For further light into this History, I thinke it not amisse to set downe what Hauithon or Anthony the Armenian hath written of the Tartarian beginnings. This our Authour royally descended in Armenia, where he liued about three hundred yeares since, and at the request of Pope Clement the fifth, writ the history of the Tartars, from Cingis or Cangius till Mengo Can, taken out of the Tartarian histories: the rest he partly saw with his eyes, and partly learned of his vncl, an eye-witnesse of the same, who had attended on Hauithon the Armenian King, in the great Chan Court. The countrey where the Tartars first dwelt (saith Hauithon) is beyond the mount Belgian, where they liued like beasts, hauing neither letters, nor faith, nor habitation, nor souldiourie, nor reputation among their neighbor-nations. There were of them diuers nations, called by one common name Mogli, which were diuided into seuen principall Tribes, whose names were Tartar, Tangut, Cumat, Talar, Sonieh, Monghi, Tebet. These al being subiects to their neighbors, a poore olde man being a Smith (who as they beleue, was ingendered of the Sun-beames) saw in his sleepe an armed man on a white horse, which said vnto him, O Cangius, The will of the immortal God is, that thou be the Gouvernor of the Tartarians, and Ruler of the seuen Nations, to free them from their bondage and tribute. This his vision, when he reported to others, they would not beleue him, vntill that the night following, the chief men amongst themselves saw the same man, with command from the immortal God, to yeeld obedience vnto Cangius. This they performed with all reuerence, and spread in the midst of them a black felt, with a seat thereon, on which the seuen Princes or chiefe men placed Cangius, calling him Can, that is, Emperour, and kneeled before him. This happily was then the most sumptuous * Throne their State could afford, but continued in the royall inuestiture of their succeeding Soveraignes, their exceeding riches and conquests notwithstanding: at two of which solemnities (saith our Author) I my selfe haue beene present. Cangius thus inthronized on his felt, commanded them many things: first to beleue the immortal God; and from thence forwards, the Tartars beganne to call vpon the name of the immortal God, seeking for his ayde in all their enterprises: secondly, he commanded to make a generall view of all such as were able to beare armes, appointing Captaines ouer troops, ouer thousands, and ouer ten thousands, which made a full regiment. Hee commanded also those seuen principall heads of their Tribes, to betraue themselves of their dignities; and for further tryall of their obedience, each of them to bring thither his eldest sonne, and to cut off his head, each with his owne hand: which they refused not to doe, in reuerence to that Diuine ordinance, whereby hee was made their Soveraigne. Cangius hauing thus made tryall of their fidelitie, subdued many nations: and one day hauing his horse slaine in battell vnder him, was forsaken of his Tartars, depaying his recovery after they saw him fall, and might easily haue been slaine, had not his enemies through ignorance neglected him, to pursue the rest: which Cangius perceiving conieied himselfe into a thicket of shrubs; and when his enemies returned to despoyle the dead, an Owle came and sat on the shrub, vnder which Cangius was hidden, which caused them not to suspect any to lurk there, so they departed. He the next night fled to his people; who seeing him, and hearing the order of his escape, gaue thanks to the immortall God, who by meanes of that bird had preserved him. They also had (after this) that * fowle in such reuerence, that it is accounted a happy thing to weare one of her feathers on their heads. Cangius afterwards assauleing his enemies brought vnder, both them, and all the countries on that side of Belgian. The time of these things Haithon could not learne, notwithstanding his much inquierie which he imputeth to their want of letters at that time.

These countries thus conquered, the armed man appeared to him the second time, and commanded him in the name of the immortall God to passe the Mountaine Belgian, and goe toward the West, where he should conquer Kingdomes, Seignories and Landes. And that thou mayest be assured that this is the will of God, arise and go with thy people towards the mountaine, to that part which ioyneth on the Sea: There thou shalt dismount, and turne thee toward the East, and kneeling downe nine times, shake worshipp the immortall God, and hee which is Almighty shall shew thee the way by which thou mayest commodiously passe. Cangius presently commands his people with their wiues, and families to accompany him in this enterprife; and when they were come to the Sea, forgat not with his followers to performe those nine worshippes; and staying there that night in his prayers, the next day he saw that the Sea had gone nine foote backe from the Mountaine; and left a spacious way, by which they with all their substance passed Westward. Hence it is that the Tartars ascribe some happinesse to the number of nine: and he that will offer a present to any Tartarian Signor, must offer nine * things, which custome they vse in their tributes vnto this day, as Mr. Ienkinson found by experience to his cost. Cangius after many aduentures, and many lawes which of him were called Iasack Cangis Can, hauing first perswaded his twelue sonnes (wherin I thinke his nephews were also reckoned) to concord, bidding each of them to bring him an arrow, which together, none of them; asunder, the least of them might easily breake; he died.

of nine.

This Historie of Cingis or Cangius I haue thus fully related, for knowledge both of the beginnings of their State and Religion: and if these Visions seeme fabulous, yet might Cingis in his subtiltie deale with them, as Mahomet with his Arabians, or Numa with the Romanes; the one making Gabriel, the other Ageria, Authours of their policies: and what he in part pretended, might by Fame and Time be augmented. Although I see not, but that this Historie of Cingis may as well be credited, as that of Alexander in Iosephus, to whom appeared one in the habite of the Iewish High Priest, commanding him to vndertake that enterprife, with promise of assistance; for which cause, he whom the world worshipped as a King, and as a God, did worship, himselfe prostrate before Iaddus the High Priest. And the same Author also saith, that the Pamphylian Sea diuided it selfe to giue way vnto his Macedonian souldiers, hauing no other way to destroy the Empire of the Persians.

To returne to our Frier with whom we beganne; he reporteth<sup>m</sup> that Cingis, after his victorie against the Naimani, warred vpon the Kythayans, but were ouerthrowne, and all the Nobles, except seuen, slaine. Hauing breathed himselfe a while at home, he invaded the Huyri, a Christian people of the Nestorian Sect, whome they ouercame, and receiued of their letters, of which before they were ignorant. After them; hee subdued the Saroyur, Karanites, and Hudirar. This done, hee waged warre against the Kythayans or Cathayans, whose Emperour hee shut vp into his chiefe Citie, where Cingis besieged him, till that victuall fayling in his Campe, he commaunded that they should eate every tenth man of the Armie. They of the Citie fought valiantly with Engines, Darts, Arrowes: and when Stones wanted, they threw Siluer, especially moken Siluer. But by vndermining the Tartars made way from the Armie into the midst of the Citie, where they issued vp, and opened the gates by force, and slew the Citizens. This is the first time that the Emperour of the Kathayans being vanquished, Cingis Chan obtained the Empire. The mens Kytay* are Pagans, having a speciall kinde of writing by themselves, and, as it is reported, the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament. They have also recorded in histories the lives of their forefathers, and they have Eremites, and certaine houses made after the maner of our Churches, which in those daies they greatly resorted vnto. They say, that they haue diuers Saints also, and they worship one God. They adore and reuerence Christ Iesus our Lord, and beleeue the Article of eternall life, but are not baptized. They doe also honorably esteeme and reuerence our Scriptures. They loue Christians, and bestow much almes, and are a very courteous and gentle people. They haue no beards, and they agree partly with the Mongals in the disposition of their countenance. There are not better Artificers in the world. Their Countrey is exceeding rich in Corne, Wine, Gold, Silke, and other commodities. Of their writing, Forer Bacon, from the Relations of W. Rubruck, which liued in his time, and Rubruck himselfe (as in the Manuscript thereof appeareth) testifie that it was done with pencils and in characters: as the Chinese and Iapones still vse. The Suyes write from the top to the bottome of the page, and from the left hand to the right: the men of Tartary as we doe: those of Tangut from the right hand to the left, but multiply their lines upwards. The Cathayans (saith Rubruck) are little men, and speake thorow the nose. They are good artificers, the son succeeding in the fathers trade. Their Physicians deale with hearbes, but not with vynes. There were amongst them Nestorians, who had a Bishop residing in Segni; Their bookes were in Syriack: themselves ignorant of that tongue. They were drunkards, vsurers, and some of them had many wives. They washed their lower parts when they entered their Churches: they feast and eat flesh on Fridaies, as the Saracens. Their Bishop visits them scarce once in 50. yeeres. And then all their males, even infants also, are ordered Priests. The Idolaters amongst them are more wilde, some of which weare yellow broad cowles: some are Eremites, and leade an heretick life in woods and hills. Cathay had not then any vynes, but they made drinke of life, wherewith they also tooke a kinde of aper, which would drinke themselves drunken with that pleasant liquor: out of whose neckes they tooke the blood wherewith they died purple.

After the conquest of Cathay, Cyngis sent his sonne, Thosut Can (for so they termed him also) against the people of Comania, whom hee vanquished. Another sonne he sent against the Indians, who subdued India Minor. These Indians are the blacke Saracens*, which are also called Aethiopijs. Thence he marched to fight against Christians, dwelling in India Maior, whose King was commonly called Presbyter Iohn, who by a stratageme repelled them out of his dominion. In travelling homewards, the said Armie of the Mongals came vnto the Land of Bairthabert, the inhabitants whereof are Pagans, and conquered the people in battaile. This people haue a strange custome: When any mans father dieth, he assemblith all his kindred and they eat him. They haue no beards, but with an iron instrument plucke out the haire, if any grow. Cyngis himselfe went vnto the Land of Kergis, which they then conquered not. And in his returne home his people suffered extreme famine: and by chance finding the fresh skilles of a beast; they cast a way the dunn, sod it, and brought it before Cyngis, and did eat thereof. Hereupon Cyngis enquired, That neither the blood, nor the entrilles, nor any other part of a beast, which might be eaten, should be cast away: saue onely the dunn. He was afterward slaine by a thunder clap, leauing behinde him foure sons; the first Occoday, the second Thosut Can, the third Thiaday, the name of the fourth is not knowne.

Cyngis being dead, Occoday was chosen Emperor. He sent Duke Batby his nephew, the sonne of Thosut Can, against the Countrey of Athysaldan, and the people called Zistmyn, who were Saracens, but spake the Language of Comania, whom he subdued. Thence they marched against Orna, a Port Towne on the Riuier Don, where were many Gozarians, Alanians, Russians, and Saracens, which he drowned with the Riuier running thorow the Citie, turning it out of the chanell. Thence they passed into Russia, and made foule hauocke there, destroying Kiou, the chiefe Citie. They proceeded against the Hungarians and Polonians, and in their returne invaded the Mordua, being Pagans, and conquered them in battaile. Then they marched against the people called called Byleri, or Bulgaria magna, and utterly wasted the Countrey. From hence they proceeded towards the North against the people called Bassarci, or Hungaria magna, and having conquered them, subdued also the Parossitz and Samogetz, thence proceeding vnto the Ocean Sea.

The Kergis.

At the same time Ocoday sent Cyrpodan against Kergis, who subdued them in battaile. These are Pagans, hauing no beards at all. They haue a custome, when any of their fathers die, in token of lamentation, to draw (as it were) a Leather thong ouerthwart their faces, from one eare to the other. Hence hee marched with his forces Southward against the Armenians, which they conquered, with part of Georgia, receiuing tribute of the other part; and from thence into the Dominions of the mighty Soldan, called Dentum, whom they vanquished in fight. And to be short, they went on further, sacking and conquering euen vnto the Soldan of Aleppo, whose Countrey they subdued. They marched against the Caliph of Baldach, and exacted at his hands the daily tribute of foure hundred Byzantines, besides Baldakines, and other gifts. Thus farre of their Conquests out of Frier Iohn aforesaid, who was in person with Dethy, or Baydo, and at the Court of Gnime the Emperour.

n Haithon Armen.

Haithon calleth Baydo the second sonne of Ocoday, or Heecota Can, affirming, That he sent his three sonnes; Iosbi into the West, as farre as Tygris; Baydo towards the North; and Chagaday towards the South. Hee sent also one Baydo (whether the same, or another) with thirte thousand horse, against the Soldan of the Turkes, whose Realme he subdued in the yeere 1244. He addeth, That Baydo hauing conquered Cumania, (which he confineth on the East with the Corassians, on the West with the Euxine, on the North with Cassia, haply Casan, on the South with the River Etil) he subdued Russia, Gazaria, Bulgaria, and so passing into Austria, following the stream of his victories, in the passage of a great streame was there drowned. His heires succeeded him in the places which he had conquered; which Seignorie Tschay possessed in Haithon time. This Historie of Baydo his death is not likely: For Yves of Narbonne, in an Epistle to the Archbishop of Burdeaux, recorded by Matth. Paris in the yeere 1243. saith, That in the same present Summer they had departed out of Hungary, and laid siege to Neustat, wherein this Yves then was: and in the yeere 1246. Frier Iohn was with the said Baydo, who also rehearseth that Hungarian Expedition, and his returne vnto those parts about Volga, or Etil. Likewise William de Rubruquis, a Minorite, was sent to Baanu (so hee calleth him) from Lewes the French King, in Ann. 1253.

And to this agreeth Matthias à Michon in his Sarmatian Historie, who writeth, That in the yeere 1241. the Tartars, vnder Batou, came into Russia, and destroyed Koua, a Citie before stately and beautifull, hauing in it three hundred Churches and more, very faire, of which some remaine to this day among the shrubs and briers, receptacles for wilde beasts. It was the Seat of the Metropolitan, who had vnder him many Bishops thorow Moldauia, Valachia, Russia, and Muscovia. He sent Pita into Polonia, who destroyed the Countrey, and on Ashwednesday turned Craecouia into ashes, abandoned before both of the Prince and People; and after ouerthrew Duke Henric, and other Noblemen, with the forces of the Countrey assembled against them, together with Pompo, the great Master of the Dutch Order in Prussia: in which battaile a certaine Tartarian Standard-bearer, carrying in a great Standard the Greeke letter X, and on the top of the staffe a blacke and terrible Image, with a long beard, began with inchantment strongly to shake the head of the Image: whereupon a smoake and cloud of intolerable stinke was presently dispersed ouer the Polonians, and they became heartlesse and vnable to fight. Duke Henric, and Duke Baleslau, and Pompo, with the flower of their Nobilitie, was heere slaine, and the Countrey miserably spoiled: From hence they went into Morauia, where they put all to fire and sword more then a moneth together: and thence to Hungary to Batby, who entred Hungary with 50000 souldiers; where first ouerthrowing those forces which King Bela had sent to prohibit them passage, they after chased the King himselfe, with the power of his kingdom opposing himselfe against them, out of the field, who fled into Austria, and after into Sclauonia, leauing his Countrey a pray to the Tartars: who making spoile on that side of Danubius, the next Winter passed over the River, then frozen, and filled all with blood and slaughter. Baiby sent Cadan to pursue the King into Sclavonia, still fleeing before him, who wasted Bosnia, Servia, and Bulgaria. And after two yeeres sackage in Hungarie, they passed by the sennes of Mazotis into Tartaria, and haply had returned to make fresh spoiles in Europe, if the Embassage of Pope Innocent had not diverted their purpose: or rather, that Occoday their great Chan being about that time poisoned, they were to expect a new Commission from his successeur, which was Cuine; who when he was installed, even in the presence of Frier John, the Popes Legat, erected a Banner against all Kingdomes of the Christians, except they would be subiect to him: for their intent was to subdue all the world, as Cyngis Chan had ordained; and the superscription of his Seale was, God in Heauen, and Cuine Chan vpon Earth, the strength of God, the Seale of the Emperour of all men. He kept his Court vsually in the land of the Naymans, the plaines whereof were extended like to the sea, without descending of any hill. The cold most eager and sharpe till March, little winde, nor snow, except in the end of Aprill. At Caracarum Rubruquis met with an English man borne in Hungaria, which was expert in many languages: his name was Basilus. Heere he found two Moschees and one Church.

But Cuine in short time after died, and left the Empire to Mangu Can; to whom Agan, the Armenian King went voluntarily in person, about the yeere 1257. and receiving gracious entertainment, made vnto him seuen petitions: first, That he and his people should become Christians: secondly, That there should bee perpetuall peace betweene the Tartars and Christians: thirdly, That in all Countries conquered by the Tartars, the Churches and Clergie-men of the Christians should be free from servitude and tribute: fourthly, That he would redeeme the Holy Sepulchre and the Holy Land from the Saracens: fifthly, That he would destroy the Caliph of Baldack: sixthly, That himselfe might haue aid, as need should require, in his defence, of such Tartars as were neere vnto Armenia: seventhly, That such parts of Armenia as the Saracens now possessed, and the Tartars should recouer from them, might returne to the Crowne of Armenia. Mangu-can answered, after deliberation with his Nobles, to the first, That himselfe would be a Christian, and perswade other his subiects, but force none thereunto: and to the rest in order, that his requests in all should be fulfilled, and to that end he would send his brother Hasan into those parts, as is before already shewed. Thus was Mangu baptized by a Bishop, then Chauncellor of Armenia, and all his household, and many Nobles of both sexes. But before Ierusalem could be recovered, Mangu died, and Cobila, or Cublai Can succeeded, in whose time M. Paulus was an eye-witnesse of the Tartarian proceedings, who affirmeth, That this Cublai exceeded in power, not his predeceessours onely, but all the Kingdomes of Christians and Saracens, although they were ioined in one. Before hee obtained the Soueraintie, he shewed himselfe a valiant souldier: but after hee was Emperour, hee neuer fought field but once against Naiam his vncle, who was able, out of the Provinces wherein hee governed, to bring together foure hundred thousand Horse, to whom Caidu should haue added a hundred thousand Horse more. These both conspired against their Master and Lord Cublai: but before their forces were ioined, Caidu stopping the passages, that none might passe to carrie newes, suddenly assembled, within ten daies iourney of Cambalu, three hundred and threescore thousand horse, and a hundred thousand footmen. With this power riding day and night, hee came suddenly on his enemies, and hauing first consulted with his Diuiners, after their manner, gaue the on-set, and tooke Naiam prisoner, whom he strangled betwixt two Outposts, lest the Earth should drinke, or the Sunne should see the blood of that imperiall familie. Naiam had bene secretly baptized, and now also had the Crosse for his Banner, which occasioned the Iewes and Saracens to scoffe at the Christians: but Cublai vnderstanding heereof, called them all before him, and said, That the Crosse would not helpe such wicked men as Naiam, who was a Traitor to his Lord; say yee me therefore, that the God of the Christians is vniust, to forsake his followers; for hee is the chiefe Bountie and Iustice. Cublai by his Captaines conquered the Kingdomes of Sien, Bengala, Mangi, &c.

And all these liued in the Westerne bounds of the Tartarian Empire, euery way inferior in wealth and numbers to the Southerly and Easterly parts thereof.

Tarik Mirkand a Persian, in his Catalogue of the Cans or Tartarian Emperours, calleth Cublai, by a transposition of the syllables, Ulai. For thus doth he recite their names with the yeeres of their coronations. Chingays in the yeere of the hegire 600. Otkay Khaon 626. Goyuk Khaon 643. Manchu Khaon 644. Ulai Khaon 657. Haykay Khaon 663. Hamed Khan or Nicudar Oglan 680. Argon Khan 683. Ganiar Khan 690. Budukhan 693. Gazunkhan 694. Ahyapukhan 703. Salter Khan 716. For Haykay seemeth the same which Polo calles Hochtay in the kingdome of Cumania. And Mirkand speaketh of them as commanding in Persia: after whom in the 789. of the heg. he mentioneth Teymurlang (the varietie of language easily varieth the proper names) in 807. Murad Carrok, 850. Ologhbek, and so proceedeth with the gouernours of Persia, whence Paramont or deputed: whence small light accrueeth to the Tartarian Historie. I haue seene the transcript of a letter sent by K. Edward the Second, written 1307. the first yeere of his reigne, Octob. 16. to Disolgius King of the Tartars, against Mahomet and in behalfe of William Liddensis Episcopus and others to preach to his people. But these Tartars it seemeth were of the neerer Mahumetans, and not the great Can of Cathay.

CHAPTER XII.

A Continuation of the Tartarian Historie, and the question discussed, whether Cathay and China be the same.

Since Tamor Can, we haue not so continued a Historie of their Empire and Emperours as before, and yet we haue had succeeding testimonies a long time of their State and Magnificence, but neither so diligent obseruers, nor so exact Writers as the former: besides that, their Histories seeme in some things more fabulous. Of this later sort are Odoricus, a Frier, which liued three yeeres in the Emperours Court, and trauelled as farre as Quinsay, who died in the yeere 1331. Sir Iohn Mandeuile a Countryman spent many yeeres in those Countries a few yeeres after Odoricus, and writ the Historie of his Trauels in the reigne of Edward the third of England; Edmund Can being then Emperour of the Tartars: in which, if many things seeme not worthy credit, yet are they such as Odoricus, or some others, nor of the worst Authors, had before committed to writing, and haply by others after his time, in those daies when printing wanted, soisted into his booke. Once, hee setteth downe the distances and passages of Countries so exactly, as I thinke hee could not then haue learned but by his owne Trauels. After his time Nicobolo di Conti, a Venetian, trauelled thorough India and Cathay, after fife and twentie yeeres returning home: and going to Emperour the fourth, then Pope, to be absolved, because hee had denied the Christian Faith to saue his life, his enioined penance was, truly to relate to Poggini the Popes Secretary his long peregrination: This was in the yeere 1444. About the same time Iosaphat Barbaro, a Venetian, in the yeere 1436. had learned of a Tartarian Embassadour (which had bene at Cambalu, and returning by Tana, was entertained of the said Iosaphat) some particulars touching the great Cham and Cathay, some part whereof hee heard after after confirmed by the mouth of Uzun-cassan, the mightie Persian King, in the yeare 1494: So that from the yeare 1246. thus farre we haue a continyed succession of the Cathayan Historie, besides that which an Arabian<sup>a</sup> hath written in his Historie of Tamurlane, now extant in English.

I am the more curious in naming these Authors, lest any should thinke that which is written of this people to be fabulous (all these, in a manner, concurring in the most substantiall things) or should confound, as diuers<sup>b</sup> lately haue done, the Countries and affaires of China and Cathay. The cause of both these errours is, because that in these last hundred yeares and more, in which more of the World then euer before hath bene discovered, yet nothing of moment is found out of this Countrey or People. Whereunto may be answered, That since, diuers of the great Tartarian Lords, before subjects to the great Cham, hauing made themselves absolute Lords of their seuerall States, the way hath not bene so open to passe, being otherwise of it selfe exceeding-ly both long, difficult, and dangerous: and the adioyning Princes recouering themselves from Tartarian seruitude, will neither suffer their owne to goe out, nor others freely to enter their Dominions; as the Muscouite, the King of China, and others. M. de Lencinson, which went as farre thither-ward as Bogharre, could not passe further for warres in those parts. Neither haue any gone thither by sea. And yet even in this time we haue not altogether wanted witnesses. Ludovicus Vertomannus, an hundred yeares since, in Bengala met with diuers Christians, who affirmed, that there were in their Countrey diuers Signiors, Christians, subiect to the great Cham. These were white men, of a Citie called Sarnau. In M. Hakluyts painefull labours we may reade of diuers passages out of Russia and Persia by Carauans into Cathay. Ramusius also, in his Annotations<sup>c</sup> before M. Paulus, telleth of one Chaggai Memet, a Persian Merchant, who had bene at Campion and Succuir in Catay (Damircan then raigning) and had acquainted him with diuers particulars thereof.

Also in the Epistle of Emmanuel Carualis, a Iesuit, dated at Malaca in Ianuarie, 1599, is contained the transcript of Ieronus Xanerius his letter from Lahor, the Citie Royall of the great Mogor, dated August 1598. Wherein the Iesuit relateth, That whiles he was in conference with the Prince, there entred into the Pallace an old man of Mahometts Religion, threescore yeares of age, who affirmed to the Prince, That he had come from Xatai by the way of Mecca. Presently some which knew him, affirmed, That he had distributed in almes an hundred thousand peeces of gold at Mecca. The Prince asking if it were so, he affirmed, that he did it because he was old, and could not long live, nor carry those things away with him. Being demanded of the State of Xatai, he answered, That he had there liued thirteene yeares in the Citie Royall, Xambalu, the King whereof was very mightie, and had in his Empire a thousand and fiftie Cities, some of them very populous. He said, he had often seene the King, with whom no man speaketh but by a supplication, nor is answered but by an Eunuch. Being asked how he had access thither, he answered, That he sustained the person as well of the Embassador of the King of Caygar, as of a Merchant: and being detained in the first City by the Magistrate, he shewed his Commission, and post was presently sent to the King, who returned in a moneth, riding ninie or an hundred miles a day, with change of Horses, bringing him letters of admission. No man was troublesome to him in the way. They punish theeuers severely (which also is obserued of the Cathayans in Iosapha Barbari, and in Marcus Paulus afore said.) The people he affirmed were white, comely, long-bearded, and very personable. In Religion hee said they were Issauites, (or Christians, professors of Iesus) and some among them Mussauites, or Iewes, and many Mahometans, who hoped to draw the King, being a Christian, to their Sect. The Iesuit addeth, That he further conferred with him another day about their Religion, who told him that they had many Churches, and some very great; many Images, both painted and carued, especially of the Crucifixe, which they religiously worship. Euery Church hath his Priest much reuerenced. The Priests liued single, and kept Schooles, wherein they instructed the youth, which should after take Orders: they had also one among the Priests supereminent, and were all maintained at the Kings costs, as were the Churches also both built and repaired. They wore blacke clothes, and on Holy dayes, red; with Caps much like the Iesuites, but greater. He added, That he had often seene the King go to Church: That there were many of both Sexes, which in Cloysters liued a Monasticall life, some obseruing also a single life in their owne houses. He reported, That the Countrey was rich, and had in it many Mines of Siluer: the King had foure hundred Elephants, which they said were brought from Malaca. And from Pegu also he said, that Merchants resorted thither, which voyage was halfe a yeare (it becometh thorow the sea betweene China and Japan.) Xauierius addeth, That while he was at Caximir, he heard of many Christians in Rebat, a Kingdome ioyning to Xasai, who had Churches, Priests, and Bishops, to whom he had written three wayes in the Portugall and the Persian Tongues.

The greatest obiection against this Historie, that distinguisheth Cathay from China, is the report of Jacob Pantogio <sup>1</sup>, a Iesuit, in a letter dated from Panquin, the Seat Royall of China, in March 1602. in which he blameth a double error of our Mappers, both for making China larger then it is, and for adioyning to the same this questionable Kingdome of Cathay, whereas (saith he) China, or Sina, is Cathay, and this Panquin, where now we liue, is Cambalu. This he proueth by the incredible riches which hee here saw, agreeing to that which is commonly reported of Cathay, and by the testimony of certaine Moores and Mahometans, whom he found in Panquin, which yearly, every fift yeare, resort hither vnder shew of an Embassage, and paying of Tributes, indeed for gaine, by way of traffique: (their tribute meane-while obtaining sufficient retribution out of the Kings Coffers, who sustaineth them and theirs, all the time of their abode in China, at his owne costs, besides other gifts.) Of these Merchants, which resorted hither out of Persia and the Countrey of the Mogores, the Iesuits by enquirie learned, that this countrey of China was called Cathay, and had no other name in Persia, and among the Mogores, nor did they know any other Countrey so called. And asking further, how they called the Citie Panquin, they answered, Cambalu: whereupon the Iesuit concludeth without all scruple, as is said. And againe, in the Chinian Epistles, dated 1607, is reported, That <sup>2</sup> Benedictus Goes (seuen fixe yeares since the Iesuites by the way of Mogor to finde out Cathay.) remained in the borders of China, in the Prouince of Xanti, from whence he writ, Anno 1606. That hee could finde no other Catay then the Kingdome of China. This report furthereth Pantogio's opinion.

But if it be not sufficient to oppose the former report of Xauier to these of Pantogio and Goes, and the different qualities of the Chinians and Cathayans (as in their proper places shall follow) both in things priuate and publike; Diuine and Humane; I answer, That the name Cambalu is by Marcus Paulus and others interpreted The Citie of the Prince, or Cam. And Perera <sup>3</sup> interpreteth Pachin, or Paquin, where the King of China alwayes resideth, to signifie the Towne of the Kingdome, as hee was there aduertised, the same signification (in manner) remaining to the diuers appellations in differing Languages, as a common name to be applied to any Citie. <sup>4</sup> Royal. This Perera was himselfe a long time prisoner there, and accounted it a wonder one Citie to meete with a few Moores, who were detained in China hauing come thither twentie yeares before, and were permitted the vse of their Religion; of which they could say almost nothing; but Mahomet was a Moore, and their father was a Moore, and I am a Moore, with some other words of their Alcoran; wherewithall and in abstinence from Swines flesh, they liue (saith hee) till the Diuell take them. And yet the report of Xauier telleth vs, That the Moores are many and mightie in Cathay; of Iewes I remember not the mention of them in any Chinian relation: of Christians, which (he saith) is the Religion in Cathay, there are not to my knowledge, except some late gleanings of the Iesuits, any reported to be at all in China, but at Xosifi, at Xucheo, which also were aliens, as appeareth by their complexion, long beards, and the vse of Bells.

And whereas in China theues and malefactors are seldome executed (and none hath power to execute any without speciall Commission from the King) but either they die by stripes, hunger, or imprisonment, except some few once in a yeare. Marcus Paulus and Iosafa Barbaro, from the relation of eye-witnesses, affirme, That in Cambalu course directly East, or inclining to the South, must have been taken, if China had beene Catai. Neither is it likely that their journey would have beene so much lested by Frosts and Snowes. The same may be gathered out of the discourses following in Marcus Paulus, where he abuteth the Countries in succeeding linkes to Cathay, from the East, to the Northwards, and from the North-east declining Westward reckoning from thence. And whereas Pantogia raiseth the most Northerly part of China but to two and fortie degrees at the most, wherein, as to an eye-witnesse we yeeld him credit: How can it stand with reason, how can it bee likely that in those temperate climates, the world can yeeld but a few Nations; and those base Moores, and Ethiopians, when as a good part of Spaine, halfe Italy, Greece, all France, Germany, and Hungarie (to omit other wealthy parts of the world) are subiect to the same parallels? And indeed herein Pantogia hath well helped vs, whereas our moderne Mappes have called no small scruple to a diligent obseruer, in placing Cathay, a Countrey reported to be so fertile and ciuill in so Northerly a climate, very indiscreetly raising Cambalu to the height of sixtie degrees, and paralleling Cathay with Norway: which cannot stand with other things thereof reported, howsoeuer the Tartars themselves were happy of a more Northerly climate then this mentioned. Others goe not so farre, yet they place Cambalu too farre within land, which Paulus saith is within two dayes journey of the Sea. It seemeth that now this great Tartarian Prince hath no strength at Sea, and therefore is the lesse knowne. And herein participate other great and mightie Princes, Prestor Iohn (so called) of Ethiopia in Africa, and the Sepbi, and great Mogor, in Asia; ranked iustly amongst the greatest Emperours of the world: who hauing some part of their Dominion adioyning to the Sea, make little or no vse thereof. Abulfeda a Syrian Prince, who wrote an exact Geographie in Arabike, about three hundred yeares since, placeth Cambalu in 144. 8. Long. and 25. 25. Latit. it may happily bee 45. degrees in Latitude, one Figure being falsified, or else inuerted for 51. And as this Latitude disagreeeth from that of Paquin, so the Longitude a great deal more.

d Marc. Paulus lib. 2, cap. 60.

Thus much haue I thought good to dispute touching that difficult and hard question of Cathay and China: which though it will be tedious to some, yet to the curious may seeme short enough; although somewhat else may be obserued to this purpose the particulars of China, and Cathay following: this confirming my opinion further, that Chaggi Momet, Mar. Polo, Mandevill, Odericus, Nicolas de Conti, and others, who witnesseth, speake of China or Mangi, and of Cathay, as diuers Countries.

And Farsur King of Mangi possessed his Countries, now knowne by the name of China, in peace till An. 1269. being counted a richer Countrey then Cathay itself, which was conquered before; if we vnderstand it properly; and Cambalu seemeth to be the Citie wherein Gingis the first Cham besieged and tooke the Cathayan Emperour. Paulus also mentioneth among the greatest Cities of Mangi, Pangbin, and Nanpin, which sound to be the same with Paquin and Nanquin; reporting further that Mogor alone had in it a thousand and two hundred great, rich, and illustrious Cities: (as much as is reported of whole China, and more) and that after Gubli Can had conquered that State, he diuided it into nine tributarie Kingdomes, gouerned by so many Vice-royes vnder him, (which possibly the Chinois recovering diuided into fiftie; as now they reckon them, except we thinke that expelling the Tartars they added some parts of Cathay also to their Kingdome) And these Cities he fortified with Garisons, not of the Naturall inhabitants, but of Cathay. And these things are reported by him who long liued in these parts; Et non interfuit solum sed etiam presens, et quinquaginta magna fuit; possessing the place of Governour vnder the Cap three yeares: (according to the Tartarian custome) in Yung, one of the chiefe Cities of Mangi, hauing vnder it seuen and twentie other Cities: and the whole Province of Mangi he placeth South-East from Cathay. And wherefore doth the King of China alwayes abhorre Paquin, in the Northerly part of his Kingdome, but as all which write hereof be firme, because of the Tartars which from those parts conquered the Kingdome; which if they were so base a people, as Pantogia affirmeth; could not bee so dreadful to the Chinois, that their King for their sakes should there make his residence in the skin shires and borders of the Kingdome. Albacen a learned Arabian wrote the History of Tamerlane's life, wherein he telleth of the great Chan of Cambalu, and the King of China: as diuers Princes of diuers Countries, one of which accrewed to Tamerlane's by marriage of the Chan's onely Daughter, and the other by conquest. What needed such a wall (which I my selfe haue scene drawne in a Mappe of China of a verie large forme, and made in China it selfe with Chinian characters, hanging in Master Hakluts chamber at Westminster) made by the Chinois, if the Tartars were not mightie neighbours, especially themselves being so mightie and populous?

For my part I cannot but thinke that in so great a tract as is situate to the North of China, there is now, as there haue beene of old, many Cities, and a Tartarian or Cathayan Kingdome, although it remaine yet vnknowne. And who knew that there was such a Kingdome as China an hundred yeares agoe? Or who hath failed that way to finde this, since? And how long was it before it was knowne in our world that there was such a Prince in the world, as the great Negus, aboue mentioned, in Aethiopia; especially hee hauing no shippes for warre or Merchandize, nor many (if any) good hauens by Sea to make himselfe knowne: and within land Namethat as it were imprisoned him, barring vp the passages with Mountaines and deserts: which seemeth now to bee the case of the Cathayan; furthered by the jealousy of many great Princes, not to admit any Forreiner in, or license any of theirs to passe out, for feare of innouation. Sed plenum alea est, saith Scaliger, de ys all- quid habere qua nobis per caliginem dumtaxat nota sunt. It is hard to determine in these mistie mysteries. Even as in Nature it falleth out that the Sunne shineth there many houres before it riseth to vs, so in Historie it may happen that there may shine a Tartarian Sunne in Cathay, when as a darke night in this longinquitie of distance hideth him from our eyes. Let euerie Reader iudge as pleaseth him: I am afraid between Cathay and China I shall get a cheeke for staying longer then becommeth a Pilgrim. Let vs now therefore minde our Pilgrimage, and take view of the Tartarian Religion: with thanks so the Iesuites for their paines, but loath to follow them in nouelties except wee be forced: the rather, because none are so ready to blame men therein as their Societie; which though they be new sprung vp, yet are Veteratores, (so Dalger fully calleth them) pretenders of Antiquitie, but nihil illis antiquius quam antiquari antiquitatem. I am indeed for their nouelties that we forsake them. Id verum quod prius. Truth and Antiquitie haue kissed each other. But let vs leaue the Iesuites, which in more necessarie matters haue left the true Antiquitie, and come to our Tartarian take.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the Religion of the Tartars, and Cathayans.

IOannes de Plano Carpini thus writeth of their Religion. They beleue that there is one God, the Maker of all things visible and inuisible, the Author of good things and punishments, yet doe they not worship him with prayers, prayses, or any certaine rites. They haue also Idolls of Felt, in the fashion of a man, and the same they set on both sides of their Tent-doores, and vnder them they put a thing of Felt fashioned like a Dugge. These they account the keepers of their Cattell, Authors of their Milke and yong flore. Others they make of Silke, and doe them much honour. Some place them in a faire Chariot covered, before the dore of their station: and who soeuer stealeth any thing out of that Chariot is slaine without all pittie. Their Captains haue one alway in the middest of their Tent. To these Idolls they offer the first fruits of their Milke: and the first morsels of their meat, and first draught of their drinke, at meales. And when they kill a beast, they offer the heart to their Idoll, leauing it before him till the morning, and then they take and eate it. They make an Idoll also to their

their Chiefe Emperour, and offer thereunto with great solemnities, as well other creatures as horses, which none after dare ride on till death. They breake not a bone of the beasts which they kill for meate, but burne them with fire. They bend themselves to this Idoll toward the South, as to a God. They worship the Sunne, Light, and Fire; Water also, and the Earth, offering thereunto the first of their meats and drinke, and in the morning before they eate or drinke. They haue no set rites prescribed by Law, nor doe they compell any to deny their religion simple; although in some of their customes they are very rigorous. Thus they martyred Michael Duke of Russia, because he refused to doe reuerence to the Image of Cingü Can, which had bene their first Emperour; and compelled the younger brother of Andrew Duke of Saruogle in Russia, to marrie his said brothers wife according to their custome, after that they had slaine her former Husband.

They haue certaine traditions, according to which they reckon these things following to be sinnes. To thrust a knife into the fire or any way touch the fire with a knife, or with their knife to take flesh out of the Cauldron, or to hew with an hatchet neere to the fire. For they thinke that they should so cut away the head of the fire. They account it sinne also to leane on the whip wherewith they beate their horses (for they ride with spurs.) Also to touch arrowes with a whip, to take or kill yong Birds, to strike an horse with the raine of their bridle, and to breake one bone against another. Like wife to powre out meat, milke, or any kinde of drinke, vpon the ground: or to nule water within their Tabernacle, which whosoever doth willingly, is slaine: but otherwise he must pay a great summe of money to the Inchanter to be purified: who entereth the Tabernacle, with all things therein, to passe betweene two fires. Besides, if any hath a morsell given him which he is not able to swallow, and for that cause swallow it out of his mouth, there is an hole made vnder his Tabernacle, by which he is drawen forth, and slaine without all compassion. Likewise whosoever treads vpon the threshold of any of the Dukes Tabernacles, he is put to death. Thus are these Gnas punished, when as hostile inuasions, murder, and such other Camels, are easily amongst them swallowed. They thinke that after death they shall liue in another world, and there multiply their castell, eate, drinke, and doe other actions of life. As a new Moone, or a full Moone, they begin all new enterprises. They call her the great Emperour, and bow their knees and pray thereto. The Sunne they say is the Moones mother, because she hath thence her light.

Their Sorceries.

They are giuen to Diuinations, Auguries, Sooth-sayings, Witchcrafts, Incantments: and when they receiue answer from the Diuell, they attribute the same to God, whom they call Itoga, and the Comanians call him Chan, that is, Emperour, whom they maruellously feare and reuerence, offering to him many Oblations, and the first fruits of their meate and drinke. According to his answer they dispose all things. They beleue that all things are purged by fire: therefore when any Embassadors, Princes, or other Personages whatsoever, come vnto them, they and their gifts must passe betweene two fires to be purified, lest peraduenture they haue practised some Witchcraft, or haue brought some poyson or other mischief with them. And if fire fall from heauen vpon men or beasts, which there often hapneth; or if they thinke themselves any way defiled or vnclane, they thus are purified by their Inchanters. If any be sicke, a speare is set vp in his Tent with blacke Felt welted about it, and from thenceforth, no stranger entereth therein. For none of them which are present at his death, may enter the hord of any Duke or Emperour, till a New-Moone. When he is dead, if he be a chiefe man, he is buried in the field where pleaseth him. And he is buried with his Tent, sitting in the middest thereof, with a Table set before him, and a platter full of meate, and a Cuppe of Mares-milke. There is also buried with him * a Mare and Colt, a Horse with bridle and saddle: and they eate another Horse, whose bones the women burne for the soule of the dead, stuffing his hide with straw, setting it also on two or foure poles, that hee may haue in the other world a Tabernacle and other things fitting for his vse. They burie his gold and siluer with him: the Chariot or Cart in which he is carried forth is broken, his Tent is destroyed, neither is it lawfull to name his name, till the third generation. They obserue also other funerall Rites, too long to rehearse. They lament their dead thirtie dayes, more or lesse. Their Parents, and those of their family are thus cleansed: They make two fires, and pitch neere thereunto two Speares; with a line from the top of the one to the other, fastening on the same line some peeces of Buckram, vnder which, and betwixt the fires, passe the men, beasts, and Tents. There stand also two women: one on this side, the other on that, casting water, and repeating certaine charmes: if any thing fall, or be broken, the inchausters haue it. And if any be slaine of Thunder, the men in the Tent must thus be cleansed, and all things in the Tent, being otherwise reputed vncleane, and not to be touched. No men are more obedient to their Lords then the Tartars. They seldome contend in wordes, neuer in deedes. They are reasonably courteous one to another: their women are chaste; adulterie is seldome heard of, and theft is rare, both punished by death. Drunkennesse common, but without bralls among themselves, or discredit among others. They are proude, greedie, deceitfull. They eate Dogs, Wolves, Foxes, Horses; and in necessitie, mans flesh, Mice, and other filthy, and that in as filthy a manner, without Gloathes, and Napkins (their Bootes and the Grasse can serue to wipe their greasie handes) they haue no Bread, Hearbes, Wine, Meate or Beere, nor doe they wash their dishes. It is a great sinne amongst them to suffer any of their food to be lost: and therefore they will not bestow a bone on a Dogge, till they haue eaten the marrow.

Their conditions,

You Narbunensis in an Epistle recited by Mat. Paris Anno 1243. reporteth the confession of an Englishman, which was taken with other Tartars by the Christians. He saith, that they called by the Name of Gods the ancient founders and fathers of their Tribes, and at severall times did solemnize feasts vnto them; many of them being particular, and but foure onely genrall. They thinke that all things are created for themselves alone. They be hardie and strong in the breast, leane and pale-faced, rough & hus-shouldered, hauing flat and short noses, long and sharpe chins; their upper jawes low and declining, their teeth long and thin, their eye-browes extending from their foreheade downe to their noses, those eyes inconstant and blacke, their thighes thicke, and legges short, yet equall to vs in stature. They are excellent Archers. Vanquished, they aske no favour; and vanquishing, they shew no compassion. They all persist as one man in their purpose of subduing the whole world.

b Mat. Paris

Their proude swelling titles appeare in the copie of those Letters of Duke Baiorthnoy and Chin Can, expressed by Vincetius. One of them beginneth thus: By the presence of the living God, Cingischam some of the sweet and worshipfull God saith, that God is high above all, the immortall God, and upon Earth Cingischam only Lorde, &c. These Letters of the Emperour, the Tartars called the Letters of God: and so beginneth Duke Baiorthnoy to the Pope, who had sent Frier Ascelline, with Alexander, Albericus, and Simon, thither in Embassage. The word of Baiorthnoy, sent by the diuine disposition of Chans, Know this O Pope, &c.

c Vincent Bel. Spec. Hist. l. vii. c. 51. & 52.

Frier Iohn, saith he, styles himselfe, The power of God, and Emperour of all men; and hath in his Seale ingrauen words of like effect, as is already shewed. Mandemill hath the same report.

Will. de Rubruquis saith, that they haue diuided Scythia amongst them, from Danubius to the Sunne rising every Capitaine knowing the bounds of his pastures which they feede, in the Winter descending Southwards, ascending in the Summer Northwards. Their houses are moueable, remoued on great Carts which containe twentie foot betweene the wheeles; their houses on each side ouer-reaching sixe foot, drawne by aboute twentie Oxen. When they take them downe, they turne the doore alwaies to the South. Over the Masters head is an Image of Felt, called the Masters brother; and another over the head of the good wife or Mistres, called her brother, fastened to the wall; and betwixt both of them is a little leane one, which is the keeper of the whole house. She hath also at her beds feete a Kidskin, filled with wooll, and a little Image looking towards the Maidens and Women. Next to the doore on the womens side (which is the East, as the mans side is on the West) there is an Image with a Cowes Veller for the women, whose office it is to milke the Kine; on the other side another with

with a Mares Ydder for the men. When they make merrie, they sprinkle their drinke vpon these Images in order, beginning at the Masters. Then goeth a seruant out of the house with a cup full of drinke, sprinkling thrice toward the South, and bowing the knee at euery time: and this is done for the honour of the Fire. Then performeth he the like superstition toward the East, for the honour of the Ayre: next to the West for the honour of the Water: and lastly, to the North, in the behalfe of the Dead. When the Master holdeth a cup in his hand to drinke, before he tasteth thereof he poureth his part vpon the ground: if hee drinke sitting on horse-backe, he first poureth part thereof on the Mane of the Horse. After the seruant aforesaid hath discharged his cups to the foure quarters of the world, he returneth to the house: and two other seruants stand readie with two cups, and two Basons, to carrie drinke vnto their Master, and that Wife, which lay with him the last night, sitting together on a bedde. Their Sooth-sayers or Inchanters are their Priests. To this may be added but of the Manuscript aboue mentioned, their Diuination by three bones, through which (being first burned blacke) the diuinor looks; and if the sight passeth straight and right, it is a good token; but if it be inwardly crooked or broken, hee then vpon this will preface ceaseth from his enterprise. (Master Jenkinson travelled with certaine Tartars, which diuined by the blade-bones of sheepe, sodde and then burnt to powder, which being mingled with the blood of the sheepe, they writ therewith certaine characters, with diuers wordes and ceremonies; and thence diuined of their success, which they found true to their cost). They vse diuination also by foure swords. Mang desired a conference betwixt the Christians, Saracens, and Idolaters, to see which of them could make best proof of his Religion. The Mosl Tartars professed to believe one onely God, the Author of life and death: but as the hand, which is one, hath diuers fingers, so thought he and they, that this one God was pleased with diuers wayes of deuotion. Their Priests were diuiners: they were many, but had one Capitaine or chiefe Bishop, who alwayes placed his house or Tent before that of the Great Can about a stones cast distant. He had charge of the Waine, which carried the Idols: the other Priests had their places appointed them. Some of them were Astrologers, specially that High-Priest, which foretold the eclipses of the Moone. All the people prouided them their meat, that they might not goe out of their Tent. When an Eclipse happens they sound their Organs and Timbrells, and make a great noyse: and when it is past they make great feasting, drinking, and mirth. They foretell holy dayes, and those which are vnluckie for enterprises. No warres are begunne or made without their word. They cause all presents which are sent to the Can to passe through the fire: they purifie the household of the dead by the like rite, which before may not be touched. On the ninth day of May they assemble all the white Mares, and hallow them: at which the Christians must be present with their Censers. They then cast on the ground new * Cosmos, and make a great feast. They foretell the destinies of Infants newly borne: and when one is sicke, they diuine by charmes whether the disease be naturall, or proceed of sorcerie. They are them selues Witches, Slaundersers, Inuoluers of the Diuell: this they doe in the night, setting flesh in the middes of the house, and boyled, vsing charmes, Timbrells, and falling into mad fits are bound. Then comes the Diuell and giues them answers. Thus touch Rubruquis.

Ad. Paulus thus reporteth of their Religion: They say that there is a God on high in heauen, of whom lifting vp their hands, and smiting their teeth three times together, euery day with Censer and Incense they desire health, and vnderstanding. They place a Table aloft, in the wall of their house, in the which is written a name, that representeth this God. They haue another, which they call Natigay (or Itogay) of felt or other stoffe in euery house. They make him a Wife and Children, and set his Wife on the left hand, and his Children before him, which seeme to doe him reuerence. Thus they call the God of earthly things, which keepeth their children, beasts, and come: and when they eat they annoint his mouth with the fat, and the mouthes of his wife and children, and then cast out the brood out of the doore vnto other spirits. And when their God hath had his part, they take theirs. Of this Natigay, they with like ceremonies ties of lifting up their hands, and smiting of their teeth, desire temperature of the ayre, fruits of the earth, children, and such like. Their wiues are exceeding chaste and obseruant: and though they be many, yet can Rachel and Leah, yea, ten or twentie of them, agree with a marvellous vaioy, intent vnto their houshold, and other businesse, whereby they are gainfull, and not chargeable to their Husbands. When they marrie, the Husband couenanteith with the father of the Mayde; who hauing giuen him power to take her wherefoeuer he shall finde her, he seeketh her among some of her friends, where she hath then of purpose hidden her selfe, and by a kinde of force carrieth her away. They marrie with any, except their owne Mother and Sister. Their Widdowes seldome marrie, because of their seruice to their former Husbands in an other world; except the sonne marrie his fathers wiues, or the brother his brothers, because they can there in the next world, bee content to resigne them to their former Husbands againe. The women buy, sell, and provide all necessities into the house, the men intending nothing but their Armes, Hunting and Hawking. If one hath buried a Male-child, and another a Female, the parents contract a marriage betwixt thole two, and painting in papers, Seruantes, Horses, Clothes, and Houshold, and making writings for the confirmation of the Dowry, burne these things in the fire, by the smoke wherof they (in their smokie conceits) imagine all these things to be caried and confirmed to their children in the other world: and the parents of the two dead parties claime kindred each of other: as if they indeede had married their children while they liued.

In Xandu did Cublai Can build a stately Pallace, encompassing fixteene miles of plaine ground with a wall, wherein are fertile Meddowes, pleasant Springs, delightfull Seemings, and all sorts of beasts of chase and game, and in the midst thereof a sumptuous house of pleasure, which may be removed from place to place. Here he doth abide in the moneths of Iune, Iuly, and August, on the eight and twentieth day wherof, he departeth thence to another place to do sacrifice on this manner: He hath a Heard or Doue of Horses and Mares, about ten thousand, as white as snow; of the milke wherof none may taste, except he be of the blood of Cingis Can. Yea, the Tartars doe these beasts great reuerence, nor dare any crosse their way, or goe before them. According to the direction of his Astrologers or Magicians, he on the eight and twentieth of August aforesaid, spendeth and poureth forth with his owne handes the milke of these Mares in the ayre, and on the earth; to giue drinke to the spirits and Idols which they worship, that they may preserue the men, women, beasts, birds, corne, and other things growing on the earth.

These Astrologers, or Necromancers, are in their Art marvellous. When the skie is cloudie and threatneth raine; they will ascend the rooffe of the Pallace of the Grand Can, and cause the raine and tempests to fall round about, without touching the said Pallace. These which thus doe are called Tebeth, and Chejmir, two sorts of Idolaters, which delude the people with opinions of their sanctitie, imputing these workes to their dissembled holinesse: and for this cause they goe in filthy and beastly manner, not caring who seeth them; with dirt on their faces; neuer washing nor combing themselves. And if any be condemned to death, they take, dresse, and eate him: which they doe not if any die naturally. They are also called Bachsi, that is, of such a Religious Order; as if one should say a Frier-Preacher, or Minor, and are exceedingly expert in their diuellish Art. They cause that the Bottles in the Hall of the great Can doe fill the Balls of their owne accord; which also without mans helpe, passe tenne paces through the ayre, into the handes of the said Can; and when he hath drunke, in like sort returne to their place. These Bachsi sometimes resort vnto the officers, and threaten plagues or other misfortune from their Idols, which to preuent they desire so many Muttons with blacke heads, and so many pounds of Incense, and Lignum Aloe to performe their due sacrifices. Which they accordingly receiue and offer on their Feast-day, sprinkling Broth before their Idols. There be of these, great Monasteries, which seeme like a small Citie, in some whereof are two thousand Monkes, which shew their heads and beards, and wear a religious habite, and hallow their Idols feasts with great solemnitie of Hymnes and lights. Some of these may bee married. Other there are, called Sensim, an order which obserueth great abstinence and strictnesse of life, in all their life eating nothing but Branne, which they put in hot water, and let it stand till all the white of the meale be taken away, and then eat it being thus washed. These worship the Fire, and are condemned of the other for Heretikes, because they worship not their Idols, and will not marrie in any case. They are shaven, and weare hempen-garments of black or bright yellow, and although they were filthy, yet would they not alter the colour. They sleepe on great mats, and liue the austere life in the world.

Of their Astrologers in Cambalu were not fewer then five thousand; Christian, Carayans, and Saracens, maintained with foode and rayment at the great Chan charge. These, by their Astrolabe foretell of the change of weather, mortalitie, warres, diseases, &c. And if any enterprise any great worke, hee resorteth vnto them, and telling the houre of his natiuitie, by their Art is informed of the successe. They hold the soule to be immortall, and according to euery mans merits in his life, to passe into a more noble creature, till it be deified; or ignoble, as to a peasant, and then to a Dogge, and so by degrees to the vilest. They shew much reuerence to their parents, to whom if any be vngratefull in their necessitie, there is an office and officers appointed to vie and punish the offence. In the Emperours hall none dare spit, but for that purpose carrieth a little vessell to spit in: nor dare any there make any noyse or lowd talking. The Tartars were at first very vncharitable to the poore, and would curse them, saying, That if God had loued them, he would haue provided for them: but after the Idolatrous Bachsi had commended Almes for a good worke, there was great provision made for them, and euery day at least twentie thousand dishes of Rice, Mill, and Pe-nike, by certaine Officers distributed amongst them. And for this liberalitie they adore him as a God.

Cingis amongst his first Lawes enacted (as saith Vincutinus) the punishment of death to be inflicted vpon offenders in those three vices, which before time had been most rife amongst them, namely, lying, adulterie, and theft: of which yet towards other men that were not Tartars they made no conscience.

They are great Vsurers, taking tenne in the hundred for a moneth, besides vsu vsu vsu in so much, that a souldier in Georgia, which had borrowed five hundred pichen of coyne called yperpera, retayning the same five yeares, was constrained to repay twentie thousand. And a Tartarian Ladie for seven yeares vsu of fiftie sheepe, demanded seven thousand yperpera. They are so couetous, that though they abound in carrell, they will scarce allow any to their owne expence, while iols sound and good, but if it die, or be sicke, They are addicted to sodomie or buggerie: They eat sometimes for necessitie mans flesh, sometimes to delight themselves, and sometimes to terrifie others, reckoning it a great glory to haue slaine many, and that by varietie of crueltie. Their heads they shauo from eare to eare, in manner of a horse-shoote: wearing long lockes at their eares and neckes. There be some of the Tartars, which when they see their fathers grow olde and diseased, they giue them fatted meates which may choake them. And when they are thus dead, they burne their bodies, reseruing the ashes in pretious jewell, sprinkling their meates with that powder. But if any thinke not this enough (which I am afraid the most will deeme too much) let him resort to the huge reports of Vincutinus in his three last Bookes, an Author, I confesse, otherwise fabulous, and monkish, but herein to be beleueed, as receiuing his Reports from the eyewitnesses.

WEE haue already spoken of the solemn sacrifice obserued on the eight and twentieth day of August: we read in our Author Marcius Paulus, an eye-witnes of these his relations, of other the *Grand Can*s grand solemnities. Of which, two are principall; one on his birth-day; which in *Cublai Can*s time was the eight and twentieth of September. On which himselfe was royally clothed in cloth of gold, and twenty thousand of his Barons and souldiers were all apparellled in one colour, and like (excepting the price to himselfe, every one hauing a girdle wrought of Gold and Siluer, and a paire of shoes, some of their garments richly set with pearles and jewels, which they weare on the thirteene solemnities, according to the thirteene Moones of the yeare. On this day all the Tartars, and seuerall Princes subiect, present him with rich gifts; and all sects of Religions pray vnto their gods for his health, and long life.

But their chiefe feast is on the first day of their yeare, which they beginne in February, celebrated by the Grand Can, and all the Countries subiect to him: in which they are all arrayed in white, a colour in their estimation portending good lucke. And then he is presented with many clothes and horses of white colour, and other rich presents, in the same religiously obseruing the number of nine; as nine times nine horses, if they be able, and so of pieces of gold, cloth, and the rest. Then also the Elephants (which are about five thousand) are brought forth in sumptuous furniture: and Camels covered with silke. And in the morning they present themselves in the Hall as many as can stand without in their due order. First, those of the Imperiall progenie; next, the Kings, Dukes, and others, in their due place. Then cometh forth a great man or Prelate, which cryeth out with a lowd voyce; Bow downe your selues, and worship: which they presently doe, with their faces to the earth. This Prelate addeth, God saue and preserve our Lord, long to liue with ioy and gladnesse. They all answer; God grant it. The Prelate againe; God increase his Dominion, and preserve in peace all his subiects, and prosper all things in all his Countries. Whereunto they answer as before. Thus doe they worship foure times. After this, the said Prelate goeth to an Altar there, richly adorned; on which is a red Table, with the name of the Great Can written in it, and a Censer with Incense, which he incenseth in stead of them all, with great reuerence performed vnto the Table. This done, they returne to their places, and present their gifts; and after are feasted.

When Cublai had ouerthrowne Naiam his vncl (as before is said) vnderstanding that the Christians obserued their yearely solemnitie of Easter, he caused them all to come vnto him, and to bring the Booke of the foure Gospels, which he incensed often with great Ceremonies, deuoutly kissing it, and caused his Barons to doe the like. And thus he obserueth alway in the principall feasts of the Christians; as Christmasse and Easter. The like he did in the chiefe feasts of the Saracens, Iewes, and Idolaters. The cause (he said) was because of those foure Prophets, to which all the world doth renounce: Iesus of the Christians, Mahomet of the Saracens, Moses of the Iewes, and Sogomembar Can the first Idoll of the Pagans; and I (saith he) doe honour to them all, and pray him which is the greatest in Heaven, and truest, to helpe me. Yet he had best opinion of the Christian faith, because it contained nothing but goodnesse: and would not suffer the Christians to carrie before them the Crosse, on which so great a man as Christ was crucified. He also sent Nicolo and Maffio, the father and vncl of Marcius Paulus our Author, in Embassage to the Pope, to send him a hundred wise men, which might conuince the Idolaters, that boasted of those their magickall wonders, whereas the Christians that were there, were but simple men, not able to answer them; which if it had bene effected, hee and his Barons would haue bene baptized. Thomas à Iesui, a Iesuite in his second booke of Procuring the conuersion of all Nations, reporteth, that Clement the first ordained Iohn à Monte Coruino, a Minorite, Archbishop of Cambalu, and nine other of the same Order he consecrated Bishops, and tooke order for the successour of the Archbishop, when he died. Whether these went or no, is vncertaine. Great pitie it is, that the Iesuites, men of so refined wits, and such mightie miracle-mongers, (our world must witness the one, and the East and West the other) were but of yesterdaies hatching, and that Ignatius had not broken his legge before those times. These had beene (if they then had beene) the onely men to haue remoued those objected scandals of the simplicitie of Christians, and to haue confronted these Magicall Montebanks, as the Can here required. But these were referred to times more satall to the Pope, to helpe at a dead list, by peruertings heere and conuertings there, to hold vp the supposed sanctitie of the triple diademe. But looke we to our Tartars.

Vinc. & Io.
Bueni.

b Odoricus saith, that in his time the Can celebrated, besides the former, the feasts of his circumcision, marriage, and coronation. But before the conquest of Cathay they obserued not any day at all with festiuall solemnities.

Cublai Can was of meane stature, of countenance white, red, and beautifull. He had foure wiues, which kept seuerall Courts, the least of which contained at least ten thousand persons. He had many concubines; every second yeere hauing a new chaine of the fairest maidens in the prouince of Vngut, most fertile (belike) of that commodie: which passe a second election at the Court, and the fairest and fittest of them committed to Ladies, to prooue and to instruct them. Their parents hold it a great grace so to haue bestowed their children: and if any of them proue not, they impute to their disastrous planet. They hold it for a great beautie, to haue their noses flab betweene the eies.

The Grand
Cans pallace.

In December, Ianuary, and February, he abideth at Cambalu, in the North End part of the prouince of Cathay, in a Pallace neere to the Citie builded on this manner. There is a circuit walled in, foure square, each square containing eight miles, having about them a deepe ditch, and in the middle a gate. A mile inwards is another wall, which hath six miles in each square; and in the South side three gates, and as many in the North. Betwixt those walles are souldiers. In euery corner of this wall, and in the midst, is a stately pallace, eight in all, wherein are kept his munitions. There is a third wall within this, containing foure miles square, each square taking vp one mile, having six gates and eight pallaces, as the former, in which are kept the Grand Cans provisions. And betwene these two walles are many faire trees, and meadows sowed with many beasts. Within this is the Grand Cans Pallace, the greatest thereof was lene, confining with the wall abovesaid, on the North and South. The name and forme thereof is of such cost and Arr, with such appurtenances of pleasure and state, as were too long heere to recite. Hee for a superstitious feare suggested by his Astrologers, of a rebellion which sometime should be raised against him in Cambalu, built a new Citie neere therunto called Taidu 24. miles in compasse, and yet not able to receiue the Inhabitants of the old Citie, whence hee remoued such as might moue suspicion, hither. This Citie was built by line, in foure squares, each where of contained six miles, and three gates, so streight, that vpon the wall of one gate one might see the gate right against it. In the midst of the Citie is a great Bell, which is rung in the night, to warne men to keepe within doores. The great Can hath twelue thousand horsemen vnder foure Captains to his gard. He keepeth leopards, wolues, and lions to hunt with, and with them to take wild asses, beares, harts, &c. and one sort of eagles able to catch wolues. The two masters of his hunting game had ten thousand men vnder each of them, the one part clothed in red, the other in skie. colour: and when the Emperor hunteth, one of these Captaines goeth with his men and dogs on the right hand, the other on the left, compassing a great quantitie of ground, that not a beast can escape them. From October to March, they are bound daily to send in a thousand head of beasts and birds. He hath also when hee trauelleth, ten thousand falconers diuided in diuers companies himselfe abiding in a chamber caried vp on foure Elephants, whence he may see the game, hauing also his tents pitched for his solace neere thereby. None may catch hawke or hunting-dog out of his dominion, nor may hawke or hunt neere the Court by many daies iournies, nor at all, in their times of breeding, from March to October.

c Odoricus calleth it Caido.

Odoricus reckoneth a greater number.

Of the alteration of Religion among the Tartars: and of the diuers sorts, sects, and nations of them now remaining.

After so long narration of the Religion of the auncient Tartars, and of the Cathayans, wheretheir Emperours fixed their abode: it followeth to consider of the times following, wherein they haue beene diuided both in Policie and Faith. Maginus * diuideth them into fise principall sortes; which may likewise be subdiuided into many inferior branches or Hords. The first of these hee calleth Tartaria minor, or the lesse, which is in Europe betwixt Borisphenes and Tanais, comprehending Taurica Cher-sonesus, inhabited by the Precopite Tartars, or as Broniovius <sup>b</sup> rearmeth them, Perecopenses of Perecopia a Towne and Castle in Taurica: they are called also Offonenfes and Crimis, of two Townes bearing those names. These are now subiect to the Turke both in State and Religion, hauing some Townes and Mahumetane Temples, and Monasteries and Turkish Garrisons, and a few Temples and persons Christian, of the Armenian, Grecian, and Westerne profession. They liue in their homely Cottages in the winter, but in the summer wander in their Carts as the other Tartars, then whom they are somewhat more ciuill. They pay three hundred Christians yearely to the Turke for tribute: of whom their Can, since the time of Zelim, receiueeth a banner, and his approbation to the Empire, giuing his children or brethren in hostage. They esteeme also an heire apparant to their Empire, whom they call Galga: and if the Can will preferre his sonne to that dignitie, he killeth all his brethren, as the Turkes also deale with theirs.

It should seeme that they deriue their pedegree from Cingis, descended (if I may coniecture, where certaine historie faileth) of some of the sonnes of Bathy, the great Conquerour in those partes of the world: Lothton Can was the first which ruled in Taurica: long since Barby's time. They * vse the Chaldean and Arabian letters: they haue their Cadies to administer Religion and Iustice, as haue the Turkes.

They count the Don or riuier Tanais holy, in respect of the commodities which it yeldeth them. These <sup>d</sup> Tartars passing through the confines of Polonia and Podolia, to helpe the Turkes in the warres of Hungary, the wayes being secured and defended with the Garrisons, they vsed a new stratagem to make way, by drining a multitude of Bels before them, which contrary to their expectation, affrighted with the Ordnance, reioyled vpon their driuers, treading them downe, and scattering them. The Chan, when St. Bathor King of Poland was dead, sent his Embassadors to be elected their King: affirming, that their Pope should be his, their Luther his also: and for dainties, Horse-flesh would content him. His suite was reiected with laughter. Williams Brusa a Scot from the relation of Anthony Spinola, descended of that familie in Genoa, and then Ambassador from Casghere the Crim Tartar into Polonia, affirmeth diuers things of the Tartarians, as namely of threescore and ten diuers Kingdoms of them, the names whereof are scarce knowne to any Tartar: differing in language and manners, but all agreeing in the Tartarean appellation, warring, wandring, hard and spare dyet: all sometimes subiect to the Great Can, now inferiour in power (as the Crimis say, which know nothing of him but by tradition) to the Crim or Precopite.

These Precopites abhorre drunkennesse, punish adultery with death: steale not from their countrey-men, nor conceale any thing which they finde, walke not with weapons, haue few lawes, the Interpreters of which are their Priests, which they greatly reuerence, as they doe also those of the Christians: if any thing be not expressed by Law, they referre it to that generall head, whereon hang the Law and the Prophets, to doe as men would bee done to. The Sar or Emperour (sitteth himselfe in iudgement, with the Galga, and Soldans (so they call the Princes children) and the Chancellor, with other Senators, whose sentences being first deliuered, he determineth, and present execution followeth. All mettals are the Sars prerogative (except Gold which is the Turkes peculiar) he hath also the tenths of the spoiles, and of euery Captiue a Chekine, and if he be of great estate, three. He receiueth 5500. Duc-kets a yeere from the Turke, for which hee is bound to warre vpon none but the Muscouite without his leaue. Hee brings into the field 150000. horsemen, (leaving at home but one man in a house) and when the Circassians and Astracans adioyne their forces, two hundred thousand. It is paine of death not to come. They bring with them three moneths victuall, which are dried Flesh, Cheefe, Garlick, roots, and a spare Horse for food, besides a better for seruice. Their haire tied to long poles, are their banners; only the Prince receiueth from the Turke one of Silke. Both Horse and Men are exceeding skilfull in swimming. In passing ouer large streames, they set their Saddles and Baggage on Reedes or Rushes which they tie to their Horse-tayles, themselves holding them by the manes, and guiding them: sometimes they sit themselves on those Rushes, and sometimes they kill and slaie some of their Horses, and turning the inside outward, timbering them with the ribbes of the Horse, and sowing them with the haire, make Boates for transportation. They take off the wheelles of their Carts, and setting them on Rushes as aforesayd, transport them. The spoile is diuided in common, and euery mans losse thence made good: to conceale any thing is death, whether pillaged from the enemy, or found of their owne people.

In the yeere one thousand five hundred seuentie one, they came to Muscou and first the Suburbs, which being of wood, burned with such rage, that in foure houres space it consumed the greatest part of the Citie, being thirtie myles or more in compass. The rusfulness of this fight was seconded with a more dismall euent, the people burning in their houses, and streets, and whiles they sought to flye out of the Citie, they wedged themselves with multitude so fast in the gate (which was furthest from the enemy) and the streetes adioyning, as that three rankes walked one vpon the others heads, the vppermost treading downe those that were lower: so that there perished that time, as was said, by the fire and the presse, the number of eight hundred thousand people or more. The Tartar sent the Russe a knife, (as vpbraiding him this loss and his desperate case) therewith to stab himselfe. The cause of this quarrell is, the Tartars title to Cazau, Astracan, and Mosco it selfe, which the Moscouite was wont to acknowledge with this homage yeerely in the Castle of Mosko, to giue the Cau Crim Horse Oates out of his Gap, himselfe on foot, the Crim abiding on his Horse. This homage Basilus changed into a Tribute of Fures, which also by his sonne Iulius was denied. Hereupon once or twice euery yeere, sometime about Whitsontide, but oftner in haruest, he inuadeth the Countrey: eyther in greater numbers, if the Cau himselfe come, or otherwise in fewer, with lighter border-skirmishes. Their common practise is to make diuers Armies, and drawing the Russe to one place, to inuade another: They are all Horse-men, carrying nothing but a Bow, a Sheafe of Arrowes, and a Falcon Sword: they are expert Riders, and shoote as readily backward as forward. The Morseys or Nobles haue Armour like the Turkes, the Common-people none other then their apparrell, viz. a blacke sheepes skinne with the wooll side outward in the day time, and inward in the night, with a Cap of the same.

God helpe vs.

They haue a rule that Iustice is to be practised but towards their owne: and therefore will promise any thing when they beseege a Citie, but being once possessed of the place, performe all manner of hostilitie. When their number is small, they make greater shew with counterfeited shapes of men set on horsebacke. In giuing onlet, they make a great shout, crying together * Olla billa, Olla billa; they will die rather then yeeld, contrary to the Turkes custome. The cheife bootie they seeke for is store of Captiues, specially yong boyes & girls: for which purpose they haue bads intending nothing else.

elfe, and baskets like Bakers Panyers, to carrie them tenderly. If they tire or ficken on the way, they dash them against the ground or some tree, and so leaue them dead. The Russe borders being vsed to their inuasions, keepe few other cattell but swine, which their Religion abhorreth to touch.

They differ herein from the Turkish Religion, that they haue certaine idoll puppets made of silke or like stuffe, of the fashion of a man, which they fasten to the doore of their walking houses, to be as Iannuses or keepers of their house. And these Idolls are made not by all, but by certaine religious women, which they haue among them for that and like vses. They haue besides, the Image of their King of an huge bignesse, which they erect at euery Stage, when the armie marcheth: to which euery one must bow as he passeth by, both Tartar and stranger. They are much giuen to Witchcraft and ominous coniectures. In marriage they onely abstaine from the mother, sister, and daughter: neyther doe they account that woman a wife, which hath not honoured them with the name of a father, and then beginneth he to take a dowrie of her friends of Horse, Sheep, Kine, &c. If she be barren after a certaine time, he turneth her home againe.

Vnder the Emperour they haue certaine Dukes or Morseys, which rule oter hoords of ten, twentie, or fortie thousand, which are bound to serue the Emperour with a certaine number of men double-horsed. They preferre horse-flesh before other meats, esteeming it stronger nourishment: this notwithstanding, they vsed to send thirtie or fortie thousand horse yearely to Musko, to exchange for other commodities. Their herds of kine, and flocks of blacke sheepe; they keepe rather for the milke then the flesh, though they sometime eate it. They drinke milke or warme bloud, and for the most part curde them both together: as they trauele they sometime let their horse bloud, and drinke it from his bodie. Townes they plant none nor standing villages, but haue walking houses built vpon wheeles, like a Shepheards Cottage; which they moue in the Spring from the South to the North, and with Winter returne Southwards; when they come to their Stage or standing place, planting their houses in a rake, making the forme of a towne and streets. Golde and siluer they neglect, as they doe also tillage, which freeth their countrey from inuasions.

For person and complexion, they haue broad and flat visages, of a tanned colour into yellow and blacke, fierce and cruell looks, thin haired vpon the vpper lip and pit of the chin, light and nimble bodied with short legges, practising themselues to ride and shoot from their child-hood, their parents not suffering their children to eate till they haue shot within a certain scantling of the mark. Their speech is sudden and loude, as it were out of a deepe hollow throat, their singing like a Cowes lowing. In the description of these Crimis I haue bene thus long, because they are now the chiefe knowne Nation of the wandering Tartars, and the rest differ little from them, except in greater barbarisme.

Master George Barkley, a friend of mine, a Merchant in London, hauing trauelled Liaonia, Russia, Lithuania, and Poland, went from Cracouia with a Tartar Duke, (which had come thither to the Parliament to sue for his two daughters, taken by the Polacks) and stayed with him in his hord (which consisted of about a 1000. households of a kindred) six moneths. These Tartars sowed a three square graine, called Totarka; they liued in great ease and pleasure, euery day hunting, that for worldly pleasure he neuer any where enioyed such a life with such loue and liking of his Tartar-hord, as if he had bene his sonne. These vsed to make sudden inrodes vpon the Polacks: the gentlemen of Poland, not dining without their peeces and soldourly-seruingmen ready to giue them entertainment. If the Christians make head against them, they know not where to find them. Resolute they are, and will ride with their bowes in the face of a Peece.

G. Barkley.

The second part in this diuision is attributed to Tartaria Deserta, so called of the Desert huge tract of Countrey betweene Tanais, the Caspian Sea, and the Lake Kiray: sometime knowne by the name of Sarmatia Asiatia. It containeth many Tribes: of which the Principall are, Zauolhensis, called Bulgar Tartars, of Volga: betweene which Riuer and Iaich they haue their abode. This they called the great Hord, and

the Emperour thereof Vlucau, in the year 1506, subdued by the Crim-Tartars before mentioned: and after that by Basilus the Muscouite, to whose large stile Bulgaria is added, taking that name of Volga, as it were Volgaria, or of Bulgar, a Towne upon that River. Cazan and Astracan, Hords of these Zaval Tartars, have beene subiect also many yeares to the said Great Duke, who caused the Prince of Casan (being taken prisoner when he was young) to be baptizd. Neare vnto Cazan is Vachen, the people whereof are Gentiles; and the Cberemizes halfe Gentiles, halfe Tartars, and Mangat, or Nagay, Mahumetan Tartars, which in the year one thousand five hundred fiftie and eight, were thorow ciuill warres, famine, and pestilence, destroyed to the number of aboute a hundred thousand. These Nagayans haue their diuers hords subiect to their severall Dukes, whom they call Murzes, hauing no vse of money, come, or Arts. They, in the time of their distresse, would for one loafe of bread, worth six pence, haue solde sonne or daughter to Master Ienkinson if hee would haue bought a thousand, although otherwhiles they deride the Christians, as liuing on the toppes of weedes (so they call our corne.) This our Author and countrey-man trauelled downe the riuer Volga to Astracan, which riuer, after it hath runne about two thousand English miles, hath threescore and ten mouthes or falls into the Caspian Sea. Through the Sea he passed to Manguslaue another part of the desert Tartaria. The Prince wherof Timor Soltas he found and saluted in a little round house, not hauing Towne or Castell, made of Reedes, couered without with Felt, within with Carpets, accompanied with the great Metropolitane of their Countrey, esteemed of amongst that field-people, as the Bishop of Rome is in most partes of Europe. And had hee not presented himselfe to him with the great Dukes Letters, hee had beene spoyled of all that he had.

They passed thence with a Carauan of Merchants twentie dayes, not finding water, but as they drew out of olde deepe Wells, brackish and salt: and passed sometimes two or three dayes without the same. After that, they came to a Gulfe of the Caspian Sea againe, where the water is fresh and sweet. Nor so the people; for the Customes of the King of Turkeman tolles of euery five and twentie, one; and seven ninths for the said King and his brethren. Into this gulfe the River Oxus did sometimes fall, but is now intercepted by the River Ardeck, which runneth toward the North: and (as were) loath to view so colde a Climate and barbarous Inhabitants, after he hath runne with a swift race a thousand miles (as it wete) in flight, he hideth himselfe vnder ground for the space of five hundred miles, and then looking vp, and seeing little amendment, drowneth himselfe in the Lake of Kithay.

Thence they had three dayes journey to Sellizure, where finding Azim, Cam whom he presented a ninth, he receined there the like festiuall entertainment as before with Timor, that is, the flesh of a wilde Horse, and Mares milke without bread. He and his brethren ruled all from the Caspian Sea to Vrgence, and had continuall wars with the Persians; which space is called Turkeman: for the other Hords of that huge Tartarian desert, the Kirgessen, Melgomazan, Scibanski, Thumen (which still is said to remaine vnder the obedience of the Grand Can) Bascheridi, Heselisi, haue names of harsher people in those most harsh and horrid deserts, will hasten my pen and your eares, to some more pleasing subiect. The Thumen and their neighbours are great lechanters, and by their Arte (they say) raise tempests and ouerthrowe their enemies. The Kirgessen obserue these stinking holies: their Priest mixeth blood, milke, and Cow-dung together with earth, and putting them in a vessell, therewith climeth a tree, and after his deuout exhortation to the people, he besprinketh them with this sacred mixture which they account diuine. When any of them die, they hang him on a tree in stead of buriall.

The Tartars in Turkeman vse to catch wilde horses with hawkes tamed to that purpose, which seising on the necke of the horse, with his beating, and the horses chafing, tireth him, and maketh him an easie prey to his Master, who alwayes rideth with his Bow, Arrowes, and Sword. They eat their meate, and say their prayers sitting on the ground crosse-legged, spending the time very idly. As Master Ienkinson with his company trauelled from hence towards Boghar, they were assailed with fortie thieues of whom they had intelligence somewhat before, and therefore certaine holy men (for so they account such as haue beene at Mecca) caused the Carauan to stay while they made their prayers and diuinations touching their successe. They tooke certaine sheepe and killed them, and tooke the blade-bones of the same, which they first sodde, and then burne, mingling the blood of the said sheepe with this poulder of their bones, with which blood they wrote certaine Characters, vsing many other ceremonies & words, and thereby diuined that they should meete with enemies, which after much trouble they should overcome: which accordingly proued true. Of the faithfulness of these holy men hee had good prooffe, both here and elsewhere, they refusing not to expose themselves to danger, and (faithlessly faithfull) to forswear themselves rather then betray him and the Christians to their theuish Countreymen. For these robbers would haue dismissed the Bussarmans, so they call their Catholikes, if they would haue delivered the Caphars, that is, infidels, as they esteeme the Christians, vnto their power. One of their holy men (which the enemies had surprized) by no torments would confesse any thing to the prejudice of his fellowes. But at last they were forced to agree, and giue the theues twentie ninth, that is, twentie times nine severall things, and a Camell to carry the same away. This Countrey of Turkeman or Turcheman is the first habitation of the Turkes, and the people were called by that name, both in Flaubon's time, and in the time of Mauritius, as in the Turkish Historie you haue heard. Pliny nameth the Turkes nearer Maotis: but whether in deuouring the people with their swords, as they did the pastures with their cattell, they came from hence, or thence from thence, or that Pliny might easily wander in so wandering a subiect; all agreed, that from hence they went first into Persia, and in succeeding ages haue made many fertile countries, like their Turcomania, where Master Ienkinson saith groweth no grasse, but heath whereon the cattle feed: The Ottoman-horse blasting with his breath the ground he treads on, (according to their owne Prouerbe) there neuer groweth grasse more. The Turkeman Nation is (saith Flaubon) for the most part Mahometan, and many of them without Law at all. They vse the Arabike Letters.

These Deserts and Theues haue almost made vs forget our diuision, according to which we should haue told you, that from the Caspian Sea hither you must (according to Maginus) call the Tartars generally Zagathayans: so called of Zagathay, the great Cans brother, sometime their Prince. Which name <sup>b</sup> comprehendeth also diuers other Nations more ciuill then the former, possessing the Countries sometime knowen by the names of Bactriana, Sogdiana, Margiana, now Iesfelbau, that is, Greene head, of the colour of their Turbants: differing from the Persians, whom they call for like cause, Redde heads. These haue cruell warres continually with the Persians, whom they call Caphars (as they doe the Christians,) for their supposed heresie, of which in the Persian relation hath beene shewed, and for that they will not cut the haire of their vpper lips, for which they are accounted of the Tartars great sinners. In <sup>c</sup> Bojhar is the seate of their Metropolitane, who is there more obeyed then the King, and hath sometime deposed the King, and placed an other at his pleasure. There is a little Riuer running through the Citie, whose water breedeth in them that drinke thereof (especially strangers) a worme of an ell long, which lyeth in the legge betwixt the flesh and the skinne, and is plucked out about the anckle, with great Arte of Surgeons well practised herein. And if it breake in plucking out, the partie <sup>d</sup> dyeth. They plucke out an inch in a day, which is rolled vp, and so proceed till shee be all out. And yet will not the Metropolitane suffer any drinke but water or Mares milke, hauing orders to make searce and punish such as transgresse, with great seueritie. Zagatai liued the space of one hundred twentie and one yeares before Marcus Paulus, and was (as hee saith) a Christian, but his sonne followed him in his Kingdome, not in his Religion.

the World. And one of the greatest Monarchs now of the Earth, The Great Mogor is said to <sup>a</sup> descend of him.

Of him are many Histories written by some <sup>b</sup> that have liued since his time, and could not well know his proceedings, it being generally deplored, that this Arabic wanted a Homer <sup>c</sup>, which Alexander applauded in him, but wanted for himselfe; only one Albacen (an Arabian which then liued) hath written largely thereof and that (as he saith) by Tamerlans commaund, which Iean du Bec, Abbot of Mortimer, in his voyage into the East Countrie, met with, and had it interpreted to him by an Arabian, and we vpon his credit: which if any thinke to bee insufficient, I leaue it to his choice and censure. That Authour sayth, that Tamerlan descended of the Tartarian Emperours, and Og his father was Lord of Sachetay, who gaue to his sonne Tamolan (which name signifieth Heauenty graue in their Tongue) his Kingdome, while hee yet liued, appointing two wise Counsellors, Odmar, and Aly, to assist him. Hee was well instructed in the Arabian learning, and a louer of Learned men. Nature had set in his eyes such rayes of Maiestie and beautie, that men could scarce endure to looke on them. He wore long haire, contrary to the Tartarian custome, pretending, that his mother came of the race of Sampson. He was strong, and had a faire legge: where Leunclavius sayth he was called Tamurleng, of his lamenesse. His first Warre was against the Muscouite, whom hee overcame: The second against the King of China, with like successe (I mention not his battailes in ciuill warres: ) The third against Baijazet the Turke (whom he captiued) passing thither by the way of Persia; where Guines Authour of the Sophian Sect, a great Astrologer, and accounted a holy man, encouraged him with prophecies of his good successe. This Warre he made against Baijazet in behalfe of the Greeke Emperour, and others, whom the Turke oppressed. He went priuately to Constantinople, and had sight of the Citie, with all kindnesse from the Emperour. He inuaded Syria and Egypt, ouerthrew the Soldan, and wonne Cairo; destroyed Damascus, visited and honoured Ierusalem, and the holy Sepulchre, and granted great Priuiledges thereunto. The Princes of Lybia and Barbarie, by their Embassages in Egypt, acknowledged his Soueraignetie: In his returne by Persia hee was encountred by Guines, who brought with him an infinite number of sundrie kinde of beasts, which he made tame, and by which he taught men. As soone as he saw Tamerlan, he made his Prayers towards the Heauens for his health, and for the Religion of the Prophet, excommunicating the Ottomans, as enemies to the faithfull beleaguers. Tamerlan gaue him fiftene or sixtene thousand of his <sup>d</sup> prisoners, which hee instructed in his opinion: and after conquered Persia, and so returned to Samarcand, where hee had vowed to erect a Church and Hospitall, with all sumptuous Magnificence: thence he went to Mount Althay, to burie his vnkle and father in law, the great Chao, in whose State he succeeded. Hee enriched Samarcand with the spoyles gotten in his Warres, and called the Temple which he there built, the Temple of Salomon, wherein he hanged vp Trophies and Monuments of his victories, and caused all his battailes therein to be ingrauen, thereby (said he) to acknowledge the Goodnesse of God. His Religion was not pure Mahumetisme, for he thought God was delighted with variety of worships: yet hee hated Polytheisme and Idols, onely one God hee acknowledged, and that with much deuotion, after his manner. Thus he beat downe all the Idols in China, but honoured the Christians, with great admiration at the strict life of some Votaries. When Aly his Counsellor was dead, hee built a stately Tombe for him at Samarcand, and caused prayers to bee said three dayes for his soule. Being neere his end, he blessed his two sonnes, laying his hand on the head of Sautochio the elder, and pressing it downe, but lifting vp the chinne of Letrochio the younger, as it were pressing vnto him the Empire, although the elder were proclaimed. But this Empire was too great, and too suddenly erected to continue.

These three sorts of Tartars which we haue hitherto mentioned, are all, for the most part, Mahumetans. There are some yet (as Michonius <sup>e</sup> affirmeth) neere the Caspian Sea, which are not Mahumetans, nor shaueth their haire of their heads after the Tartarian manner; and therefore they call them Calmach or Pagans.

The fourth are those which in greatnesse are first, namely the Cathayans, called Calma

rabai (that is, black-heads) of their Turbants, as the former, Iesabai. But of their Religion, further then that which hath beene before expressed, we can say little. And it seemeth by the relations mentioned in the former Chapters that they are Gentiles or Christians, and not of Mahomet's error. Chaggi Memet, a Persian Merchant, related (as in part is said before) to Ramusius, that he had beene at Campion, Damir Can then reigning, and that into Camul, the Westerly part of Tanguth, they were Idolaters and Ethnikes: from thence Westwards, Musulmans, or Saracens. In the Epistle of Carnalini the Iesuite; it is reported by a Mahumetane Merchant, that they were Christians, happily because of Images which the Idolaters, and Pseudo-Christians doe equally worship.

f *Chag. Memet.*g Carnal. Epist.

The fifth and last forme of our Tartars are those which abide in those places, whence the Tartars first issued to ouerwhelme all Asia with their Armies: of which is related at large in the eleventh Chapter: of which, for want of probable intelligence, I can say little more. Our Mappes place there the Hords of the Danites, Nephthalites, Ciremiffians, Turbites, and other, which some deriue from the dispersion (as is said) of the tenne Tribes. Here is Tabor also, whose King was by Charles the fifth Emperour in the yeare 1540. (as before is said) burned at Mantua, for soliciting to Judaisme.

Pope Innocent, King Lewis of France (by meanes of Will. de Rubruquis) and the King of Armenia, solicited (as you haue partly heard) both the great Can, and his chiefe Princes, to become Christians: and it is likely that the Tartars might, if diligence had beene vsed, and some Superstitions had not darkned the Christian profession, haue thereunto beene perswaded, which many also of them were, as appeareth in Haitbon, Mat Westmanast, and Vincentius.

But the Saracens which had before polluted those Countries where the Mahumetan Tartars now abide, by that sutableness of their Law to their lawlesse lusts of Rapine and Poligamie, preuailed (as Michonius reporteth) with Bathi and those other Tartars, to embrace Mahomet, and refuse Christ. They say, Eissa Rochella, that is, Iesus is the Spirit of the Lord; Mahomet Rossolai, that is, Mahomet is the Iustice of God. They obey (saith he) the Pentateuch of Moses, are circumcised, obserue the leuell Ceremonies: they haue no Bels, but euery day cry, Labi illo ilaloh, which signifieth, that there is but one God. They professe themselves Ismaelites, the Christians they call Dzintzis, that is, Pagans; and Gaur, Infidels. They obserue three Feasts: the first Kairam, to which they prepare themselves, with their thirtie dayes Lent, and in that Feast offer Rammes, Birdes, &c. The second they celebrate for All Soules, for which they fast a moneth, visit the graues, and doe workes of mercie. The third they keep for themselves and their owne saluation, and fast twelue dayes.

i See the Saracen Historie.

Iosafa Barbaro (a Venetian, which liued amongst the Tartars about the yeere 1437.) saith, That they embraced not the faith of Mahomet generally, but as euerie man liked, vntill about that time, in the dayes of Hedighi, a Captaine vnder Sidabamuth Can, who first compelled them thereunto, being before free vnto their Idolatries, if they pleased. And of the other Tartars neere the Zagathayans, he saith, That many of them were Idolaters, and carried Idols in the Carts: yea, some of them vsed to worship whatsoever Beast they first met with, after they went abroad in the morning: This D. Fletcher reporteth of the Morduit Tartars, adding that they vse to sweare by it all that day, whether it be Horse, Dogge, or whatsoever else. And when his friend dieth, hee killeth his best Horse, and flaying off the skinne, carrieth it on high vpon a long Pole before the corpse to the place of buriall.

k L. 1. apud Ram.

The Moxy, at a certaine time in the yeare, take a Horse, which they set in the field, with his foure legges tyed to foure posts, and his head to another post, fastened in the ground. This done, one of them standing in a conuenient distance, shooteth him to the heart. Afterwards they flea him, and obseruing certaine ceremonies about the flesh, eat the same. The skin they fill with chaffe: and in each of his legges thrust a straight stick, that he may stand vpright, as if he were aliue. Lastly, they goe to a great Tree, and loppe therefrom as many boughes as they thinke good, and make a Roome or Sollar in that tree, where they set this horse on his feet, & worship him, offering vnto him him Foxes, and diuerſe Beaſts which beare rich Furies; of which offerings the Trees hang full.

Maſter Ienkinſon mentioneth a Nation liuing among the Tartars, called Kings, which are alſo Gentiles, as are alſo the Kirgeſſen (of whom wee haue ſpoken) and the Colmacks, which worſhip the Sunne, as they doe alſo a redde Cloth, faſtened to the toppe of a Pole; and eate Serpents, Wormes, and other filth. Neere to which he placeth (in his Mappe of Ruſſia) certaine Statues, or Pillars of Stone, which ſometimes were Hords of Men and Beaſts feeding, transformed by diuine power (if it be not humane error) into this ſtonie ſubſtance, retayning their priſtine ſhape. Theſe Nations are eyther Tartars, or, in manner of life, like vnto them, and may therefore paſſe vnder that generall appellation. And this may ſuffice touching the Tartarian Nation & Religion; which in the Weſt and South parts of their abode is Mahumetane, in the more Northerly and Eaſterly, partly Heatheniſh, partly Iewiſh, or Moorish, or mixed, or as may beſt aduantage them, and moſt pleaſe them, wandring in opinion in like ſort, as in their habitation. D. Flateber reckons theſe things as general to all the Hords of Tartars. Firſt, to obey their Magiſtrates whatſoeuer they command about the publike ſeruice. Secondly, Except for the publike behoofe, euery man to be free and out of controlment. Thirdly, No priuate man to poſſeſſe any Lands, but the whole Countrie to be common. Fourthly, To neglect all daintineſſe and varietie of meates and to content themſelues with that which commeth next to hand. Fifthly, To weare any baſe attire and to patch their clothes whether there bee any need or not. Sixthly, to take or ſteale from any ſtranger whatſoeuer they can get. Seuenthly, Towards their owne to be true in word and deed. Eighthly, To ſuffer no ſtranger to come within their Dominion, but the ſame to bee ſlaue to the firſt taker, except they haue a Paſport;

But by this time I thinke the Reader will wiſh mee their paſport to bee gone from them, who haue ſhewed my ſelfe no Tartarian, whiles I dwell ſo long on this Tartarian diſcourſe, happily herein as tedious to him, as ſtaying in one place would be to the Tartar; a thing ſo abhominable, as in anger he wiſheth it as a Curſe, Would God thou mayeſt abide in one place, as the Chriſtian, till thou ſmell thine owne dung. Indeede this Hiſtorie, not thoroughly handled before by any one, drew me along, and I hope will purchaſe pardon to this prolixitie.

CHAP. XVI.

Of the Nations which liued in, or neere, to thoſe parts, now poſſeſſed by the Tartars: and their Religions and Cuſtomes.

From thoſe Countries, inhabited by the Perſians and Zagathayan Tartars Eaſtward, we cannot ſee with M. Paulus his eyes (the beſt guide we can get for this way) any Religion but the Saracen, till wee come to Baſcia, a Prouince ſomewhat bending to the South, the people whereof are Idolaters and Magicians, cruell and deceitfull, liuing on Fleſh and Rice. Seven dayes iourney from hence is Cheſmur, wickedly cunning in their deuilliſh art, by which they cauſe the dumbe Idols to ſpeake, the day to grow darke, and other maruellous things, being the welſpring of Idols and Idolatrie in thoſe parts. They haue Heremites after their Law, which abide in their Monaſteries, are very abſtinent in eating and drinking, containe their bodies in ſtrait chaſtity, and are very carefull to abſtaine from ſuch finnes, wherewith they thinke their Idols offended, and liue long. There are of them many Monaſteries: They are obſerued of the people with great reuerence. The people of that Nation ſhed no bloud, nor kill any fleſh; but if they will eate any, they get the Saracens, which liue amongſt them, to kill it for them. North-Eaſtward from hence is Vochan, a Saracenicall Nation; and after many dayes iourne ouer Mountaines (ſo high, that no kinde of birds are ſcene there) on) is Beloro, inhabited with Idolaters. Cascar (the next Countrey) is Mahumetane, beyond which are many Nestorian Christians in Carchan. There are also Moores, or Mahumetanes, which haue defiled with like superstition the Countreies of Cotam and Peyon (where the women may marrie new husbands if the former bee absent aboute twentie dayes<sup>a</sup>, and the men likewise) and of Ciarcian, & Lop. From Lop they crosse a Defart, which asketh thirtie dayes, and must carry their victuals with them. Here (they say) spirits call men by their names, and cause them to stray from their company, and perish with famine. When they are passed this Defart, they enter into Sachion, the first Citie of Tanguth, an Idolatrous Prouince, subiect to the great Can: there are also some Nestorians and Saracens, where they haue had the Art of Printing these thousand yeeres. They haue Monasteries replenished with Idols of diuers sorts, to which they sacrifice, and when they haue a male childe borne, they commend it to some Idoll, in whose honour they nourish a Ramme in their house that yeare, and after on their Idols festiual, they bring it, together with their Sonne, before the Idoll, and sacrifice the Ramme, and dressing the flesh, let it stand till they haue finished their prayers for their childes health: in which space (they say) their Idoll hath sucked out the principall substance of the meate: which they then carrie home to their house, and assembling their kinsfolke, eat it with great reuerence & reioicing, sauing the bones in goodly vessels. The Priests haue for their Fee the Head, Feet, Inwards, Skinne, and some part of the Flesh.

When any of great place dyeth, they<sup>b</sup> assemble the Astrologers, and tell the houre of his natiuitie, that they may by their Art finde a Planet fitting to the burning of the corpes, which sometime, in this respect, attendeth this fierie constellation a weeke, a moneth, or halfe a yeare: in all which time, they set before the corpes a Table furnished with Bread, Wine, and other Viands, leauing them there so long as one might conveniently eate them, the Spirit there present (in their opinion) refreshing himselfe with the odour of this provision. If any euill happen to any of the house, the Astrologers ascribe it to the angrie soule for neglect of his due houre, agreeing to that of his Natiuitie. They make many staves by the way, wherein they present this departed soule with such Cares, to hearten it against the bodies burning. They paint many papers, made of the Barkes of Trees, with pictures of Men, Women, Horses, Camels, Money and Rayment, which they burne together with the bodie, that the dead may haue to serue him in the next World. And all this while of burning is the Musicke of the Citie present, playing.

Chamal, the next Prouince, is Idolatrous, or Heathenish: for so we distinguish them from Saracens, Jewes, and Christians, which I would were not as guiltie of Idolatrie as the former, in so many their forbidden Rites, although these haue all; and the other, part of the Scriptures, whereof those Heathens and Idolaters are utterly ignorant. Here they not onely permit, but account it a great honour to haue their wiues and sisters at the pleasure of such strangers as they entertain, themselves departing the while, and suffering all things to be at their guests will: for so are their Idols serued, who therefore for this hospitalitie (they thinke) will prosper all that they haue. And when as Nan-ga-Can forbade them this beastly practise, they abstained three yeeres; but then sent a pitifull Embassage to him, with request, That they might continue their former custome, for since they left it, they could not thriue: who, ouercome by their fond importunitie, graunted their request; which they with ioy accepted, and doe still obserue.

Idolaters, how vnderstood in this Booke.

In the same Prouince of Tanguth is Succuir, whose Mountaines are clothed with Rheubarbe, from whence it is by Merchants conueyed through the World. Campion is the mother Citie of the Countrey, inhabited by Idolaters, with some of the Arabians and Christian Nations. The Christians had there, in the time of M. Polo, three faire Churches. The Idolaters had many Monasteries, abounding with Idols of Wood, Earth, and Stone, couered with Gold, and artificially made, some great, tenne paces in length lying along, with other litle ones about them, which seeme as their Disciples, to doe them reuerence. Their religious persons liue, in their opinion, more honestly than other Idolaters, although their honestie is such, as that they thinke it no sinne to lye lye with a woman, which shall seeke it at their hands; but if the man first make loue, it is sinfull. They haue also their Fasting-dayes, three, four, or five in a moneth, in which they shedde no bloud, nor eat flesh. They haue many wiues; of which, the first-married hath the first place and preeminence. Heere Marcus Paulus liued about a yeare.

Touching the Religion and Customes in Tanguth, the reports c of Caggi Mami in Ramusius (who of late yeares was in Campion) are not much different. Hee saith, That their Temples are made like the Christians, capable of foure or five thousand persons. In them are two Images of a man and woman, lying in length fortie foot, all of one Peece, or Stone: For which vse they haue Carts with fortie wheelles, drawne of five or sixe hundred Horses and Mules, two or three moneths iourney. They haue also little Images, with sixe or seuen heads, and ten hands, holding in each of them severall things, as a Serpent, Bird, Flower, &c. They haue Monasteries, wherein are men of holy life, neuer comming forth, but haue food carried them thither daily: Their gates are walled vp; and there are infinite of Frier-like companions passing to and fro in the Citie. When any of their kindred die, they mourne in white. They haue Printing, not much vnlike to that which is vsed in Europe; and Artillerie on their walles very thicke, as haue the Turkes. All the Catayans and Idolaters are forbidden to depart out of their natiue countrey. They haue three Sciences, Chimia, Limia, and Simia: the first, Alchymie; the second, to make enamoured; the third, Iugling, or Magicke.

Succuir also is, according to his report, great and faire, beautified with many Temples. Their Rheubarbe they would not bestow the paines to gather, but for the Merchants, which from China, Persia, and other places fetch it from them at a cheape price. Nor doe they in Tanguth vse it for Phisicke, as wee heere, but with other ingredients make perfumes thereof for their Idols: and in some places they burne it in stead of other firing, and giue it their horses to eat. They set more price by an hearbe which they call Mambrosi cini, medicinable for the eyes, and another called Cbias Catay, growing in Catay at Caciausu, admirable against very many diseases, an ounce whereof they esteeme as good as a sack of Rheubarbe; whose description you may see at large, according to the relation and picture of the said Cbaggi, in Ramusius: for (to adde that also) they haue many Painters, and one Countrey inhabited onely by them. These Tanguthians are bearded as men in these parts, especially some time of the yeare.

d M. Paul.

Northwards from Tanguth is the Plaine<sup>d</sup> of Bargu, in customes and manners like to the first Tartars, confining with the Scythian Ocean, fourescore dayes iourney from Ezina, in the North parts of Tanguth, and situate vnder the North Starre. Eastward of Tanguth (somewhat inclining to the South) is the Kingdome of Erginul, addicted likewise to Ethnike superstitions, wherein yet are some, both Nestorians and Mahometans. Here are certaine wilde Bulls as bigge as Elephants, with manes of white and fine haire, like silke; of which, some they tame, and betwixt them and their tame Kine engender a race of strong and laborious Oxen. Here is found a beast also, as bigge as a Goat, of exquisite shape, which every full Moone hath an apostemation or swelling vnder the bellie, which the Hunters (at that time chasing the said beast) doe cut off, and drie against the Sunne, and it proueth the best Muske in the world.

The next Easterly Countrey is Egrigaia, idolatrous, and hauing some Christians of the Sect of Nestorius. But Tenduc, next adioyning, was at that time gouerned by King George, a Christian and a Priest of the posteritie of Presbyter Iohn, subiect to the Grand Can. And the Grand Cans giue commonly their daughters in marriage to this generation and stock of Presbyter Iohn. The most part of the inhabitants are Christians, some Idolaters and Mahometans being there also. There be also that are called Argon, descended of Ethnikes and Moores, the wisest and properest men in those parts. All the people, from hence to Cathay, are Christian, Mahometan, and Gentile, as themselves like best. In Thebet, the next countrey, the people in times past (saith c Will. de Rubraquis) bestowed on their parents no other Sepulchre then their owne bowels, and yet in part retaine it, making fine cuppes of their deceased parents skuls, that drinking out of them in the midst of their iolitie, they may not forget their progenitors. They haue much much gold, but hold it an high offence to imprison it, as some do with vs, in Chests or Treasuries; and therefore hauing satisfied necessitie, they lay vp the rest in the earth, fearing otherwise to offend God. Cambalu is in the Northeast parts of Cathay: and fortie miles Westward from hence (all which way is enriched with Palaces, Vineyards, and fruitfull Fields) is Gouza, a faire Citie, and great, with many Idoll-Monasteries. Here the way parteth, leading Westward into Cathay, and Southeastward vnto Mangi, or China: Tanifu and Caccianfu are Prouinces, which trend Westward from hence, inhabited with idolatrous Nations, and here and there some of the Arabian and Christian profession, full of Cities. Cunchin and Sindinfu are Ethnikes; as is Thebeth: where they haue a brutish custome, not to take a wife that is a Virgin; and therefore, when Merchants passe that way, the mothers offer vnto them their daughters, much struing which of them may be the most effectuell bawde to her childe. They taking to their pleasure such as they like, gratifie them with some jewell, or other present, which on her marriage-day she weareth, and she which hath most of such presents, bringeth the most accepted dowrie to her husband, as testimonies of the great fauour of their Idols. This Thebeth contained sometimes eight Kingdomes, with many Cities, but was now desolated by the Tartarians. There are great Necromancers, which by their infernall skill cause Thunders and Tempests. They haue Dogges as bigge as Asses, with which they catch wilde Oxen and all sorts of beasts.

like custome in Calicut.

Caidu is an Heathenish Nation, where in honour of their Idols, they prostitute their wiues, sisters, and daughters, to the lust of Travellers; which being entertained in the house, the good man departeth, and the woman setteth some token ouer the doore, which there remaineth as long as this stallion-stranger, for a signe to her husband, not to returne till the guest be as well gone from her house, as honestie from her heart, and wit from his head. They make money of salt, as in Cathay of paper. In Caraiian also (a large Prouince adioyning) there are some Christians and Saracens, but the most Ethnikes, which are not discontented, that other men should lie with their wiues, if the women be willing.

Carazan is of like irreligion; their soules captiuated to the Olde Serpent, and their bodies endangered to mightie huge bodies of s Serpents, tenne paces long, and tenne spannes thicke, which that Countrey yeeldeth. They keepe in their dennes in the day, and in the night prey vpon Lions, Wolves, and other Beasts, which when they haue deuoured, they resort to some water to drinke, and by their weight leaue so deepe impression in the sand, that hereby men knowing their haunt, doe vnderfet this their Tract with sharpe stakes, headed with iron, couering the same againe with sand; by this meanes preying on the spoyler, and deuouring the deuourer; esteeming nothing more sauourie then the flesh, nor more medicinable then the gall of this Serpent. More Serpentine then this diet, was that custome which they vsed, when any proper and personable Gentleman, of valorous spirit, and goodly presence, lodged in any house amongst them: in the night they killed him, not for the spoyle, but that his soule, furnished with such partes of bodie and minde, might remaine in that house. Much hope of future happines to that house did they repose in so vnhappy attempts. But the great Can killed this Serpent also, ouerthrowing this custome in the conquest of that Prouince.

g The serpents
of Carazan.

Cardandan confineth on the Westerne limits of Carazen. They make blacke lists in their flesh, tazing the skinne, and put therein some blacke tincture, which ever remaineth, accounting it a great ornament. When a woman is deliuered of a child, the man lyeth in, and keopeth his bed, with visitation of Gossips, the space of fortie dayes. They worship the ancientest person of the house, ascribing to him all their good. In this Prouince, and in Caidu, Vocian, and Iaci, they haue no Physicians, but when any be sicke, they send for their Witches or Sorcerers, and acquaint them with their malady. They cause Minstrels to play while they dance and sing, in honour of their Idols, not ceasing till the Diuell entereth into one of them, of whom those Sorcerers demand the cause of the parties sicknesse, and meanes of recoverie. The Demoniaks answereth for some offence to such or such a God. They pray that God of pardon, vowing that when he is whole, he shall offer him a sacrifice of his owne blood. If the Diuell see him vnlikely to recouer, he answereth, that his offences are so grieuous, that no sacrifice can expiate: but if there be likely-hood of recouerie hee enioyneth them a sacrifice of so many Rammes with blacke heads, to be offered by these Sorcerers, assembled together with their wiues, and then will that god be reconciled. This is presently done by the kinsmen of the sicke, the sheepe killed, their bloud hurled vp towards Heauen. The Sorcerers and Sorceresses make great lights, and incense all this visited house, making a smoke of Lignum Aloe, and casting into the aire the water wherein the sacrificed flesh was sodden, with some spiced drinckes, laughing, singing, dauncing in honour of that God. After all this feul-rout they demaund againe of the Demoniacke, if the God be appeased: if so, they fall to those spiced drinckes and sacrificed flesh with great mirth, and being well apayed, returne home; if not, they (at his bidding) renue their superstition, ascribing the recouerie (if it happen) to that Idoll; and if he dieth notwithstanding, they shift it off to the want of their full due, fleeing, or tasting the same before, to the Idols defrauding. Thus they doe in all Catay and Mangi. Thus much out of the large Reports of Paulus that renowned Venetian<sup>a</sup> to whom our Relations are so much indebted.

a Of him, his wealth and family see Ramus preface: his Pallace is yet in Venice, now deuided into 70. dwellings. Nich. Lock saw both it & his Mappa mundi mentioned by Ramus, and his Sepulchre.

b Hypocritical shauelings.

Rubruquius telleth the like of Cailar and Caracotam, where he had been in these Catayan Prouinces, concerning their Christopher or Giant-like Idols, and Idoll Temples in one of which he saw a man, with a crosse drawne with inke on his hand, who seemed by his answeres to be a Christian; with Images like to that of S. Michael, & other Saints. They haue a Sect called Ingures, whose<sup>b</sup> Priests are shauens, and clad in Saffron-coloured garments, vnmarr'd, an hundred or two hundred in a Cloyster. On their holy-dayes they place in their Temples two long formes, one ouer against another, whereon they sit with Bookes in their hands, reading softly to themselves. Nor could our Author (entring amongst them) by any meanes breake this their silence: They haue, where soeuer they goe, a string about them full of nut-shells, like the Popish bead-rols; alway they are vitering these wordes, Oumam bañani, God thou knowest, expecting so many rewardes, as they make such memorials of God. They haue a Church-yard, & a Church-porch, with a long pole on it (as it were a steeple) adioyning to their Temples. In those porches they vseto sit and conferre. They weare certaine ornaments of paper on their heads. Their writing is downewards, and so from the left hand to the right; which the Tartars receiued from them. They vse Magicall Characters, hanging their Temples full of them. They burne their dead, and lay vp the ashes in the top of a Pyramis. They belecue there is one God, that he is a Spirit: and their Images they make not to represent God, but in memoriall of the rich after their death, as they professed to Rubruquius. The Priests (besides their Saffron-iackets buttoned close before) weare on their left shoulder a cloake descending before and behinde vnder their right arme, like to a Deacon carrying the Houselboxe in Lent. They worship towards the North, clapping their hands together, and prostrating themselves on their knees vpon the Earth, holding also their foreheads in their hands. They extend their Temples East and West in length; vpon the North side they build (as it were) a Vestrie; on the South, a Porch. The doores of their Temples are alwayes opened to the South. A certaine Nestorian Priest told him of so huge an Idoll, that it might be seene two dayes before a man came at it. Within the Quier, which is on the North side of the Temple, they place a cheff long and broad, like a table, and behind that cheff stands their principall Idoll, towards the South: round about which they place the other lesse Idols: and vpon that cheff they set candles and oblations. They haue great Bels like vnto ours. The Nestorians of those parts, pray with hands displayed before their breasts, so to differ from that Ingurian Rite of ioyning hands in prayer. Thus far W. de Rubruquis, who was there An. 1153. In Thebet (saith Odoricus) resideth the Abassi, or Pope of the Idolaters; distributing Religious preferments to those Easterne Idolaters, as the Roman Pope doth in the West.

CHAP. XVII.

Of other Northerne people adioyning to the Tartars, and their Religions.

THE Permians and Samoits that lie from Russia North and Northeast, are thought to have taken their beginning from the Tartar kinde, whom they somewhat resemble in countenance. The Permians are subiect to the Russe: they liue by hunting and trading with their furs, as doe the Samoyts, which dwell more toward the North Sea. The Samoyt, or Samoed, hath his name as the Russe saith, of eating himselfe: as if they had sometime beene Canibals: and at this time they will eat raw flesh, whatsoever it be, euen the very carion that lyeth in the ditch. They say themselves, that they were called Samois, that is, of themselves, as if they were Indigenes, there bred, and not transplanted from any other people. I talked (saith our Author) with certaine of them, and finde that they acknowledge one God, but represent him by such things as they haue most vse and good by: and therefore they worship the Sunne, the Ollen, and the Lofy and such like.

The Permacks, and Schyrians are of the Russe Religion. The Yougorians are clothed after the Permack fashion, but worship Images as doe the Samoeds. The Tingoseys a people farre more Easterly, are said to worships the Sunne and Moone. They weare their apparrell, all of Deere-skinnes, made closer to them then the Samoeds, being also a taller people. Beyond the Tingoseys liue the Boulashees: beyond them the Seelachee. Beyond the Riuer Yenisey the Imbakj and Ostaki a kind of Tartars. Beyond the Tingoseys is a Riuer called Geta. This space, extending Eastward from Ob, a Russe was a Summer in traouelling, and liued there 6 yeares. Oneke, another Russe with first occasion of subduing the Samoyeds to the Russian Dominion in the Raigne of Phodor Iuanowich. He sending his Sonnes into the Samoeds Countrie, found that about the Riuer Ob they were governed by the ancientest, had no Cities, liued in hords or companies, ate the beasts theyooke, knew not corne nor bread, were good Archers, sharpening their Arrowes with fish bones and stones: sewed Furges with bones and lewes for their clothing which they ware inward in Winter, outward in Summer, couered their houses with Elkes-skinnes: He grew rich by trading with them. For the Muscovite sent his Messengers gallantly attired, which easily obtained leave to erect Castles neere Ob, to which hee sent condemned persons, and brought it into the forme of a petty Kingdome. Boris the next Empetour built Tooma 300 leagues vp the Riuer Ob, and many other Townes on both sides the Riuer, the which were peopled with Samoeds, Tartars, and Russes. In ten weekes trauell from Ob to the Tingoseys through the deserts. They liue in hords, haue deformed swellings vnder the throat. These traouelling Eastward passed a Riuer which they called Pisida, and heard the sound of brazen Bells: which if it be so, is argument of some more ciuil people either of Cathay or the parts adioyning. The Cathayans are said to trade to Siberia: From the mouth of Pechora to Ob it tenn dayes sayling. Ob and Ienisey runne North and South: The Samoeds report that in Ienisey are great vessels drawne with sledges.

In the yeere one thousand six hundred eleuen Iohann Logan & W. Purfselone, sailed to Pechora, where they anchored Iuly the tenth, and on the sixteenth came to Pustozera: where M. Logan wintered; but Purfselone trauelled from thence by land to Colmogro. The nine and twentieth of Nouember he departed with Russes and Permacks, for Siberia in a sledge drawne with two Deere: in their Argeshey (so they call their whole company) were two hundred and ten sleds: and they had aboue five hundred for change when the other were weary. They kept company till the south of December, and then in companie of foure sleds and a Samoed for a guide, bee left the sleds and sledges, and went on foot for Sloborcka, where hee arriued the twentieth day at night: and thence trauelled day and night to Colmogro, where hee arriued the twelfth being 250. versts or Russe myles, somewhat shorter then ours. He returned againe with a better passage to Pechora, by reason of much snow falne in the meane while and frozen, passing ouer the mountaines which are not high, but a Champaine Countrie. He left the companie the fifth of Iannary. and in fortie houres continuall post, passed (by report) three hundred and fiftie versts. About the mouth of the Riuer Ob,<sup>a</sup> is said to be an ancient Idoll, in forme of an old woman, holding in each arme a childe, and a third at her feet, called by her worshippers (the Iugri, Obdorian and Comderani) Zlata Baba, that is, the golden olde wife, to which they offer precious Fures, and sacrifice Harts, besmearing the mouth and eyes of the Idoll with the bloud. In the time of their sacrificing, the Priest demands of the Idoll touching things to come, and sometimes receiueth answer. D. Fletcher<sup>b</sup> found this to be a very fable. Only (saith he) in the Prouince of Obdoria, on the Sea-side neere the mouth of Ob, there is a Rocke, which naturally (being somewhat helped by imagination) seemes to beare the shape of a maged woman with a childe in her armes (as the Rocke by the North Cape, the shape of a Friar) where the Obdorian Samoytes use to resort, by reason of the commoditie of the place for fishing: and there sometimes practise their Sorceries, and ominous coniecturings about the good or bad successe of their iourneys, fishings, huntings, and such like.

The Samoyts or Samoyeds are clad from head to foot in Deeres-skinnes or in Stalk-skinnes with the hairy side outwards downe as low as the knees with their breeches and netherstockes of the same, both men and women. They are all blacke haired, naturally beardslesse. And therefore the men are hardly discerned from the women, but by the lockes which the women weare downe their eares. They live a wilde and sauage life roving from one place to another, without any proprietie of House or Land. Their leader in eury company is their Papa or Priest.

The Samoyeds are Idolaters and Witches, observing Deuillish Superstitions, as witnesseth Rich. Iohnson, who on the fifth of Iannary in the yecere a thousand five hundred fiftie seuen saw amongst them, as followeth. The Samoyeds about the banks of Rechor, are in subiection to the Muscouite, and when they will remoue from one place to another, then they will make Sacrifices, in manner following. Eury kindred offer Sacrifice in their owne tent, and he that is most Ancient, is their Priest. And first the Priest doth begin to play vpon a thing like a great Siure, with a skinne on the one end like a Drumme; his Drumme-sticke is about a span long, and one end is round like a ball, couered with the skin of an Hart.

Also the Priest hath as it were a white garland on his head, and his face is crowned with a peece of a shirt of male, with many small ribbes, and teeth of fishes and wilde beasts hanging thereon. Then he singeth, as we use here in England to hollow, whoope or shout at Houndes; and the rest of the companie answer him with this Ouer Igha, Igha, Igha, to which the Priest with his voice replieth. And they answer him with the selfe-same wordes, so many times, till in the end, hee becomie, as it were, motionlesse, falling downe as he were dead, hauing nothing on him but a shirt, and lying on his back. I perceiued him yet to breath, and asked why he lay so; they answered, Now doth our God tell him what we shall doe, and whither we shall goe. And when hee had lied a litle while, they cried thus three times together, Oghav, Oghav, Oghav, and when they use these three calls he ryseth with his head, and lyeth downe againe; and then he roseth and sang with like voyces as he did before, with the like answer, Igha, Igha, Igha. Then he commanded them to kill five Ollens, or great Deere, and continued singing still, both he and they as before. Then hee tooke a sword of a Cubite and a spanne long (I did mete it my selfe) and put it into his belly halfe way, and sometime lesse, but so wound was to be seene; they continuing their sweet song still. Then hee put the sword into the fire, till it was warme, and so thrust it into the slit of his shirt, and thrust it thorow his bodie, as I thought, in at his nauell, and out at his fundament, the point being out of his shirt behinde, I laid my finger vpon it. Then hee pulled out the sword, and sate downe.

This being done, they set a Kettle of water ouer the fire to heat, and when the water the water was in seething, they sate and sang not. Then they made a thing being square, and in height and squarenesse of a chaire; and covered with a gowne very close the fore-part thereof, for the hinder-part stood to the tents side. Their tents are round and are called Choms; in their language, The water still seething on the fire, and this square seat being ready, the Priest put off his shirt, and the thing like a garland, which was on his head, with those things which covered his face, and he had on yet all this while a paire of hoses of Deere-skinnes with the haire on, which came vp to his buttocks. So he went into the square seat, and sate downe like a Taylor, and sang with a strong voyce or hollowing. Then they tooke a small line made of Deere-skinnes of four fathomes long, and with a small knot the Priest made it fast about his necke, and under his left arme, and gaue it to two men standing on each side of him; which held the ends together. Then the kettle of hot water was set before him in the square seat, which seat they now covered with a gowne of broad-cloath without lining (such as the Russ serve to weage). Then the two men which did hold the end of the line, still standing close, began to draw, & drew, til they had drawn the ends of the line tisse, & together; and then I heard a thing fall into the kettle of water, which was before him in the tent. I asked what it was, and they answered, his head, shoulder and left arme; which the line had cut off, I meane the knot, which I saw afterwarde drawne hard together. Then I rose vp, and would haue looked whether it were so or not, but they laid holde on mee; and said, that if they should see him with their bodily eyes, they should liue no longer. (And the most part of them can speake the Russian tongue, to be vnderstood, and they took me to be a Russian.) Then they beganne to hollow with these wordes Oghasso, Oghasso, Oghasso, many times together: in the meane while I saw a thing like a finger of a man, two times together, thrust thorow the gowne from the Priest. I asked them that sawe it, to me what it was, that I saw, and they said, not his finger, for he was yet dead; and that which I saw appeare thorow the gowne, was a beast, but what beast they knew not, nor would not tell. And I looked vpon the gowne, and there was no hole to be seen. At last the Priest lifted vp his head, with his shoulder and arme, and all his body, and came out to the fire. Thus farre of their seruice, which I saw during the space of certaine houres. But how they doe worship their Idols, that I saw not: for they put vp their Idols to remoue from that place where they lay. And I went to him that serued their Priest, and asked him what their God said to him, when he lay as dead. He answered, that his owne people doth not know, neither is it for them to know, for they must doe as he commanded.

William Purfloe tolde me of the like either iuggling or Magicall pranks practised by the Samoed-Coniurours or Priests, whom they haue in great veneration. They haue (as he reporteth) certaine Images, some in likenes of a man, others of a Beare, Wolfe, &c. which they behang with the richest Fures they can get, hiding them in Caves in the Woods, for feare of the Russes: who trauell those Countries to hunt after wilde beasts, as Sable, Fox and Beauer: who if they light vpon those furred Deities take away the Fures, and bestow on them greater heat in fires. Puslozero is in 68. 50. The Inhabitantes holde trade with other Samoeds, which haue traffique with the Ongonians and Mulgumsey, for Sables, blacke and white Foxes, Beauers, Downe, Whales-Furres. The Russes maligning others that gaine which themselves find in the Samoed-trade, traduced the English amongst them as spies. The Ozero or lake before the Towne was frozen ouer Octob. 13. and so continued till May 20. Iosim Logan there observed, and Decemb. 11. he could see but the way of the Sun-beames: on the 13. the beames but not the Sun: which on Christmas day he saw rising at S. and by West, and setting at South West and by South: not wholly eleuated from the Horizon; but all the way the nether part of the Sun seeming iust and euen with it. They found the harbor of Pechora full of ice in July, the tide strong and dangerous. The Towne of Pechora is small, it hath three Churches: the poore in the Spring and Summer time liue by catching Partridges, Geese, Duckes, Swans: salt the flesh and liue on them most of the Winter. Sailing from Puslozero in August towards Nova Zemla, they fastened them-

The Samoyeds know these unknowne deserts, and can tell where the mosse groweth, wherewith they refresh their wearied Deere, pitching their tents of Deere-skinne neere the same. Their wiues and daughters fetch wood sometimes ten versts off, they hang kettles on the fire with snow, of which melted, euery one drinks a draught. When they haue supped, they spread a Deere-skinne on the snow within the Tent, whereon hee resteth couered with his day-apparell. Ten or twelue of the boyes or mayds watch the Deere to keepe them from Wolves or Beares: making a great noise if they see any. For two hundred and fiftie sleds they pitch euery night three tents. The light of the Moone and snow helpe them in their trauells.

The Hollanders in the year 1594. sent to discover a way to Cathay and China, by the North-East, which by Master Burrough, Pet and Iacman, English men, had been long before in vaine attempted. William Barentz was the chiefe Pilot for this Discouerie. This year they sailed thorow the Straits of Vaygats, and thought themselves not farre short of the River Ob. The next year they returned for the same discouery. They landed in the Samogithians or Samoyeds countrey, and named a place, because they there found Images carued of wood, Idoll-nooke. They gaue names to places long before discovered by the English, as if they had beene the first founders. They learned of certaine Muscouites, that the Inhabitants of Noua Zemla, had neither Religion nor Ciuilitie prescribed them by any Law, but worshipped the Sunne, Moone, and North-Starre, and euery year offered vnto them sacrifices of Deere and other things. On the nine and twentieth of August there arose a thicke fogge, whereupon Oliuer Brund (which had beene three seuerall yeares sent by the King of Denmarke, for the discouerie of Greenland) reporteth that in threescore and fixteene degrees he had often obserued such thicke fogges, that some perished thereby. These happened most commonly in October and November. The last of August they had speech with the Samoyeds, they were of a short stature, scarcely foure foote high, with long hair, broad faces, great heads, little eyes, short and bow legges, very swift, clothed with beasts skins, whereof the hairy side was outward. They know no God. The Sun (whose presence they are long deprived of in the winter (which is recompensed in their nightlesse Summer) is worshipped amongst them. And when the Sun is declining out of their sight, the Moone, or North-Starre, is his receiuer or successour (if you will) in tribute of their deuotions. They haue besides, many Idols rudely carued. In times past they had no King, but now they chuse one to that dignitie. They burie the dead, and offer yearely their sacrifices for them to the Sun, Moone, and North-Star, of their deere which they burne, except the head and feet. They eat the flesh of wilde beasts either raw, or dried in the ayre; which make them haue very vsfauorie breath. On the sixth of September two of them went on shore, on the Continent of Moscouia, and encountered with a Beare, which killed one of them: his crie brought in other of their fellows (which were also stragling about) to his rescue, but the Beare laid hold also on one of them, and could not be driuen to forsake his prey, till himselfe became a prey in recompence. The two torne carkasses were there buried. They tooke from the Beare, which they killed, an hundred pound of fat, which serued them for their lamp: the skin was nine foot long, and seuen wide.

In the year 1596. there were sent other two shippes, to prosecute this Discouerie, which on the fourth of June had sight of a triple Sunne, attended and guarded with a double Rainbow, one encompassing them, the other crossing them over the head. After many dreadfull combates with the ice, and one of the shippes departing from the other, they were forced to winter in Noua Zemla; where they built them a house to serue them for a fortification against the sauage Beares, tempeituous stormes, continuall snowes, ice, and vspeakable cold; and (if worse may bee) a worse then all these, they endured, a continuall night of many weekes, wherein neither the Sunne, nor any of his courtly traine, the least raies to bee the harbingers of his desired presence, did present themselves to their eyes: and the fire could scarcely preuaile against the insulting tyrannie of the cold, to warme them. The Beares together with the Sun forsooke them, but plentie of Foxes remained; and with the Sunne the Beares also returned, sometime laying violent siege to their house. From the fourth of November all the seuen and twentieth of Iannarie they saw no sunne. Their watch also or clock was by violence of the cold forced to stand still, that they could not measure their times. Thus did they waite in expectation of the Sunnes returne, that they also (not able further to pursue the voyage) might returne home, which eleven of them did in October following.

But seeing these North-easterne Seas are so frozen and vnpassable, I will therefore in an inkie Sea finde an easier passage for the Reader, with more both ease and security, to the mightie Kingdome of China, whereof we are next to speake.

CHAP. XVIII.

Hina is supposed of some, to be that Countrey, whose people of Ptolomey are called Sina. Some thinke them to be the people mentioned by the Prophet Esaie, whereunto Iunius also inclineth. The Arabians call them Tzinis; and the Portugals first of all other (because they could not pronounce it aright) called them Chinians (saith Joseph Scaliger) Pierre du Larric, saith, that before that time in all the East they were called Chij, and the inhabitants of Ceilan were called Chingales, because they were mixed with the Chinois; and Cinamom, was of the Persians named Durchin, that is, wood of China, as some thinke: he addeth their opinion that deriue that name from the Chinian salutation, in which they vse the word Chij, Chij, as a nickname therefore giuen them; and others that thinke the Citle Chincheo gaue name to the whole Region: but it were tedious to recite heere the seuerall opinions in this question; the difficultie whereof ariseth from this, that the Chinois themselues know not this name, but call their Countrey Tamen. Leauing therefore these deriuations and names of Cin, Cauchin China, Battchina, and the rest; let vs come to the Countrey itselfe. It bordereth on the North, with Catay and the Tartars; on the South, with Cauchin China; on the East, with the Sea; on the West, with the Bramas. It reacheth from 17. degrees to two and fortie of Northerly Latitude and lyeth after their owne description almost foure square. On the West it is separated and secure from vnneighbourly neighbours, by a sandie wilderneffe; on the North, by a wall, which Nature hath partly framed of high mountaines, and Art hath supplied with the labour and industrie of men. It is diuided into fifteene Prouinces; sixe whereof border on the Sea, Catar, Foquien, Chequiam, Nanquin, Xantum, Paquin: the other nine be in-land, Quin, Huquiam, Houan, Xiensis, Xanfi, Suchnon, Queichen, Iuman, Caansis. Some reckon these names somewhat differently. The King holdeth his Court in Paquin; his predecessors, before the Tartarian conquest of this Countrey, are said to haue resided in Nanquin, or (according to the more ancient writers) in Quinsay. Pantogia reporteth his owne iourney from Macao to Paquin, the space of six hundred Spanish leagues (which the next way by land is reckoned 450.) in all that space travelling but one day by land, for shortning his way, otherwise all the way by water, caried in a Riuer, called of the Chinians a little Sea for the greatnesse, (being the greatest which euer hee saw) abounding with Sea-fish an hundred leagues vp from the Sea, and after that in another Riuer of like bignesse, whose waters were thicke and miry, which they clarifie with allume; before they can drinke it: all the rest of the streames that he passed were made by mens hands about 200 leagues. These Riuers are abundantly stored with shipping, and from Nanquin to Paquin the space of three hundred leagues, it seemed to be, as it were, a continued street of Shippes: and though they came in the morning betimes to Nanquin, yet were there the same houre about fise hundred saile of Vessels, vnder saile readie to enter, which were laden with provision for the Citie. The Kings Shippes in that Region about Nanquin, are reported to be about ten thousand, to carrie his tents and tributes, besides a thousand saile belonging to private men. The Ships wherein the Mandarines, or Magistrates and Officers are carried, are not inferiour in sumptuous stateliness to the Shippes Royall in Europe, and some exceeding them, having parlours, large halls, and many windows with silke Curtaines, and curious painted without enuironed with galleries: the height as of high houses: and painted within and without, with a certaine liquor made of a gumme called Claren of shining brightnesse and long continuance, besides great store of carued workes. Escallanta and Gaspard de Crux report a Proverbe of the Chinois, that their King is able to make a bridge of Shippes from China to Malaua, which is neere five hundred leagues. They haue so great store of timber, that a Ship may there bee built for a fourth part of the which it will here cost. The Riuer is no lesse adorned and beautified with Cities, Townes, and Villages, so many, as that in all this way being neere or against one they had alway fight of another: and so great, that sometime they sayled two or three houres alongst the walles of some Citie. Their Townes and Cities haue high walles.

They haue (as Barros numbred) 244. Cities of name, dignified by the title Fa, Antonie Dalmida reckoned 150. and as many Townes, or smaller Cities enclosed Cben, with their seuerall iurisdiccions: A third sort called hien, as great as the meaner Cities in Spaine, about 120. Two sorts of Castles both for fortification and habitation with priuiledges also of market, the greater sort named Huy 293, the lesse of greater number 2593. Their Villages are innumerable. In each Citie is an Officer that hath charge of the wals, whereby they are kept faire and strong: and for further beautie, besides commoditie of shadow, they plant trees at their dores, which continue green all the yeare long. The Cities generally are like one another, except in greatnesse.

The streets are strait, yielding prospect from one gate to another, Canton is accounted the least of the Metropolitane Cities: it hath on one side a great navigable River, elsewhere enuironed with a deep Trench filled with water which is navigable also: the wals haue 83. Bulwarkes: the streets so broad that tenne men may ride in front, and paved, adorned with many triumphant Arches, and shops on both sides: the bridges there and elsewhere in the Kingdome are many of large free stones very costly, the high wayes very stately which leade to the Cities: and the Kings houses for the publike Officers very magnificent after their manner. Such was the plentie and abundance, that in this one Citie were spent euery day betweene five and sixe thousand Hogges, and betweene tenne and eleuen thousand Duckes, besides a great number of Kine, Birds, Hens, Conies, Frogs, Dogges, Fish of many sorts: and yet the most chief meat of the Chinois is Rice boyled with water.

Nanquin standeth in two and thirtie degrees, and is eight or tenne leagues from the Sea, with a River leading thither. <sup>a</sup> It hath three faire bricke wals, with large & strong gates. The streets are of two leagues, or of two and a halfe in length, wide, and paved. The compasse is at least 11. or 12. leagues, and containeth by coniecture 20000 houses, and (according to all the opinions of the Iesuites there abiding) equalling, or exceeding in people foure of the greatest Cities in Europe. There are diuers other Cities within a dayes iourney hereof, which are great and famous for traffique, of which Hancheum and Sucheum are chiefe, which are of the Chinians called Paradise, for the plentie of all things. Sucheum is as Venice in situation, hauing her streetes part by water, and part on land; so rich in traffique, that the China-bookes doe reckon twelue millions of reuenue to accrew from hence to the Kings coffers: and he that seeth these Cities (saith the Iesuite) will beleue those reports.

To stay heere awhile, That <sup>b</sup> Quinsay, whilome the Royall seate of the Kings of Mangi (as Venetius recordeth) now supposed to be swallowed vp with some Earthquake, or in Bellona's all-consuming belly deuoured, may seeme to bee heere sayled from the graue: the watery streetes; the trade and reuenue, exceeding alone (if some account truly) any one the richest Kingdome in Europe: the situation in the midst of China, and neere to the Sea; the signification, Quinsay being interpreted, The City of Heaven: and so is Suntien (in the discourse <sup>c</sup> of this Kingdome, written by Mendoza) said to signifie. All these reasons doe moue me to coniecture, that Quinsay is now by euerfion of Earth-quake, Warres, or both, and by diuersion of the Court from thence, conuerted into this smaller Sucheum, the name also a little inuer-

b After I had written this, I was further confirmed in my opinion by the relation of the Citie of Quinsay, largely written by Contugo Cota in la. 4. parte del Thesoro politico c. 47. who is of the same mind.

Indremaying as diuers languages and dialects will differ, almost the same. Or perhaps tokening with so long warres (began in the time of M. Paulus, and continuing in the dayes of our countrey-man Mandao, almost an hundred yeares after, both of them serving the great Cau in those warres) Quinsay at last, after so long and tedious consumption, died, and bequeathed what remained those spoyle of her land-greatness, unto Nanquin, of her sea-weasures, unto Suebeum, both succeeding, but not together equalling (that wonder of the world) Quinsay, bent compassing an hundred miles, and euery thousand bridges, fikreene hundred thousand households, which the country choynge (then the much part of the Kingdome of Mangi) yeelding fixteene millions, and eight hundred thousand ducats of golde, besides fixte millions, and foure hundred thousand ducats for the custome of salt, in yearely renenue to the great Cau. Well then may it befeeme Suebeum and Nanquin, both to haue risen out of the ashes of such a Phoenix. Hereto agreeth the report of Nicolo di Cami (who was there about the yeare 1440.) that the King had then built Quinsay anew, thirtie miles circuit. But it is fiftie to Panagra.

lib. 2. cap. 68.

These Cities of China want that elegance and magnificence, which stately Temples, and sumptuous building, doe afford vnto our Cities of Europe. Their houses are low, without the ornament of Porches, Galleries, Windows, and prospect into the streets. Besides these habitations, they haue many which dwell not on land but in their ships. For their shipping is of two sorts, one for saile, another for habitation also, these also meanly or fairly, according to the wealth of the owners. In the one side they carrie their families, in the other side their passengers. Many Barques are as dwelling houses by the way, and likewise as shops of Merchandize. Many of the poorer water-dwellers get their liuing by labour on land: their wiues ferrie ouer passengers and vse means to get Fish. They bring vp thousands of Duckes, hatched with artificiall heat in dung, which hauing fedde with a little rise in the morning, they put out at a dore into the water, which presently swimme on land, and eate the weedes which grow among the rice (these weeders thereby procuring some wages of the husbandmen to their owners) and at night are called home with a Tabor, each resorting to their owne Barque. They haue certaine Sea-crowes or Cormorants, wherewith they fish, tying their gorges that they cannot swallow the fishes which they take, till their Masters turne being serued, they are suffered to hunt for themselves.

In the Winter they haue store of yce and snow, whereby the riuers are frozen euen about Nanquin. They haue abundance of all things necessarie to the life of man, fruits, flesh, and fish, with prices correspondent. They haue two, and somewhere three harvests in the yeare. Few Mountaines, but Plaines of an hundred leagues. Wine they make of Rice. They eate thrice a day, but sparingly. Their drinke (be it water or wine) they drinke hot, and eate with two stickes of Iuorie, Ebonie, or like matter, nor touching their meat with their handes; and therefore little naperie serueth them. Their warme drinks and abstinence from fruits, are great preseruatiues of their health, which for the most part they enioy. The Chinians haue thin beards (not aboue twentie haire) short noses, small black eyes, long garments with wide sleeves; and, if they would resemble a deformed man, they paint him with short habite, great eyes and beard, and a long nose. They are white, but not so much as in Europe. The men as well as women, suffer their haire to grow long, colour it, and gather it into a net or cule on the top of their heads: those which are unmarried weare their haire curled on their foreheads. Their salutations are tedious, we will therefore but salute them. In entretyning a friend they ioyne both their handes, and holding them vp, bend their bodies to the earth: after other officious ceremonies, they offer him Chia to drinke, which is the water of a certaine hearbe of great price, and may not be omitted, with other iunkets. Except there be great familiarity, hee which will salute a friend must send a letter before for his harbenger, to signifie his affection towards him, with termes answerable to his estate. He is hereby warned to prepare himselfe for entertainment, clothing himselfe with apparell for that purpose, as must the guest also. If they were vnknowne to each other, they prostrate themselves, and knocke the ground diuers times with their foreheads. If they send a present, they send withall a letter, containing saying an Inuentory of the things sent, with termes very officious; which he must answer with another letter of thanks, and a present of like or greater value, besides a recompence to the messenger. Their partings from each other are as full of ceremonie. In their feasts, they set each guest two Tables, one furnished with flesh and fish, the other with fruits and junkets. They send a Pattis or letter sixe or fixe dayes before to invite them; and he which cannot come, with another letter must excuse himselfe. On the day, with the first light he sends new invitations, and again a little before the time, or else his guests will not come. Much curtesie is in the meeting, exceeding much straining and striving about the place of sitting, as much solempne ceremonie in eating, as if they were bidden to be witnesses of their hosts ostentation, to view and a little to taste his meats: but after sixe houres spent in this banquet, they may goe home to fill their bellies. In this officious trifling the Chinois spend a great part of their liues; but especially at the beginning of the new yeare fiftene dayes together, and at their birth dayes. Their women keepe home very closely, very rarely going forth to see their mothers, sisters, or some of their neere kindred: otherwise neuer; except the poorer sort, which sometime are scene by the way, appparelled in short habite, somewhat like the men in these parts. The Chinois couer their heads when they come before their betters. They buy and sell not with golde, but siluer, and that not coined; but every one hath his scoles with him to the Market to weigh his siluer: and they are very subtil and deceitfull, if men be not very warie. Things are there exceeding cheape: a hundred pound of sugar may be bought for nine or ten fixe pences; and other things proportionable: so that though there are none rich, as we interpret the word in Europe, for such and such revenues; yet this cheapenesse doth recompence that other defect. They haue Artificers of all trades; and in idleness none may liue. The impotent are well provided for in Hospital. They haue no gentlemen, but every man is a Plebeian vntill his merits raise him. Preferrment is achieued onely by learning. This maketh them generally studious. Their letters are not reduced into Alphabeticall order, nor are properly letters, but characters, whereof they haue some thousand; and therefore in that they faine not difference of syllables, but of sence, in diuers languages, yea, in Iapon &c, their writing is vnderstood, not their speaking. Their paper is like a thins transparent parchment, and beareth inke but on one side. Their writing is downwards, not side-ways, as ours, and with pensils. They haue in ordinary and daily vse eight or ten thousand of those characters. Their words are monosyllables, as are also their surnames, of which they haue not aboue three hundred in that world of people. Rhetorique is the only science which they syme at; for he obtaieth places of honor, which can most fitly place his wordes, and most eloquently write of the subiect propounded. Their printing is not by composing the letters, as with vs; but (as in Maps or the like pieces is here vsed) they make for euery leafe a Table or boord, with characters on both sides; which seemeth very laborious, and yet their bookes are very cheape. They print also white in blacke more artificially then in Europe, hauing to that end characters of stone, the letters not being therein set backward, that in the impression they may appeare forward; but in the stone and paper both alike: laying the paper on the stone, and gently pressing it into the prints thereof.

They haue not publique Schooles, but in the Cities are publique trials or commencements euery third yeare, whether these Probationers resort, and are examined, and are accordingly preferred. They haue three degrees: 1. Graduates of the first degree are called Sinsai; of the second, Quingiu; of the third, Chinzu. Euery Citie yeeldeth tryall for the first degree. For the second, onely the Metropolitan Citie of the Prouince; whereunto they of the first degree do resort euery third yeare, and in a publique house, doe the second time make an Oracion, of some obscurer theme then the former. There are such multitudes of them, that some are sometime killed in the entrance of that their Commencement-house. For the third degree, they are examined onely at the Court the third yeare after. And out of this Order are taken their Mandarins or Magistrates after some studie in the law of the Land. While they are writing their Probationary Themes, they are shut vp, with one to attend them foure and twenty hower, with pen, inke, paper, and candle, and hauing subscribed their names, certain

Registers copie the said Orations, without setting to the Authours names; and then sale up their first patternes. Those namelesse copists are by appointed Officers examined, and those chosen which they approve for best: the names and Authors are known by comparing these copies with the printipall. In the first degree they obtaine certaine immunities to themselves and their familia; provided that he proceed in his studies, or else they will degrade him. He that hath obtained the third degree of Loytia (as some recite it, or as we may stile it; Doffor) writes it vp over his doores, that all men may honour his house: and this is the highest Nobilitie whereto they can ascend. To the elder brother of these fellow-commencers (which can be but three hundred and fiftie at once) is a triumphall Arch erected, besides other solemnities. They haue books, written by certaine wise men or Philosophers, two thousand yeares since, or more, of Politicall and Morall Philosophie; the Authors wherof they honour for Saints; especially one Confucius, to whom the Mandarines doe therefore once in the year offer sacrifice, and the Kings doe honour his posteritie vnto this day. And hee alone in the path and weight of his Sentences may be compared to Plato or Socrates; though farre short of their elegant and eloquent phrases: Poetrie, Painting, and Musicke, are amongst them commendable qualities: but they are not so expert in them as men in these parts. They know little of the world but their owne Kingdome, which they commonly call the world. When they saw a Map of the World, which the Iesuites had, they were much little astonished to see it so great, & their Kingdome so little, which they thought had bin the one halfe thereof. Of God and heavenly things they know nothing. They had thought, that none had bookes and letters but themselves. The names of some of their Authours in the Mathematickes, with their opinions, and the manner of their Epistles, is expressed in the letter of Thaiso to Ricci, extant amongst the Iesuites Epistles. Their learning is not so exceeding, as the first Chinitian relations report; in the Mathematickes, and other liberal Sciences. The principall Mandarines admire the Iesuits in these things, who esteeme the greatest learning of the Chinois, after their valuation, to be nothing superiour to that of the Romanes, in the dayes of Cicero: (althought it cannot be denied, that Rome euen then approched neare her highest toppe of humane Science) It were an endlesse worke to recite the admirable things of this huge Kingdome: and therefore I reitit the Reader to those diuers Authours, which haue written Treatises of them.

Yet out of these I hope the Reader will pardon mee, to obserue something touching their Politie and Gouvernement. This Kingdome is by themselves called Tamen, and the Inhabitants, Tamegines: China is a meere stranger in China. The King is absolute Monarch, and in reuenue exceedeth all the Princes in Europe, and Africke together: which ariseth out of that which is properly called Census, the poll-money of his subjects (paying three Mazes, or halfe ducats) exceeding thirtie Millions: and his Tributes, out of the profits of the earth, and their handicrafts, amounting to fixe and twentie millions after their owne bookes. His Customs in Canton (ont of the least Provinces) are neere eight millions. Pantogia summeth the whole at a hundred and fiftie millions. His expences are exceeding great; all the Mandarines, Eunuches or Courtiers, Souldiers, Hospitals, and Priests receiuing Stipends out of his Exchequer. The Kingdomes adiacent are willingly refused of this King, whose predecessors sometime possessed, after freed them, as bringing more burthen then profite: which of late appeared in Corea, which the Iaponites invaded, the Chinois defended, as abutting on the Frontiers: but when the enemy left invading, the defender soone after voluntarily relinquished these new subiects. The King hath one wife & many Concubines, whose children inherite, if the lawfull wife be barren: as euen now it happened; the present King (whose predecessor was named Vanlin) being the sonne of a Concubine, as his apparant heire also is. These women are so straitly kept, that they are neither suffered to goe abroad, nor to speake vnto their kinsfolkes, which likewise receiue no increase of honour or authoritie by their kinsfowmens aduancement. His Courtiers are Eunuches, whom their poorer parents haue gelded in their youth, in hope of this Court-preferment, where after they are admitted by that Mandarin appointed to this office, they are trained vp vnder elder Eunuches to be made seruiceable. mankinde are supposed to be in the Court sixeene thousand. This King is esteemed more tyrannicall then his predecessors; neither doth hee euer come abroad as they were wont once in the yeare, to sacrifice in the Temple sacred to heauen and earth. His Pallace is farre more spacious, but not equall in workmanship to those in Europe. It is compassed with a triple wall, the first whereof might insure a large Towne. Here besides the many lodgings of the Euntuchs, are hills, groues, streames, and other things of pleasure. The Iesuite our Author saith, that he passed eight huge Pallaces before he came to the lodgings of those Euntuchs which were appointed to learne how to order their Clockes or Watches, wherewith they had presented the King: and there were as many beyond. And ascending vp a Tower, he saw trees, gardens, houses, exceeding all that euer he had seene in Europe, who yet had bene in many the most sumptuous buildings therein. Within the third wall is the King, with his women, children, and such sergants as are thither admitted. When the heire apparant is proclaymed, all his other sonnes are sent away soone after, and confined to certaine Cities, where they nothing participate in affaires of State: otherwise are honoured as the Kings kindred, living in pleasure in their Pallace-prisons, vnto the third and fourth generation. The Kings title is, Lord of the World, and Sonne of Heauen. Their Histories mention some of their ancient Kings very vertuous, which worshipped no idols; but only him which made heauen and earth: and when their owne sonnes were unworthy, preferred to be their successors, such as they deemed most vertuous. The King that expelled the Tartars, about two hundred yeares since, established this their present Politie (which his posteritie still continue) casseling all the ancient Nobilitie and Magistrates, that none is now great but the King. Neither is any meanes of greatnesse left to any, the royal kindred nor dealing with affaires of gouernement: the gouernours neither inheriting their offices, nor leauing eyther place or name of gentrie to their families. And those which haue command of the souldiers, pay not their wages; nor haue the Treasurers command of their persons: and their employments are (out of their native) in some remoter Prouince.

The Mandarines haue their habite (both in attire and language) in their iudicial proceedings peculiar. Of these Mandarines (to omit them which are officers in each Citie) there are three principall in each Prouince. The first hath to deale in cases criminall, and is called Ganchan: the second is the Kings Fosterer or Treasurer, and is called Puchinfa: the Lieutenant for the warres, named Champin. These all are in subiection vnto the Tutan or Vice-roy of the Prouince. All these Magistrates beare office three yeares together, chosen alwayes out of other Prouinces, to auoyde corruption. They haue an annuall officer called Chaien, who maketh inquisition of all crimes, both of priuate persons and Magistrates themselves. When the King preferreth any to the dignitie of a Mandarine, or to a higher office, their custome is to put vp a libell or supplication, inferring their insufficiencie, with many modest refusals: yet loth to be beleued, and that the King should accordingly refuse them; as sometimes (against their will) he doth, and certainly would, if this officious forme of deprecation be omitted by them. Notwithstanding all prouisions to the contrarie, they are couetous, cruell, and exceedingly addicted to bribes: and where they finde not (as it often happens) they make lawes, sometimes contrary to others, alway for their owne will and aduantage.

None may execute the sentence of death, but by special commission from the King. And therefore the Malefactors are consumed in the prisons. But they haue authoritie with certaine Canes to beate men on the legges, in such terrible crueltie, that a few blowes may eyther lame or kill the partie. And therefore no King is more feared then these Mandarines, who goe (or are carried rather) on mens shoulders in sumptuous chairs (such is their fashion) attended with fiftie or three score Sergeants going before them, two and two in a ranke, armed and furnished with Halberds, Maces, Battle-axes, Chaines, and these Canes: some crying to giue way, wherewith and the noyse of those Chaines, and Canes, both men and dogges, with mute silence giue place. In the midst of their Cities are Pallaces of the Kings for these officers to reside in. In Paquin and Nanquin the multitude of these Magistrates is incredible, one of these Cities con-

tying more then two thousand and five hundred, as many as some where are of Citizens. These all twice a day heare causes, and execute Justice. In Paquin are six Mandarines, Presidents of so many severall Councells. The first of these is called the heavenly Mandarine for that his most ample power, which entreateth with the King for the present, degradation, or correction of all the Mandarines in the kingdom: for not one of them is there whose office is not by his Maiesty confirmed or abrogated. The second is Master of the Ceremonies, both in humane magnificence and diuine sacrifice. The third is head of the Councell of warre. The fourth is chiefe Treasurer. The fift is Surveyor, and Procurer generall of the Kings buildings in his Pallace, in the walls of Cities, and such like. The last dealeth as chiefe vnder the king in causes criminall. These six are inferiour to one order of Mandarines, which are of the kings Priuie Councell. These Magistrates are no way comparable in wealth to the Nobles in Europe: Their sentence against guiltie persons is without solemne furniture of words; as, Let him haue twenty strokes more or lesse, which by those Canine Cane-men is suddenly executed, the party lying grouelling on the ground. These Canes are cleft in the midst, three or foure fingers broad: twentie or thirtie blowes will spoile the flesh, fiftie or threescore will aske long time to be healed, an hundred are vncurable. They vse also the Strappado, beating them vp and downe by the armes with a cord. They be about measure patient in hearing causes: and their examinations are publique. Condemned persons haue a pillory-boord fastened about their neck, and hanging down before them to the knees, in which his felony or treason is exprest; which boord neither suffereth them well to sleepe or sleepe, and in fine killeth them. There be in euery Metropolitane Citie foure principall houses, for those three officers before mentioned; the fourth for the Taisso, wherein is the principall gaole or prison, walled about high and strong, with a gate of welle force: within the same are three other gates before you come where the prisoners lie, in the meane space are such as watch and ward day and night. The prison within is so great, that in it are streets and market-places, and neuer voyde of seuen or eight hundred men, that goe at libertie. In Canton alone are said to be 15000. prisoners: & in this and euery other Metropolitane Citie, thirteene prisons, six of which are alwayes possessed, or doe possesse rather, those which are condemned to death. In euery of them are a hundred souldiers, with their Capitaine to keepe them. The offenders are allowed to worke in the day time for their liuing; for little almes are giuen in China, and but a litle Riee allowed them by the king. Such prisoners as are in for debt haue a time appointed for payment: at which if they faile, they are whipped, and a new time assigned: and so they proceed til the debt be paide, or the debtor dead. If any man remoue his dwelling from one place to another, the neighbours cause a Cryer to proclaim it with ringing of a Bason, that his creditors, if he haue any, may come to demand their debts, which the neighbours if they neglect this duty, are charged with. Executions of deathly sentence are seldome, and that with many ceremonies. Thus it comes to passe, that of whippings and imprisonment there die thousands yearly. But by following Perera (sometime a prisoner there) into his prison and others, I finde my selfe almost imprisoned, and therefore will flee hence into their Temples, and there take Sanctuary. Here they deale as madly with their Gods, as there with their men.

CHAP. XIX.

How much the greater things are reported of this so large a Country, and mightie a kingdom, so much the more compassion may it prouoke in Christian hearts, that amongst so many people there is scarce a Christian, who amongst so ample reuenues, which that king possesseth, payeth eyther heart or name, vnto the King of Heauen, till that in so huge a vintage, the Iesuites of late haue gleaned a few handfuls to this profession. M. Paulus, N. di Conti, and Odericus call this countrey a Mangi, which somewhat better agreeth with Tamen and Tamegine, as Perera, or Tangia, as Escalante saith they call themselves, then China, which they thinke from the neighbour countrey of Cauchin. China was applied to this. It had (after Paulus) twelue hundred Cities, after Odericus, two thousand, and yet both they describe another large countrey of Catay more Northerly, that here againe we may prevent such scruples. Their Religion was then, and continueth still (though with some alteration) Idolatrous or Bonike, and it is thought that a great part of Asia, especially the Islands as farre as Zellu, and euen to Madagascar, borrowed some of their superstitions from hence, as hath they sometime payed their tribute, vntill a fullnesse and feare of surfeit caused the Chinois, as you haue heard, to let themselves blood, and willingly to relinquish all that which they doe not now enioy. They were before the Tartarian Conqueste gentes Astrologie, and obserued natiuities, and gaue directions in all matters of weight. These Astrologers or Magicians tolde Farfur the King of China or Mangi, that his Kingdome should neuer bee taken from him, but by one which had a hundred eyes. And such in name was Chinsanbaian the Tartarian Capitaine, which dispossessed him of his state, and conquered it to the great Can about 1269. This Farfur liued in great delicacie, nor did euer feare to meete with such an Argus. He brought vp yearly two hundred thousand Infants, which their parents could not prouide for: and every yeare on certaine of his Idol-Holy-dayes feasted his principall Magistrates, and all the wealthiest Citizens of Quinsay, ten thousand persons at once, ten or twelue dayes together. There were then som few Nestorian Christians; one Church at Quinsay; two at Cinghianfu, and a few others. They had many Idol-Monasteries. They burned their dead: the kinsmen of the dead accompanied the corpse, clothed in Canuas, with musick and hymnes to their Idols: and when they came to the fire, they cast therein many papers, wherein they had painted Slaues, Horses, Camels, &c. as of the Cathayans is before reported, to serue him in the next world. They returne, after their funerall rites are finished, with like harmony of instruments, and voices, in honor of their Idols, which haue receiued the soule of the deceased.

Odericus affirmeth that at Kandou or Zanon, he found two Couents of Minorite Friars, and many Monasteries of Idolaters, in one wherof he was, in which (as it was told him) were three thousand Votaries, and a hundred thousand Idols. One of those Idols (lesse then some others) was as bigge as the Popish Christophier. These Idols they feede every day with the smoake of hot meates set before them: but the meate they eat themselves. At Quinsay a Chinian conuert ledde him into a certaine Monastery, where he called to a Religious person, and said, This Raban Francus, that is, this Religious Frenchman cometh from the Sun-setting, and is now going to Cambaleh, in pray for the life of the great Can, and therefore you must shew him some strange sight. Then the said Religious person tooke two great baskets full of broken reliques, and ledde him vnto a little walled Parke, and vnlocked the doore. Wee entered into a greene, wherein was a Mount in forme of a Steeple, replenished with hearbes & trees. Then did he ring with a Bell, at the sound whereof many creatures, like Apes, Cats, and Monkeyes, came down the Mount, and some had faces like men, to the number of foure thousand, putting themselves in good order, before whom he set a platter, and gaue them those fragments. Which when they had eaten, he rung the second time, and they all returned to their former places. I wondred at the sight, and demanded what creatures they were. They are (quoth he) the soules of Noble-men, which we here feed for the loue of God, who gouerneth the world. And as a man was honourable in his life, so his soule entereth after death into the body of some excellent beast, but the soules of simple and rusticall peop'e possesse the bodies of more vile and brutish creatures. Neyther could I dissuade him from the opinion, or perswade him that any soul might remaine without a body.

Nic. di Conti saith that when they arise in the morning, they turne their faces to the East, and with their hands ioyned say, God in Trinity keepe vs in his Law.

Their Religion at this time is Idolatrous and Pagan, wherein the common people are & somewhat superstitious; but the King himselfe and the Mandarines, as seeing the

the vanitie thereof, and not able to see the truth, are in manner irreligious and profane: they first worship that which is Nothing in the world, and these finde nothing in the world, but the world and these momentany things, to worship. Yet doe they acknowledge a Deitie of the Heauen and Earth, whereof the former Kings haue beene more superstitiously obseruant: and this King also, when as some few yeares since his Pallace was fired with lightnings, being guiltie of his owne vnworthinesse, he commanded his sonne to pray vnto heauen for reconciliation. And although <sup>b</sup> the Mandarines confine their happinesse with their liues, yet some of them are found admirable in their gratitie and constancie of resolution. This appeared lately, when as the King, in loue of his second Wife or Concubine, would haue preferred her sonne to the title of Prince, and hope of succession, neglecting the elder, which was the sonne of her, who among his women had the fourth place, contrary to the lawes and customes of China: they all assembled together, and presented a Petition to the King, That forasmuch as he would not be admonished to obserue their aunient lawes in proclaiming the lawfull heire apparant, that hee should seeke him new Officers, and for their partes they resigned their Mandarin-robres; which the King (relenting) caused them to resume, with promise of satisfaction to their demaund. There haue not wanted of them which haue publicly in writings (after their manner) expostulated with him of his vnjust courses: and one on this sort, Although, O King, I know the Gibbet is already pitched for mee, and the fire kindled to burne mee, yet will not I cease to reprehend thine inuuries and publique enormities. Amongst all their Idols, <sup>i</sup> they obserue with great reuerence One, which they paint with three heads, continually looking each on other. Others they haue resembling the pictures of the Apostles. These were the Philosophers we spake of, whereof three are principall, Confusius, Xequiam, and Tanzu. The first is in first and chiefe account for the inuention of part of their letters, for his holinesse, and for his bookes of morall vertues. Vpon the dayes of the New and full Moone, <sup>k</sup> his Disciples which are in manner all their men of learning, Mandarines and Students, doe assemble themselues at the common Schoole or Commencement-house, and before his Image (which is worshipped with burning of Incense and Tapers) they doe bow their knees thrice, and bend their heads to the ground. The followers of the second are called Cen in China, and in Iapon Bonzi, which shauet their heads and beards, and doe for the most part inhabite the Temples of Xequiam, or of other Saints of that profession, rehearsing certaine prayers after their manner on bookes or beads, and haue some inckling of the life to come, with rewards answerable to the well or ill spent life. The third sort, which follow Tanzu, differ in their long haire, and some other ceremonies from the former, but they both liue in great contempt, as men vnlearned and ignorant, and are not permitted to sit beside the Magistrates, but kneele before them, and are subiect to their punishment no lesse then the Vulgar. They weare on their heads a Tyre like to a Miter (saith <sup>l</sup> Nuannes: ) twice was I at Canton, and could finde none of them which could so much as teach mee their owne mysteries. Confusius his precepts prescribe the light of Nature as guide, ascribing much to the heauens, to Fate, to the worshipping their forefathers Images, without mention of other God in other things approaching neere to the Truth.

<sup>m</sup> On the said Holy dayes of the new and full Moone, a little before Sunne rising, in all the Cities of this vast Kingdome, and in all the streetes thereof, at one and the same houre, they make publication and proclamation of sixe precepts: first, Obey thy Father and Mother: secondly, Reuerence thy elders and superiors: thirdly, Keepe peace with thy neighbours: fourthly, Teach thy children and posteritie: the fift enioyneth euery one to discharge his office and calling: the last prohibiteth crimes, as Murther, Adulterie Theft and such like. These things doe their Mandarines cause to be obserued; otherwise Atheists, not hauing reason or reasoning of the immortallitie of the soule, and future rewards, which yet some of their bookes and pictures of their Pao or God, resembling those infernall torments, might learne them. Both Mandarines and others haue many Images in their houses, to which they sacrifice. But <sup>n</sup> if they obtaine not their requests, they will whip and beate these Gods, and then set them againe in their places, and with new Incense seeke their reconciliation, renewing their prayers, and their stripes also, if their prayers be reiected. And in a word the Mandarinés are the Gods (or Diuels rather) whom the people most feare, as dreading blowes from them, which they themselues at pleasure can and doe inflict on the other. This God-bearing they vse with Lots. ° For when any is to vndertake a journey or any matter of weight, as buying, lending, marrying, &c. They haue two stickes flat on the one side, otherwise round, as bigge as a Walnut, ryed together with a small thread, which after many sweet Oraisons they hurle before the Idoll. If one or both of them fall with the flat side vpward, they reuile the Image with the most opprobrious termes: and then hauing thus disgorged their choller, they againe craue pardon with many fawning promises. But if at the second cast they finde no better fortune, they passe from wordes to blowes, the deafe God is hurled on the earth into the water or fire, till at last with his vicissitude of sweet and sowre handling, and their importunate reiterations of their casts, he must needes at last relent, and is therefore feasted with Hennes, Musicke, and (if it be of very great moment, which they consult about) with a Hogges head boyled, dressed with hearbes and flowers, and a pot of their wine. They obserue another kinde of Lots, with stickes put together in a pot, and drawing out the same, consult, with certaine booke they haue, of their destinie.

But to returne to their varietie of Idols. Frier Gaspar de la Cruz, being in Canton, entred a certaine Religious house, where he saw a Chappell, hauing therein, besides many other things of great curiositie, the Image of a woman, with a child'e hanging about her neck, and a Lamp burning before her. The mysterie hereof (so like the Popish mysterie of iniquitie) none of the Chinois could declare. The Sunne, the Moone, Starres, and especially Heauen it selfe, are Gods of the first forme in their Idoll schoole. They acknowledge Laocou Tzantey, the Gouernour of the great God (so it signifies) to be aternall and a Spirit. Oflike nature they esteeme Cansay, vnto whom they ascribe the lower heauen, and power of life and death. They subiect vnto him three other spirits, Tanquam, Teyquam, Tzumi-quam: The first supposed to be Authour of crime, the second of humane Natiuitie, Husbandrie, and Warres; the third is their Ser-Nesune. To these they offer victuals, odours, and Altar. clothes; presenting them also with Playes and Comedies. They haue Images of the Diuell with Serpentine lockes, and as deformed lookes as here he is painted, whom they worshippe, not to obtaine any good at his hand, but to detaine and holde his hand from doing them euill. They haue many hee and shee-Saints, in great veneration, with long legends of their liues. Amongst the chiefe of them are Sichia, the first inuenter of their religious Votaries of both Sects; Quannia an Anchoreffe; and Ngoma a great Sorceresse. Frier Matia, in one Temple in Uchao, tolde a hundred and twelue Idols. In time of trouble they haue familiaritie with the Diuell, Pedro de Alfaro obserued, beeing in a Ship with the Chinois, in this sort. They cause a man to lie on the ground grouelling, and then one readeth on a booke, the rest answering, and some make a sound with Bells and Tabors. The man in short space beginneth to make visages and gestures, whereby they know the Diuell is entred, and then doe they propound their requests, to which he answereth by word or Letters. And when they cannot extort an answer by word, they spread a red Mantle on the ground, equally dispersing all ouer the same a certaine quantitie of Rice. Then doe they cause a man that cannot write to stand there, themselves renewing their former inuocation, and the Diuell entring into this man, causeth him to write vpon the Rice. But his answers are often full of lies. In the entries of their houses they haue an Idol-roome, where they Incense these Deities morning and euening. They offer to them the sweetest odours, Hens, Geese, Duckes, Rice, Wine; a Hogs head boyled is a chiefe offering. But little hereof falleth to the Gods share, which is set in a dish apart: as the tips of the Hogges eares, the bills and feete of the Hens, a few cornes of Rice, three or foure drops of Wine. Their bookes tell much of hell, their deuotions little. Their Temples are homely, and filthy: no Oracle is in any of them. They haue fables of men turned into Dogges or Snakes, and againe metamorphosed into men. And they which belecue the paines of hell, yet belecue after a certaine space, that those damned soules shall passe thence into the bodies of some beafts.

It were tedious to tell of their opinions touching the Creation. All being a rude and vnformed Chaos, Tayn (say they) framed and sealed the Heauen and Earth. This Tayn created Panzon and Panzons; Panzon by power of Tayn created Tanhom, and his thirteene brethren. Tanhom gaue names to all things; and knew their vertues, and with his said brethren multiplied their generations, which continued the space of nine thousand yeares. And then Tayn destroyed the world for their pride, and created another man named Lorchiam, who had two hornes of sweet sauer, out of which presently did spring forth both men and women. The first of these was Alazan, which liued nine hundred yeares. Then did the heauen create another man (Lyziam was now vanished) named Asizion, whose mother Luzim was with child with him onely in seeing a Lions head in the aire. This was done in Truchin, in the Province of Sancan; he liued eight hundred yeares. After this, Vfao and Hantani, and Gehimsey with his sonne Sezonow, and his nephew Uasi the first King of China (they say) were the inuentors of diuers Artes.

They haue many Monasteries of foure differing orders of Religion, distinguished by the seuerall colours of their habit, blacke, yellow, white, and russet. These foure orders are said to haue their Generals (whom they call Tricon) which reside in Piquin. These ordaine Provincials, who againe haue subordinated to them the Priors of Seu, all houses or Colleges, in those their houses acknowledged chiefe. The General is clothed with silke in his owne colour, and is carried on mens shoulders in an luerie chaire by foure or sixe men of his habite. They liue partly of reuenues giuen them by the King, and partly by begging: which when they do, they carrie in their hands a certaine thing, wherein are prayers written, whereon the almes are laide, and the giuer thereby cleared of his mony. I should haue said of his sinne: They are shauen, vse beads, eate together, and haue their Cells, assist at burials, arise two houres before day to pray vnto the heauen and Sinquian, who (they say) was the inuenter of that their manner of life, and became a Saint, in which their deuotion they continue vntil break of day, singing and ringing of bells. Once, both the Friers which formerly, and the Iesuites which later haue bin there, affirme a great conformitie betwixt their and the Chinian ceremonies. They may not marry in the time of their Monkish deuotion, but they may (acquainting the Generals therewith) at their pleasure relinquish their vowe. The eldest houses may not enter into religion, because they are bound to sustaine their aged parents. At the admittance of any is a great Feast, made by their friends. At the lanching of any Ship, they dedicate the same to the Moone, or some Idol: and besides, there resort thither these Monkes, to make sacrifices in the poope, and reuerence the Diuell, whom they paint in the fore-castle, that he may doe them no harme. Else would she make an vnfortunate voyage. The religious men, as is said, are shauen, the people weare long haire, in combing whereof they are womanishly curious, these hoping by their lockes to be carried into heauen; the other, professing a state of greater perfection, refuse any such helpe. There be of their religious more austere, which liue (in desert and solitarie places) the liues of Heremites, with great abstinence and austeritie of life. They haue hills consecrated to Idols, whither they resort in heapes on pilgrimage; hoping hereby to merit pardon of their finnes, and that after their death they shall be borne againe more noble and wealthy. Some of these will not kill any liuing creatures, especially such as are tame, in regard of this their Pythagorean opinion of the transmutation or passage of soules into beasts. The Iesuites conuerted one man neere vnto Nanquin, which had thirtie yeares together obserued a fast, not strange among the Chinois, neuer eating flesh or fish, anthon other things feeding temperately. Vsurers are punished in China, with the losse of that money so employed.

Of their Priests is before shewed, that they haue both secular and regular: the one weareth long haire and blacke clothes, and hath priuate habitation; the other liue in Couents and are shauen. Neyther may marry, though both doe (and not here alone) fine worke. They much commend in their bookes the consideration and examination of a mans selfe, and therefore do esteeme highly of them which sequester themselves from humane societie to diuine contemplation, that (as they say) they may restore themselves to themselves, and to that pristine state, wherein the Heauen created them;

And therefore haue not onely Colleges of learned men, who leauing the affaires of State and secular distractions, do in private villages liue together, obseruing these contemplations with mutuall conferences: but euen women also haue their Nunneries, and liue a Monasticall life vnder their Abbesses after their manner: although euen such as are married liue closely enough; their feet to this end so straitly swaddled in their fasces, that they grow but little, (and to haue little feet is with them great commendation) whereby they cannot but famely walke abroad. And if any Widdow refuse a second marriage, she obtaineth hereby much praise and many priuiledges. Their Bonays are so little accounted of, that the Iesuites wearing their habite were little set by, and therefore taking the Mandarin-habite, were exceedingly honored of all sorts, as professors of learning.

Many are the ceremonies which they there obserue in Funerals. As they honor their parents in their life time (being otherwise liable to grievous punishments, yea some of their Mandarins will sue for the Kings licence to leaue their publike function to give private and more diligent attendance to their parents) so after their death they moue three yeares in white Hats and garments. The first months they gird vnto them a rough vesture with a rope, like the bare-footed Friars. This is not onely obserued of the meaner sort; but the mightiest Mandarines, after newes of their fathers death, leaue their function, and in their private houses bewaile their losse. The wealthier keepe them aboue ground two or three yeares in a Parlour, fitted for that purpose, whither they daily resort vnto them, to salute them, and to burne Incense, and so mean before them. Sometimes also the Bonays, or Priests, resort thither with their Dirges and holy things. Their wiues, children, and neighbours come likewise to bewaile them. The Mandarines will not vse those things which before they did: nor the same apparell, household-furniture, salutations. They colour part of the paper in which they write, with another colour. They obserue not their wonted proper names, but call themselves otherwise, as Disobedient, or such like. Musicke is banished; the dyet is hard. When the corpse is to be buried, all the kindred come together, and assemble as many Priests as they can, which on muscalle instruments, and with their voices, tune their mournfull Dieties. The place whither the corpse is carried, is adorned with diuers Images. The Coffin is very large, the prouiding of which they commit to their heire, but themselves in their liues take order for the same, bestowing great care and cost for the best wood and workmanship which they are able to procure, therein spending sometime seuentie, eightie, or a hundred ducats. They holde it vntil they are to die before they haue prouided the same. They are no lesse curious for the place of their buriall, thinking that hereon dependeth the fortune of their posterity, and therefore sometime spend a whole yeare in consultation, whether it shall be toward the North, or some other Region. Their Sepulchres are in the fields, where they fortifie them, and oft-times resort thither to performe their obsequies. To be buried within the walls were a thing most miserable, neuer to be forgotten. And for some time after they will eate no flesh, in regard of that passage of soules before spoken of. This opinion is of more authoritie and credite with them then that of Hel or Hecate, although (as is said) their Bookes and Pictures depaint terrible things in that kinde. Others adde, that as soone as one is dead, they wash him, and clothing him in his best apparell, all perfumed, set him in his best chaire, and there all his neerest kindred kneeling before him, take their leaue with tears. They Coffin him (as before) and place him in a roome richly furnished, and couer him with a sheet, in which they put his portraiture. A table standeth by full of Viands, with Candles on it. Thus doe they keepe him fiftene dayes, every night the Priests executing their superstitious ceremonies, burning and shaking certaine papers before them. By the Sepulchre they plant a Pine tree, which is sacred, and may not be cut downe, nor conuerted to any vse, if the weather ouerthrow it. Their funerall pompe is in manner of Procession, with Candles carried in their hands. They burne vpon the graue many papers, painted with men, cartell, and prouision for his vse in the next world.

The times religious are the new Moones, and full Moones (as yee haue heard) in which they make great banquets, and then also they muster their Souldiers, who

Some may weare weapons in China. They solemnize also their birth dayes, whereunto their kindred doe resort of custome with presents, and receiue good cheare. The Kings birth-day is a great festiuall. But a New-yeares day, which is the first day of the new Moone in Februarie is their principall feast, and then they send New-yeares gifts to each other.

Their order for the poore may be a patterne vnto Christians: they suffer none to begge, nor to be idle. If any be blinde, yet he is set to some worke, as grinding in a Quene, or such like; of which sort (after Bosman account) there are foure thousand blinde persons that grinde still in Canton alone. If they be impotent, that they cannot worke, their friends (if they be able) must prouide for them; if not, they are kept in Hospitals, out of which they neuer passe, and haue all necessities prouided them by Officers appointed in euery Citie to this businesse. Common women are confined to certaine places, and may not goe abroad, nor dwell in the Citie, for infecting others, and are accountable to a certaine Officer of their euill earnings, which when they are old is bestowed on their maintenance. Their dwelling is in the Suburbes of Cities.

The Lawe of Nations is little respected in China. Embassadors are in manner imprisoned for the time of their abode, their affaires being intreated of by the Mandarines; who thinke no Nation worthy to deale with their King, in any equall termes of Embassage. Petruus the Portugall Embassador was imprisoned at Canton, and there died. Prouder people are not vnder heauen then they. Long nailes is an honorable signe, as of handes not employed to base and manuell labours. They thinke no bookes so learned as their owne, which their auncient men take paines to conue by heart, as boyes in Schooles, and their Professors do reade with subtile and curious exceptions, distinctions, and obseruations on the Text. They thought the Popedom most needes befall the Iesuites at their returne into Europe, for the learning which they had gotten in reading these Chinian Authors.

In their Temples they haue a great Altar, after the Dutch fashion, that one may go round about it. There set they vp the Image of a certaine Louisa. At the right hand standeth the Diuell (their Veisous) more vgly then amongst vs hee is painted: whom they worship with great reuerence that come thither to aske counsell, or draw lots. Besides these Temples, which they call Meani, they haue another sort, wherein both vpon the Altars and walles stand many Idols well proportioned, but bare-headed. These beare the name of Omitsefon; accounted of them spirits, but such as in heauen doe neither good nor euill; thought to be such men and women as haue chaste lyued in this world, in abstinence from fish and flesh, fed onely with Rice and Sallads. Of this Diuell they make some account: of these spirits little or nothing at all. They hold opinion, that if a man doe well in this life, the Heauens will giue him many Temporall blessings: but if he doe euill, then shall he haue infirmities, diseases, troubles, and penurie, and all this without any knowledge of God. They imagine also, that they which liue here well, presently after death shall become Diuels, if otherwise, that then this Diuell doth transanimate his soule (as is said) into a Dogge or other beast. And therefore doe they sacrifice vnto him, praying that he will make them like vnto himselfe. When a man lyeth on his death-bed, they set before him the picture of the Diuell, with the Sunne in his right hand, and a poniard in his left, and desire the patient to looke well on him, that he may be his friend in the future world. They liked the Christian manner of praying, and desired vs (saith Perera) to write them somewhat concerning Heauen, which wold to their contentation. They are great Sodomites, although they haue many Wiues and Concubines, which they buy of their parents, or in the Markets, in like manner as the Turkes. They are not by Law prescribed to observe this or that Sect: and therefore they haue many sects, some worshipping the Sun, some the Moone, some nothing: and all, what themselves best like, as is in part before shewed. They take their oathes (as here by kissing a booke) with thrice drinking of a certaine liquor.

Antony Dalmeida saith, That in saying Masse, they were so thronged with the people, that they were almost troden vnder foot. And of a Chintan Priest (contrarie to the zeale elsewhere in any Religion) they were invited to dinner, and rested together gether with many other of their Priests that vsed them kindly. Amongst them he obserued, that the Diuell had taught them in many things to imitate the sacred ceremonies (it is the Iesuits phrase) of the Catholike Church. At Ciquon also (a Citie like Venice) they provided themselves of a house, on both sides whereof dwelt these Bonzi, or Chinian Priests, who vsed them gently, and daily resorted to them to heare their doctrine; and some of them desired Baptisme: so little is this Religion prized of the forwardest Schollers; and it seemeth, that many of them obserue their Rites rather of custome then deuotion. This I note by the way, lest these reports should seeme to contradict themselves, relating the deuotion, and manifold superstitions, and yet scorne negligence, Atheisme and Polytheisme, professed and practised in these large countries according to each mans choise. And as that Religion, which of the one sort is practised, is against the light of reason, that a man (as Tertullian saith) should be mercifull or cruell (as these Chinois are) vnto their Gods: so the other (and especially they which are most learned) neither hope nor feare any thing after death, and ascribe this vnto their happinesse, that they are not touched with such (as they suppose them) superstitious fancies. Yet euen they which ascribe no Diuinitie to their Idols, obseue their Countrey-customes of sacrifices and offering vnto them. Their Temples are not so sumptuous as some report, but meane, and meanely kept. They consult, not onely with their Gods (as you haue heard) but with their Wisards and Fortune-tellers; whereof they haue great store. They are exceedingly addicted to two vaine studies; of Alchimy, wherein if they haue not so good successe as he in the West, which (as La Nou saith) turneth so little Lead in his Bulls into so much Golde, yet they vse as religious and costly diligence: (for besides much siluer lost, to finde siluer, many of them seeke to better their fortune in this attempt, with many yeares fastings;) the other is to prolong their life, for which they deuise a thousand Artes and Compositions. Of both these studies they haue diuers books and Professors. There be which fable themselves to be very olde, vnto whom is great recourse of Disciples, as to some heavenly Prophets, to learne lessons of long liuing. They supposed the Iesuites (whom they tooke to be of great learning) did not truly tell them their age, but suspected, that they had already liued some ages, and knew the meanes of liuing euer, and for this cause abstained from marriage.

The Spaniards of the Philippina's being feasted by the Viceroi, two Captaines, appointed Stewards, or Feast-masters, before they sate downe, did take each of them a cup full of liquor in his hand, and went together, wheresoeuer they might discover the Heauen, and offered the same to the Sunne, adding many prayers, that the comming of their guests might be for good, and then did fill out the wine, making a great curtesie. And then proceeded they to their feast. The Chinois<sup>m</sup> in the eclipse of the Sunne and Moone, are afraid that the Prince of heauen will destroy them, and pacifie him with many sacrifices and prayers; they holde the Sunne and Moone, man and wife.

Londonius Georgius in his Mappe of China, <sup>n</sup> describeth a huge Lake in the Prouince of Sancij, made by inundation, in the yeare of our Lord 1557. wherein were swallowed seuen Cities, besides Townes and Villages, and innumerable multitudes of people: one onely childe in a hollow tree escaping so great a destruction. Such were escaped drowning, were, as Boterus addeth, destroyed with fire from Heauen. Gassardus Crux reciteth a letter of the Mandarin to the King 1556. containyng newes of a terrible earth-quake in the Prouinces of Sanxi and Santon; wherein the day was darke. The earth opened the yeare before in many places; vnder which was heard the noyse, as it were, of bells: there followed winde and raine. The winde, which they call Tufan, is so violent, that it driueth ships on the land, ouerthroweth men & houses: it cometh almost euery yeare once, lasteth foure and twentie houres, in which space it compasseth the compass. In Vinyanfu the earth-quake caused a fire to breake out, which consumed all the Citie, and innumerable people. The like happened to another Citie neare it, where none escaped. It caused the River at Leuchimen to encrease and drowne multitudes. At Hien the fall of the houses slew eight thousand; In Puchio the house of the Kings kinsmen fell, and slew all therein but a childe. Cochu with fire from aboue, and waters from beneath, was left desolate. At Einchinoen almost an hundred thousand perished. At Inchumen the River ebbed and flowed ten times in a day and night. This perhaps was the same with that which Georgius and Boterus mention. From this worke of Diuine Iustice I might passe to those admirable workes of Humane industry amongst them: Of which sort are (besides that wall continued by the ioynt agreement of Art and Nature some hundreths of leagues; their Printing) their Artillery farre short of that excellencie of ours, or rather more excellent, as more suourable; their souldiers peeces not hauing barrells aboue a spanne long, and their great Artillery of little vse: their porcellane and fine earthen dishes; their sailing waggon, and other things, may not be further described for feare of prolixitie: all which are so much the more to be admired, because they are their owne Inuentions, and not borrowed. The opinion of Scaliger touching the steeping of shat their porcellane, and burying it in the earth, is gain-said by later Writers, who affirme, that the earth, whereof these dishes are made, is naturally hard, beaten small, steeped, and often stirred, and of the finest, swimming in the toppe, is the finest vessell framed.

This Countrey hath few in it of other Religions. The Tartars conquered it, and possessed the same about two hundred yeares, and were expelled at last by a Bonzi, whose posteritie still enioy the Scepter. There are still about Paquin and many other places of the Kingdome, some Tartars which haue their Moschees and obseue Mahomet. They differ in countenance from the Chinois. Perera saith hee saw at Fuquien certaine Moores, who could say little of their Religion, but, Mahomet was a Moore, my father was a Moore, and I am a Moore, with some other words of their Alcoran, wherewith, in abstinenice from Swines flesh they liue, (saith he) vntill the Diuell take them all. He reasoned with them, because he had in many Chinish Cities seene the reliques of Mahomet kept; and they answered, That they came in great ships, fraught with Merchandise from Paquin-ward, to a Port appointed to them by the King, where they converted to their Religion the chiefe Mandarin or Loytia; whereupon the people began to turne Mahumetane. They now waxing bolder, prohibited the eating of Swines flesh, the peoples chiefe food: who hereby prouoked, complained of a conspircie betwixt these Moores and the Loytia, against their King. Hereupon he and the chiefe of them were executed; and the rest dispersed into certaine Cities, where they remained slaues to the King.

Marbau Ricinus learned of certaine Mogore-strangers, that in the Xenfan Province, the North part of China, in a place called Xucheo, there are white men with long beards; which vse Bells, and worship Isa; that is, Iesus and Maria, and honor the Crucifixe. Their Priests were married, and cured diseases without medicines. The former part of this report agreeth iustly with that of Carnalini, before mentioned in the eighth Chapter, touching Cathay, which Geographers place next hereunto.

The Iesuits haue three or foure places of residence; But the Labourers are few, and their business nothing so pleatfull as in other places, which they impute to the hardness of learning the Chinian language, and especially their writing in so many Characters not distributed into any Alphabetical order: to be exact in which, is required a good part of a mans age: their inhospitall Lawes to prohibite strangers entrance into their Countrey, and suspicion of them when they are entred; their Epicurean opinions and lues; their adding themselves to ancient customes; the conceit of their owne learning; their pride, crueltie, extortion, polygamie, and such like. Themselues in their Epistles and Tractes acquaint you with their Roman Conquests in these parts, and heere and elsewhere Larry, one of their societie, is an Arch-Trumperet, to sound their exploits: I cannot say, alwayes without iarring.

Boterus ascribeth vnto China seuentie millions of people, whereas he alloweth to Italy scarce nine; and to Spaine lesse, to England thre. to all Germany, with the Switzers, and Low Countries, but fifteene, and as many to all France. Lamentable it is, that the Diuell should haue so great a tribute in this one Kingdome. Gonsales (in his Discourse of China, translated by Park) reckoneth almost seuen millions of souldiers in continuall pay. Dalmeida numbreti seuentie millions, and two hundred and fiftie thousand Inhabitants, besides souldiers, and reckoning but the principall in each Familie, oftentimes not aboue three of ten, as their bookes testifie.

In the later Epistles from China, dated 1606 and 1607, little is there to further this Historie. As for their tales of Miracles in those and the Japonian Epistles (bearing the same date) wherein Ignatius Loyolaes picture is made a miracle-worker; I hold them not worth relation. At Nanquin was a conspiracie of three thousand people, to make a new King, but they were executed and quartered for their treason. The Chinois beleue (as is there reported) that there is a certaine spirit which hath power of the life and death of children that are sicke of the measles, and therefore when their children are sicke thereof, they hang a glasse before the doore of the Chamber where he lieth, what the spirit comming to destroy the child, seeing his Image in that Glasse, should not dare to approach nearer. Their Baptisme cured the disease; a new remedy for measles; a new vertue of Baptisme.

I thought it not impertinent here to adde the Catalogue of the Kings of this country, according to their owne Stories, which although it be in part fabulous, (as when ancient prophane Storie is not?) yet, because I have done thus in other Nations, and have so worthie a patterne in this, as the Worthie of our Age Josephus Scaliger, pardon me to trouble thee with this Chronicle of their Kings.

The first was Fuy, a Giant-like man, a great Astrologer and Inuenter of Sciences; he reigned an hundred years. They name after him an hundred and sixteene Kings (whole names our Author omitteth) all which reigned two thousand two hundred sixtie and seuen yeares: all these were of his lineage: and so was Tantzon the maker of that huge wall of China which killed many of the Chinois, of whom he tooke every third man to this worke. For which cause they slew him when he had reigned forie yeares, with his sonne Agniz. They ordained King in his stead Anchosan, who reigned twelue yeares; his sonne Fuy succeeded and reigned seuen yeares; his wife eighteene; his sonne, three and twentie: then followed Gunsy, foure and fiftie; Gunsy the second; thirteene: Ochansy, fife and twentie: Coansy, thirteene: Tantzon, six and twentie and foure moneths: Ansby, six: Pinsy, fife: Tantzon, three and seuen moneths: Huy Haimon, six: Cuon, two and thirte: Bansby, eighteene: Unshy, thirteene: Osby, seuentee: Tansby, eight moneths: Ansby, nineteene yeares: Tantzon, three moneths: Chisy, one yeare: Linsby, two and twentie yeares: Tantzon, one and thirte yeares: Lansy, one and fortie yeares: Cusby, fife and twentie yeares: Fansy, seuentee yeares. Fiftene other Kings reigned, in all, one hundred seuentie and six yeares. The last of which was Quinty, whom Tantzon deposed, who with seuen of his lineage reigned threescore and two yeares: Coty, foure and twentie yeares; Dian, six and fiftie yeares: Tym, one and thirte yeares: Tantzon, seuen and thirte yeares: Tantzon with his lineage (which were one and twentie) reigned two hundred ninetie and foure yeares: Bansa a Nunne, wife of the last of them (whom she slew) one and fortie yeares: Tantzon slew her, and reigned with his posteritie (which were seuen Kings) one hundred and thirte yeares: Dian, eighteene yeares: Onon, fiftene yeares: Onon, nine yeares and three moneths: Toran, foure yeares: Anshin, ten yeares: Zantzon, and seuentee of his race, three hundred and twentie yeares: Tantzon, the last, was dispossessed by Uxon the Tartar, vnder whom, and eight of his Tartarian successours, China endured subiection ninetie and three yeares: Gombu expelled Tantzon, the last of them. Hec with thirteene successours have reigned about two hundred and fortie yeares.

CHAP. I.

*Of India in Generall, and of the Ancient Rites
there obserued.*

THE name of India, is now applied to all farre-distant Countries, not in the extreme limits of Asia alone; but euen to whole America, through the error of Columbus and his fellowes; who at their first arriual in the Westerne world, thought that they had met with Ophir, and the Indian Regions of the East. But the Ancients also comprehended vnder this name a huge Tract of Land, no lesse in the iudgement of Alexanders followers, in his Easterne Inuasions, then the third part of the Earth; Ctesius accounted it one halfe of Asia. Yea a great part of Africa also is comprehended vnder that name, So Turnebus<sup>a</sup> in his Aduersaria, not onely findeth the Bactrians and Parthians called by that name in Virgil; but Thebes in the higher Egypt, and Ammons Temple in Higinius; and Ethiopia also, as in our discourse<sup>b</sup> thereof will further appeare. But taking India more properly, Dionysius<sup>c</sup> bounds it betweene Caucasus, and the Red-sea, Indus and Ganges. And likewise in that verse,

But Ptolemy<sup>d</sup> and other Geographers, did vsually diuide India by the Riuer Ganges, into two parts, one on this side Ganges, and the other beyond. Although heere wee finde no lesse difficultie concerning Ganges, which the most, with my selfe, account the same with Guenga, that faileth into the Gulfe of Bengala, which they also imagine to be that, which of the Ancients is called Sinuu Gangeticus: Others<sup>e</sup> esteeme the Riuer Cantan (whereon Cantan chiefe Citie of one of the Chinian Prouinces, whereof we haue so lately taken our leaue) to be that Ganges: of which minde are Mereator, Maginus, Gotandus Aribus, and their disciples. M. Paulus<sup>f</sup> diuideth India into three parts, the Lesse, the Greater, which he calleth Malabar; and Abassia, betwixt them both. Dom. Niger reckoneth the same number; the first, from the River Indus (whence this name India <sup>h</sup> flowed) vnto Barini, which he calleth Casparas: the second or middle, from thence to Caberis, Miniber: from thence Eastward to Ganges, hee nameth Maabar, and all these on this side Ganges: beyond it placing Magini, or Man-gi. Ptolemy maketh the Sina, to be next beyond India extra Gangem, so which hee abutteth them on the West: and therefore if Sina be China, then are they by him placed quite beyond India: and therefore Mercator and Maginus esteeme Cathay to be the Region of the Sina.

It is our part to leaue this matter to the discussing and deciding of others, and to hold on our perambulation through this wide and spacious Region; first relating the generalities and antiquities thereof; and next proceeding from China (where we left) vnto the next adioyning Nations, certainly reputed Indian, how vncertaine to ether Ganges runneth, whether on this side, or beyond them: to which when we haue added our survey of the Ilands adioyning to the Continent of Asia, we may end this Booke, and our promised Asian Discouerie. Vnder the name of India, heere we comprehend all that Tract betweene Indus and the Persian Empire on the West, vnto China Eastward, as it trendeth betwixt the Tartarian and the Indian Seas.

Semiramis first inuaded India, as Ninus her husband had done before to Bactria, but not with like successe. For although she had thought to haue encountered the Indian Elephants with her counterfeits made of Ox-hides, sewed together in that shape, and stuffed with Hay: for which vse she caused three hundred thousand beasts to be slaine, which might both serue in the battell for shew, and before-hand to exercise her horse to such fights; and, if we belecue <sup>i</sup> Antiquitie, mustered in her huge armie no lesse then three millions of foot-men, and fiftie hundred thousand horse: Yet Strabo bates, at that time the Indian Monarch, brake her Fortes, and chased her out of the field, But I can yeeld small credit to this report.

Megasthenes reckoneth an hundred and two and twentie Indian Nations: Arrianus wonders how he could make any certaine account in a thing so hard to be knowne. This Arrianus in his eighth booke makes a large description of this Indian world.

In these first times the Indians <sup>k</sup> are said to liue like the Scythians, without houses, Cities, Temples, in a wandering course with their Tents, liuing on the barke of the tree Tala, and wilde Venison, the skinnes whereof were their garments. In all India were no seruants, but all free-men. These things were altered by Bacchus or Dionysius, who made an Expedition hither, not so much with Armes, as with Arts. Hee taught them the vse of Wine, Oyle, and Sacrificing: in memorie whereof, Posteritie honored him for a god. Of this the Poets, and Histories of Alexander, and others make much mention. So doth Suidas tell of one Brachman, that prescribed the Rites and Lawes of the Brachmanes: Solinus, of Hydaspes; and others, of Ganges, Hercules, and the rest, with much vncertaintie. Postellus <sup>l</sup> strangely conceiteth himselfe, that Abrahams posteritie by Keturah seated themselves in India; and were there knowne by the name of Iewes, before the Iewes in Palestina: that they obserued Circumcision, and dispersed it into Syria, Egypt, Armenia, Colchis, Iberia, Paphlagonia, Chaldea, and India, before Moses led the Israelites out of Egypt: and that the Brachmanes were so called, quasi Abrahmanes, as following the instructions of Abraham. Abraham we belecue, the Father of the faithfull, but cannot father on him such vnfaitfull and degenerate generations, notwithstanding some rare vertues; no more then with the same Postellus we acknowledge the Turkes the posteritie of the ten Tribes, carried by Salmanafer into captiuitie, and the Tartars (which word signifieth a remnant) to be the remainder of those Turkes, which some Centuries of yeares after followed those their Turkish country-men into the like and greater conquests. But following Cabalisticall coniectures, and counterfeit writings of Berosus, the Sybille, Henoch, Noah, Abraham: no maruell if he obtrude vpon credulitie such dreames; as that India should bee so called, or Hundia, as being Iudea orientalis; and that their wise-men were called Chalanni, as obseruing Chalon or the Window of the heavens, therein reading I know not what mysteries: so saith he Abimelech saw Isaak playing with his wife by the window, that is, by Astronomie. But that which he speaketh of the name Iewes and Abrahmenes in India, may perhaps arise from a testimonie cited out of Megasthenes his Indica, by Clemens Alexandrinus, That all things observed by Naturall Philosophers in Greece had beene handled before, partly by the Brachmanes amongst the Indians, partly of those which in Syria are called Iewes: in which testimonie he ioyneth Iewes and Brachmanes in profession of the same learned Science of Naturall Philosophie. Otbo Henrinius affirmeth also that the gifts which Moses testifieth that Abraham gaue his sonnes by Keura, were (besides gold and the like) Arts and hidden Sciences, as Astrologie and Naturall Magicke.

Apuleius maketh the Brachmanes first founders of the Pythagorean learning: and reporteth further, that at dinner-time the Table was made readie, and the youths from diuers places and seruices resorted thither: at which time the Masters questioned with them what good they had done that day: one answereth he had beene a peace-maker to reduce such and such which were at oddes, to amitie: another had done this or that for his parents: another had studied or meditated on such a point. Once, hee which could not giue good account of his mornings worke, might not be admitted to receive any dinner-wages.

Strabo in his fifteenth booke is large in this Indian subject. He reporteth out of Aristobolus, that the Riuer Indus, by force of an Earthquake, changed his chanel; thereby a great part of the neighbour Region being turned into a desert. For in this, Indus is like vnto Nilus, in that, without it, the Countrey would be a wilderness, and therefore is also worshipped of the Inhabitants. It receiueth fifteene other Riuers into it. He mentioneth the Catbei not farre from thence, which after happily gaue name vnto Cathay. To let passe the strange Creatures, which some ascribe to these parts, as Dragons of incredible bignesse, those great Apes, which by imitation of men in aray, made Alexanders Campe to arme themselves against so ridiculous an enemy.

cap. 19.
Ar. lib. 8.

The Indians are of seuen sorts: 1 The first in estimation, and fewest in number, were their Philosophers. These kept publike Acts once a yeare before the King, and he which in his obseruations was found three times false, was condemned to perpetual silence. The second sort were husband-men, which paid the King (the only owner of all the land) a fourth part of the increase. The third was of shepheards and huntsmen, which wandered in Tents. The fourth Artificers. The fifth Souldiers. The sixth Magistrates. The seventh Courtiers, and those of his Priue Counsell. If any woman killeth the King in his drunkenesse, shee is rewarded with the marriage of his sonne and heire.

If any deprive another of a member, besides like for like, he loseth his hand; and, if it be an Artificer, his life. They strangle their Sacrifice, that it may be so offered whole to their Idols.

t Brachmanes.
Vid. Strab. &c.
Cl. Duret.
Henr. &c.

Of their Philosophers, or men learned and religious, the Brachmanes obtaine the first place, as being nearest in sect to the Greekes. These are after their manner Nazarenis from the wombe. So soone as their mother is conceiued of them, there are learned men appointed which come to the mother, with songs containing precepts of chastitie. As they grow in yeares they change their masters. They haue their places of exercise in a groue nigh to the City, where they are busied in graue conferences. They eat no liuing creatures, nor haue vse of women, liue frugally, and lie vpon skinnies. They will instruct such as will heare them, but their hearers must neither sleepe, nor spit, nor speake. When they haue in this strict course spent seuen and thirtie yeares, they may liue more at pleasure and libertie, in diet, habit, proper habitation, and the vse of gold, and marriage. They conceale their mysteries from their wiues, lest they should blabbe them abroad. They esteeme this life as mans conception, but his death-day to be his birth-day vnto that true and happy life, to him which hath beene rightly religious.

They

They hold the World to be created, corruptible, round, ruled by the high God. Water they imagine to haue beene the beginning of making the World; and that besides the foure Elements, there is a fifth Nature, whereof the Heauen and Starres consist.
They intreate of the immortalitie of the Soule, and of the torments in Hell, and many such like matters.

k The Indian Germanes.

The <sup>k</sup> Germanes, another Order of religious or learned men, are honored amongst them: especiall'y such of them as liue in the woods, and of the woods, both for their diet of those wilde fruits, and their habit of the barkes of trees, not acquainted with Bacchus or Venus any more then with Ceres. They speake not to the Kings, when they aske counsell of them, but by messengers; and doe pacifie the angrie gods, as is supposed, by their holinesse.

l Practise of prescribed patience.

Next in honor to these, are certaine Mendicants, which liue of Rice and Barley, which any man at the first asking giue them, together with entertainment into their houses. These professe skill in Physicke, and to remedie diseases, wounds, and sterility; very constant in labour and hardship. Others there are, Inchanters and Diuiners, Masters of ceremonies about the dead; which wander thorow Townes and Cities. Some there are more ciuill and secular, in their life professing like pietie and holinesse. Women also are admitted vnto the fellowship of their studies in this Philosophie, not to their beds. Aristobulus writeth, that he saw two of these Brachmanes, the one an old man shauen, the other yong with long haire, which sometimes resorted to the Market place, and were honored as Counsellors, and freely tooke what they pleased, of any thing there to be sold, for their sustenance. They were annointed with Sesamie oyle, wherewith, and with hony, they tempered their bread. They were admitted to Alex- anders table, where they gaue lessons of patience <sup>l</sup>: and after going to a place not far off, the old man lying downe with his face vpward, sustained the Sunne and shewes terrible violence. The yonger standing on one foot, held in both his hands a peece of wood of three cubits lifted vp, and shifted fette, as the other was wearie: and so they continued every day. The yong man returned home afterward, but the old man followed the King, with whom he changed his habit and life, for which, when as he was by some reprov'd, he answered that he had fulfilled the fortie yeares exercise, which he had vowed. Onesicritus saith, that Alexander, hearing of some religious Observances, which went naked, and exercised themselves to much hardship, and would <sup>m</sup> not come to others, but would bid men, if they would haue any thing with them, to come to them; sent him vnto them, who found fiftene of them twentie furlongs from the Ci-tie, each of them obseruing his owne gesture of sitting, standing, or lying naked, and not stirring till Sun-setting, in that vsupportable heate, at which time they returned into the Citie. Calanus was one of them. He afterward followed Alexander into Persia, where beginning to be sicke, he caused a great pile or frame of wood to be made, wherein he placed himselfe in a golden chaire, and caused fire to be put to, in which he was voluntarily consumed, telling (if they tell true) that he would meet Alexander in Babylon, the place fatal to Alexanders death. Helianus <sup>n</sup> saith, that this was done in a suburb of Babylon, and that the fire was of Cedar, Cypress, Mirtle, Laurell, and other sweet woods: and after he had performed his daily exercise of running, he placed himselfe in the midst, crowned with the leaves of reedes, the Sunne shining on him, which he worshipped. This adoration was the signe which he gaue to the Macedonians to kindle the fire, in which he abode without any stirring till he was dead;
Alexander himselfe admiring, and preferring this victory of Calanus before all his owne. This Calanus told Onesicritus of a golden world, where meale was as plentifull as dust, and fountaines streamed milke, hony, wine and oyle. Which Countrey, by men turned into wantonnesse, Iupiter altered and detained, imposing a life of hardship and labour, which while men followed, they enioyed abundance; but now that men begin to surfet and grow disobedient, there is danger of vniuersall destruction. When he had thus spoken, he bade him, if he would heare further, strip himselfe, and lye naked vpon these stones. But Mandanis, <sup>o</sup> another of them, reprov'd Calanus for his harshnes, and, commending Alexander for his loue to learning, said that they mured their bodies to labour for the confirmation of their minds against passions. For his na-

herdes he alledged; that that was the best house which needed least furniture of household. He added that they searched the secrets of Nature, and that returning into the field they met with any carrying figs or grapes, they received of him gratis; if oyle they poured is on them, and all mens houses and goods were open to them, even to the parlours of their wives. When they were entred, they imparted the wisdoms of their sentences as the others communicated his meate. If they feared any disease, they prevented the same with fire, as it was now said of Calanus. Megasthenes reprooveth this Calanus, as Alexander another Chaplaine, and commendeth Mandanis saying, that when Alexander messengers told him that he must come to the same of Jupiter, with promise afterwards, if he came, otherwise menacing torture: he answered, that neither was he Jupiter's sonne, nor did he possess any great part of the earth: as for himselfe, he neither expected his gifts, nor feared his threatnings; for while he lived, India yielded him sufficient; if he died, he should be freed from age, and exchange for a better and purer life. Whereupon he saith, Alexander both pardoned and praised him. Chitarchus reporteth also, that to the Brachmanes are opposed another Sect called Pramnæ, men full of subtiltie and corruption, which derided the studies of others in Physiologie and Astronomie. He divideth the Brachmanes into those of the mountains, clothed in Deeres skins, which carried scrippes, full of roots, and medicines, which they applied with certaine charms to cure diseases: and the second sort he calleth Gymneta, those naked ones he hath mentioned (whereof it seemeth they were called Gymnosophista) which had women amongst them, but not in carnall knowledge: the third he calleth Ciuill, which lived in Cities and Villages, wearing fine linnen, and apparelled in skinnes. Nicolaus Damascenus saith, That at Antiochia he saw the Indian Embassadors, sent to Augustus from Ptolemeus the King (as his letter contained) of sixe hundred Kings, with presents among which was a female Viper of sixteene cubits (one of the like bignes Strabo saith he saw sent out of Egypt), and a Cray-fish of three cubits, and a Partrich bigger then a Vulture. Zarnanachbagas, one of these Indian Philosophers, was one of the Embassadors, who at Athens burned himselfe, not moved thereto by adueritie, but by propheetie, which had in all things followed his desires, left in his succeeding age it might alter: and therefore entered the fire, annointed, naked, laughing. His Epitaph was; Heere lieth, Zarnanachbagas the Indian, of Bargosa, which according to his Countrey-custome, made himselfe immortall.

But it is not such maruell that their Philosophers thus contemned death, whereas their women, the weaker and more fearefull sexe, bore in out-went their sexe and weakness. For their custome admitting many wives, the dearest of which was burned with the deceased husband: Haec igitur contendunt inter se de amore viri (they are Heromes words) & ambitio summa certantium est, ad testimonium castitatis, dignam morte decere. They ambitiously contend amongst themselves, to obtaine this farall testimonie of their husbands loue, and their owne chastitie; and the conqueresse in her former habit, lye down by the carcase, embracing and kissing the same, contemning the fire which consumeth them againe in despite of deaths divorce. A thing to this day obserued in many parts of India, as we shall see anon. Arrianus reporteth of a place called Comor (it seemeth the cape Comori ouer-against Zeilan) wherein is a Hauen, to which used to resort certaine Votaries, which had deuoted themselves to a single life, to wash themselves in those holy waters. The like was done by their Nun-like women. They had a tradition of a certaine goddess, which used to wash her selfe there euery month. Suidas telleth of a Nation called Brachmanes, inhabiting an Iland in the sea, where Alexander erected a pillar, with inscription, that he had passed so farre. They liue an hundred and fiftie yeares, and haue neither bread, wine, flesh, nor mentalls, nor houses, but liue of the fruits, and cleare water, and are very religious. Their wives liue apart on the other side the Ganges, to whom they passe in July and August, and after fortie daies, returne home againe. When the wife hath had two children, shee neither knoweth her husband after, nor any other man; which is obserued also, when in five yeares he can raise no issue of her, he after abstaineth. These say no beasts in sacrifice, but affirme that God better accepteth vnbloudie sacrifices of Prayer, and more delighteth in man, than in any Image.

Hydaspes, & the father of Darius, is reported to have learned of the Indian Philosophers or Brachmans, both Astronomie and Rites of Religion, with which he after instructed the Persian Magi. None might sacrifice without one of these to direct him, who onely among the Indians had skill of Divination, and authoritie to sacrifice, and were free from other services.

The Indians are said to worship Jupiter, Ganges, and other Heroes of their Countrey. Some of the Indian Nations accounted it dishonorable (as they doe also at this day) for the wives not to be burned with their deceased husbands. Thomas the Apostle preached the Gospell to the Indians, and so did Bartholomew also, and destroyed their Idols (which wrought great wonders amongst them) Ashtaroth, Beirah, and Waldath, as Abdias reporteth, who even in this Historie may easily bee conceived to be counterfeit, in ascribing the Names and Religions of the Grecians, Iuno, Neptune, Berecintia, to the Indians; besides those vncristian reuenges, in killing so many of their aduersaries, and old Heathenish, new Popish Ceremonies, fastened on those Apostles.

To let passe that Abdias, a fit Bishop of that mystical Babylon: Alexander ab Alexandro reckoneth among their gods the greatest trees (to cut which, was with them a capitall crime) and a Dragon, in honor of Liber Pater. Hercules they honored in a Giant-like statue, whose daughter Pandæa, the Pandæans say, was their first Queene. These affirme, that in the Hill Meros, which they account sacred to Jupiter, is a cave wherein Liber or Bacchus was nourished; from whence the fable grew, that hee was borne of Jupiters thigh; for so much signifieth. Some of the Indians (saith Solinus) kill no beasts, nor eat flesh: some liue onely on fish. Some kill their parents and kinsfolke, before age or sicknesse withereth them, and deuoure their flesh, an argument not of villany, but pietie amongst them. Their Gymnosophists, from the Sun rising to the setting, fixe their eyes on the bright orbe of the Sunne, thence obseruing certaine secrets. Hereunto he addeth the tales, of men with dogges heads; of others with one legge, and yet very swift of foot: of Pigmeis, of such as liue only by lent: of home infants; of some like Polyphemus, with one eye in their forehead; of others with eies to the ground, wherein many of the old writers are Poets, and the moderne Painters, as in many other monsters of men and beasts. We seeke credit with the wise, and not admiration of fooles.

Ctesias in his Indica (which Photius hath preserved rather as a monument of Ctesias his lying, then of Indian truth) hath told the like incredible tales; that it neuer raineth in India, that there is a fountaine of liquid gold receiued into pitchers of earth, that the sea in the toppe is boyling hotte, with the monstrous Marrichora, a man-like beast, and other more horrible beast-like men, with tailes and heads of dogges, without speech: the little truth in his little Pigmeis both beasts and men; his great lies of great Gryphons, Lion-Eagles, keepers of golden mountaines, with other like fables, scarce in one thing agreeing with our moderne, and more certaine obseruations, and such, as if of purpose he had in challenge of the World cast downe the Gantlet for the Whetstone, which for my part, I thinke he best deserueth. This hath the lyer gotten by lying, that in his Persian Storie, which hee had better meanes to know, hee is the more doubted: and such relations haue made Indian reports accounted fabulons.

The Indians neuer sacrificed, or saluted their Idols without dances. They were neuer rewarded with militarie honor or spoile, except they brought into the Campe their enemies head in their hand. They punished perurie with the losse of fingers and toes; and such as deceived their Clients, with perpetuall silence; and besides, they were disabled vnto any Office. Their Lawes are not written; their contracts without scales, or witnesses. They vsed no pledges; nor might borrow or lend vpon vsurie.

In the hills, called Hemodi, Balthus is said to haue erected pillars, to witnesse his Conquest, as farre as that Easterne Ocean, as Hercules did in the West. He built the Citie Nysa, where he left his sicke and aged souldiers, which Alexander spared, and suffered to their owne libertie, for Dionysius or Bacchus his sake. And as Bacchus erected Pillars, so did Alexander Altars to the twelue chiefe gods, as high as Towers, monuments of his farre trauels, where he obserued solemn games and sacrifices. He sacrificed crificed also, not to his Country-gods alone, but to Hydaspis, Acefine, and Indus, Indian Rivers, and to other gods, with other Rites and Sacrifices, then he had before vsed: drawing a golden bowle in Iodus, and another in the Ocean, in his Ethnicke superstition. To him did the Indian Magi (so doth Arrianus<sup>d</sup> call their Brachmanes) say, that he was but as other men, sauing that he had lesse rest, and was more troublesome, and being dead, should enioy no more land, then would serue to couer his bodie. And euery man (saied they) stamping with their feet on the ground, hath so much as he treadeth on. Eusebius<sup>e</sup> reciteth out of Bardesanes Syrus, that amongst the Indians, and Brachmanes, were many thousand Brachmanes, which as well by tradition, as law, worshipped no Image, nor ate any quicke creature, dranke no wine nor beere, only attending on Diuine things: whereas the other Indians are very vicious, yea some hunt men, sacrifice, and deuoure them, and were as Idolaters.

d *Arrian. lib. 7.*e *Euseb. de
lib. 6. cap. 8.*

Many, besides his Relations of Monsters in these parts, telleth of their Philosophers (called Gymnosophists) like things to that, which is before mentioned of their beholding the Sunne from the rising to the setting, with fixed eyes, standing on the hot sands all day-long, on one foot by course. Tooth-ache, with other diseases of the head and eyes, spitting and other sicknesses, are either exiles or strangers to the Indians. Tully saith, That in this naked plight these Philosophers endure the cold of Winter, and fumes of Caucasus, while they liue, and the burning fire at their end without any plaining. The Indian women also strue which shall be married to her husbands corpse, in a fiery chariot, riding with him into another world.

Philostratus in his large Legend of the life of Apollonius Tyaneus, their Philosophicall Saint, relateth his pilgrimage into India, to the Brachmanes, in which he came to Nysa, where was a Temple of Bacchus built by himselfe, planted about with Bayes, Vines, and Liue, whose shadie rooffe couered the same. In the middest was an Image: all instruments belonging to the Vintage were there, some of gold, others of siluer hanging sacred to Dionysius. He after<sup>h</sup> came to Taxilla the Citie royall, where he found the Temple of the Sunne, and in it, the Iuory Image of Ajax, with golden statues of Atalanta: and ouer-against the same, brazen Images of Pomus. The walls of red marble lined like fire, interlaid with gold, resembling lightning. The Mosaicall floore paved with pearles. The King heere offered sacrifice to the Sunne. For the pepper-trees, which (he saith) are great, and abound with Apes, who gather the pepper for the Indians gratis, brought thereunto by a wile of the Indians, who first gather some, and lay it on heapes, and then go away: at their returne, finding many the like heaps made by the ravenous Apes, I leaue it to the Authors authoritie, and Readers credulity: as also which followeth of the Inhabitants of Paraca in these parts, who by eating a Dragons heart and liuer, attaine to vnderstand the language (if so I may terme it) of beasts. And if you maruell at this,<sup>k</sup> that which followes will amaze you; of men which doe not, as the former, communicate with the nature of beasts, but of spirits, making themselves at their pleasure inuisible. Heere in a holy hill was a pit, whereof no man drinketh, by which the Indians binde their faith, as by the most solemne and inuiolable oath. In this pit was a fiery receptacle, where men were purged from their offences: and two tubs (of Whetstones, I should say) of raines and windes, the one being opened yeelding raines, and the other, windes.

g *Phil. l. 2. c. 4.*h *cap. 9.*i *Lib. 3. cap. 1.*k cap. 3.

In this place were many Indian, Grecian, and Egyptian statues, with their Rites observed accordingly. This hill was reported the middle of India, and euery noone-tide they sing Hymnes to the Sunne for that fire, borrowed (they say) from his beames. The Brachmanes sleepe on the ground, on herbes strewed two cubits thicke, that by this elevation they might more signifie their deuotion to the Sunne, whom they laud night and day. He found Iarchus their principall, with seuen associates; sitting on Thrones of Brasse. Iarchus could tell Apollonius his Name, Nation, and Adventures, which had befallen him all his life. They annoint themselves, then wash in a fountaine, and after this, being crowned, enter the Temple in solemne Procession, with Dances, stamping the ground with Roddes, wherewith the earth, like vnto waues, did moue and shake it selfe. Iarchus being asked by Apollonius, what hee thought of himselfe and his company, answered, That they were gods, because they were good men: that he himselfe had sometime beene Ganges, and Apollonius before had beene an Egyptian Mariner, an attendant which there waited on them had been Palamedes, whose misfortunes we reade of in the warres of Troy, thus in new bodies presenting themselves to the world. The world, he said, was a living creature, compounded of five Elements, with diuers other things of Pygmies, which liued vnder the Earth, of Gryphons, &c. Thus much I thought to adde of Apollonius, because some vaine Philosophers haue impudently compared him to our Sauour, that the Reader might parallel this Legend with the Gospell; out of this darknesse, the more to admire that more then admirable Light. And thus much out of Philostratus, of the Brachmanes. The Gymnosophists are by him placed, and by that name knowne, in Egypt and Ethiopia, whither also Apollonius went to visit them, and we in due place will follow him.

Of the Indian Prouinces next adioyning to China.

b Discourse of China. p. 381.

c Gi. Bot. Ben.

Auchin-China<sup>a</sup> is an Indian Kingdome, situate betweene the River Cantan, and the Kingdome of Siam, diuided into three Prouinces, and as many Kings, but one of them is PARAMOUNT. It<sup>b</sup> aboundeth with Gold, Silver, Aloes, Porcelane, and Silke. They are Idolaters and Pagans, and<sup>c</sup> haue had some deuotion to the Popish Christianitie, moued thereto by certaine pictures of our Ladie, of the last Iudgement, and Hell (a new kinde of preaching) and haue erected many Crosses amongst them, at which the Friars report (after their fashion) some miracles. Their Religion seemeth little to differ from that of the Chinois.

Nigh vnto this Kingdome is Champa, the name of a Kingdome, and chiefe Citie thereof, of great Traffique, especially of Lignum Alois, which groweth there in the Mountaines, prized at the weight in siluer, which they vse in Bathes, and in the Funerals of great Princes. In Religion they are as the former.

Camboia lyeth Southward from thence; a great and populous Countrey, full of Elephants and Abada's (this Beast is the Rhinoceros;) Heere also they be ginne to honor the Crosse, as Frier Siluester (a man, as they say, much reuerenced by the King, and honored of the people) hath taught them. When the King dieth,<sup>d</sup> his women are burned, and his Nobles doe voluntarily sacrifice themselves in the same fire. The women are generally burned with their husbands at their death. The Camboians dealt treacherously<sup>e</sup> with the Hollanders, Anno 1602. whom they invited to the shore, with promise of certaine Buffes, and then cruelly slew them. They detained the Admirall on shore, to be redeemed, with some of their Ordinance. When they intended journey, they vse diuination with the feete of a Henne, to know whether it will be luckie, or no; and as the Wizard shall answere, they dispose of themselves, either to goe or stay. Gaspar de Cruz mentioneth a people called Laos, Northwards from Camboia, which come thither downe a Riuer, which hath his beginning in China, and is of eight, fiftene, and twentie fadoms depth: it passeth through deserts, where no Elephants and Bados, or Rhinoceroes, the males of which beasts haue a home issuing out of their snout, accounted good for the Piles. This Riuer comming to Cudum, twelve leagues from the principall Citie of Camboia, makes a passage to another Riuer, which descendeth from a great Lake, in the midst of which one cannot see land. When the great waters come downe from the Laos Riuer, they enter that other Riuer with such violence, that it reuerseth and turneth backe the streame, with a swift current, and overfloweth all Camboia, leauing no passage for Trauellers, but by Boat, their houses also being in the lower roomes over-flown, themselves remaining in the higher roomes, with their household. This Riuer runneth vpward from Iuly to September. The Portugals shewed our Author a great Hill, ouer which a ship had failed, being of sufficient burthen to haue passed from India to Portugall. These Laos bring Musk from Camfi, being the flesh and bloud (as he saith) of a certaine beast. They

They goe naked from the waste vpwards, trussing vp their haire like a cappe. Their Poynts weare yellow cloaths and yellow Copes, with certaine folds and seamés. Their Religion is as in Siarn.

On this side of Cambois, is <sup>f</sup> Siam; Sion, or Silon, mother-Citie of a Kingdome bearing the same name, in which are reckoned thirtie thousand families of Moities, besides the Naturals. In these parts are huge woods, harbours of Lions, Tigers, Owls, and Maricheb, which haue Maidens faces and Scorpions-tailes. Heere runneth Menan out of that huge Lake Chiamay, which yeeldeth this and other Rivers of like name to Nilus in Egypt.

For this cause, Balbi affirmeth, that they build their houses in Silon (so he termeth it) very high, and every house hath a boat belonging thereto for passage and transportation of the family in that their winter-time, or annuall deluge. And some poore persons haue slight houses of Reed, or timber set vpon planks tied together, or Litters, which they can remoue whither they please, as mouable shops to buy and sell, which is there done most by the women. This name of Sion, Silon, or Siam, may worthily moue a question to Geographers, whether this be not the Sina mentioned by Ptolemy, Marcianus and other Ancients: the rather because China is a name vnkowne to the Chinoies and their Countrey abuts on the sea Eastward, and the Cities thereof haue more Northerly situation, then those by them ascribed to the Sinez; which name is heere little altered, and in other things this seemeth rather to agree therunto. But let the curious enquire, and the learned iudge.

They haue amongst them many religious men, which leade an austere life, and therefore had in great reputation of holinesse. These liue in common: they may not marie, nor speake to a woman (which fault is punished with death) they goe alway bare-foot, in poore aray, eating nothing but Rice and Greene herbs, which they begge from dore to dore. They craue it not, nor take it with their hands, but go with a wallet at their backs alwayes, with their eyes modestly fixed on the ground, and calling or knocking stand still, till they receiue answer, or some thing be put in their wallets. Many times they set themselves naked in the heate of the Sunne: notwithstanding that himselfe, with such direct beames, together with his frie (whole armies of Gnats) doe their utmost malice on them. They rise at mid-night to pray vnto their Idols, which they doe in Quires, as the Friars doe. They may not buy, sell, or take any Rents, which, if they should doe, would bring on them the imputation of Heretikes. Some Merchants of Siam being at Canton, and hearing that Frier Martin Ignacio and his companions, were there imprisoned, for entering that Chrsian Kingdome without licence, they visited them, and seeing their poore Friars weeds, they, besides other almes, offered to pay their rancome, if money would doe it.

The Siamites commonly hold, that God created all things, rewardeth the good, and punisheth the bad: That man hath two Spirits; one good, to keepe; and the other evil, to tempt, continually attending him. They build many and faire Temples, and place in them many Images of Saints, which sometime liued vertuously, and now are in Heauen. They haue one Statue fiftie paces long, which is sacred to the Father of men. For they thinke that hee was sent from aboue, and that of him were borne certaine persons that suffered Martyrdom for the loue of God. Their Priests are clothed in yellow long garments. (This colour is esteemed holy: and euery yellow thing, for the resemblance which it hath with Gold, and with the Sunne, is hallowed to God.) Besides that which is before said of their strict orders, they may not nourish Homes, because of their female Sexe. To drinke Wine, is punished in their Priests with stoning. They haue many Fasts in the yeare, but one especially, in which the people frequent the Temples and their Sermons. They haue their canonicall houres by day and night for their holy things. They hold, that the World shall last eight thousand yeares, whereof sixe thousand are passed, and then it shall bee consumed with fire: at which time shall bee opened in Heauen seven eyes of the Sunne, which shall drie vp the Waters, and burne vp the Earth. In the ashes shall remaine two Egges, whence shall come forth one man and one woman, which shall renew the World. But there shall bee no more Salt, but fresh Riuers and Lakes, which shall cause the Earth, without mans labour, to abound in plenty of good things. The Siamites are the sinke of the Eastern Superstitions, which they deriue to many Nations.

a G. de Cruz,

Gaspár de Cruz a testifieth that the Bramenes in Siam are Witches, and are the Kings principall seruants. They worship one god called Probar Missur, which (say they) made Heauen and Earth: and another called Ptalossur, who obtained of a third named Praisur, that power to be Probar Missur. Another they call Brabus Praisur Adetris. He thinketh the third part of the Land to be Priests or Religious persons. These Religious are proud, the inferiour worshipping their Superiours as gods, with prayer and prostrating. They are reuerenced much of the people, none daring to contradict them: so that when our Frier Gaspár preached, if one of those Religious came, and said, this is good, but ours is better, all his auditors would forsake him. They number, in their opinion, seven and twentie heauens, holding that some of them are (like Mahomets Paradise) fraught with faire women, with meates also and drinkes; and that all liuing things which haue soules go thither, even Fleas and Lice. And these lousie heauens are allotted to all secular persons which enter not into their rule, and habit of Religion. They haue higher heauens for their Priests which liue in wildernesses, ascribing onely this felicitie to them, there to sit and refresh themselves with wine. And according to the higher merits they assigne other higher heauens among their gods, which haue round bodies like bowles, and so haue these that goe thither. They hold also that there are thirteene Hells; according to the differing demerits of mens finnes.

Of their Religious men, some are supreme and sit above the King, called Messachachers; a second Order they entitle Naseendeches, which sit with the King, and are as Bishops: a third and lower ranke sit beneath the King, named Maires, which are as Priests, and haue the Chapuzes and Saxes, two inferiour degrees, vnder them: all reuerenced according to their place. Except the Priests and Religious, all are slaves to the King, and when they die, their whole state deuolueth to him, how hardly forer the wife and children shift: which was caused through a rebellion against the brother of the King, which then reigned when the Frier writ this.

G. Bot. Ben.

The Inhabitants of this Kingdome are much giuen to pleasure and riot: they refuse the vse of Manuall Arts, but addict themselves to Husbandrie. They haue publicke Schooles, where they teach Lawes and Religion in the vulgar Language: other Sciences they learne in a more learned Tongue. They worship innumerable Idols, but especially the foure Elements; according to which his Sect, each man maketh choise of his buriall. They which worshipped the Earth, are therein buried: the Fire burned the dead carcases of them which obserued it: in the Ayre are hanged (to feast the winged people with their flesh) those which adored the Ayre, being aliue. The water drowneth those which had aliue beene drowned in that Waterie Religion. Every King, at his first entrance to the Crowne, erecteth a Temple, which he adorneth with high Steeples, and innumerable Idols. In the Citie of Socotay is one of metall, four score spannes high.

c Treatise of the Circumserence of the Earth.

The Kingdome of Siam comprehendeth that Aurea Regia of Ptolemy, by Arrianus in his Periplus (the Mappes whereof Ortelius set forth 1597) called Aurea Cantium; nigh to which is placed that Aurea Cebusina, then (it seemeth) by a necke of land joyned to the continent; since supposed to bee by force of the sea separated from the same; and to be the same which is now called Siamatra: which Tremellius and Isinius iudge to be Salomons Ophir. The Land trendeth long and narrow, and containeth five hundred leagues of Sea-coast, compassing from Chaupa to Tauay. But of this spot the Arabians, or Moores, haue vsurped two hundred, with the Towns of Parane, Paua, Ior, and Malacca, now in possession of the Portugals: and the Kingdome of Aua, Checran, Caipumo, & Brema, haue shared also therein. Odia is the chiefe Citie thereof, containing four hundred thousand households, & serueth the King with fifty thousand soldiers: & to the riuer Capumo (on which it standeth) belong two hundred thousand vessels. This King hath nine Kingdomes subiect to him, and thirtie thousand Elephants, whereof three thousand are trained to the warres. His Nobles hold their Lands in a kinde of Knights-Seruaice, like the Turkish Timars (yet onely for terme of life) and without the Kings pay serue him, whensoever he appointeth, with twentie thousand horse, and two hundred and fiftie thousand soore. The countrey is compassed with the high hills of Iangoma, Bréma, or Brama, and Ava, and is it selfe plaine, in situation and fertilitie (caused by inundation) like to Egypt. The Lai are tributaries to Siam, for feare of the Gueoni, Caniballs and Man-eaters living in the mountaines adiacent; against whom the Siamite defendeth them, and invaded those Gueoni one time with twenty thousand horse, two hundred and fiftie thousand foot-men, and ten thousand Elephants, for carriages and warre. Cesar Frederike reporteth, That in the yeare 1567. the King of Pegu besieged the King of Siam in his chiefe Citie, with an Armie of one million and foure hundred thousand men, and lay before it one and twentie moneths, and had five hundred thousand fresh souldiers sent him in supply, and yet had not prevailed, if treason had not more furthered his designs then force. The gates were one night set open, and the Peguans entred; which when the Siamite perceived, he poysoned himselfe, leaving his children and Kingdome a prey to the Conquerer; whose triumph shall returne. Frederike (then in Pegu) beheld. Since that time the Kings of Siam have bene tributaries to Pegu.

1 Ces. Frid.

After this Peguan had reigned seven and thirtie yeares, he left his Kingdome, but not his fortunes, to his sonne: who taking displeasure against the Siamite, his vassall, sent for him to come to him, which he refused. And thereupon hee entered into his Countrey with nine hundred thousand men, and besieged him in his chiefe Citie: which he, seeking politicke delays, made semblance still to deliuer; yntill in the third month after (which was March) the River overflowed the countrey sixe score miles about, after his yearly custome, and partly drowned, partly committed to the Siamites (swimming in boats for this bootie) to be slaughtered, that huge Army; of which, scarce threescore and ten thousand returned to Martavan, and those without Elephants and Horses. And when the King of Pegu proceeded in his attempts with like successe, the Siamite, at last besieged him in Pegu, his royall Citie, Ann. 1596. But hearing a rumor of the Portugals comming to helpe him, he raised his siege. These are the reports of Franciscus Fernandes, a Iesuite. Of the Peguan wee shall speake more in the next Chapter.

Malacca is now subiect to the Portugals, conquered by Alphonso Albuquerque, or Aluisher, as K. Emanuel in his Epistle to Pope Leo, (wherein he relateth the whole expedition and exploit) calleth him. They haue there their Bishop, and a Colledge of Iduies besides the Castle. It for sometime was subiect to Siam, from whom it rebelled, after that Merchandize had made them rich. The ayre is here very vnwholsome: their speech a deuised language of the first founders (for it is not long since it was but a few Fishers cottages:) their Religion is Mahumetan, as a great part of the Coast hereabout is. Magimus calleth it the Centre of the Easterne Trafficke. They are proud of their language; wherein they deuise many Sonnets and amorous Poesies. The Malays, or Countrey-people, goe naked, with a cloth about their middle, and a little ruff of cloth about their heads. Lodowick Bartherma (who was there before the Portugals knew it) supposed, that here arrived more ships then in any Citie in the world. The River Gaza, neere thereunto, is more after his reckoning, then fiftene miles ouer. The people in the countrey (which compasseth about two hundred and threescore miles) lodge in trees, for feare of Tygres. After that Alphonso Albuquerque had conquered Malacca, the Moores, dispossessed there, seated themselves in diuers places along the Coast, and some of them vsurped the title of Kings.

Parane is a Citie betweene Malacca and Siam, chiefe of that Kingdome, whereto it giueth name, in the height of seven degrees. The buildings are of Wood and Reed, but artificially wrought. The Mesquit (for many of them are Mahumetanes) is of bricke. The Chinois are more then the native Inhabitants. They are of an Asht-colour. They vse three languages; the Malayan (which to them is naturall) the Sian, and Chinan. The first is written like the Hebrew, from the right hand; the second, like the Latine, from the left, and almost in like Characters; the third, from the right to the left, with a descent from the top to the bottome. The Chinois haue idolatrous Temples, and so haue the Sians, wherein are many golden statues; the Priests which attend them them are clothed in yellow. They haue sacred youthes which are their Oracles. The people when they enquire of them, sit a conuenient distance from the Images, and obserue the young mans gestures (who with his haire disheuelled lyeth prostrate before the Idoll) singing and playing on Instruments, vntill he arise, and standeth vp. For then, as possessed of the Diuell, he runneth vp and downe with a terrible countenance; and maketh a stirre, as if he would kill himselfe, & them that stand by, with a sword which he hath in his hand. Then the people prostrating themselves, request him to declare the Diuels Oracle; and he answereth as pleaseth him, this lies being accounted Oracles. Adulterie is here a capitall offence, the father of the malefactor being the Executioner, or his next kinsman, if he be dead: yet is this vice common (notwithstanding this rigor) by reason of the womens vbridled lust.

The Kingdome was gouerned many years by a Queene, who gaue good entertainment to the Hollanders. James Nacoy and his fellowes, anno 1602. after their double misfortune and madnesse, which had befallen them, the one in iest, the other in earnest, this at Macao in China, where they were, and knew it not, and setting twentie men on shore, neuer saw them againe, but heard, that the Portugals had caused fifteene of them to be hanged: the other at Auarella Falca, in 22. degrees 7. where they found the Tract of Carcs, and footings of beasts, but could not see a man; nor shoot a beast. They ghesied that the people liued as the Tartars, wandring in Carcs and Tents, without any seded dwelling. The place was by them called Southernym, by reason that many of their companie had lost the vse of reason, and became madde with eating a certaine fruite there growing like to Plummes, with a tender stone, which continued till they had slept. Had they knowne then the easinesse of the cure, it had bene better then any Comedie to haue tickled their Splene, & prouoked laughter, to see one fighting against the enemies, which assaulted him at his Cabbin: to heare another with pitteous shrikes trie out on the multitude of Diuels and Hobgoblins, which affrighted him: a third sees strange sights, and cries out, the Ship is full of strangers: and whilst one, in more pleasing distraction, enioyeth (and ioyeth in that distracted pleasure) the sight of God and his Angels; another (transported by this humoured Charon) with dreadfull and gastly looks, trembles at his supposed sights of the Diuell, and his helish associates. It were a madnesse to relate how exceedingly this their madnesse was diuersified, and how many Acts this Tragickall Comedie had, till sleepe had dispersed those fumes, wherewith that fruite had distracted their braines. From thence (as is said) they came to Patane, where the Queene entertained them in good sort, and to their contentment.

As the difference of their writing, in such neerenesse of dwelling, is very much, so no lesse is found in their Religions. The Pataneans are Mahumetans. The Chinese and Siamites are Ethnikes, in that diuersitie of Rites which you haue heard. Whilst the Hollanders were there, one of those youths, in that Propheticall distraction before-mentioned, warned them to depart from thence; for a great fire would otherwise consume them: wherupon many forsooke their habitation, and yet no fire happened. They also saw the execution of their seuerer law against Adulterie, on two noble Personages, whose lewd familiarity being detected, she chose to be strangled, and he to be stabbed (the law permitting them their choyse of the kindes of death) which by the fathers of the parties was executed on them. In single persons it is accounted no crime. And if a forreine Merchant come to trade there, they vse to aske him if he neede not a woman yea, many young women offer their seruice: and the price and time being agreed on, she whom he pleaseth to chuse, goeth with him to his house, and in the day performeth the office of a seruant, in the night of a Concubine; but then neyther of them may seeke change of pleasure, without great perill.

The Siamites that liue here, weare two or three balls of Golde or Siluer, as bigge as a Tennis-ball, in their yards, as we shall after obserue in Pegu. The Mahumetans wear them not. The Queene keeps her selfe close at home among her women; of which some may not marrie (but yet may doe worse) others may, hauing first obtained the Queenes licence. It is seldome that she is seene; yet sometimes she rideth on an Elephant in Progresse, for her recreation. And for Elephants, they haue a deuise to take them

q The Hollanders saw many men & women of China in their Boats, which were Fishers, and dwelt in them: but saw not a Portugall, nor could procure any of the other, at any summe, to deliuer them a letter on shore. After 1603. the Hollanders tooke a rich ship of the Portugals at Macao, laden for Iapan. Cornel. de Vener. Amerrie madnesse of Every one in his humor.

them in this sort. Some ride into the woods on a tame Elephant, and when they espie a wilde one, they prouoke him to fight. Whiles these are fastened in the encounter by the teeth or tuskes, each struiuing to ouerthrow the other, some come behinde the wilde Elephant, and fasten his hinder feete, and so eyther kill him for his teeth, or by famine tame him.

Since this time, the Hollanders haue had much trading at Patane; and the King of Ioe, moued with their good successe against the Portugals, ioyned his Nauie to theirs, to chase them out of those parts. Yea, they haue braued the Portugals, euen before Goa, the seat of their Viceroy; and in Nouember, 1604. at Calecut entered into solemn league with the Samaryn and the Hollanders, against them: and the next yeare they wonne from the Portugals the Castles of Amboyne and Tidore, not to mention many other prizes taken from them by the Hollanders at sundrie times. In the yeare 1605. Cornelius Matelinus was sent to the Indies with twelue Ships; and the next yeare after Paulus à Caerden, with twelue more. And Matelone besieged Malaca in the yeare 1608. and on the seuenteenth of August was a great fight by Sea, betwixt the Portugals and Hollanders. But in this attempt they had not successe answerable to their desire. He that will not onely reade, but in manner see, the most of these exploits of the Hollanders, with other rarities of the Indies, may resort to Theodoricke and Isaac de Bry, who haue in liuely stampes expressed these Nauigations, with the obseruations of Linschoten, and others. Balbi mentioneth an Iland on this coast called Carnacubar, the Inhabitants whereof go from one Iland to another (as the Caribes were wont) to hunt men for their cruell diet. For the most part they liue on fish, goe naked, without law, and had almost seized on him and his companie. David Middleton affirmeth the like of another Iland called Seran, which prouoked by wrongs from the Portugals, eate all Christians they can get, roasting them aliue, without regard of any mesome.

CHAP. III.

Of the Kingdome of Pegu, or Brama.

F the Kingdome Brama, or Brama, the Citie royall is Pegu, the Nation where began the greatnesse of the late Kings. These Bramans inhabited neere the Lake Chiamay, among whom the King of Pegu had his Lieutenants or Viceroyes: one whereof (the Deputie of Tangu) about threescore and tenne yeares since, rebelled against him, and surprised the Kingdomes of Prom, Melintay, Calam, Bacam, Mirand, Aua, all peopled with the Bramans, trending Northwards a hundred, and fiftie leagues. He after attempted Siam with an Armie of three hundred thousand, and spent three moneths in making way through the huge Woods and inaccessible Places, but archieued not his purpose. After his returne he assailed Pegu, and conquered it; and then returned the second time 1567. as in the former Chapter is mentioned. He subjected to his Seignorie twelue Kingdomes, which Fernandes thus rehearseth: The Kingdome of Caelan, where are the best Rubies and Saphyres: secondly, that of Aua, the bowels whereof are filled with Mines of Copper, Lead, and Siluer: the third Bacan, enriched with Mynes of Gold: Tungran, the fourth, aboundeth with Lac and Lead: such is Prom, the fifth: the sixth is Iangoma, stored with Copper, Muske, Pepper, Silke, Silver, Gold: Lauran, the seventh, had Bauim enough to lade shippes: the eight and ninth are the Kingdomes of Trucon, Staples of China-merchandize: the tenth and eleventh are the Diademes of Cublan, betweene Aua and China, powdered with precious stones: Siam, whence we last came, is the last of the twelue; in the inuasion whereof he armed a million and threescore thousand men (which number is short of Fredericks reckoning, except we ascribe that surplusage to Victuallers, Voluntaries, and Seruants and Attendants on the baggage:) which Armie (saith Fernandes) he tythed out of his people, taking one onely of ten. He so abounded with wealth, that a hundred dred ships, fraughted with Rice, seemed to diminish nothing of the plenty. The fields are said to yeeld three harvests in a yeare : and of Gemmes the store is beyond estimation, and almost maketh them there short of the estimation of Gemmes. But this wealth, then wanting no store, had, when Fernandes writ this 1598. a contrarie vicissitude, of no store, but of want, euen of those things which Nature exacteth, as necessary props of life. Scarcely of so many millions were left seuen thousand persons, Men, Women, and Children, to participate in the Kings imprisonment, or Siege, in his Tower, and those feeding on mans flesh, the Parents requiring of the Children that life which before they had giuen, to sustaine their owne, and now layed them not in their bosomes, but in their bowels; the children became liuing Sepulchres of their scarce-dead parents. The stronger preyed vpon the weaker : and if their flesh was eaten vp before by their owne hunger, leauing nothing but skinne and bones to the hungrie assault of these raueners, they ripped the bellie, and deuoured their inward partes, and breaking the skull, sucked out the braines raw. Yea, the weaker fed by the strength of famine, armed with no lesse butcherly despight against whomsoeuer they could meete in the streetes of the Citie; with their knives, which they carried about them, as harbengers to their teeth, in these inhospitall inhumane-humane banquets.

And thus did the besieged Citizens, while the King endured in his Tower no small part of like miserie, besides the indignitie, so to be by his owne vassalls straitned, and after slaughtered. But such is the iust hand of the King of Kings, who regardeth not persons, but as he sheweth Mercie to the mercifull, so doth he reserve Vengeance for cruelty and Tyrannie. Pardon me, Reader, if on this spectacle I cause thee, with my selfe, to stay a while and wonder. The Sunne, in his daily iourney round about this vast Globe, saw few equall (that I say no more) to this Peguan greatnesse, and yet in a small space, he that is higher then the highest, hath abated and abased this Magnificence lower then the lowest of his Princes.

After the death of that Brama Conquerour, his sonne, in the second moneth of his succeeding raigne, hearing that the King of Aua, his tributarie and vncl, was plotting some conspiracie, committed to prison fortie of his Nobles, partners in that new project, and bringing them all, with their parents, wiues, children, friends, & acquaintance into a wood, set fire whereon, commanding to cut them in pieces, whosoever escaped out of the flame. This kindled another fire in the hearts of his discontented subjects, which was not quenched but with his ouerthrow. He warred on his vncl, the King of Aua, with no great aduantage, till they both agreeing to trie it by single combat on Elephants, Pegu obtained the conquest. In the meane time the Siamite with an Army marched to the borders of Pegu, divulging rumors, That he came to succour his Lord against the Aua Rebelle. The King enraged hereat, sent presently part of his forces to take him, and present him captiue : but the souldiers refused to follow the Generall in this enterprize, and returned to their owne houses. The King, after his returne, sent to Siam, by faire speeches to perswade him to come to him : he refused his presence, but denied not his wonted Tributes. Hereupon the King, after two yeares prouision for the warre, made that vnhappie expedition in the former Chapter mentioned. And there the waters taking part with the Siamite, hee tried once and againe the like fortunes of warre. He sent his brother the King of Iangoma, and his owne sonne with which did much harme to the Siamites, and receiued no little themselves; never returning without losse of halfe their Armie, and of his own sonne, in the last invasion slain with a shot. Relentlesse he (inflamed rather with his losses) determined another expedition in his owne person; and therefore laid vp store of prouision in barnes at Martauan, Murmulan, Tauay, and Tanassarin, three yeares together, purposing then to employ all the Peguans in this enterprize. But they wearie of forreigne calamities, hid themselves in woods and wildernes, and some turned Talapoys: so they call their religious persons. Many sold themselves slaues. The King persisting, in his person gaue order to his vncl Ximibogu, to take a muster of all the people, and to entertaine halfe of them for the warres. But he missing so many, which had by those new courses preuented this seruice, acquainteth the King therewith; who enioyneth the late pro-forced Talapoyes to resigne their habite, the young men to be compelled to warfare, the old men to be exiled to the Bramans (where after he caused them to be exchanged for horses). He caused all the Peguans also to be branded in the right hand, that they might be knowne. This made them entertaine thoughts of rebellion, which was first practised by the Cosmians, who set a new King over them.

The Peguan sent an Armie against them; with charge to burne or bring away all they could finde amongst them, which they did, together with many of the people of Ussu, which he (after his manner) setting wood about them, burned. And when they fled (not able to warre against their King) and famine at once) submitted themselves, with exquisite torment he slew them all. He then sent for his sonne, the King of Pegu, to transplant those people of every age and sex, to people these forsorne desolations of Pegu. They, unacquainted with this aire, brake forth in diseases, wherewith they infected also the naturall Inhabitants; which plague made such havocke, that many in impatience cast themselves into the River. The Murmulans with helpe of the Siamites, seized on their Castle, whom the King besieged a yeare together, and then were forced from thence by the Siamites sudden irruption; with losse of the most of his people, the Horses, Elephants, and Countrey it selfe remaining their recompence. And the Peguan Captaines also, fearing their Masters tyrannie, became subiects to the Siamites, whose whole families this Tyrant with fire and water destroyed; so that all the Tract from Pegu to Martava and Murmulan was made a Wilderness. These things done he sent for his younger sonne, the King of Prom, and commanded him to the siege of Murmulan; who, vterly misliking the attempt, conveyed himselfe in the night homewards, with purpose of rebellion.

g The cruell tyrannie of the K. of Pegu.

The King of Siam not ignorant of this Peguan estate, invaded the countrey in Harvest time, and therefore that which they could, they conveyed into Barnes, the rest was fired. He proceeded and laide siege to Pegu; in which at that time were a hundred and fiftie thousand men; and three thousand Perces of Ordnance, a thousand whereof were Brasse; but (as is said) for feare of the Portugals, which were said to have entered into Siam by the way of Camboia, he departed, leaving Famine behinde as Lieutenant of his warres, which caused the foreigners, then in Pegu for the defence thereof, to get them to their owne homes. Those few which remained, lived with provision from Tangu. The King sent to his Deputie in Tangu, to come to him with all the Inhabitants of the Countrey and their store, leaving his wife, and some few to guard the Citie. He answered that he would send halfe, and to demand all were unreasonable. The king sends foure Noble-men with Souldiers to force him herunto. But he slayeth the Leaders, and seizeth on their followers. Thus the Famine encreasing, the people eating one another, the king numbred the Citizens, among whom he findeth seven thousand Siamites, whom he commanded to be slaine, not leaving above thirtie thousand of all sorts in the Citie. His sonne, the king of Prom, which had now stood out three yeares, began to relent and sue for pardon, with promise to bring the Promans (to the number of fiftie thousand) to the Citie, where at his father reioyced, and sealed his pardon, which he sent him with many gifts. But his chiefe counsellor, author of this rebellion, fearing all the blame would be laide on him, poysoned the Prince; himselfe aspiring to the kingdome, was within one weeke destroyed; and the King, every man seeking to seize the state to himselfe, caused that of those fiftie thousand within two moneths space, whiles every weeke they had a new Prince, scarce remained fifty men fit for warre, which departed to Pegu, three or foure in a Ship, leaving their countrey to the habitation of wilde beasts.

Indes cannot be secure, till he hang himselfe.

The Natives of Pegu are not quite extinct, but many of them are fledde into other Kingdomes; of whom, and of the Bramans, Iangoma numbred a hundred and twenty thousand: Oracan, twentie thousand: Siam a hundred thousand; and the king of Iangoma is able (they say) to arme a million of men.

The Talapoyes perswaded the Iangoman to depose his brother of Pegu. Hee alledged his oath vnto his father, while he lived. They replied, that no oath might prohibit, if he placed his brother in a Ubat (or golden Throne) to be adored for a God. And partly with this (I may not call it) reason: and partly, as Xerxes alledged for himselfe, selfe, because that his elder brother was borne before his father was King, and because his mother was the former King of Pegu's daughter, he perswaded himselfe that was lawfull.

And thus was the state of this mightie Kingdome in the yeare 1598. brought to one City, which also was now become a withered raskie, and well neare the Starve of it selfe, and (as mischiefs come most alone) besieged by Adama, King of Oraccan, who to victuallive redigged his yareldid, and signore about him.

1 A. Bower.

Andræ Bower (in his Letters the 28. of March, 1600.) thus finisheth this Tragedie. When the King of Pegu saw himselfe in such straits, he beseeged by the King of Oraccan, or Arracan, and Tangu, he yielded himselfe to the King of Tangu, who treacherously with him, and cut off his head; as he did to the Queen likewise, and the Prince. He then hasted to the Tower of Pegu, where he found as much golden and jewels as laden six hundred Elephants, and as many Horses, besides silver and other mettals of smaller price. The King of Arracan then absent, and angry that the King of Tangu (contrarie to promise) had seized all the treasure to himselfe, he purposed to invade his kingdome, and to that intent, had the ayde of many Portugals (amongst whom this Ictius was one) who saw the wayes and fields, lately so fertile, now strewed with dead mens bones and skulls; and in the Rivers all passage of ships hindered by the carcases of men. The king of Arracan found in the Towne aforesaid, six millions of silver, with the Artillerie; and then remained Lord of Pegu. But the king of Siam and Iangoma prevented his enterprise for Tangu, which they invaded to deprive him of his treasures. The king of Siam twice assailed Martaban with repulse, whereupon he caused two of his cowardly Captaines to be cast into Cauldrons of scalding Oyle: and the third time conquered that kingdome; on which he said.

k A cruell punishment of Cowards.

Thus have you heard of the power and subdersion of this great Monarchie; so much the more lamentable, because their fall was from such a height. The Country is so fertile, that at what time soever come be put into the ground, the painment is good with increase. I have seene with mine eyes (saith Cesar Frederich) that they have seven Serpents, Scorpions, all manner of Hearbes and Grasse as such fertilitye, as the stomackes, as they make credible the reports of their huge Armies; so doe they make more terrible the reports of their desolations. This that I speake of their diet, I will stand not of their extremitie and famine, but ordinarily. Master Fitch saith also, that they eat Roots, Hearbs, Leaues, Dogges, Cats, Rats, and Snakes; they strike most nothing.

It is about a hundred yeares since Veremathus was there, who in company of a Persian Merchant went to visite the king, who then had waies in Aua. They went in Boate all of one piece of wood, fiftene or sixtene paces long. The Oares were Cane, and the Mast was one Cane as bigge as a Herring Barrell. The king wore as many jewels as were worth a great Citie, which made him in the night time to shine as the Sunne. He had then a sacrifice to doe to the Diuell, and the next day the Persian presented him with rich Coralls, which he tooke in so good worth, that he gave him many Rubies as were worth a hundred thousand Ducats. Some yeares before Hernimio da Saule and Stephano found him in the same warres with Aua, and saith of him, that he had ten thousand Elephants, and bred or brought vp every yeare five hundred.

The king, that lived when Mr. Fitch was there, had one wife, and three hundred Concubines: of whom he was said to have fourescore and ten children. Her judgement almost every day. They vse no speech in their suits, but give vp their Supplications, written in the leaues of a tree, with the point of an Iron bigger then a hook kin. These leaues are of an ell long, and two inches broad; they are also double, the which giueth in his Supplication (standeth a little off, with a present; which, if the king granteth his request he accepteth, if not, he returneth with his present.

Pegu is (or at least in a more vnhappy tense, when they werethere; was) a great, strong and very faire, with walls of stone, and great ditches round about in many Crocodiles in them. There are two townes; the olde, in which the Merchants abide, and the houses are made of Canes called Bambos; and the new, for the king and his Nobilitie. The Citie is square with faire walls, having in each square five Gates, befides side many Turrets for Centinels to watch, made of wood and gilded very faire. The streets are straight as a line, from one gate to another; and so broad, that tenne or twelve men may ride a-front through them. On both sides at every mans doore is set a tree, yeelding a faire shew and comfortable shadow, that a man might walke in the shade all day. The houses are made of Wood, and covered with Tiles. The Kings house is in the midst, walled and ditched about: and the houses within of wood, beautifully wrought and gilded. And the house wherein his Pagode or Idoll stan-deth, is covered with Tiles of silver, and all the walls are gilded with golde. Within the first gate of the Kings house was a large roome, on both sides whereof were houses made for the Kings Elephants. Among the rest he had foure white Elephants, a thing rare in Nature, but more precious in his estimation. For this is part of his royall Title, The King of the white Elephants. And if any other hath any, he will seeke by fauour or force to haue the same, which (some say) was the cause of the quarrell betwixt him and the King of Siam. Great seruice was done vnto them. Euery one of these white Elephants stood in an house gilded with gold, and were fed in vessels of silver gilt. One of them, as hee went euery day to the River to be washed, passed vnder a Canope of Cloath of Golde or Silke, carried by sixe or eight men; as many going before playing on Drummes or other Instruments. At his coming out of the River a Gentleman washed his feete in a Silver Bason. There were of blacke Elephants nine Cu-shes high. The King was said to haue aboue fūe thousand Elephants of Warre. There was about a mile from Pegu, a place builded with a faire Court in it, to take wilde Elephants in a Grove: which they doe by the female Elephants, trained to this purpose, and appointed with a certaine Oyle, which causeth the wilde Elephant to follow her. When the Hunts-men haue brought the Elephant neere to the Citie, they send word thereof, and many Horse-men and Foote-men come out and cause the female to make a streight way, which leadeth to the place where she entereth, and he after her:

 for it is like a Wood. When they are in, the gate is shut, and they get out the female. The wilde one seeing himselfe alone, weepeth and runneth against the walles, which are made of strong trees: some of them breake their teeth therewith. Then they pricke him with sharpe Canes, and cause him to goe into a strait house, and there fasten him with a rope, and let him fast three or foure dayes; and then bring a female to him, with meate and drinke, within few dayes taming him. When they goe into the warres, they set a frame of wood vpon their backs (bound with great Cordes) wherein sit foure or sixe men, which fight with Gunnes, Darts, Arrows, and other weapons. All Authors agree, that no beast cometh so neere the reason of a man as the Elephant, yet they seeme to goe before some men in conceit, haughtinesse, desire of conquest, and such like. &c.

The Peguans are beardlesse: and carrie pinsers about them to plucke out the hair if any growe. They blacke their teeth, for they say a Dogge hath white teeth.
 The men of Pegu, Aua, Tangoma, and Branta weare balls in their yardes, which drye in the skinne beinge cut, and weare for euery childe one; till they haue time, and may take them out at pleasure: the least is as bigge as any Wall nut:
 the biggest as bigge as a little Hennes Egge. They were inuented to preuent Sodo-mie, which they vse more then any people in the world. Abusing the Male-Sexe; with the women also to weare scant clothes, that as they goe their thigh is seene to prouoke men to lust. Both these were ordained by a certaine Queene for those crimes, and are still obserued. If the King giue any one of his Balles, it is a great jewell esteemed: they heale the place in six or eight daies. The Bramans that are of the kings

Daughters, leauing onely passage for Vrine; which, when they marry, passe vnder the Surgeons hand for remedie. Gaspar Balby, and Gas. Arthur, tell of another custome of their Virgins, if that name may be giuen them. For, saith he, Virgines in regno annuo nullas reperire licet: Puella enim omnes statim a puertitia sua medicamentum quoddam vsurpant, quo muliebria distenduntur & aperta continentur: idq. propter phallos quos in virgis viri gestant: illis enim admittendis virgines antiores nullo modo suffereunt. If a man be bankrupt, the creditor may sell his wife and children. Their money is called Gauza, and is made of Copper and Leade, which euery man may stamp as he will. Golde and Siluer is merchandise and not money. The tides of the Sea betwixt Martauan and Pegu by q Casar Fredericks are reputed the greatest wonder which he saw in his trauels; being so violent, that the ayre is filled with noise, and the earth quaketh at the approach of this watery element, shooting the Boats that passe therewith in arrowes, which at a high water they suffer not to anchor in the Chanell, which would betray them to the deuouring iawes of the returning tide, but drawe them toward some banke, where they rest in the ebbe on drie land, as high from the Chanells bottom as any house top. And if they arrive not at their certaine stations, they must backe againe whence they came, no place else being able to secure them. And when it encreaseth againe, it giueth them three calls or salutations: the first waue washeth ouer the Barque from stemme to sterne: the second, is not so furious; the third, nimbly the Anchor. In Negrais in Pegu r diuers people dwell in Boats, which they call Parses; the countrey being full of Riuer, in which they goe to and fro with their Families: as strange is the dwelling here on the land; their houses being set on high posts, and their going vp on Ladders for feare of Tygres. From hence to Pegu is ten dayes iourney by the Riuer, in which way is Cosmin and Medon, where their markets are (as their dwellings) vpon the water in Boats, with a great Sombro, like a Carr-wheel, to keepe off the Sunne, made of Coco-Leauers.

Varells were burned, together with four thousand houses in Pegu, by negligence of a Portugal Mariner.

Heir Varells or Idoll-Temples in the Kingdome of Pegu are many. They are made round like a Sugar-Loafe, or a Bell: some are as big as a Church or a reasonable Steeple, very broad beneath: some a quarter of a mile in compasse: in the making of them, they consume many Sugar-Canes with which they couer them from the top to the bottom. Within, they be all earth, done about with stone. They spend there much golde, for they be all gilded aloft, and many of them from the top to the bottom: and euery tenne or twelue yeares, they must be new gilded, because the sunne consumeth off the golde, for they stand open abroad. Were it not for this vain custom, golde would here be good-cheape. About two dayes iourney from Pegu, there is a Varelle, b or Pagode, which is the Pilgrimage of the Pegues. It is called Dagon, and is of wonderfull bignes, and all gilded from the foot to the top. This house is fifty fye paces in length, and hath in it three Iles or Walks, and forty great Pillars gilded, which stand between them. It is gilded with gold within and without. There are houses every faire round about for the Pilgrims to lie in; and many goodly houses for the Talpoies to preach in, which are full of Images both of men and women all ouer gilded. I suppose it the fairest place in the world. It standeth very high, and there are some wayes to it, which all along are set with trees of fruits in such wise, that a man may goe in the shade about two miles in length. And when their feast-day is, a man can hardly passe by water or by land for the great prease of people, which resort thither from all places of the kingdome. There are on the shores of Dagon two statues, which from the head downward represent young men, but haue the faces of Diuels, and two winges on their backs. In Pegu there is a Varelle or Temple, like to this, which the King frequented to doe his holies therein, mounting vp staires, at the foote whereof were two Tigers gaping wide, seeming as if they had bene aliue. Besides the many Magazines (or Treasuries full of Treasure) which the late Braman King had, he had neere vnto the Pallace a Court walled with stone, the gates whereof were open euery day. Within this Court are foure guilded houses covered with Leade; and in euery of them certain Idols of great value. In the first house was a great statue of golde, and on his head a crowne of golde, beset with rare Rubies and Saphires, and about him foure little children of golde. In the second house is another of silver, as high as an house, set as it were sitting on heapes of money, crowned, his foote is as long as a man. In the third house there is the like Idol of Brasse, and in the fourth, of Ganza (which is their money metall, tempered of Leade and Copper.) In another Court not farre from this, stand foure other Colossies, or huge Images of Copper, in houses guilded faire, as they are themselves, saue the head. Balby c. tells of five made of Ganza, so monstrous, that the sides of their feete were as bigge as a man, and sitting crosse-legged, were yet as high as one could hurle a stone, and were all guilded. Fernandes d. relateth of threescore and foure Images of Gold, richly adorned with Jewels, and three hundred threescore and five Gambalangas or gourds of golde, molten by the Kings father, each weighing a hundred and fourescore pound; besides his other treasures; to conceale which he slew two hundred Eunuches his attendants.

Tygers

c Balby c. 38.d Fernandes Epist.

Their Tallipois, e before they take Orders, goe to Schoole, till they be twentie yeares olde or more: then they come before a Tallipoie, appointed for that purpose, whom they call Rowli. He (as chiefe and most learned) examineth them many times, whether they will leaue their friends, and the company of all women, and take vpon them the habite of a Tallipoy. If he be content, then he rideth vpon an horse about the streets, very richly apparelled, with Drums and Pipes, to shew that he leaueth the riches of the world to be a Tallipoie. In few dayes after he is carried vpon a thing like an Horse-litter, which they call a Serion, vpon ten or twelue mens shoulders, in apparell of a Tallipoy, with Pipes and Drums and many Tallipoies with him, and all his friends; which accompanie him to his house, standing without the Town, and there leaue him. Every one of them hath his house (which is very little) set vpon sixe or eight postes, to which they ascend on a Ladder of twelue or fourteene steps. These houses are commonly by the high-waies side, & among the trees, and in the woods. They go strangely apparelled, with one Camholine or thin cloth next to their bodie, of a browne colour; another of yellow, doubled many times vpon their shoulders. These two be girded to them with a broad girdle; and they haue a skin of leather hanging on a string about their neckes, whereon they sit bare-headed, and bare-footed, with their right armes bare, and a broad Sombtera or shadow in their hands, to defend them in Summer, from the Sunne, and in Winter from the raine.

They goe with a great pot made of wood or fine earth, and couered, tyed with a broad girdle vpon their shoulder, which commeth vnder their arme; wherewith they gett begge their victuals which they eate, which is Rice, Fish, and Hearbes. They demand nothing, but come to the dore, and the people presently do giue them one thing or another: they put together in their pot. They keepe their feasts by the Moone; and a new Moone is their most solemne Feast: and then the people send Rice and other things to that Kiack or Church, of which they be: and there all the Tallipoies of that Church meet and eate that which is sent them. They preach against all abuses, and manerly exhort vnto them. When they enter into their Kiack, at the dore there is a great iarre of water, with a Cocke or a Ladle in it, and there they wash their feete, and then enter in, setting vp their hands to their heads, first to their Preacher, and then to the Sunne, and so sit downe. When the Tallipoies preach, many of the people carrie them gifts into the Pulpit, where they sit and preach. And there is one which sureth by them to shew that which the people bring, which is diuided among them. They haue none other ceremonies nor seruice that I could see but onely preaching.

Bernardus f. saith, that they holde an innumerable multitude of worlds successiue one after another, and also innumerable number of Gods; but not all at once. They imagine that five haue gouerned this present world, whereof foure are passed away two hundred yeares agoe. Now they are without a God, and expect the fifth many ages hereafter: after whose death, they conceiue that the world shall perish by fire, and then another world shall follow, and other Gods to rule it. They reckon likewise in the number of their Gods certaine men, which yet haue first passed into fishes, beasts, and birds of all sorts. After death they beleue three places, one of pleasure, (like the Mahumetane Paradise) another of torment; the third, of annihilation, which they call Niba. The soules after their phantasie abide in the two former places, whence they returne so often into this life, till at last they be holden worthy that Niba. Here, death, that they haue Couents or Colledges of Priests, which liue three hundred together, or more in one place, haue no vse of women, are harbourers of strangers, and liue some of almes, some of rents. They haue like Nunneries also for the women. There is supposed to be in one Idol-sanctuarie (whereof they haue many) 120000 Idols. They fast thirtie dayes in the yeare; in which they eate nothing till night. They are of opinion, that he which in this world robbeth another man, shall in the next world be his servant for recompence. They hold it a sinne also to kill a liuing creature, although this be not strictly obserued amongst them. Some Iewes are of opinion that this people descended of those Israelites which Solomon sent to Ophir, which they place in this Kingdome. But the Peguans themselves ascribe their originall to a Dogge, and a China woman, which escaped shipwracke.

The Diuell is highly worshipped of these Pegusians, <sup>h</sup> to whom they erect a stately Altar, and adorne it with varietie of flowers, and meates of all sortes, so to see and feede him that he should not hurt them. This is principally done when they are sick: for then they make vowes, and build Altars, which they couer with clothes and flowers. They entertaine him also with diuersitie of musike, and appoint him a Priest, whom they call the Diuels Father, which procureth his Rites and Musicke. Some, as soone as they rise from their beds, bring a basket of Rice, and meates, and a burning Torch in their hand, running vp and down in the streets, openly professing to feed the Diuel to preuent harme from them that day. And if Dogs follow them, they hold them to be sent of the Diuell, to deuoure those meates in his name. Some will not eate till they haue first cast something behinde their backs to the Diuell. And in the country villages some of the richer inhabitants leaue their houses furnished with store of food three moneths space to be inhabited of him, keeping meane while in the fields: but so the other nine moneths they may be out of his danger. And howsoeuer the Talipois preach against this diuellish deuotion, yet they cannot reclaim the people. The Talipois every Monday, arise early, and by the ringing of a Bason call together the people to their Sermons, which are of Iustice to man, but nothing of Religion to God. They wash themselves once a yeare, <sup>i</sup> and the water wherewith they are washed, the people account holy, and reserue it for their drinke, as a holy potion. They holde that all which doe well, of whatsoever Religion shall be saued, and therefore care not, as Balby affirmeth, if any of their Nation turne Christian.

k Sapan, Giacbie

They haue many feasts very solemnly obserued. <sup>k</sup> One feast (called Sapan Giacbie) is kept twelue leagues from the Citie; whither the King rides in a triumphall Chariot, with his Queene in exceeding pompe, his Nobles attending. Another <sup>l</sup> is kept in Pegu, against which day all the Courtiers prouide them certaine Pillars or Images of diuers formes, kept close,ly, that none may see what others haue prouided all the day. These are made of Indian Reedes, carued and guilded, and on the festiual presented to the King, who praiseth the most artificiall of them. All that night huge lights of Waxe are burnt in honour of their Idoll, whose feast it is, that all may be to haue access to him; to which end the Citie gates are left open. But none may approach vnto him emptie-handed. They haue <sup>m</sup> a Feast of watering celebrated in the olde Citie, where the King, Queene, and his Children, with Rose-water sprinkle one another. And all the Capitaines likewise besprinkle each other, that they seeme as well as if they came out of a Riuer. It is said of the last Kings father, that when the people were thus washing, he would send amongst them an Elephant, which slew many of them, whereat he laughed; the people lamented. Another Feast <sup>n</sup> they haue, where in they haue a triall of their shippes, which can saile best: this feast lasteth a moneth. A fifth Feast <sup>o</sup> is called Giaimosegenon, in honour of a certaine Idoll. They haue many o-

these feasts, but these the most solemn. Antony Correa, a Portugall, concluding a league with the King of Pegu, the Kings Deputie caused the Articles of accord, written in Portugall and Pegu languages with golden letters, to be read aloud, and then sent the scrole, and with a few leaues of an odoriferous tree, caused the same to be burned to ashes, vpon which he layed both handes of the Priest, who in the name of the King, sware to those Articles. These things being done with great attention and silence, Correa, loath in a superstitious fancie to defile Holy Writ, with confirmation of an oath to a Gentile, sware on a booke of amorous Sonnets, to keepe inuiolable the said Articles.

In the year of our Lord 1585. the King of Aua rebelling (as is before shewed) the King of Pegu by single combat, slew the Traytor. The fight was on Elephants, in which the Pegusians Elephant, and the Auan Prince, died. The liuing Elephant was preferred to the place of the former; but in fiftene dayes space (let the beastlinesse of men imitate the humanity of a beast) hee sorrowed so for his Master, that nothing might comfort him. And although he had continually two seruants attending him, and telling him of his amended estate vnder a mightier Master, yet would he scarce cease to weepe, or begin to eate, till his fiftene dayes exequies were finished.

Bonifertus a Franciscan, spent three yeares in learning the Pegu's language, and mysteries, that he might preach the Christian Religion amongst them, but was soone forced to giue ouer, and returne into India. For they could not endure to heare any better knowledge then they had.

Crocodiles and Apes are accounted holy and sacred creatures, for which cause Apes multiply exceedingly; none taking them, except for the vse of their Vaselles or Temples, where they tye them, and keepe them with diligent respect. And though the Crocodiles in the Towne ditch deuoure men daily, yet in a blinde zeale they will drinke no other water, and account their soules certainly saued, whose bodies are doubt certainly lost and deuoured of those beasts, which sometimes are thirtie foote in length.

The Kings, subiect to the King of Pegu, did their homage, and presented themselves before him, kneeling, yea, they not onely kneeled to him, but to his white Elephants also. When the King dyeth, they make two ships with golden couers, and betwixt them erect a golden Theater; in which they place the corpse, applying thereto Muske, and the most sweet woods, with other things; and so set forth the same to Sea, setting the Theater or Pageant on fire. In one of the Ships are Talapois, which sing till they drinke the bodie consumed to ashes. Then doe they make a masse or lump of these ashes and milke, and commit the same to sea in the haue of Sirian at an ebbing water: the bones which remaine they carrie to another place, and there erecting a Chappell, doe burie the same therein. After this they returne to the Pallace, and, according to the accustomed rites, inaugurate the new King. The father of that King (whose Tragedie ye haue heard) had his bones buried in Dogon.

In Dagin or Dacin, as certaine Merchants at Martaban tolde our Author, That if a king be in loue with a maide, hee asketh her fathers consent, which yet few will giue, because he is still tied to maintaine his daughter; the king allowing no expence to his wife. In some places of that kingdome are men-eaters, called Batacchi, which when their parents grow olde, kill them, and eate them as great dainties. When the king hath condemned a man for some crime, these are his executioners, who in the presence of the king cut off his head, hands, and feete, and adding pepper and salt, eate him flesh raw. He is called the king of Affi, and is of great power, hath many ships, much pepper, and is a sworne enemie to the Portugals, working all the euill he can to Malacca. If the father knoweth the sonne to be guiltie (or the sonne the father) of some grievous crime, he may slay him, but must after giue account to the king; and if he alow the fact, all is well; otherwise he is liable to punishment.

In Samahy or Tangoma (five and twentie dayes iourney from Pegu) when the people be sicke, they make a vow, to offer meate vnto the Diuell, if they escape: and when they be recovered, they make a banquet, with many Pipes and Drummes, and many other Instruments, and dauncing all the night. Their friends bring them presents, p Gaspar Balby was there with other Merchants, which saw him weeping.

r Balby c. 42.

Cocos, figges, Arrecas, and other fruit; and with great dancing and reioycing, they offer to the Diuell, and say, they giue the Diuell to eate, and driue him out; and to this end in their dancing they crie and hollow very lowde. Likewise, when they besicke a Tallipoy or two, every night doth sit by them, and sing, to please the Diuell, that hee should not hurt them. When one is dead, he is carried vpon a great frame, made like a Tower, with a couering all gilded, made of Canes, carried by fourteene or fiftene men, with great minstrellie to a place out of the Towne, and there is burned. He is accompanied with all his friends and neighbors, all men: and they giue to the Tallipoies, or Priests, many mattes and cloth: and then returne to the house, where they staid two dayes: which being expired, the women accompany the wife to the place where he was burned, and there spend a while in mourning: then doe they gather the pieces of bones, which be left vnburned, and burie them, and then returne to their houses. The neere of kindred doe also shauē their heads, both men and women.

CHAP. V.

Of Bengala, and the parts adioyning.

He kingdome of Bengala is very large, and hath of coast one hundred and twentie leagues, and as much within land. The riuer Chabern (which some call Guenga, and think to be the ancient Ganges) watereth it: it is plentifull in Rice, Wheate, Sugar, Ginger, long Pepper, Cotton and Silke; and enioyeth a very wholesome ayre. The inhabitants neare the shore, are (for the most part) Mahumetans, and so also was the king, before the great Mogore (one likewise of his owne Sect) conquered him. Gouto the seate royall, and Bengala are faire Cities. Of this the Gulfe, sometimes called Gangesius, now beareth name Golfo di Bengala. Chatigan is also reckoned amongst their Cities. They are <sup>b</sup> a most subtile and wicked people, and are esteemed the worst slaues of all India: for that they are all theeuēs; and the women, whores; although this fault is common through all India, no place excepted. They haue a custome, neuer to drie off or see the meate twice in one pot, but haue every time a new one. Whensoever they are found in adulterie, they haue their <sup>c</sup> noses cut off, and are thence forwards narrowly looked to, that they keepe not each others company. The Portugals haue here Porto Grande, and Porto Pequino, but without Forts and Government; euery man liuing after his owne lust: and for the most part, they are such as dare not stay in their places of better Gouvernement, for some wickednesse by them committed.

In Bengala are found great numbers of Abadas or Rhinoceroses, whose horne, (growing vp from his snout) teeth, flesh, bloud, clawes, and whatsoeuer he hath without and within his body is good against poyson, and is much accounted of throughout all India. The skinn <sup>d</sup> vpon the vpper part of this beast, is all wrinkled, as if he were armed with shields. It is a great enemy of the Elephant. Some thinke that this is the right Vnicorne, because as yet there is no other by late trauellers found, but onely by heare-say. Onely Lodouicus Vertomanthus <sup>e</sup> saith he saw a couple of those true Vnicornes at Mecca; one whereof had a horne of three cubites, being of the bignesse of a Colt of two yeares and a halfe olde; the other was much lesse: both sent to the Sultan of Mecca, for a rare present out of Ethiopia. Gesner in his booke of Four-footed Beasts, citeth this testimony, and some others, whereby he perswadeth, that there are diuers sorts of these Vnicornes: but it cannot seeme otherwise then strange, that in this last hundred of yeares, wherein the world hath vneyled her face more then euer before; none of credite (that I haue read) hath affirmed himselfe to haue seene this Vnicorne, but in picture. That which is reported of their vertue against poison, proceedeth from the herbs which Bengala yeeldeth: for in other places they are not neere the price of these. There are here also certaine wilde Goats, whose hornes are in account against venom: as I my selfe (saith Linschoten) haue proued.

The Kings of Bengala, in times past, were chosen of the Abassine or Ethiopian Emperors, as the Soldans of Cairo were sometime of the Circassian Mamelukes. Northward from Bengala lieth the Kingdome of Arracan. The great Can subdued these parts and the Kingdome of Mien, about the yeare 1272. while Marcus Paulus liued there. Arracan, Chandican, and Syripur are by Fernandez placed in Bengala, as so many Kingdomes: Patane or Patenau by Frederick and Fuch reckoned to another Bengalan Kingdome: which our Countrey-man Master Fuch calleth the Kingdome of Goutrent so that vnder this name, Bengala, are comprehended many Seigniories; all, or the most part now subiect to the Mogor.

Our Mappes seeme not to describe the Riuer Ganges (so will we here terme it with Orellius, Castaldus, Bartius, and all our later Trauellers, both Merchants and Jesuits) according to the due course thereof. For Chaberis they bring from the North, enclining to the East, Guenga from the West; but Master Fuch, which continued five months in passing downe first in Iamena from Agra; which falleth into Ganges, and then in Ganges it selfe to Bengala (although he confesseth it may be done in shorter time) saith it commeth from the North-west, and runneth East into the Sea. Some call Chaberis, Ganges; and some hold Guenga to be Ganges; and some make but one Riuer of them both: and hence may happily arise in part, that seeking of Ganges is farre off.

There is in Ganges<sup>b</sup> a place called Gangasagar, that is, the entrie of the Sea, in which are many fishes called Sea-dogges. They which are wearie of this world, and desire to haue a quicke passage to Paradise, cast in themselves heere to bee deuoured of these fishes; perswading themselves, that the next and readiest way thither, is by their lawes.

Ganges<sup>i</sup> overflowing his bankes, in times past drowned many Villages, which so remaine; and hath changed his wonted Channell: the cause that Tanda (a City of Orissa) standeth now a league from the Riuer. It watereth a fruitfull Countrey and populous, and (as the Oceans high Collector) receiueth into him many riuers by the way; none no lesse then it selfe, so that in the time of raine, you cannot see from the one side of Ganges to the other. The superstitious opinion conceived, in those parts, of this Riuer, appeareth by the reports of all. <sup>k</sup> Emanuel Pinner at Cambaia obserued many to resort thither on pilgrimage, sometime out of that Citie foure thousand; and was told by the Governour of Bengala vnder the Mogor then at Lahor, that there came thither sometime three hundred thousand or foure hundred thousand Pilgrims. And addeth, That not long before his comming to Cambaia there assembled there, to this deuout iourney, fiftie thousand people. Happy they esteeme that man which washeth himselfe therein, and secure of saluation, if at the point of death he may drinke of this water. He conferred with one Gedacham, a great man, which had bene on this holy voyage, and had there weighed his mother three times; first, by her weight in siluer; secondly, in gold; thirdly, in pearles, all which he gaue to the poore. A brother of his, called Ran, being to go to the great Mogor, offered one hundred and fiftie thousand <sup>l</sup> Pardawos, that his <sup>m</sup> Pagods or Idols should send him good successe. They make an Image also to this Riuer, whereunto they doe diuine honor. The King of Calecut and the other Kings of Malabar keepe a solemne feast every twelue yeares, in honor of this Riuer; because that long since a certaine Brachman (falsely accused) fled vnto Ganges; and there led an austere life twelue yeares, worshipping that Streame and his Idol, to whom, when he purposed to returne home, after those twelue yeares expired, that Image of Ganges appeared, and said, that on the last day of February he would appeare in a Riuer of his owne Countrey, and cause the waters thereof to arise, and runne backward in witness of his innocencie, and bade him assemble all the Lords of Malabar to the sight, which accordingly came to passe, and the memorie thereof is by this Feast solemnized.

Bannaras<sup>n</sup> is a great Towne on Ganges, to which the Gentiles out of farre Countreies come on pilgrimage. The men are shauen all but the crowne. Alongst the water-side are many faire houses, in which stand Images of euill fauour, made of stone, and wood, like Leopards, Lions, Monkeis, Men, Women, Peacocks, and Diuels, with foure four armes and hands, sitting close-legged, and holding somewhat in their hands. There are diuers old men, which on places of earth, made for the purpose, sit praying, and they giue the people (which by breake of day, and before, come out of the towne, to wash themselves in Ganges) three or foure strawes which they take, and hold them betweene their fingers where they wash themselves: and some sit to marke them in the foreheads, and they haue in a cloth a little rice, barley, or money, which they giue to these old men. After that, they go to diuers of their Images, and giue them of their sacrifices, those old men in the meane while praying, which maketh all holy. They haue one Idoll called Ads, with foure hands and clawes. On certaine great carued stones also they powre water, rice, wheat, &c. They haue a great place like a well, with steps to goe downe, wherein the water standeth foule, and stinketh, by reason of those many flowers, which they continually throw thereinto. Many people are alwayes therein with imagination of pardon for their sinnes, because God (as they blasphemie) washed himselfe therein. They gather vp the sand in the bottome, as a holy relike. They pray not but in the water, and wash themselves ouer-head, lading vp water with both their hands, and turne themselves about, and then drinke a little of the water three times, after which they go to their gods in their houses. Some of them will wash a place which is their length, and then will pray vpon the earth, with their armes and legs at length out, and will rise vp and lye downe, and kisse the ground twentie or thirtie times, but will not stirre their right foot. Some vse fifteene or sixteene pots, little and great, ringing a bell, while they make their mixtures, ten or twelue times; and make a circle of water about their pots, and pray: others sitting by, one of which reacheth them their pots. They say ouer these pots diuers things many times, which done, they go to their gods and strew their sacrifices, which they thinke are very holy, and marke many of them, which sit by, in the foreheads, esteemed as a great gift. There come fittie, and sometime an hundred together, to this Well, and to these Idols.

About their Idols, in some houses, sitteth one in warme weather, to blow the winde with a fan vpon them. And when they see any company coming, they ring a little bell, and many giue them their almes. None of these Idols haue a good face. Some are blacke, and haue clawes of brasse; and some ride on Peacocks or other fowles. One there is alwayes attended with his fan, to make winde, which (they say) giueth them all things, both food and rayment. Heere some be burned to ashes, some scorched in the fire, and throwne into the water, when they are dead; the Foxes presently eat them: The wiues doe burne with their husbands when they die: if they will not, their heads be shauen, and neuer any account is made of them after. If a man or woman be sicke, and like to die, they will lay him before their Idols all night: and that shall mend or end him. And if he doe not mend, that night his friends will come and sit a little with him, and cry, and after will carry him to the water-side, and set him vpon a little raft made of reeds, and so let him goe downe the riuer. The chiefe Idols are very euill-fauoured, their mouthes monstrous, their eares gilded, and full of jewels, their teeth and eyes of gold, siluer, glasse, coloured blacke, with Lampes continually burning before them. Into their houses or Temples you may not enter, with your shooes on. When the scorched Indians are throwne into Ganges, the men swim with their faces downe-wards, the women with their faces vpwards; which I had thought they had by some meanes caused, but they denied it. The people goe all naked, with a little cloth about their middle. Their women are exceedingly on their neckes, armes, and eares, decked with rings of Siluer, Copper, Tinne, and Iuory hoopes: they are marked with a great spot of red in their foreheads, and a stroke of red vp to the crowne, and so it runneth three wayes. Their marriages are in this sort: ° The man and the woman come to the water-side, where standeth a Bramane or Priest, with a Cow and a Calfe, or a Cow with Calfe: these all goe into the water together, the Bramane holding a white cloth of foure yards long, and a basket crosse bound with diuers things in it. This cloth he layeth vpon the backe of the Cow. And then he taketh the Cow by the taile, and saith certaine words. Shee hath a Copper or a Brasse pot-full of water. The man holdeth his hand by the Bramans hand, and the wiues hand by her husbands, and all haue the Cow by the taile. Then they powre water out of the pot vpon the Cows taile, which maner throw all their hands, and they lade vp water with their hands; and then the Bramane tie their clothes together. After this they goe round about the Cow and Calfe, and give somewhat to the poore there attending, leauing the Cow and Calfe for the Bramans vse, and offer to diuers of their Idols money: then lying downe vpon the ground, they kisse it diuers times, and go their way. Betweene this and Patenaw are diuers theeuers, like the Arabians, without certaine abode.

Patenaw was sometime a Kingdome, now subiect to the Mogor. The women here are decked with siluer and copper, that it is strange to see, and by reason of such rings vpon their toes, they can weare no shooes. Heere I saw a dissembling Prophet, which sat vpon an horse in the Market-place, and made as though he slept, and many of the people came and touched his feet with their hands, and then kissed their hands. They tooke him for a great man, but I saw he was a lazie lubber: and there I left him sleeping. The people heere are great praters and dissemblers. As I came from Agra downe the River Iemena, I saw also many naked beggers, of which the people make great account; they call them Sebesche. Heere I saw one, which was a monster among the rest, wearing nothing on him, with a long beard, the haire of his head couering his priuities. The nailes of some of his fingers were two inches long: for hee would cut nothing from him. Neither would he speake, but was accompanied with eight or ten which spake for him. When any man spake to him, he would lay his hand vpon his breast, and bow himselfe, but speake he would not to the King.

In those parts they had many strange Ceremonies. Their Bramans or Priests come to the water, and haue a string about their neckes made with great ceremonies, and lade vp water with both their hands, and turne the string first with their armes within, and then one arme after the other out. Heere also about Iemena, the Gentiles will eat nothing, nor kill any thing. They pray in the water naked, and dresse their meate and eat it naked: and for their penance they lie flat vpon the earth, and rise vp and turne themselves about thirtie or fortie times, and vse to heaue vp their hands to the Sunne, and to kisse the earth, with their armes and legs stretched out along, their right leg being alwayes before the left. Euery time they lie downe, they score it with their fingers, to know when their flint is ended. The Bramans marke themselves in their foreheades, eyes, and throats, with a kind of yellow geare which they grinde; euery morning they doe it. And they haue some old men which goe in the streetes with a box of yellow powder, and marke them which they meet on their heads and neckes. And their wiues doe come, ten, twentie, and thirtie together to the water-side, singing, and there doe with themselves, and vse their ceremonies, and mark themselves on the foreheades and faces; and carrie some with them, and so depart singing. Their daughters be married, at, or before the age of ten years. The men may haue seuen wiues. They are a craftie people, worse then the Iewes.

I went from Bengala into the Countrey of Couche, which lieth fise and twentie dayes iourney Northwards from Tanda. The King was a Gentile, named Suckel Conn. For his Countrey is great, and lieth not farre from Cauchin-China. All the Countrey is set with canes made sharpe at both ends, and driuen into the earth; and they can let in the water, and drowne the Countrey knee-deepe. In time of warre they poyson all the waters. The people haue eares which be maruellous great, of a span long, which they draw out in length by deuises when they be yong. They are all Gentiles, and will kill nothing. They haue Hospitalls for sheepe, dogges, goats, cats, birds, and all other liuing creatures. When they be old and lame, they keepe them till they die. If a man catch or buy any quicke thing in other places, and bring it thither, they will giue him money for it, or other victuals, and keepe it in their Hospitalls, or let it goe. They will giue meat to the Antes. Their small money is Almonds, which oftentimes they eat. We passed thorow the Countrey of Gouren, where we found but few Villages, and almost all wildeernesse, and saw many Buffes, Swine, and Deere: grasse longer then a man, and very many Tygers. Satagam is a faire Citie (for a Citie of Moores) and very plentifull. In Bengala such is the estimation of Ganges, that they will fetch of it a great way off, though they haue good water neere: and if they haue not sufficient to drinke, they will sprinkle a little on them, and then they are well. From Satagam I travelled by the Country of the King of Tippaia, with whom the Mogor hath continuall warre. The Mogores, which be of the Kingdome of Recôn and Rame, be stronger then this King of Tippaia. Foure dayes journey from Couche is Botanter, and the Citie Bettis: the King is called Dermaine: the people are tall and strong: the Countrey great, three moneths journey, and hath in it high mountaines, one of which a man may see, five dayes journey off: Vpon these mountaines are people with eares of a spanne long: otherwise they account them Apes. Hither resort many Merchants out of China, and Tartaria. From Chatigan in Bengala, I went to Bacola, the King whereof is a Gentle, thence to Senepare, and after, to Simergan, where they will eat no flesh, nor kill no beast; and thence to Negrais in Pegu and Cosmin. Thus farre hath our Countryman led vs in the view of so many superstitions of these Bengalans, and their Northerly neighbours.

The Bengalans have a tradition or fable amongst them, That this River commed out of Paradise, which was proued by one of their Kings, who sent men vp the streame till they came to a pleasant aire, still water, and fragrant earth, and could row no further. Hence happily grew this conceit, That this water should wash away sinne, and that without it they cannot be saued. This River hath in it Crocodiles, which by water are no lesse dangerous then the Tygers by land, and both will assault men in their shippes. There is also a little small beast, which by his barking maketh the Tyger to runne away.

The King of Candecan caused a Iesuit to rehearse the Dialogue: who when he proued the Indians for their polytheisme, worshipping so many Pagodes: He said, that they obserued them but as, among them, their Saints were worshipped: to whom how fauour the Iesuits distinction of σωαία and λατρία was for his satisfaction, I leaue to the Readers iudgement. This King, and the others of Bacala and Arracan haue admitted the Iesuits into their Countries, and most of these Indian Nations.

In that part of Botanter, which is next to Lahor and the Mogor, the people are white, and Gentiles. Their garments are close girt to them, that a wrinkle or pleat is not to be seene, which they neuer put off, no not when they sleepe, as long as they are able to hang on: their head attire is like a sugar-loafe, sharpe at the toppe. They neuer wash their hands, lest, say they, so pure a creature, as the water, should be defiled. They haue but one wife; and when they haue two or three children, they liue as brother and sister. Widowers and widowes may not marrie a second time. They haue no Idols nor Townes, nor King, in those parts of Botanter. They haue their Sooth-sayers, which they aske counsell of. When any is dead, they resort vnto these Wisards, to know what is to be done with their dead. They search their Bookes; and as they say the word, they burne them, or burie them, or eat them, although they vsually feede not on mans flesh. They also vse dead mens skulls in stead of dishes, as in Thebes we haue obserued the like custome. They are liberall Almes-giuers.

Of the Great Mogor.

1599.

He Great Mogor (according to Boterui) hath vnder his subiection seuen and fortie Kingdomes, which lie betweene Indus and Ganges on the East and West, and betwixt Imaüs and the Ocean. He is called of the people the Great Mogor, for the same cause that the Ottoman Turkes are called Great. The stile of him that was King A, when the Iesuits imparted to vs these relations, was Mahumeth Zeladim Ekebar, King Mogor. His descent is from Tamerlan (worthily called Great) from whom he is reckoned the eight. His father was Emmaupaxda (as the Iesuits report) which being driuen to great straits by the Parthians, or Tartars, was driuen to aske aid of the Sophi, or Persian King; which he obtained, with condition of submitting himselfe to the Persian Religion. The Mogores speake the Turkish language. The Empire of this
Mogor

Mogor is exceeding great, containing the Countries of Bengala, Cambaia, Mendao, and others, comprehended by some vnder the name of Indufstan. This Mendao is said to be ten leagues in circuit, and that it cost the Mogor twelve yeares siege. Agra and Surpore are two Cities in his Dominion, great, and full of people, much exceeding London, and the whole space betwene is as a continuall populous Market. Many Kings he hath conquered, and many haue submitted themselves and their Seates voluntarily to his subiection. Twentie Gentile Kings are numbred <sup>b</sup> in his Court, which attend him, equalling the King of Calecut in power. Many others pay him tribute. Eleven great Rivers runne thorow his Dominions; Tapi, Haruada, Chambel, Iameno, Ganges: The other sixe are Indus, or Schind (as they call it) and Casamul, Cebcha, Ray, Chama, Reberth, tributaries to Indus. The whole Monarchie enuironeth nine hundred leagues. King Echeber <sup>c</sup> hath many Lords, each of which is to maintaine eight, ten, twelve, or fourteene thousand horse in readines for the warre, besides Elephants, of which in the whole Kingdome are said to be fiftie thousand. Himselfe can further bring of his owne into the Field fiftie thousand horse, and foot-men innumerable. To those Lords he alloweth certaine Prouinces for such militarie seruice; for he is Lord of all, nor hath any else possession of any thing, but at the will of the King. Once a yeare they appeare before the King, where they present a view of those their enioyned forces. Many millions of reuenue doe besides accrew vnto his coffers: yet his Port and Magnificence is not so great, as of many other Princes, either for Apparrell, Diet, or the Maiestie of his Court-seruice. He cannot write or reade, but heareth often the discourses of others, and Histories read before him, being of deepe iudgement, piercing wit, and wise fore-cast. In execution of Iustice he is very diligent, in so much, that in the Citie where he resideth, he heareth all causes himselfe, neither is any malefactor punished without his knowledge, himselfe giuing publike audience ten times every day: for which purpose he hath two wide Halls, and in them Royall Thrones, where he is attended with eight Counsellors, besides Notaries.

This King detesteth the Mahumetan Sect, which, as you heard, his father embraced for his aduantage; and therefore hath ouerthrowne their Moschees in his Kingdome, converting them to Stables, and more trusteth and employeth the Gentiles in his affaires then the Moores; whereupon many of them rebelled against him, and stirred vp the Prince of Quabul, his brother, to take Armes: against whom Echeber opposed himselfe, and caused him to retire into his owne Countrey. It is vncertaine <sup>d</sup> what Religion he is of, some affirming him to be a Moore, some a Gentile, some a Christian; some of a fourth Sect, and of none of the former. Indeed it appeareth that he wauereth, vncertaine which way of many to take, able to see the absurdities of the Arabian and Gentile profession, and not able to beleue the high mysteries of the Christian Faith, especially the Trinitie and Incarnation. He hath admitted the Iesuits there to preach, and would haue had them by miracle to haue proued those things to him, which they elsewhere so much boasting of Miracles) wisely refused. For he demanded that the Mahis, or Priests of the Mogores, and they, should by passing thorow the fire, make vail of their Faith. He hath many Bookes and Images, which the Christians there do see, and seemeth to haue great liking to them, vsing the same with great reuerence. But his Religion is the same (it seemeth) with that of Tamerlane his predecessor, to acknowledge One God, whom varietie of Sects and worshippings should best content. Hee caused <sup>e</sup> thirtie Infants to be kept (like that which is said of Psammetichus King of Egypt) setting certaine to watch and obserue, that neither their Nurses, nor any else, should speake vnto them, purposing to addiect himselfe to that Religion which they should embrace, whose Language these Infants should speake; which accordingly came to passe. For as they spake no certaine Language, so is not he sealed in any certaine Religion. He hath diuers Idols sometime brought before him, among which is one of the Sunne, which early euery morning hee worshippeth. Hee worshipped also the Image of Christ, setting it on the crowne of his head. Hee is addicted to a new Sect, as is said, wherein he hath his followers, which hold him for a Prophet. The people, which they haue by his Gold, addiecteth them to this new Prophet. <sup>f</sup> He professeth to worke miracles; by the water of his feet curing diseases. Many women make vowes vnto him, either to obtaine children, or to recouer the health of their children, which if they attaine, they bring him their yowed deuotions, willingly of him recoued. He hath three sonnes; Seier the eldest, which is honored with the title Shah, and called Seierigis, that is, the Soule, or Person, of Seier: he much fauoureth the Iesuits. The second, Pahari; Dan, or Daniel is the yongest: Some call them by other names. His presents are exceeding, besides his Tributes and Customes: for in eight dayes space these gifts amounted to a million of Gold; & almost daily he is presented with the like, and especially in a feast which he celebrateth, called Nerofa, great gifts are offered: so that his Treasures occupie the next roome to those of China.

Anno 1608: the Ascension an English Ship, hauing had the happines to be the first English visitor of the Red-sea or Arabian Gulfe, had heere the disaster, neere the coast of Cambaya, in the Mogors Dominion, to be cast away: The people were saved, and trauelled from Surrat to Brainport (a Citie greater then London, and of great trading) and thence to Agria; where they saw the beginning of a goodly monument, which the Great Mogor hath beene nine yeares in building, for his father, with five thousand work-men continually. The matter is fine Marble, the forme nine square, two English miles about, and nine stories in height: wheron the Mogor said (as a Poet reported to them) he would bestow an hundred millions of treasure. From hence the company of this shippe were dispersed, some passing thorow Persia to Bagdat, and thence to Aleppo for England: others the contrary way, as namely, William Nicols, which trauelled foure Moneths with three Iewes (from whom he receiued many indignities) to Mesulopatania a factorie of the Hollanders. Iohn Mildnall in his letter from Casbin in Persia, dated the third of October 1606. testifieth that he was at Labor, and thence went to Agria, to the Court of the Mogor, whom he presented with nine and twentie great horses, the best he could get in those parts, at fiftie pound, or threescore pound a horse, with diuers jewels, rings, and eare-rings. The Iesuites opposed themselves to his proceedings, slandering him as a spie, our Nation as theenes: which moued him to learne the Persian language, that he might tell his owne tale; and thus he obtained articles of trading.

Touching the Superstitions of this Kingdome, thus writeth Ioannes Oramus, in the Narration of this Kingdome. Not farre from the Citie Tihor is an Idoll, resembling a woman, which they call Nazar Coto, framed with two heads, and six or seven armes, and twelue or foureteene hands, one of which brandissheth a Speare, another a Club. Hereunto resort many Pilgrims to worship, and hereof they tell many miracles; as that many cut off their tongues, which are againe restored whole vnto them, but remaine mute. Some thinke our breath to be our Soule. Some affirme, That all things are the same thing. Some, that God onely hath a being, other things are shadowes and apparences. Some thinke all things, and some, the round Circle of the World, and some, themselves to be God. Almost all do hold the commigration of soules into the bodies of Beasts. They say the World shall last foure Ages; or Worlds, whereof three are past. The first lasted seuentee Laches (euery Lache containeth an hundred thousand yeares) and eight and twentie thousand yeeres. Men in that world liued ten thousand yeares, were of great stature of bodie, and great sinceritie of minde. Thrice in this space did God visibly appeare on the Earth: First in forme of a Fish, that hee might bring out the Booke of the Law of Brama, which one Causacar had hurled into the Sea: The second time in forme of a Snail, that he might make the Earth drie and solid: Lastly, like a Hogge, to destroy one that said he was God, or as others of them truly say, to recouer the Earth from the Sea, which had swallowed it. The second World lasted ten Laches, and ninetie two thousand and sixe yeares, in which men were as tall as before, and liued a thousand yeares. God did appeare foure times: First in a monstrous forme, the vpper part a Lion, the lower a Woman, to repress the pride of one which gaue out himselfe for God: Secondly, like a poore Bramane, to punish a proud King, that would by a new-deiufed Art sicke into Heauen: The third time, to be reuenged of another King, which had slaine a poore Religious man, hee came in the likenesse of a Man, named Paracaram; and lastly, like one Ram, the sonne of Giorcorat, which had slaine Paracaram. The third World continued eight Laches, and foure thousand thousand yeares, wherein men liued five hundred yeares; and God appeared twice in humane likenesse. The fourth age shall endure foure Lacbes, whereof are already passed foure thousand, sixe hundred, fourescore and twelue yeares. They say God will appeare in this Age. Others imagine, that he hath already appeared, and that E. . . is he. Some hold, that those ten Appearances were but creatures, which had received Diuine power. They themselves easily perceiue the vanitie of these Chima- ry, and monstrous opinions; but will not leaue them, lest they should (at the same time) lose both wealth and superstition together.

In the Countrey of the Mogor they haue many fine Carts, carued and gilded, with two wheeles, drawne with two little Bulls, about the bignesse of our great dogges in England, and they will runne with any Horse, and carrie two or three men in one of these Carts. They are couered with Silke, or fine cloth, and be in vse as our Coaches in England.

By the Letters of N. Pimenta 1600. it appeareth, that the Mogor had subdued the Indian Kings, of the Arabian Sea; Abdenagran, Idalcari, Massulapatan, and presented him to the puissant King of Narsinga, by the current of his Conquests; in the Chersonesus which extendeth to the South from Cambaja and Bengala, before mentioned.

CHAP. VII.

Of Cambaja, and the neighbouring Nations.

Cambaja is also called Guzarat, containing in length, from the River Bate to Circam, a Persian Region, five hundred miles of Sea-coast, being on either parts enuironed with the Kingdomes of Dulcinda and Sarga on the North; Mandao on the East; on the West, Nauracos, or the Gedrosians. The Sea and the Confinnes of Decan are the Southerly bounds. It hath in it, by estimation, threescore thousand Populations, or inhabited places, watered with many streames; the chiefe whereof is Indus, which diuideth it in the middle, running from Caucasus, or Naugrocor, and after nine hundred miles journey, with two nauigable mouths disemboquing it selfe into the Ocean. This Countrey is very fertile, not yeelding to any other in India, in the fruites which the Earth and Trees bring forth, besides their store of Elephants, Gemmes, Silke, Cotton, and such like. The people are of an Olive-colour, and goenaked, except about their priuie parts. They eate no Flesh, but Rice, Milke, Butter, and other life-lesse creatures. The Inhabitants are, for the most part, Gentiles; and so were their Kings, vntill the Mahumetane Superstitions preuailed. There are within the Land, People called Reibuti, which are the naturall Nobles of the Kingdom, chased by the Moores to the Mountaines, whence they make offencions and spoyles in the Countrey, and the Cambajans pay them tribute, that they might liue in peace. Their chiefe Sea-Townes are Daman, Bandora, Cumra, Rauellum, Bazuinum; and within Land, Cambaja, Madabar, Campanel, Basra, &c.

a Maginus.b *Mass. lib. 4.*c *Joseph. Ind. Lib. 1. l. 1. 27.*d L. Vertom. lib. 4. cap.

Cambaja hath bestowed the name on the whole Kingdom, which they call the Indian Cairo, for the excellencie thereof: it standeth three myles from Indus. The Tides heere increase not, as with vs, at the full, but in the decrease of the Moone they are at the highest. Of this River Indus, Ptolemy and Arrianus in his Periplus of the Erythraean Sea reckon seven mouths or entrances into the sea, and Thenes (I know not what Frier-like and Iyer-like boldnesse) nameth seuen at this day: but Arrianus saith in those times six of the seuen were ouergrowne, & but one nauigable. But Dionysius Periegetes, Strabo, and the other Arrianus which writ the life of Alexander, ascribe two vnto it, which is confirmed by the Portugals. Arrianus hath in his eighth booke largely described the Voyage of Nearchus and Onesicritus, from this River along the coast into the Persian Gulfe, employed by Alexander the Great. It is nor an hundred and threescore yeares since Machamus, a Moore, expelled the Canan King.

This Machamus serveth mention for one thing, wherein the Sonne hath longer beheld his like: Hee so accustomed himselfe to poysons, that no day passed wherein he took not some; for else he himselfe had died, saith Barbosa; as it saith with Asiaticus, or Opium, the use whereof killeth such as neuer took it, and the distill such as haue. And beyond that which wee reade of Mithridates in the like poyson; his Nature was transformed into so venomous a habit, that if he did meane to put any of his Nobles to death, hee would cause them to be set naked before him, and chrowing certaine fruits in his mouth, which they call Cheoselos and Tambolos, with little made of shells, by spitting vpon him, in one halfe houre depriv'd him of life; if a Flie flew vpon his hand, it would presently fall off dead. Neither was his loue to be preferred to his hatred, or with women was his dealing lesse deadly. For he had three or foure thousand Concubines, of whom none liued to see a second Sonne, after hee had carnally knowne them. His Mustaches (or haire of his upper lippe) was so long, that he bound it vpon his head, as women doe with an haire-lace; and his beard was white, reaching to his waste. Euery day when hee arose, and when hee died, fiftie Elephants were brought into the Pallace, to doe him reuerence on their knees, accompanied with Trumpets, and other Musicke.

lib. 11. cap. 13.

Celins Rhodignus mentions the like of a maid, thus nourished with poyson, her spittle (and other humours comming from her) being deadly: such also as lay with her carnally, presently dying. Amicenna hath also a like example of a man, whose nature, infected with a stronger venome, poysoned other venomous creatures, if any did bite him. And when a greater Serpent was brought for triall, he had by the biting thereof a two-dayes Feuer; but the Serpent died. The other did not harm him.

g Maff. lib. 11.

Mamudius, the Successor of King Machamus, was a great enemy to the Portugals. Badurinus succeeded in State and affection, and exceeded in greatnes and ambition. He invaded S. Mandao, and Sanga, where he besieged Citor, then governed by a wife woman, which not able to hold out longer against him, fled, and left the peoples in a forlorne plight, who in a desperat resolution (like Sardanapalus) heaping vp their Treasures, set fire thereto, and then cast themselves therein. This fire continued three daies, and consumed threescore and ten thousand persons.

h Rel. Reg. Mog.

Hence Badurinus triumphantly marched against the Mogor, whom Maffius calleth Miramudius; (it seemeth to be Echbars Grand-father, whom some call Aburxa, famous for his Indian victories) with an Armie of an hundred and fiftie thousand horse, whereof thirtie thousand were barded; and five hundred thousand footmen: of great Brazen Ordinance, a thousand; whereof foure Basilikes were draine (such was their weight) by so many hundred yokes of Oxen: with Shot and Powder hee laded five hundred Waynes, and as many with Gold and Siluer, to pay his Soldiers. These Forces, with this prouision, might rend the Aire with thunders, might make the Earth to shake with terrour, might drie and drinke vp Rivers of water, might frame another fierie Element, of Arts inuention, but could not either vanquish the Mogor, or saue Badurinus from a double overthrow, first at Doceri, near to Indoia, where he loseth his Tents and Treasures, and shauing his beard, fleeth to Diu, in which, that the Portugals might bee engaged in the same warre, hee gave them leaue to erect a Fortresse: A thing of such moment vnto them, that John Aluissius (confined before vnto India, for crimes objected) thought, by being the first messenger thereof in Portugall, to purchase his libertie: whereof hee might well be reputed worthie, who in a little Vessell, scarce eightene foot long, and five wide, with vndaunted courage contemning that wide, long, and tempestuous Ocean, arrived with his small companie, great newes, and greater admiration at Lisbon. Badurinus after altering his minde, and therein entertaining a treacherous project against the Portugals, coloured the same with kindnesse, and he (which feared all men no lesse then he was feared as guiltie to his owne tyrannie, which sometime made Darius of a King a Barbar, and now this, a King of others, and his owne Cooke, trusting no man to dresse his meat) aduentured to visit the Portugal Viceroie in his ships, professing great friendship with great dissimulation, and by a meane Mariner, at his returne was thine; whereupon the whole Island submitted it selfe to the Portugal yoke. And because we haue in this Chapter mentioned so many wonders, let this also haue place among (if not aboue) the rest, which presently happened <sup>k</sup>. Whiles the Portugals were busie in their buildings, a certaine Bengalan <sup>l</sup> came to the Gouverneur, which had liued, as he affirmed, three hundred thirtie five yeares. The old men of the Country testified, That they had heard their ancestors speake of his great age, and himselfe had a sonne fourescore and ten yeares old, and not at all booke-learned, yet was a speaking Chronicle of those passed times. His teeth had sometimes fallen out, others growing in their places; and his beard, after it had bene very hoarie, by degrees returned into his former blacknesse. About an hundred yeares before this time he had altered his Pagon Religion into the Arabian or Moorish. For this his miraculous age, the Sultans of Cambaia had allowed him a stipend to liue on, the continuance of which hee now sought, and did obtaine of the Portugals.

Alamandius, Successour to Badarius, fought with all his forces to driue these new Lords out of Diu, as Solyman had done before, by a Nauie and Armie sent thither, but both in vaine: of which Warres, Damianus à Goes <sup>m</sup> hath written diuers Commentaries. But this whole Countrey is now subiect to the Mogor. It was, in Alexanders time, peopled by the Massani, Sodra, or Sabraca, Prasta, and Sangada, as Ortelius hath placed them, where Alexander (as in diuers other places he had done) erected a Citie of his owne name, called Alexandria. Daman, another Key of this Bay, and entrance of the River Indus into the Sea, fell to the Portugals share.

The Land of Cambaia <sup>n</sup> is the fruitfullest in all India, which causeth great trafficke of Indians, Portugals, Persians, Arabians, Armenians, &c. The Guzarates, or Cambaians, are the subtillest Merchants in all India. They haue <sup>o</sup> amongst them many Histories of Darius and Alexander, which sometime were Lords of this Indian Province. The Portugals <sup>p</sup> haue at diuers times conquered diuers of the chiefe Townes in this Kingdome, some whereof they keepe still. The women in Diu, by arte die their teeth blacke, esteeming themselves so much the more beautifull, and therefore go with their lippes open, to shew the blacknesse of their teeth, drawing away the couer of their lippes, as if they were lipplesse, giuing the prize of Beautie to a double deformity, blacknesse, and a mouth O bellis wide. When a Cambaian dieth, they burne his body, and distribute the ashes vnto the foure Elements (of which man consisteth) part to the Fire, part to the Aire, to the Water also and Earth their due portions, as Balbi hath observed. The wiues are burned with their husbands, being addressed thereunto in pompous attire.

Six Leagues from Decan is a Hill, out of which the Diamond is taken. This hill is layd with a Garrison, and walled about.

Gurim ab Horto thus writeth <sup>q</sup>, That about three hundred yeares before his time, a mightie King in the Kingdome of Dely, depriued the Gentiles of the Kingdome of Balaguate. At the same time the Moores dispossessed the Reisbuti of Cambaya. These Reisbuti in Cambaya (once the Naturall Lords) and the Venezaras and Colles, of like condition in Balaguate, to this day exercise robberies in those parts: the Kingdome of Decan to these, and to the first the Kingdome of Cambaya, paying tribute, to be freed from the same. And the Kings suffer them, that they may share with them. The Kingdome of Dely is Northerly, subiect to cold and frosts, as in Europe. The Mogors had possessed this Kingdome, but a certaine Bengalan (rebellling against his Master) slew him, warped his State, and by force of warre added this also to his Dominion; he was called Xaholam <sup>r</sup>. This King made his sisters sonne <sup>s</sup> his Successor, who was much addicted to Foreinners: he diuided his Kingdome into twelue parts, or Prouinces, ouer which he set so many Captaines: I daleam, from Angidaua to Cifarda: from thence to Nagrona, Nizamaluco: Ouere Balaguate, or the vp-Hill Countrey (for Bala in the Persian Language signifieth the toppe, and Guate a Hill) Imadmaluco, and Catalmaluco, and Perido, &c.

These all rebelled, and captiued Daquem their King at Beder, the chiefe Citie of Decan.

can, and shared his Kingdome amongst themselves, and some Gentiles, partners in the conspiracie. They were all foreiners but Nizamaluco. This and the other names, before mentioned, were titles of honor given them, with their Offices, by the King, corrupted by the vulgar in pronouncing. Idalcum is Adel-ham; Adel in the Persian Language, signifieth Iustice; Ham is the Tartarian appellation, signifying a Prince, or King (which name might well be the Reliques of the Tartarian Conquests in those parts) so Adelham is, King of Iustice. Neza in the Persian (which Saalyer faith is of like extent in the East, as Latine in the West) is a Launce: Maluco signifieth the Kingdome. Neza, or Nizamaluco, the Speare or Launce of the Kingdome. So Cumaluco the Tower of the Kingdome, Imadmaluco, the Throne of the Kingdome, &c. Nizamaluco is also called Nizamoxa: which Xa, or Scha, is a Persian title (signifying as Monsieur in France, Don in Spaine) and given by Ismael the Sophi, and Tamas his sonne, to all those Kings that would communicate in their Sect, which Nizamoxa onely yeilded to. Other of them made shew, but soone recanted. Thus saith Garcias.

The Religion in Cambaia is partly Moorish, partly Heathenish. Vertamann is author, that they worship not Idols, or Pagodes. Others report, That this way, and others, they are exceeding religiously deuoted. They obserue a strict kinde of fasting, which lasteth with some eight dayes, with others fifteene, twentie, or thirtie dayes: in all which space they eate not a bit; onely, when they thirst, drinke water. One could not see when to make an end of this his penance, till his left eye fell out of his head, in both had done before out of his heart. In Cambaia they had one Bramene in such reputation of holinesse and honor, that they would salute him before they medled with their worldly affaires. One affirmed to this Iesuit, That if his Bramene should command him to distribute all his goods to the poore, he would doe it, yea, he would lay downe his life at his command.

On the eight day of Iannarie, in that Citie, were given in almes twentie thousand Pardawes (which is in value about a Flemish Dollar; ) one man had given five thousand thereof, another three thousand, another fifteene hundred. The cause was, because that day (as their Bramenes affirmed) the Sunne departed from Sur to Horte. Of their Pilgrimages is spoken before; some Eastward to Ganges; some Westward to Mecca, to wit, the Moores; not men alone, but women also: and because Mahomet hath forbidden all vnmarried women this holy iourney, they will marrie before they set forth, and dissolue the same marriage againe, after their returne. Hereby they thinke to purchase merit with God.

I went one day (saith Pinnerus) to the publike Hospitall, which the Citizens of Cambaia had founded for all kindes of Birds, to cure them in their sicknesse. Some Peacocks were there incurable, and therefore might haue beene expelled the Hospitall. But (alacke for pitie of so ruefull an accident) a Hawke had beene admitted thither for the cure of his lame legges, which being whole, he inhospitally slew many of these co-hospitall weaker Fowles, and was therefore expelled this Bird-Colledge by the Master thereof. For men they had not an Hospitall, that were thus hospitall to Fowles.

They haue certaine Religious persons, called Vertas, which liue in a Colledge together, and when I went to their House, they were about fiftie in number. They wear white cloth, were bare-headed, and shauen; if that word might be applied to them, who pull off their haire on their heads and faces, leauing only a little on their Crowne. They liue on almes, nor receiue they but the surplusage of the daily food of him that giueth them. They are wiselesse. The Orders of their Sect are written in a booke of the Guzarates writing. They drinke their water hot, not for Physicke, but deuotion, supposing that the water hath a soule, which they should slay, if they dranke the same vnlodden. For the same cause they beare in their hands certaine little brushes, with which they sweepe the floore, before they sit downe, or walke, lest they should kill the soule of some Worme, or other small creature, I saw their Prior thus doing.

The Generall of this Order is said to haue an hundred thousand men vnder his canonically obedience, and is newly chosen every yeare. I saw amongst them little boyes, of eight or nine yeares old, resembling the countenances of Europe; rather then of their parents consecrated to this Order. They had all in their mouths a cloth four fingers broad, let thorow both their eares in a hole, and brought backe againe thorow their eares. They would not shew me the cause; but I perceived it was, lest some goat or flie should enter thither, and so be slaine. They teach that the world was made many hundred thousand yeares agoe: and that God did then send three and twentie Apostles, and now hath sent the foure and twentieth in this third age, two thousand yeares since, from which time they haue had writing, which before they had not.

The same Author in another Epistle saith, That the most of the Inhabitants of Cambaia are Bramanes. They eat no flesh, nor kill anything, yea they redeeme beasts and birds maimed or sicke, and carry them to their hospitals to be cured. In Guzarat I haue scene many Gioghi, a religious order of Monks, which yeeld to none in Penance and Povertie. They goe naked in cold weather: they sleepe on the dung-hills vpon an heap of ashes, with which they couer their head and face. I saw the place where one of these Gioghi kept in the middle of the Citie Amadeba, to whom, in conceit of honour, resorted more numbers of people, then to the shores of Lisbone, at the returne of the Indian Fleet. This Gioghi was sent for by the Prince Sultan Morad, sonne of the Mogor, and refused to come, bidding that the Prince should come to him: It is enough that I am holy, or a Saint to this end. Whereupon, the Prince caused him to be apprehended, and (being soundly whipped) to be banished.

This people killeth not their kine, but nourisheth them as their mothers. I saw at Amadeba, when a cow was ready to die, they offered her fresh grasse, and draue the flies from her: and some of them gaue this attendance two or three dayes after, till she was dead. A league and a halfe from this Citie, I saw a certaine Camiterium or burying-place, then which I had neuer scene a fairer sight, wherein had bene buried one Ca-zar, the Master of a King of Guzarat, who had erected this Fabrike, and three other were buried in another Chappell. The whole worke and pauement was of Marble, containing three lles: in one whereof, I told foure hundred and fortie pillars, with their chapters and bases of Corinthian worke, very royall and admirable. On one side was a lake, greater then the Rozzio at Lisbone; and that building was curiously framed with faire windowes, to looke into the lake.

Balbi telleth of a certaine Temple at Cape Bombain, not farre from Chaul, which is cut out of a rocke: ouer the said Temple grow many Tamarinds, and vnder it is a spring of running water, whereof they can finde no bottome. It is called Alefante, is adorned with many Images, a receptacle of Bats, and supposed the worke of Alexander the Great, as the Period of his Peregrination. And hereto agreeth the report of Arrianus in his Periplus, of many memorialls and monuments of Alexanders Expedition to these parts, as old Chappells, Altars, Camping-places, and great Pits. These he men-tioneth about Minnagara, which Ortelius in his Mappe placeth here-away.

Limfcboten affirmeth the same things of their Pythagorean errour, and addeth that they sometimes buy fowles or other beasts of the Portugals, which meant to haue dressed them, and let them flie or runne away. In the high-ways also and woods they set pots with water, and cast corne or other graine vpon the ground, to feed the birds and beasts. And (to omit their charitable Hospitalls before mentioned) if they take a flea or a louse, they will not kill it, but put it in some hole or corner in the wall, and so let it goe: and you can doe them no greater iniurie, then to kill it in their presence, which with all entreatie they will resist, as being a hainous sinne, to take away the life of that, to which God hath imparted both soule and bodie; and where words will not preuaile, they will offer money. They care no Radishes, Onyons, Garlike, or any kinde of herbe, that hath red colour in it, nor egges, for they thinke there is bloud in them. They drinke not wine, nor vse vineger, but onely water. They would rather starue, then eat with any, but their countrey-men: as it happened when I sailed from Goa to Cochim with them in a Portugal shippe, when they had spent all their store, the time falling out longer then they made account of; they would not once touch our meat. They wash themselves euery time they eate, or ease themselves, or make water.

water. Vnder their haire they haue a starre vpon their foreheads, which they rub eu-rie morning with a little white sanders tempered with water, and three or foure grains of Rice strong it; which the Bramanes also doe as a superstitious ceremonie of their law. They sit on the ground in their houses, vpon mattes or carpets, and so they ease leaving their stauies (which are piked and hooked) at the doore: for which cause the heelles of their shooes are seldome pulled vp, to saue labour of vndoing them.

The Moores amongst them will sometimes abuse the superstition of these Cam-bayans to their owne couetousnesse, bringing some Worme, Rat, or Sparrow, and threatning to kill the same, so to prouoke them to redeeme the life thereof at some high price. And likewise if a malefactor be condemned to death, they will purchase his life of the Magistrate, and sell him for a slave. The Moores will sometimes make semblance, as if they would kill themselves, that these foolish Guzzarates may let them in like sort. They will goe out of the path, if they light on an Ant-hill, lest they might happily treade on some of them: they suppe by day-light, lest their candlelight should occasion the death of some gnaw or flie. And when they must needs use a candle, they keepe it in a lathorne for that cause. If lice doe much annoy them, they call to them certaine religious and holy men, after their account: and the said Observants will take vpon them all those lice which the other can finde, and put them on their head, there to nourish them. But yet for all this loose scruple, they stick not at con-nage by false weights, measures and coyne, nor at vsurie and lies.

Some are said to be so zealous in their Idol-seruice, as to sacrifice their liues in their honor: whereunto they are perswaded by the preachings of their Priests, as the most acceptable deuotion. Many offer themselves, which being brought vpon a scaffold, after certaine ceremonies, put about his necke an iron collar, round without, but within very sharpe: from which hangeth a chaine downe his breast, into which, sitting downe he putteth his feet, and whiles the Priest muttereth certaine words, the same before the people with all his force stretcheth out his feet, and cuts off his head: their reward is, that they are accounted Saints.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Indian Nations betwixt Cambaia and Malabar, and their Religions.

He mightie Riuer of Indus and Ganges, paying their fine to the Lords of waters, the Ocean, almost vnder the very tropike of Cancer, doe (as it were) betwixt their waterie armes present into that their Mother bosome this large Cheersonesw; A Countrey, full of Kingdomes, cities, people, and (our dueft taske) superstitious customs. As Italy is diuided by the Apennine, so is this by the hills which they call Gat, quite thorow to the Cape Comori, which not onely haue entred league with many islets of the sea, to diuide the soile into many Signories and Kingdomes, but with the Aire and Natures higher officers, to dispense with the ordinarie orders, and established statutes of Nature, at the same time, vnder the same eleuation of the Sunne, diuiding to Summer and Winter their seasons and possessions. For whereas Cold is banished out of these Countreies (except on the toppes of some hills) and altogether prohibited to approach so neere the Court and presence of the Sunne; and therefore their Winter and Summer is not reckoned by heate and cold, but by the fairenesse and foulenesse of weather, which in those parts diuided the yeare by equall proportions: at the same time, when on the West-part of this Peninsula, betweene that ridge of Mountaines and the Sea, it is after their appellation Summer, which is from September till April, in which time it is alwaies clear sky, without once (or very little) raining; on the other side the hills, which they call the coast of Choromandell, it is their Winter; enery day and night yeelding abundance of raines, besides those terrible thunders, which both begin and end their Winter. And from April till September, in a contrarie vicissitude, on the Western

Western part is winter, and on the Eastern summer; insomuch that in little more then one league journey in some place, as where they crosse the hills to St. Thomas, on the one side of the hill you ascend with a faire summer, on the other you descend attended with a stormie winter. The like, saith Linschoten, happeneth at the Cape Rosalgate, in Arabia, and in many other places of the East.

Their Winter also is more fierce then ours, euery man providing against the same, as if he had a voyage of so many moneths to passe by Sea, their shippes are brought into harbour, their houses can scarce harbour the inhabitants against the violent stormes, which choake the Rivers with sands, and make the Seas vnnavigable. I leave the causes of these things to the further scanning of Philosophers: the effects and effects thereof are strange. The Sea roareth with a dreadfull noyse, the Windes blowe with a certaine course from thence: the people haue a melancholike season, which they passe away with play. In the Summer the Winde bloweth from the land, beginning at Midnight, and continuing till Noone, neuer blowing above tenne leagues into the Sea, and presently after one of the clocke vntill midnight, the contrary winde bloweth, keeping their set times, whereby they make the Land temperate, the heate otherwise would be vnmeasurable. But this change commonly causeth diseases, Fluxes, Feuers, Vomitinges, in dangerous (and to very many, in deadly) manner, as appeareth at Goa, where, in the Kings Hospitall (which is onely for white men) there die five hundred in a yeare. Here you may see both the North and South Stars; and little difference or none is found in the length of day and night throughout the yeare.

Dely is the next Kingdome to Cambaia, now not the next, but the same; the mountaines which before diuided it, not prohibiting the Mogors forces to annexe it to his Crowne. Of it is spoken before in the Chapter of Cambaya, as also of Decan, which lieth along the coast, betwixt the Rivers Bate and Aliga two hundred and fiftie miles. Here was, as is said, sometime a Moore King; who, leading a voluptuous and idle life, by his Captaines was dispossessed of his State: the one of these was called Idalgan; whose feat royall is Visapore, who in the yeare 1572. incamped before Goa, which the Portugals had taken from him, with an Armie of seuentie thousand foot, and five and thirtie thousand horse, two thousand Elephants, and two hundred and fiftie peeces of Artillerie. The other was Nizamalucco, which resideth in Danaget, and besieged Chaul, with not much lesse forces, against a Captaine of the Venazary, which are people that liue on spoile, as the Resbuti in Cambaia, the Belemi in Dely, Canara or Concam, seemeth to haue bene a part of Decan, but is possessed by the King of Narsinga, whose state is on the East side of the Mountaines. It hath in it the Coast-townes of Onor, Batticalla, Mayander and Mangalor, famous for traffique, but eclipsed by the Portugals neighbourhood. In these parts sometimes reigned a Bengalan Prince, which diuided his state among his Captains, which originally for the most part were Slaves, that he might ease himselfe of the cares of Gouvernement. And as he imported to them great places, so did he likewise honourable names, calling one Idalgan, which signifieth the King of Iustice; another Nisamalucco, that is, the Speare of the Kingdome; another Cotamalucco, the strength of the Kingdome; another Imademalucco, the pillar of the Kingdome; another Malique Urido, the keeper of the Kingdome, &c. But he that should haue bene the keeper of the Kingdome, was made the keeper of the King, whom these his Slaves and Officers by ioynt conspiracie had taken prisoner at Bider, his chiefe towne; the countrey of Decan falling to those two which we before named, and the rest to the rest.

Goa is the seat of the Viceroy, and of the Arch-Bishop, and of the Kings Counsell for the Indies, and the Staple of all Indian commodities. It standeth in a little Island, called Tizuarin, nine miles long, and three broad. Bardes on the North, and Salfette are both in like subiection to the Portugals; the King letting them to farme, and employing the rents to the payment of the Arch-Bishop, Cloysters, Priests, Viceroy, and other his Officers. Salfette is nine miles from Goa, being a Peninsula twentie miles about, containyng fixtie fixe villages or townes, and about fourescore thousand Inhabitants, giuen by Idalgan to the Portugals. Antonius Norogna the Viceroy destroyed therein therein two hundred Temples, some of them sumptuous 1567. and many Pagodes, which caused them to rebell, and afterwards they slew some of the Iesuites and their companie.

There dwell in Goa of all Nations and Religions. The Governement is as in Portugall. Only publique vse of forreine Religion is forbidden them: but in their houses priuately, or on the maine land, they may practise the same. The Portugalls many of them are married with Indian women, and their posteritie are called Mestizos, and in the third degree, differ nothing in colour and fashion from naturall Indians. Of the Portugalls they reckon two sorts, married men and souldiers, which is a general name to all Bacheliers, although they are at their own command. Of these are many knights, and are called Canalhiero Fidalgo: for if a man doe any thing worth reckoning, presently his Captaine imparteth this honour to him; whereof they much boast themselves, albeit that this Knight-hood had descended to Cookes boyes. Many of the Portugalls liue onely by their slaues. They vse great ceremonie or pride (which you will call it) in their behauiour: the particulars whereof see Linschoten, that themselves amongst them, teach you.

29, 30, 31, 32.

Besides both Abassine and Armenian Christians, Jewes, and Moores, here are many Heathens. The Moores eat all things but Swines flesh, and dying are buried like the Jewes: The Heathens, as Deccanijns, Guzarates, and Canarijns, are burnt to ashes, and some women aline are buried with the Gentlemen or Bramenes, their husbands. Some will eat nothing that had life; some all but the flesh of Kine, or Buffles. Most of them pray to the Sunne and Moone: yet all acknowledge a God that made all things, and ruleth them, after this life tending to all according to their workes. As for the Idols or Pagodes, they worship them, saith Balby, even as we adore in the Images that which they represent vnto vs. A good Argument for Image-worship.

Bal. c. 22.

But they haue Pagodes, which are Images cut and framed most vgly, and like monstrous Diuels, to whom they pray and offer: and to Saints which here haue liued holy, and are now intercessors for them. The Diuell often answereth them out of those Images, to whom also they offer, that he should not hurt them; They present their Pagode (when a marriage is to be solemnized) with the Brides mayden-head; two of her nearest kinswomen forcing her vpon the Iuorie pinne or member of stone (leaving the blood there for monument) of that Diuellish Idoll: the husband herein applauding his happinesse. Not much vnlike that beastly custome of the Roman Dames, which being newly married were caused to sit on Priapus his! But who can honestly name that which they dishonestly doe? They haue for the most part a custome to pray vnto the first thing they meete withall in the morning, and all that day after they pray vnto it; be it Hogge, or any other thing. But if they first meete with a Crow (whereof there are great store) they will not for any thing stirre out againe that day, after so vnluckie signe. They pray likewise to the New Moone, saluting her first appearance on their knees. They haue Sagos or Hermites, reputed very holy. Many Iuglers also & Witches, which shew diuellish trickes. They neuer goe forth without praying. Every hill, cliffe, hole, or denne, hath his Pagodes in it, with their furnaces hard by them, and their Cisternes alwayes full of water, with which euery one, that passeth by, washeth his feete, and then worshipping and offereth Rice, Egges, or what else their deuotion will afford: which the Bramene eateth. When they are to goe to Sea, they will feast their Pagode with Trumpets, Fires, and hangings, fourteene dayes before they set forth, to obtaine a good voyage: and as long after their returne; which they vse to doe in all their feasts, marriages childe-births, and their haruest and seed-seasons. I haue seene in Mr. Hakluytes hands a large Treatise written by Don Duart de Meneses of the customes, Courts, Officers, expenses, and other remarkable obseruations, for knowledge of the Portugall state and affaires in the East Indies. He saith that the Iland Tisore (so he writeth it) in which Goa standeth, hath thirtie two townes and villages therein. The Iesuites Colledge in Salfete enioyeth the rents before belonging to the Pagodes, being two hundred and fiftie pound yearly, besides their glebe-lands of Rice-grounds, and other commodities: also the parishes subiect to them are worth two hundred ninetie eight pounds and sixteene shillings. In Goa they receiue seuen hundred and fiftie thirteen pound twelve shillings and six pence per ann. and their yearly presents amount to three hundred seventie five pound. In Cochin also they haue three hundred thirtie seven pound. The Monasterie of St. Francis in Goa hath rents six hundred and thirtie pound and ten shillings, and one hundred fortie three pound twelve shillings and six pence in other duties. The Dominicans receiue five hundred pound, and fourscore and ten pound in other rights. The Friars of St. Augustin fourscore pound twelve shillings and six pence. The Inquisition one hundred three pound and ten shillings (besides the rents of the Hospitall one thousand eight hundred seventie five pound, and an Almes-house for Widowes and Orphans two hundred and fiftie pound.) These things I thought worthy relation, not so much to satisfie the curious, as to answer the ordinarie bragges of that world-wandering generation, pretending mortification to the world, strictnesse of their vow, loue to religion, and compassion to the poore Pagans; when as they haue such golden chains to draw them thither. Whereunto if we adde the bountie of Christians in those parts vnto these prettend d. holy fantasies, their gains from the pearle-fishings, the vowes of such as become of their societie, and many other wayes accruing to their coffers, together with those house-tries and manies, wherewith euery sence in varietie is here presented; we may see the world almost silent argument to lead them about the world, whatsoeuer other pretences notwithstanding. But this hath beene learnedly handled against them by others already: amongst others and before others, our Most Reuerend and learned Metropolitan in vn. making the reasons of Hill for Poperie, hath shewed both this our Hill to be an ignorant Mountebanke, and our Iesuites in India rather enrichers of their owne societie in Europe with golde, pearle, spice, and other Indian wares, then of those Asian Profiters with sound European Christianitie. For me, what I can shew against this their allegation, belongeth to another taske.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Indian Bramenes, Canarijns, Corumbijns and Decarijns.

THe Indian Heathens haue a custome, that no man may change his fathers trade, but must succeed in the same, and marry a wife also of the same Tribe. The Brachmanni, or, as they are at this day called, the Bramenes (who haue their shops, as well as other Merchants, throughout the Cities) are of best reputation, and weare in signe of their profession (from the shoulder crosse vnder the arme, vpon their naked bodie, downe to the girdle) three strings like scaling threds: which for their liues they will not nor may by their vow put off. They are naked, sauing that about their middles they haue a cloth bound to hide their priuities. And sometime when they go abroad, they cast a thinne gowne ouer them. Vpon their heads they weare a white cloth wound twice or thrice about therewith, to hide their haire, which they neuer cut off, but weare it long, and turned vp as the women doe. They haue commonly hanging at their eares, gold-rings. They are very subtile in writing and accounts, making of the simple Indians beleue what they will. Whatsoeuer they meete first with in the streets, they pray to all day after.

When the Bramenes die, all their friends assemble together, and make a hole in the ground, in which they throw much sweet wood, spices, rice, corne, and oyle. Then lay therein the dead bodie; his wife followeth with musicke, and many of her neerest friends, singing praises in commendation of her husbands life, encouraging her to follow him, which accordingly she doth. For, parting her jewels among her friends, which sheerefull countenance shee leapes into the fire, and is presently couered with wood and oyle, whereby she is quickly dead, and with her husbands bodie burned to ashes. And if it chanceth (which is seldome) that any woman refuseth this horrible combustion; they cut the haire cleane off from her head: neyther may she after that weare a Jewell, but is accounted a dishonest woman. This custome is (as may appeare) very ancient, and supposed to haue beene ordained, because of the libidinous disposition of the Indian women, which for their lusts would poyson their husbands.

The Bramenes obserue fasting dayes with so great abstinence, that they eat nothing that day, and sometime not in three or foure dayes together. They tell many miracles of their Pagodes. They holde the immortalitie of the soule, both of beasts and men, and that so often mentioned Pythagorean succession, and renewing of mens soules in beasts; and contrariwise. They by the direction of the Diuell (the author of their miracles) frame such deformed statues to their Idols.

The Indian women in Goa, when they goe forth, haue but one cloth about their bodies, which couereth their heads, and hangeth downe to the knees, otherwife naked. They haue rings thorow their noses, about their legges, toes, neckes, and armes, and seuen or eight bracelets vpon their handes (according to their abilitie) of glasse or other metall. When the woman is seuen years olde, and the man nine, they marrie, but come not together till the woman is able to beare children. Mr. Fitch mentioneth the solemnitie of these marriages, and the cause to be the burning of the mother when the father is dead, that they might haue a father-in-law to bring them vp.

To leaue Goa with this Island. The Canaras and Decanijns weare their beards and haire long, without cutting, as the Bramenes. They except from soode Kine, Hoggies, and Buffles. They account the Oxe, Cowe, or Buffle to be holy, which they haue commonly in the house with them, and they besmeere, stroke and handle them with all friendship in the world; feede them with the same meate they eat themselves; and when the beasts ease themselves, they holde vnder their handes, and throw the dung away: they sleepe with them in their houses, hereby thinking to doe God seruice. In other things they are as the Bramenes. For those are the Laitie, these are the Spirituality. When they take their oathes, they are set within a circle of ashes, on the pavement, and laying a few ashes on their heads, the other on their breasts, sweare by their Pagodes to tell the truth.

The Canarijns and the Corumbijns are the rustickes, and countrey-husbandmen, the most miserable people of all India: their Religion is much as the other. They couer onely their priuities, and eat all things except Kine, Oxen, Buffles, Hogs, and Hens flesh. Their women binde a cloth about their Nauell, which reacheth halfe way the thigh: they are deliuered alone by themselves, without other helpe: their children are brought vp naked, till they be seuen or eight yeares olde, without any trouble about them, except washing them in a little colde water, and liue to be an hundred yeares olde, without head-ache or losse of teeth. They nourish a tuft of haire on their crowne, cutting the rest. When the man is dead, the wife breaketh her glasse-jewels, and cutteth off her haire; his bodie is burnt. They eat so little, as if they liued by the syt: and for a pennie would endure whipping.

In Salsette are two Temples, or holes rather of Pagodes, renowned in all India: one of which is cut from vnder a hill, of hard stone, and is of compasse within, about the bignesse of a Village of foure hundred houses: with many Galleries or Chambers of these deformed shapes, one higher then another, cut out of the hard rocke. There are in all three hundred of these Galleries. The other is in another place, of like matter and forme. It would make a mans haire stand vp right to enter amongst them. In a little Island called Pory, there standeth a high hill, on the top whereof is a hole, that goeth downe into the hill, digged and carued out of the hard rocke; within, as large as a great Cloyster, round beset with shapes of Elephants, Tygres, Amazons, and other like, workemanly cut, supposed to be the Chinois handy-worke. But the Portugalls haue now ouerbrowne these Idol-Temples. Would God they had not set new Idols in the roome; with like practise of offerings and Pilgrimages, as did these to their Pagodes.

Once I went into a Temple of stone, in a Village, and found nothing in it, but a great Table that hung in the middle of the Church, with the Image of a Pagode thereon painted, hellishly disfigured with many hornes, long teeth out of the mouth down to the knees, and beneath his nauell with such another tusked and horned face. Vpon the head stood a triple crowne, not much vnlike the Popes. It hung before a wall, which which made a partition from another chamber; like a Quier, close without any light: in the middle whereof was a little doore, and on each side of it a furnace within the wall with certaine holes, thereby to let the smoke or fume of the fire to enter into that place, when any offering should be made. Whereof we found there some Rice, Corne, Fruits, Herbes, and such like. There issued thence such a filthy smoke and stinke, that it made the place blacke, and almost choked such as entered. We desired the Bramene to open the doore, which with much intreatie hee did, offering first to throw ashes on our foreheads, which we refused, so that before he would open vs the doore, we were forced to promise him not to enter beyond the doore. It shewed within like a kiln, being close vaulted, without hole or window: neyther had the Church it self any light but the doore. Within the said Cell hung an hundred burning lampes, and in the middle stood a little Altar covered with Cotten cloth, and over that with golde vnder which, as the Bramene tolde vs, sat the Pagode all of golde, of the big-ness of a Puppet.

Hard by the Church without the great doore, stood within the earth a great foure-square Cisterne, hewed out of free stone, with staires on each side to go downe into it, full of greene, filthy, and stinking water; wherein they wash themselves when they come to enter into the Church to pray. In the evening they carried their Pagode on procession, first ringing a Bell, wherewith the people assembled, and tooke the Pagode out of his Cell with great reverence, and set it in a Palanquin, which was borne by the chiefe men of the town; the rest following with great deuotion, with their vsuall noise of Trumpets, and other instruments; and hauing carried him a pretty circuit, brought him to the stone Cisterne, washed him, and placed him againe in his Cell, making a foule smoke and stinke, and euery man leauing his offering behinde him, intended to the Pagode, but consumed by the Bramene and his family. As we went along by the wayes, we found many such shapes vnder certaine couertures, with a small Cisterne of water hard by, and halfe an Indian nut hanging thereby, to take vp water withall, for the trauellers to wash and pray. By the said Pagodas doe stand commonly a Cisse of stone, and two little Furnaces; before which they present their offerings. My self leaping on one of those Calnes in the Church, the Bramene called out, and the people came running, but we stayed their furie by gentle perswasion of the Bramene before. And thus much of these deformed formes, and mishapen shapes, with their worshippings and worshippers futable. Like lips, like lettuce, Vaine rites, stinking finks and smokes, vgly Idols, conspiring with internall Darknes of the mindes, and externall Darknes of their Temples, to bring an eternall Darknes to the followers, that all may shut vp (as they are begun) in a hellish period.

Duro saith, the Bramenes also worship a one Parabramma, and his three sonnes, and in honour of them wear those three theeds aforesaid. He affirmeth that the Taghi wander vp and down through India, abstaining from all carnall pleasure, but a certain time; which being expired, they are past possibilitie of further sinning; and are then called Abduri, as the illuminate Elders of the Familists, polluting themselves in all filthinesse. The Bramenes haue Images of the Trinitie, and haue in religious estimation the number of Three. They acknowledge and pray to the Trinity in Unity; but affirme many Demi-gods, which are his Deputies in gouerning the world. They honour the Portugalls Images also, as approaching to their owne superstition. They marry but one wife, and admit no second succeeding marriage. The Bramenes must descend of the Bramene Tribe, and others cannot aspire to that Priesthood; but some are of higher account then other. For some serue for messengers, with in time of warre, and among theses may passe safely, and are called Fathers. They will not put a Bramene to death for any crime. Henthim reporteth (I know not from what intelligence) that they haue books and Prophets, which they alledge for confirmation of their opinions: that they thinke God to be of blacke colour: that they worship the hearbe AMARACHI or Maisam with many superstitious ceremonies: that they haue in their writings the decalogue, with the explanation thereof: that they adure all of their societie vnto himselfe touching their mysteries: that they haue a peculiar language (as Latine in these parts) wherein they teach the same in their Schooles: that their Doctores hallow the of them in other places, according to the singularitye of each Nation in this so manifolde a profession, which they all demonstrate in their singular superstitions.

CHAP. X.

Of the Regions and Religions of Malabar.

Malabar extendeth it selfe from the Riuer Cangeracon to the Cape Comori; which some take to be the Promontory Cory, in Ptolemeys Malabar doubteth whether it be that which he calleth Commara extrema. In the length it containeth little lesse then three hundred miles; in breadth from that ridge of Gase to the Sea, in some places, fiftie. It is full of people, diuided into many States, by variety of Riuer; which make Hoies to be vsesuiceable in their Warres, and nourish many Crocodiles, enrich the soyle, and yeelde easie transportation of commodities, which are spices of diuers kinds. They haue Bats, in shape resembling Foxes, in bignesse Kytes. The chiefe Kingdomes in this Tract are Kanonor, Calecut, Cranganor, Cochin, Carcolam, and Tranncon. About seuen hundred yeeres since it was one Kingdome, gouerned by Sama, or Sarama Perimal, who by perswasion of the Arabian Merchants became of their Sect, in which he proued so deuout, that he would end his dayes at Mecca. But before his departure he diuided his estate into these pettie Signories, among his principall Nobles and kindred: leauing vnto Coulam the spirituall preheminance, and the Imperiall Title vnto his Nephew of Calicut, who onely enioyed the Title of Zamori, or Emperour, and had prerogatiue of stamping Coine. Some exempt from this Zamori Empire and Allegiance, both Coulam, the Papall Sea of the high Bramene, and Canapor; and some haue since by their owne force exempted themselues. This Perimal died in his holy voyage; and the Indians of Malabar reckon from this diuision their computation of yeares, as we doe from the blessed Natiuitie of our Lord. He left (saith Cassaneda) to himselfe but twelue leagues of his country, which lay neere to the shore where he meant to embarque himselfe, neuer before inhabited: this he gaue to a cousin of his then his Page, commanding that in memory of his embarquing there it should be inhabited, commanding the rest to take him for their Emperour (except the Kings of Coulam and Canianor) whom yet with the rest he commanded not to coyne money, but onely the King of Calicut. For Calicut was therefore here built: and the Moors for the embarquing tooke such deuotion to the place, that they would no more frequent the Port of Coulam, as before (which therefore grew to ruine) but made Calicut the Staple of their Merchandise.

Calicut, the first in order with them, shall be so with vs. The Citie is not walled nor fine built, the ground not yeelding firme foundation, by reason of the water which is forth if it be digged. This Kingdome hath not aboue fise and twenty leagues of Seacoast, yet rich both by the fertilitie of the soyle, which yeeldeth corn, spices, Cocos, Lanterns, & many other fruits: and by the situation; as the staple especially before the Portuguese vnfriendly neighborhood, of Indian Merchandise, and therfore in her variety of Merchants being a Map (as it were) of all that Easterne world. The Egyptians, Persians, Syrians, Arabians, Indians, yea, even from Catay the space of fixe thousand miles journey, here had their trade and traffike. The Pallace also contained foure halls of audience, according to their Religions, for the Indians, Moores, Iewes, Christians. Of their Bramenes or Priests we haue already said. They yeelde Diuine honours to diuities of their deceased Saints, and build Temples vnto beasts. One of which (dedicated to an Ape) hath large Porches, and hath (saith Maffaus) seuen hundred Marble Pillars, not inferiour to those of Agrippa in the Roman Pantheon. It seemeth that the ground in that place is not of so queasie and watry a stomach, but that it can digest deepe foundations. To Elephants they attribute like Diuinity: but most of all to Kine, supposing that the soules of men departed do most of all enter into these beasts. They haue many books of their superstition, neere the Augurall discipline of the Hetrurians, and fond fables of the Gracians, and diligently conceale the same from vulgar knowledge, except some Bramene Proselytes do detect those mysteries. They beleue one God, maker of Heauen and Earth, but adde that hee could haue no pleasure in so waighie a charge of gouerning the World, and therefore hath delegated the same to the Diuell, to reward euery man according to his workes; him they call Demmo: they name God Tamerani. The King hath in his Pallace the Chappell of Demmo, carved full of Diuels, and in the midst sitteth this Image of metall in a Throne of the same matter, with a triple Crowne, like the Popes, and foure hornes, with teeth, eyes, and mouth wide and terrible, with hooked handes, and feete like a Cocke. In each corner of this square Chappell is a Diuell set in a fierie Throne, wherein are many soules, the Diuell putting one with his right hand into his mouth, and taking another from vnder him with his left hand. This Idoll is washed by the Bramenes with sweet water, incensed, and worshipped euery morning. Sometime in the weeke they sacrifice on this manner: They haue an Altar strewd with flowers, on which they put the blood of a Cock, and coales of fire in a Siluer Chasing-dish, with much perfumes incensing about the Altar, and often singing with a little Bell of Siluer. They hold in their hands a Siluer Knife, with which the Cocke was killed, which they dip in the blood, and put into the fire with many Apish gestures. All the blood is thus burned, many Waxe-Candles burning meane-while. The Priest hath on his wrists and legges as it were Morrice-Bels, which make a great noyse, and a certaine Table hanging at his necke: and when he hath ended his sacrifice, he taketh his handes full of Wheate, goeth backward from the Altar (on which he alwayes fixeth his eyes) to a certaine tree, and then hurleth the Corbe vp ouer his head as high as he can: after which hee returneth and vnsitteth the Altar. The King of Calicut eateth no meate, before foure principall Bramenes haue first offered thereof to the Diuell, which they doe lifting both their handes ouer their heads, and shutting their fists draw backe the same with their thumb, presenting of that meate to the Idoll, and then carrie it to the King on a great Leaf, or treene Platter. The King sitteth on the ground at his meate, without any thing vnder him, attended with Bramenes, standing foure paces off, with their handes before their mowthes in great reverence. And after the King hath eaten, those Priests carrie the reliques into the Court, where they clap thrice with their hands, whereat presently certaine Crows resort thither to eate the Kings leauings, which Crows are herunto accustomed, and may not be hurt of any.

g Castaneda and Barboza saith, that she is not married, but as his Concubine

When the King marrieth a wife, & one of the principall Bramenes hath the first night lodging with her, for which he hath assigned him by the King foure hundred or five hundred Ducats. The King and his Gentlemen, or Nayros, eate not flesh without licence of the Bramenes. The King committeth the custodie of his wife to the Bramenes when he trauelleth any whither, and taketh in too honest part their dishonest familiaritie. But for this cause, the Kings sonne succeedeth not in the crowne, but his sisters sonne, as being certainly of his blood. These sisters of the King chuse what Gentlemen they please, on whom to bestow their Virginitie; and if they proue not in a certaine time to be with childe, they betake them to these Bramene-stallions.

* H. de Sancto Stephano.

The Gentlemen and Merchants haue a custome to exchange wiues, in token of great friendship. Some women amongst them haue fixe* or seuen husbands, fathering her children on which of them she best pleaseth. The men when they marry, get orders to vse them (if they be Virgins) fifteene or twentie dayes before they themselves will bedde them. This Author affirmeth, that there were a thousand families of Christians in Calicut, at the time of his being there, a hundred and twenty yeares since.

Od. Barboza.

If a debtor breake day with his creditor, and often disappoint him, hee goeth to the principall of the Bramenes, and receiueh of him a rodde, with which he approacheth to the Debter, and making a circle about him, chargeth him in the name of the King, and the said Bramene, not to depart thence till hee hath satisfied the debt, which if hee doe not, hee must sterue in the place: for if hee depart, the King will cause him to be executed. The new King for one yeares space eateth neyther Fish nor Flesh, nor cutteth his Haire or Nayles, vseth certaine prayers daily, eateth but one meale, and that after he hath washed, neyther may hee looke on any man till he hath ended his repast. At the yeares end he maketh a great Feast, to which resort about ten thousand persons to confirme the Prince and his Officers: and then much almes is given. He entertayneth ten thousand women in diuers offices in his Palace. These make to the king (after his fasting yeare is out) a Candlemasse-feast, each of them carrying diuers lights from the Temple (where they first obserue many Idoll ceremonies) vnto the Pallace with great musicke and other iollitie.

Nayros reckoneth eightene Sects that haue no mutuall conuersation, nor may marrie but in their owne rankes or order. Next to the king and Bramenes, he placeth the Nayros, which are Gentlemen and Souldiers, and are not professed Nayros (notwithstanding their blood) till they be by their Lords or by the King made knights or souldiers. And then he must neuer from that time go without his weapons, which commonly are a Rapier and a Target, and sometimes Peeces or Bowes. They neuer marrie, but live with such of the Nayros women or daughters as like them, leaving his weapons on him while at the doore, which forbid any man else, although it be the good man himselfe, to enter, till he hath ended his businesse and be gone. And if one of the common people once touch a Nayro, it is lawfull for the Nayro to kill him: and he is also released, and must be purified by certaine washings. And for this cause they crie as they goe in the streetes, Po, Po, that the baser raskalitie may giue place. They haue a pit of standing water at their doores, hallowed by the Bramenes, wherein euery morning they wash themselves, although it be Greene slime, and stinking, imagining thus to be cleansed of their sinnes. They are brought vp altogether to feates of Armes and a distance from their childehood, admirably able to winde and turne themselves, and are very resolute and desperate, binding themselves by oath to liue and die with their King or Lord. No Nayro's women may enter into Calicut but one night in the yeare, when the Citie is full of lights: and they goe with the Nayros, to beholde and gaze their fill. They intend nothing but their lust, and thinke that if they die Virgins they shall enter into Paradise.

The Bisbari are another sort, and are Merchants, Gentiles, and enioy great priuiledges. The King cannot put them to death, but by sentence of the principall of themselves. They were the onely Merchants before the Moores traded there, and still enioy many possessions. These marrie one wife, and their children inherit, and they may touch the Nayro's. The Cugianem are a Sect of the Nayros, hauing a law and Idols by themselves, which they may neuer alter. They make Tiles to couer the Temples and the Kings Pallace. The Nayro's may lie with their women, but must wash themselves before they goe home.

Another Sect is called Manantamar, which are Landerers, nor may they or their posteritie be of other function: nor may they mingle themselves with any other generation. They haue Idol-ceremonies and Temples by themselves. The Nayros may vse their wines (or women rather.) Their brethren or nephews are their heires. The Calien are Weauers, and haue a distinct idolatrous Sect; otherwise as the former.

Besides these of better condition, there are of baser sort eleuen Sects, which may neither marrie nor meddle with others. The first of these are called Tibari, husbandmen; the second, Moger, and are Martiners; both hating their proper superstitions, and vse their women in common: the third are Astrologers, whom they call Canium. Common men aske their counsaile, but may not touch their persons. The Aggeri are Masons and workers in metalls. The Muchon or Mesbor are Fishers; dwelling in Villages by themselves; the men cheeuers, the women harlots with whom they please. The Amis are Salt-makers: the Pacium are Iugglers, Inchanters, and Physicians (if such diuellish practises may deserue so honourable name) which, when any are sick and require their helpe, vse coniuration to cause the Diuell to enter into some of them, and then by his suggestion declare the euent of the disease, and what sacrifices or other things are to be performed. They may not touch or be touched of other men.

The Renoles are a baser sort of Gentiles, which carrie wood into the Citie to sell, and herbs. The Puler are as excommunicate persons, and liue in desarts, where the Nayros haue no occasion to passe, and when they goe neere any of these Nayros, or any of the better better sort, they crie as loude as they can (as the <sup>k</sup> Lepers among the Iewes) that others may auoyde them. For if any touch them, their kindred may for such action of pollution slay them; and as many of these Puler also, as may make satisfaction for such disparagement. Some nights they will go of purpose, seeking to touch some of the Nayro women with hand, sticke, or hurling of a stone: which if they effect, there is no remedie for the woman but to get her forth and liue with these villaines, or to be fole, to escape killing by the handes of her kindred. These Puler are theues and sorcerers. The Pareus are of worse esteeme, and liue in desarts without commerce of any, reputed worse then the Diuell. These ten sorts (or eleuen if you reckon two sorts of the Fakiri, as our Author doth; whereof one are warriors, distinguished by a certaine cutt, which they must carrie in their hands, from the Nayros, are as well differing in Religions, as matters of common life: though, for their seuerall rites, it were wrong to the Reader at large to recite them, if we had the particulars to deliuer.

Lop. de Castan-

There are besides these Gentiles, Naturall of Malabar, many strangers of Indians, Moores, and Christians. But in other Kingdomes of Malabar, the Heathen Religion is little differing from that in Calicut. Generally amongst them, the Bramenes and Kine are had in such honour, that when the Kings create their Nayros, he giueth them with a sword, and embracing them one by one, bids them haue care of the Bramenes and the Kine. And if any should kill one, it would cost him his life, as being a God-murderer. Some of them will kill and eat any other beasts, and some will kill nothing, neyther fish nor flesh.

Cranganor is a small kingdome: the Inhabitants of the Citie, which giueth name to the Region, are Christians of Saint Thomas profession, about seuentie thousand in number. Cochin is now growne great by the Portugals traffique and friendship. Of the rest there is not much worth the recitall. The Papall honour among the Bramenes, which some ascribe to Coulam, Maginus bestoweth on the King of Cochin. In these parts are now many Christian Proselytes of the Iesuites conversion, besides many of the olde Thomas-Christians. Both men and women in Cochin, account it a great Gallantrie to haue wide eares, which therefore they stretch by arte, hanging waighs on them till they reach to their shoulders.

m Od. Bar.

The King of Coulam Dominion stretcheth beyond the Cape Comori (where Malabar endeth) on the East side fourescore and tenne miles, as farre as Cael: which diuers great Lords holde vnder him. Among the rest is the Signiorie of Quilacare. In the Citie of Quilacare is an Idoll of high account, to which they solemnize a Feast euery twelfth year, where the Gentiles resort as the Popish Christians in the Roman Iubilee. The Temple sacred to this Idoll hath exceeding great reuenuē. The King (for so he is called) at this Feast erecteth a Scaffold covered with silke, and having washed himselfe with great solemnitie, he prayeth before this Idoll: and then ascends the Scaffold, and there in presence of all the people cutteth off his Nose, and after his Eares, Lippes, and other partes, which he casts towards the Idoll; and at last he ratteth his throate, making a butcherly sacrifice of himselfe to his Idoll. He thinke to be his successour must bee present hereto: for hee must vndergoe the same Martyrdom, when his twelue yeares Iubilee is come. Along this coast dwell the Parsi, simple people, and Christians; which liue by fishing of Pearles. The Nayros make such holes in their eares, that Cesar Fradericke sayth, hee thrust his arme vp into their shoulders in one of them. They are prodigall in their lates in the honour of their King. Oswin telleth of some, which, like the renowned Decij, had vowed themselves to death, and not to returne from the enemy without victorie. Aloisius Gouanna numbrells in the Sea-coast of Coulam three and twentie Townes, of which Attene had Christian Churches.

Besides those former Sects, Stephanus de Brito speaketh of the Malcas which inhabit small Villages in the mountings, which are hunters of Elephants: amongst whom are no thefts or robberies, and therefore they leaue their doores open when they go abroad. They are skillfull in Musicke, and Magike. They haue no Idoll amongst them; onely they obserue their Antecessors Sepulchres.

Of the Feast which all the Malabar-kings hold euery twelfth year in honour of the River

River Ganges, we have there spoken & where we have discoursed of the River. This Fort lasteth eight and twentie or thirle daies with great solemnitie, to the furtherance whereof certaine souldiers, to the number of thirtie, rush among the people, and kill as many as they can; themselves certaine to be killed of the Kings souldiers. This is the Tribute imposed by the King of Calicut on one of his vassals, to honour his solemnisation. Such a number, that shall thus sell their lives as deare as they can. Of the Election of the Zamorin, we have spoken in the beginning of the Chapter: let us now adde out of Castaneda: concerning his deuotion. He saith that this King of Calicut is a Bramene, as his predecessors also. And for this it is a custome that all the Kings die in one Pagode or Idoll Temple, he is elected for that cause. For alwaies there is and must be in that house a King to serue those Idols; and when he that serueth there dieth, then must the King that then reigneth leaue his Empire, and goe seruen that place as the other did; another being elected to succede him in the Kingdom. And if any refuseth to forsake his Court for the Pagode, they enforce him thereunto.

The Kings of Malabar be browne men, and goe naked from the girdle vpward, and from thence downeward they are covered with cloth of Silke and of Cotton, adorned with Jewels. For their children; the sonnes inherite not, but the brother or if there be none the sisters sonne. When their daughters are ten yeares olde, they send out of the Kingdom for a Nayro, and presenting him with gifts, request him to take her Virginity, which hauing done, he giveth a Jewell about her necke, which she weareth during her life, as a token that from thence forth she hath free power of her body, to do what she will, which before she might not. After their death these Kings are carried forth into a plaine field, and there burned with sweete wood very cosly, their kindred and all the Nobilitie of the country being present: which done, and the ashes buried, they shew themselves without leauing any haire except on the browes and eye-lids, even on the least childe; and for the space of thirteene dayes cease to eate Betels (his lips with that doth it) and all this time is an Interregnum, wherein they obserue if any will come in to obiect any thing against the new future King. After this he is sworne to the lawes of his predecessor, to pay his debts, to recouer whatsoever belonged to his Kingdom being lost; which oath he taketh hauing his sword in his left hand, and in his right a Candle burning, which hath a ring of gold vpon it, which he toucheth with one of his fingers, and taketh his oath. This being done, they throw or poure vpon him a few graines of Rice, with many other ceremonies and prayers, and he worshippeth the Sonne three times: after which, all the Caymales or principall Nobles sware their fidelitie to him, handling also the same Candle. The thirteene dayes ended; they eate Betels againe, and flesh and fish as before; the King except, who then taketh thought for his predecessor, and for the space of one whole yeare (as is before obserued in part out of Barbosa) eates no Betels, nor shaueth his beard, nor cutteth his nails: eate but once a day, and before he doth it, washeth all his body, and obserueth certaine houres of prayer daily. The yeare being ended, hee obserueth a kind of Dirige for his predecessors soules, whereat are assembled 100000. persons, at which time he giveth great Almes, and then is confirmed. All these Malabar kings haue one speciall man, which is the chiefe administrator of Iustice, who in matters of gouernement obeyed no lesse then the king himselfe. The souldiers are Nayros, none of which can be imprisoned or put to death by ordinarie iustice: but if one of them kill another, or kill a Cowe, or sleepe with a countrey-woman, or speake euill of the king; the king after information giues his warrant to another Nayro, who with his associates kill him wheresoever they finde him, hewing him with their swords, and then hang on him his warrant, to testifie the cause of his death. These Nayros may not weare their weapons, nor enter into combat, till they be armed knights, although that from the age of seven yeares they are trained vp in seates and practise of Armes. He is dubbed created by the king, who commaundeth to gird him with a sword, and laying his right hand vpon his head, muttereth certaine wordes softly, and afterward dubbeth him saying, Hauo a regard to keepe these Bramenes, and their King. When they yeelde themselves to any mans seruice, they binde themselves to die with him, and for him, which they faithfully performe, fighting til they be killed. They are great Southsayers, have their good and bad dayes, warship the Sunne, the Moone, the Fire, and the Rain, and the first they meete in the morning. The Diuell is often in them (they say) in one of their Pagodes) which causeth them to utter terrible wordes; and then he goeth before the King with a naked Sword, quaking and cutting his flesh, saying with great cries: I am such a God, and I am come to tell thee such a thing; and if the King doubte, he roareth lowder, and cutteth himselfe deeper till he be credited. The Romans haue much delighted the greauesse of the King of Calicut, and caused many other alterations in all the East in this last Age of the world. Of whose exploits Cassandus, Strabo, Massey, Oserius, and others haue written at large.

CHAP. XI.

Of the Kingdome of Narfinga and Bisnagar.

From those places where our feete last rested (or touched rather) to the Cape Goudaworn, betwixt that ridge of mountaines called Gins, and the Ocean (which is there named the Gulfe of Bengala) extendeth the Kingdome of Narfinga or Bisnagar; those two royall Cities extending which shal giue name to this mightie Empire, containing two hundred leagues of Sea-coast. The King hath in continuall payment thousand Nairs. But as occasion serueth, he can bring into the field many many thousands more, as in that Expedition against Idalean, specified by Barrius and Barnus, in which, to let passe that world of people, he sacrificed vnto Idols twentie thousand hundred and threescore head of beasts and fowles in nine dayes space, which idol-deuotion were all bestowed after on the poore.

In the yeare of our Lorde 1567. Bisnagar was sacked by foure Kings of the Moors (as saith Frederike) naming them Dialean, Zagmaluc, Cotamaluc, and Vish, through treason of her owne Captaines: but hauing sacked it (as not able to hold it) they retired homie. The Citie remained after, an habitation for Tygres and wild beastes, contayning in circuit foure and twentie miles, as our Author (that stayed there some moneths) affirmeth. He neuer saw Pallace exceeding that of Bisnagar. It had nine gates with guards of souldiers. Here he observed their rites in burning the women, so often mentioned, which after his and Balby his relations are thus.

The woman taketh two or three months respite after her husbands death: the day being come, she goeth early out of her house, mounted on an Horse or Elephant, or else on a Stage carried by eight men: apparelled like to a Bride adorned with Jewels, and her haire about her shoulders; holding in her left hand a Looking-glasse in the right, an arrow: and singeth as she passeth through the Citie, saying, That she goeth to sleepe with her husband. She is accompanied with her friends, vntill it be one or two of the clocke in the afternoone: then they goe out of the Citie passing by the Rivers side to the burning-place, where is prepared a great square Caue full of wood. Here is made a great banquet, the woman eating with ioy, as if it were her wedding-day, and after they sing and daunce till the woman bid to kindle the fire in the Caue; then she leaueth the feast, and taketh her husbands neereft kinsman by the hand, and goeth with him to the banke of the River, where shee strippeth her of her clothes and Jewells, bestowing them at her pleasure, and covering her selfe with a cloth, she throweth her selfe into the River, saying, O wretches wash away your sinnes. Comming out of the water, she rowleth her selfe into a yellow cloth; and againe taking her husbands kinsman by the hand, goeth to the said Caue, by which is erected a litle Pinnacle, on which she mounteth, and there recommendeth her children and kindred to the people. After this, another woman taketh a pot with oyle, and sprinkleth it ouer her head, and there with annoynteth all her body, and then throweth it into the Furnace, the woman going together with the same. Presently after the woman the people throwe great pieces of wood into the Caue, so that with those blowes and the fire, shee is quickly dead; and their great mirth is on a sudden turned into great lamentation & howling.

d The solemnity of burning of the wife after her husbands death. The ancients mention this rite. vid. Al. var. hist 1.7. c. 8. Hier. ad Iou. 1.1. See the same described in Poracchi Fun. Antichi Tau. 17.

When a great man dieth, all the women of his house, both his wife and slaves; with whom he hath had carnall copulation, burrie themselves together with him, As amongst the heathen sort; I have seene (saith Master Frederike) the dead man carried to the place of buriall, and there set vpright: the woman comming before him on her knees, catch her armes about his necke, while a Mason maketh a wall round about them: and when the wall is as high as their neckes, one comming behinde the woman, strangling her, the worke-man presently finishing the wall ouer them; and this is their buriall.

Indolentia Telortomannus. It relateth the same funerall rites of Tiannafferi (as in other parts of India) saying that there fifteene or twentie men in their idolatrous habite, like Druids, doe ascend on the fire wherein the husband is burned; all the Musicians of the Cite solemnizing the funerall pompe; and fifteene dayes after they haue the like solemnitie, at the burning of the woman, those diuellish fellows holding fire in their mouths, and sacrificing to Demon, and are her intercessors to that Diuell for her eood entertainment.

f Lud. Vert 1.6

The cause of burning their wives is by some ascribed to their wonted poisonings of their husbands before this Law; s by others, that the husband might have her help and comfort in the other world.

g. Odorich:

In these parts is the City of Saint Thomas or Malepuz; where they say Saint Thomas (after he had preached the Gospel to the Indians) was martyred and burned. The Legend which some report of his death, were too tedious to recite: and as little likelihood of truth is in that long tale of the miraculous Crucifixes here found, related by Officiaries, who likewise declare the rites of those Saint Thomas-Christians, of their Churchman Popes, Cardinals, Patriarchs and Bishops; of which in another place we shall more fully speak. On the first day of July Saint Thomas holy-day is celebrated, as well by the Pagans as Christians: and his Sepulchre is had in devout estimation, both of the Moors, Gentiles, and Christians; each pretending the right of his owne Religion to the Church, where this Saint lyeth interred; to which the Indian Christians go on pilgrimage, carrying with them a little of that earth for a great relike. A Moore hath the keeping of the Church, which was built after our fashion, and begged of the courtiers for maintenance of it, and of a light continually burning therein.

h Oforinus lib. 3.

i Od. Barbosa.

The Portugals <sup>now</sup> inhabit this Towne almost desolate: the Iesuits also have here a residence. The Church-doores (by the superstition of some) are almost cut in pieces, and carried away to set in gold and silver, and to wear about their neckes, as tholy reliques; the Portugals herein being exceedingly vaine, and attributing hereunto many miracles, verifying that Proverb which the Spaniards vsē, affirming the Portugals to be Pieos, feros, devotos. One sent Linschoten a whole bead-roll or paire of beads thereof, the bringer affirming that those Beads had calmed a Tempest miraculously by the way. The Inhabitants in this respect have driven their Church-doores full of nailes: but Saint Thomas bones are now removed to Goa, Those doores are of long renowned holinesse, because they were made of that wood which Saint Thomas once with his girdle out of the haufen (which it choaked) and could not before this stroke by any means be removed.

I Few, Fooles,

Odericus in telteth of a strange and vncouth Idoll, as bigge as Saint Christopher, of pure gold, with a new band about the necke full of precious stones, some one whereof was of value (if he valued iustly) more then a whole Kingdome: The rooſe, paucet, and feeling of the walles, within and without the Temple, was all gold. The halants went thither on pilgrimage, ſome with halters about their neckes, ſome with their hands bound behinde them, ſome with knives ſticking on their armes and legs; and if after their pilgrimage, the wounded fleſh feſtered, they eſteemed that limbe holy, and a ſigne of their gods fauour. Neere to the Temple was a Lake, where-into the Pilgrims caſt gold, ſiluer, and gemmes for honor of the Idoll, and reparation of his Temple. At euery yearly Feaſt the King and Queene, with the Pilgrimes and people, ſtumbling, placed the ſaid Idoll in a rich Chariot, and with a ſolemnne proceſſion of Virgins, two and two in a rancke, ſinging before him, and with muſicall instruments came him forth. Many Pilgrims put themſelves vnder the Chariot-wheels, where they they are crushed in peeeces. More then five hundred persons vsed thus to doe, whose carkasses were burned, and ashes kept for holy reliques. Otherwise also they will devote themselves to such a martyrdome in this manner. The parents and friends assemble and make a Feast to this Votarie, and after that hang five sharpe knives about his necke, and so carry him before the Idoll, where he taketh one of his knives, and crieth For the worship of my God I cut this my flesh; and cutting a peece, casteth it at the feet of the Idoll, and so proceeding, as the last saith; Now doe I yeeld my selfe to death in the halfe of my God; and being dead, is burned as before.

a Sir John Mandevile.

Our Countrey-man Sir John Mandevile reporteth the same Historie of their Idoll Procession, and the ashes of those voluntarie Martyrs, which they keepe to defend them against tempests and misfortunes. Hee also saith that some Pilgrims in all their peregrinations, not once lifted vp their eye-lids, some at every third or fourth pace fell downe on their knees to worshippinge, some whipped, others wounded themselves; yea, and killed themselves (as is before said.) Niccolo di Conti reporteth the same in his time.

p Linschoten lib. 1. cap. 44.

Neither is this bloudie custome yet left, as Linschoten affirmeth by report of one of his Chamber-fellowes that had seene it. They haue (saith hee) a Waggon, or Cart, so heauie, that three or foure Elephants can hardly draw it, which is brought forth at Faires, Feasts, and Processions. At this Cart hang many Cables or Ropes, wherat all the people haile and pull, of deuotion. In the vpper part of the Cart standeth a Tabernacle, and therein the Idoll: vnder it sit the Kings wiues playing on Instruments. And while the Procession passeth, some cut peeeces of their flesh; and then at the Pagode, some lay themselves vnder the wheeles of the Cart, with such censure you haue heard.

q Balby cap. 30. Aribus Dan. Hist. Ind. Or. 4. 2.

Gasparo Balby relateth the same, and addeth, that the Priests, which haue care of this Idoll, and certaine women, are consecrated to these deuotions from their Cradles by their Zeale-blinde parents. And the women prostitute their bodies, to gaine for the Idoll whatsoever they can get ouer and aboue their owne maintenance. This filleth the Citie with strumpets; there being of this Sacred (you may interpreter is Cursed) crue, foure hundred in one place of the Citie. These haue their place in the Idoll Procession, some of them in the Chariot which is drawne by men; euery one accounting himselfe happie, that can touch or draw the same. This he saith was at Negapatan.

He further affirmeth, That not farre from the Citie of Saint Thomas is the Towne Castia: where the wife is not burned (as at Negapatan) but a great graue being made for the deceased husband, they place the liuing wife by the dead corpse, and their next kindred cast earth vpon them both, and stampe thereon. They which marrie, wed in their owne degree, as a Smith to a Smiths daughter: and they powre out their prayers at the Image of some Cow, or a Serpent called Bistia di capella. Their Bramines burne Cowes-dung; and if they intend any warres with other Nations, they stonke their nose and forehead with those ashes, not washing themselves till the euening. They which sacrifice themselves to the Pagode, when they haue wallowed a long time in lustfull pleasures, shoot into the aire peeeces of their flesh tied to arrowes, and diuinely mangle themselves; at last, cut their owne throats, so sacrificing themselves to the Pagode.

r Desperate dying.

There are also certaine people called Ameuchi, otherwise Chikvi, which perceiving the end of their life to approach, lay hold on their weapons, which they call Chikvi and going forth, kill euery man they meete with, till some bodie (by killing them) make an end of their killing. They are loth (it seemes) to come into the Diuels presence empty-handed, or to goe to Hell alone. Some of them worship God in the likeness of a Man; some in the Images of Kine and Serpents: some inuoke the Sunne and Moone; others, some Tree or Riuer.

Among many Feasts which they celebrate in the yeare, one in Autumne is most solemnne, in which they take some great Tree, and fasten it in the ground, hauing first fashioned it like a mast of a ship, with a crosse-yard, whereon they hang two hookes of iron. And when any one by sickness, or other miserie, hath made a vow to their Idoll in Perada, he cometh thither, and being first admonished by the Priests to offer his sacrifice, they lift him with those hookes by both the shoulders, and there hold him to the Idoll, till he hath three times saluted the same, with clapping his folded hands to his breast, and hath made some sport thereto with weapons which he hath in his hand. After this he is let downe, and the blood which issueth from his shoulders is sprinkled on the Tree, in testimonie of his deuotion. Then they draw him vp againe by the middle, to giue thanks to the Idoll: and then giue him leaue to heale himselfe, if he can. They which are in great miserie, or seeke some great matter at the hand of their Idoll, doe this. They haue another Feast, celebrated in the night, continuing eight nights: in which many candles are scene burning thorow the Ciue. Three or foure runne from one end of the streete to the other, and hurling Rice, and other meates after them, say, they offer it to the Diuell which followes them; not daring to looke behinde, lest he should slay them.

In other places also they haue those Idoll-Chariots, like vnto Towers, to the drawing whereof, many thousands of deuout persons put their helping-hand. Francis Fernandez saith, that Cidambaram is the mother-Ciue of their Pagan-rites, wherein are many stately Temples, and the reuenue of the Bramins amounted to thirtie thousand ducats, but now they are paid but twelue thousand yearly.

F. Fernandez
Epist. 1598.

Heere happened a strange accident, the same day the Iesuits departed, the occasion of which was this. There is in this Ciue a Temple of Perimal, wherein they worship an Ape called Hanimant, whom they report to haue beene a God, and (for I know not what) together with many thousands of other gods, to haue remained there, being all transformed into Apes. Now when this principall Ape was forced to passe into the Iland Zeilan, and wanted a ship, he leaped, and at euery leape left an Iland or heape of land behind him, so making way for his apish traine to Zeilan. The tooth of this Ape was kept for a great relique in that Iland, with great resort of Pilgrims thereunto: and in the year 1554. was by the Portugals, (who made a roade thither, in hope of great bootie) taken away. The Indian Princes offered the Viceroy three hundred thousand (as Linschoten telleth, seven hundred thousand) ducats, for the ransom of this Apes tooth, but the Archbishop dissuaded the Viceroy; who thereupon burnt the same before those Indian Embassadors; and threw the ashes into the Sea. Not long after a Bonnie of Cambaia perswaded the Indians, that hee by Diuine Power had taken away that holy Tooth, being inuisibly present, and had left another in the roome which was burnt. Superstition is credulous, and the King of Bisnagar gave him a great summe of gold for that Apes tooth, wherewith he thus apishly had bitten and mocked them, which was after holden in like veneration as the former. But to returne to our Cidambaran Historie.

Linschoten s. 444

They tell, That an holy man, in great penance, had many yeares held his foote pierced thorow with a piece of iron; and when he was often by God commanded to leave that selfe-rigor, he flatly refused, vlesse that he might see God dancing about him, which also hee condescended vnto; and with the Sunne, Moone and Satyres, which played the Musicians, he appeared dancing: And as he danced, a chaine of gold fell from his foot, whereof this Towne tooke name. For Cidambaran signifieth a golden chaine.

u F. Fernandez

Now at this time there was a great contention, whether the signe of Perimal should be erected in the Temple of Cidambaram. This signe was a gilded mast, with an Ape at the foot thereof. Many Embassadors were there about this quarrell; some vying, some resisting this deed. But the Prince (called the Naisib of Gingi) would haue it set vp, notwithstanding the Priests greatest vnwillingnesse. The Priests therefore, both regular (which are the Iogues) and secular Bramins ascended vp the rooſe of the Church, and thence threatened to hurle downe the ashes, which twentie of the Iogues did, and the rest threatened to follow. But the Naisib caused gammes to be discharged at them, which slew two, and caused the rest to retire and breake their couenants (rather then their neckes) with their fellowes. A woman also of this faction, cut her owne throat for zeale of this new superstition. The swelling stile of this King of Bisnagar, I thought worthie to be heere inserted, which is this. The husband of good fortune, fortune, the god of great Provinces, King of the greatest Kings, and god of Kings, the Lord of horsemen, the Master of them which cannot speake, Emperour of three Emperours, Conquerour of all bee sees, and Keeper of all he conquers, Dreadfull to the eight Coasts of the World, Vanquisher of the Mahumetans, &c. Lord of the East, West, North, and South, and of the Sea, &c. Vencapatadinus Ragin Denamaganus Regel, which newreth and governeth this World.

With the Naicho or King of Gingi (vassall to the King or Emperour of Bismagar) the Iesuits found good entertainment. Heere some of the Iogues distributed the water of Ganges, out of certaine vessels couered with soule and filthie clothes which yet the people for deuotion kissed. These Iogues with admirable patience endured the Sunnes heate: and one among the rest enclosed himselfe in an iron cage, with his head and feet onely out of the cage, that he could neither sit nor lie downe at any time: and on the cage were hanged an hundred Lampes, which foure other Iogues, his companions, lighted at certaine times. And thus walked he in this his perpetuall prison, as a Light vnto the world, in his vain-glorious opinion. They reasoned with certaine Bramenes; some of which held the Sunne for God, and yet sometime to haue been a man, and for his merits so promoted. Some denied a multitude of gods, onely allowing that priuiledge to Pyr ama, Vidhun, and Vnistr, one of which maketh, another keepeth, the third destroyeth all things.

Neare to Madure is an Idoll called Chocanada: which by night appeared in a vision to a Priest, and bade him goe say to the Naicho of Madure, that he or I must abide in this house: whereupon he would not be corruall with his Idoll, but resigned the Palace to him. His deuotion is such, that every day while he sitteth in iudgement, a Bramene euer and anon soundeth the name of Aranganassa in his eares: and when one is wearie, another succeedeth in the same office, neuer ceasing this Idolls remembrance, although he there sitteth fixe or fixe houres.

China, p. 401.

I thought meete to mention one Custome y which some report of the Brama, or Pope-like Bramene in these parts, who by his authoritie dispenseth with many of their Lawes, and dissolueth Marriages: giuing libertie at his pleasure to the woman to marrie another; which his dispensation is sealed on her right shoulder, with a marke of a hot iron.

z Mechior Cotignus.

Chandagrin is the Royall Seat of the great King of Bismagar z. The chiefe Families therein are the Bramens, Rains, and Cretins. They affirme that their Idoll Perimal did bring forth the first out of his head (as the Poets tell of Minerva;) the second out of his breast; the third out of his belly: and all other inferiour Families out of his feet. The Bramenes haue some opinions, not altogether dissonant from the Scriptures. They say, That God onely by his thought made a man, which they call Adam.

On the tenth day of Iuly, Anno 1600. happened an Eclipse of the Sunne, which the Bramenes said was by meanes of the Dragon (which they make a celestially sign) his biting of the Sunne and Moone: whereupon the King and others neither eate nor dranke that day; deploring their miserie, because the Dragon deuoured the Sunne. In the Citie Prepeti, three miles from Chandegrin is the Feast of Perimal, in remembrance of his marriage: at which the offerings amounted to two hundred thousand crownes: and the Chariot of the Idoll was drawne forth a mile and a halfe in Procession by ten thousand men. They haue another Feast of the Kine, because they suppose Perimal to be the sonne of a Cow, and then the wayes and streets are full of that cattell. They haue a Feast in honor of the Sunne, which lasteth eight dayes, solemnized by the Emperour himselfe, and hee is iudged a traytour which is not present therat. Then they cast lots, the King first, and after the rest, diuining by arrowes the next years destinie. If an arrow light on a tree, and being plucked out, causeth a red liquor to follow, it prognosticateth warres; if white, peace. Not farre hence is an Idoll called Tripits, to which are great Pilgrimages and Offerings; alwayes as they go, some beginne, and the rest answere; and so all continue to resound the name of the Idoll Goiu. Before they enter into the Temple, they shauie and wash themselues. They haue Heremites, which they call Sanasser, who liue in deserts, and at sometimes appeare before the people naked. They haue others which they call Gurupi, learned Priests, (as it were a de-proof Doctors) which beare a great port, and neuer goe forth on foote. The Idoll Tripiti is seated on a mountaine, about which are fertile valleyes, stored with fruits, which none may touch, as being consecrated. There are in the woods great abundance of Apes, so tame, that they will take meate out of mens hands: the people esteeme them a diuine Race, and of the familiaritie of Perimal the chiefe god, whom they worship in many colours and shapes, as of a Man, Oxe, Horse, Lion, Hogge, Doeke, Cocke, &c.

As Deiga<sup>b</sup> and Ricinus, two Iesuits, trauelled to Chaudegrin, they came to Trauil, where they saw their Idoll, with a white banner on his backe, and after him three sacred Kine, with Drummers on their backs, and after them Trumpeters and many Musicians of other sorts. Then followed thirtie women dancing, which were also consecrated to the Idolls seruice, and might not marrie, but yet prostitute their bodies: these were richly attired, and carried Lights. The Priests followed with the Idoll, and were followed by the people with Lights. At their returne they set downe the Idoll, and set sodden Rice before him to eate; others meane while driving away the flies, and others cowering him that he should not be seene eating: and at last, one maketh a long Oration of the worthy actes of their god, and then set him againe in his place. This lasted foure houres; and in the meane space many reasoned with the Iesuits, and some held vaine Discourses of the Creation: as, that there were seuen Seas, one of salt-water, the second of fresh, the third of hony, the fourth of Milke, the fift of Tair (which is creame beginning to sowre) the sixt of sugar, the seuenth of butter: that the Earth had nine corners, whereby it was borne vp by the Heauen. Others dissented, and said, that the Earth was borne vp by seuen Elephants; the Elephants feete stood on Tortoises, and they were borne by they knew not what.

When the Naribo of Tangaor<sup>c</sup> died, three hundred of his Concubines willingly offered themselves to the fire, to honor his funerall; so much can Custome harden so delicate and soft-hearted a nature.

The Temples<sup>d</sup> in the Countrey haue great reuenues, which in some places are increased by the deuotion of women, which prostitute themselves to gaine for their Idolls: and many yong girls are brought vp for this purpose. Many are heere in these parts, of the Sect of the Guzzarates, which kill no quicke thing, as is spoken<sup>e</sup>. Some haue a stone hanging about their neckes, as big as an egge, with certaine lines drawne thorow the middle thereof; and this they worship, and call it Tambarans: they keepe every Friday holy-day.

The Kingdome of Orissa hath on the Sea-coast three hundred and fiftie miles, betwixt the richer Kingdomes of Bengala and Bisnagar, poore of Ports and traffike. Raman<sup>f</sup> is the Royall-Citie; from whence the Riuer Ganga passeth, and at his fall into the Sea, ioyneth his water with those of Ganges. The Inhabitants (except a few Moores) are Gentiles, little or nothing (that I can learne) differing in Rites from their neighbours, of which yee haue heard. Some ascribe to the Citie Orissa, as the name, is the principallitie of the other Cities of this Kingdome.

One thing I thought not to omit, that there be<sup>h</sup> whole Villages and kindreds of people, in other things like to other men, but are borne with one of their legs and one foot from the knee downwards, as thicke as an Elephants legge; which the common people imagine to be a curse by Diuine Iustice, inflicted vpon the whole Generation, for that their Progenitors murdered Saint Thomas. Linschoten saith, hee hath seene and spoken with them, and could learne no other cause thereof. It is to them a deformitie, but no let or impediment otherwise.

And thus haue we finished our perambulation of the Continent of Asia. Some perhaps will maruell why I haue not handled the Muscouites and Russians in this Asian Discourse: to whom I answer, that, of the Tartarians, subiect to the Muscouite, I haue already spoken; and the rest of the Muscouites Dominions, especially the most populous, ciuill, wealthie; yea, the Imperiall Citie it selfe, by most Mappes, is ascribed to Europe: that I speake not of the vncertaintie of that troubled estate, now these many years, whereof I would haue more certaine and settled Relations to bestow on our Reader, which I hope, with Gods help, in our European Discouery shall be performed.

As for the Vnicorne we haue before obserued, That none hath beene scene these hundred yeares last past, by testimonie of any probable Author (for Webb, which saith he saw of them in Prester Johns Court, is a meere fabler). And Casspar Swenckfeldt a Physician testifieth of the common Vnicornes horne, that it is inferiour to Harts horne in efficacie against poysons, and therefore not likely to be it. Of the Tygers hath been spoken, and the harme they doe in Pegu. Nicholas Pimenta k reporteth, That the Tygers, Crocodiles, and a certaine Lizzard or Newt (Lerina saw the like in Brasile) is great and as cruell as the former, doe wonderfully spoile in Bengala, both by land and neere the shores. Hetells of one strange escape of a man in a vessell neere the shore, assaulted at once by a Tyger from land, and by a Crocodile from the water; and the Tyger with more swiftness and furie ayming at his prey, passed over him into the Crocodiles mouth. The admirable swiftness of this beast is recorded by Pliny. Authors agree. m That both in Asia and Africa they rather prey on blacke people, then on the whiter Europeans.

Muske is made of a certaine beast called Gudderi, which liueth, as n Polo saith, in Thebeth, and hath a kind of swelling neere the nauell, which once in the Moone sheddeth his muskie bloud: the most o say it is a beast in China, which feedeth only on a sweete roote called Camarus: him they take and bruiſe all to peeces with blowes, and lay him where he soonest putrifieth, and then cut it out skinned and flesh together, and tie it vp like balls or cods. Pantogia affirmeth, That it is the stomacke of a beast somewhat greater then a Car, which liueth in the woods, in Countries adioyning to China. How euer, our greatest sweet we see is but rottennesse and putrifaction. There be in Malacca, Sion and Bengala some Goats, whose hornes are esteemed excellent against poison, which Linschoten affirmeth of his owne experience.

Now let vs shipp our selues ouer (for wee are not skillfull of Hanimants leapes) vnto the Ilands: hauing first feasted you with the fruits and other rarities of Nature in India.

F the Elephant and Rhinoceros is already spoken: and of diuers other of their beasts. The Elephant is a of great vse, both for Warre and Peace. When the keeper employeth him in any burthen, hee geneth first on his necke, and putteth his feet vnder the beasts eares, hauing a hook in his hand, which he sticketh about between his eares, b where his stones lie: they binde the burthen with a rope, which at his keepers bidding hee taketh in his mouth, and windeth it about his teeth, and so draweth the packe after him. The Elephants are said to keepe themselves chastly to one female, which is thought to bring forth in a yeare and halfe, or (as Aristotle affirmeth) two yeares. c Christophorus Acoſta, Linschoten, and other moderne Authors, as also Aristotle, Pliny, Alian and others of the Ancient, relate strange reports of the Elephant. For the Readers delight I will mention some. An Elephant being wearie, hasted home; his keeper after much entreaty not preuailing, told him it was for the King of Pomalgals seruice, which he would haue him doe: the beast answering hoo, hoo (which in the Malabar language signifieth I will, I will, as Acoſta interpreteth) fulfilled his request. The same Elephant wanting his meate; his master said it was, because his kettle wherein he vsed to boile it was broken, and therefore willed him to carry it to the Tinker; which he did, and brought it againe, but ill amended: whereupon he was sent againe, and the Tinker to trie him, amended it worse. The Elephant carries it to the riuer which ranne by, to see if it would hold water, and finding it to runne, came backe with great noise and anger: the Tinker entreats pardon, and at the third time doth it well; which yet the Elephant would not belecue, till by triall he saw it held water, and then shewing it to the standers by that it would hold, carried it home. A souldiour hurled a Coco-shell at an Elephant: which (because he could not then repay it) put the shell in his mouth, and a few dayes after seeing him in the street, at Chochin, he hurled the same out of his mouth at the souldier againe. Another souldier iniured the keeper of an Elephant, which would haue reuenged the wrong, but was forbidden by his said keeper: but after cyping the souldier, when his keeper was absent; he tooke him vp in his trunk and ducked him diuers times in the water, and then set him downe where he had taken him vp. They are very ambitious. One being vpbraided of lazinesse by his keeper, when as his burthen was too heauie for him to draw, and therefore they had brought another Elephant to helpe him; disdainig a companion, thrust him away, and drew himselfe dead in the place. Another in like case fell on his fore-legges, and was at his keepers chiding, and although he admitted a companion till the greater difficultie was overcome, yet feeling it then in his owne power to draw, he put away the other Elephant with his head and teeth, to recouer his credit. Plutarch tells of one which learned his theatricall gestures, practising them alone by moone-light: another which reuealed his keepers hard vsage, to his master, with other like stories. Pliny reports things more incredible. Of the admirable capacitie, gratitude, and other qualities of this beast, were tedious to recite. An ample testimonie hereof, is the example of the King of Aua his Elephant before mentioned. Plutarch, Pliny and Ælian, adde also Religion, in washing himselfe, adoring the Sunne, lifting vp his trunk into the air: but this was rather the relaters superstition, as that which also followes in Plutarch of Ioues offence with Antiochus, for offering foure Elephants in sacrifice, in expectation whereof, he made foure others of brasse. The mightiest Elephant which euer I read of by many degrees (if not some degrees beyond truth) is that which Eleazar is said to kill, which exceeded his fellowes, and yet each of them bare (saith the storie) two and thirtie fighting men with their furniture, in wooodden Castles, besides the keeper; whereas Pliny and Ælian speakes but of three, and the Moderne Observers but of fīue or sixe in those towers girded for fight to the Indian (and therefore the best) Elephants. Of the Rhinoceros is spoken before: the best are in Bengala. It is lesse and lower then the Elephant, snouted like a Hogge, with a horne therein, whence he hath his name. His skinne seemeth, as it were armed. It is enemie to the Elephant.

As for fowles, they haue Parrots of many kinds: sothe reckon foureteene: and Ney more pleasing in beauty, speech and other delights then the Parrot, but they cannot be brought out of that Countrey aliue. Of Bars they haue as bigge as Hennes, about Iava and the neighbour Ilands, Clusius bought one of the Hollanders, which they brought from the Iland of Swannes, Ilha do Cerne, newly stiled by them Maurice Iland: it was about a foot from the head to the taile, about a foot about, the wings one and twentie inches long, nine broad, the claw whereby it hung on the trees, was two inches, the pisse easily scene, &c. Heere & they also found a fowle which they called Walgh-vogel, of the bignesse of a Swanne, and most deformed shape.

In Banda and other Ilands, the Bird called Emia or Eme, is admirable. It is foure foot high, somewhat resembling an Ostrich, but hauing three clawes on the feet, and the same exceeding strong: it hath two wings rather to helpe it running, then seruiceable for flight: the legges great and long: they say it hath no tongue, and that it putteth out the pisse backwards, as the Camell: that it deuoureth Oranges and Egges, rendering the same in the ordure, nothing altered. It strikes with the heeles like a horse, will swallow an apple whole as bigge as ones fist, yea it swalloweth downe burning tollers without harme, and in a contrarie extreme, peeces of ice.

Of the birds of Paradise, elsewhere is shewed the falschood of that opinion, which induceth them to want feet, whereas they goe as other birds, but being taken, the bodies (for the most part) together with the feet are cut off, and they being dried in the Sunne, is so hardened and closed, as if Nature had so formed them. This is testified by Pigafeta, and the Hollanders. Of this, Clusius in his Auularium hath a large Discourse, shewing diuers kindes of them, a greater and lesse: and saith that John de Wee of Amsterdam told one of them, which had feet, to the Emperour, 1605. But I would not herein be tedious. Of the birds and beasts of India, Acosta, Linschoten, Clusius, besides Gesner and others can informe the studious.

They haue Crowes so bold, that they will come flying in at the windowes, and take the meat out of the dish, as it standeth on the table before them that are set thereat: and are such vexation to the Buffles, that they are forced to stand in waters vp to the necks, that they may be rid of them. They haue Rats, which the Cats dare not rouch, as big as yong Pigges, which vndermine the foundations of houses in such sort with their diggings, that they sometimes fall to the ground. There are other little red Rats, which smell like muske. Incredible is the scathe which they receiue in Goa by the Pistmires, which with such huge multitudes will presently assaile any thing that is farric, or to be eaten, that they are forced to set their cup-boords and chests, wherein are their richalls and apparell, with a wooden cistern of water vnder euery of their foure feet, and that in the middle of the roome. And if they forget to haue water in the cistern, presently these Ants are all ouer, and in the twinkling of an eye (saith Linschoten) they will consume a loafe of bread. The like cisternes haue they for their beds and cabins: and for the pearches whereon they set their Canarie birds, which else would be killed by Pistmires, yea though it hung on a string from the roose of the house. The poorer sort which want cup-boords, hang their fragments in a cloth on the wall, hauing a circle of char-coales about it; with this wall to keepe out this small creature, and great enemy. There are other Ants almost a finger long, and reddish, which do great harme to fruits and plants. Great is the harme which Moths and Wormes doe in mens cloths and bookes, which can very hardly be kept from them. But more hurtfull is the Barra, which flieth, and is twice as bigge as a Bee, from which nothing almost can be kept close enough, and are to bee esteemed as a plague among them, like to the Pistmires, and are commonly in all fat wares and sweet meats, and when they come vpon apparell they leaue their staining egges behinde.

The Salamander is said to be common in the Ile of Madagascar, an Island of Africa, by which they saile to India. Of Serpents<sup>b</sup> they haue diuers kinds, and very venomous, besides one other kinde as bigge as a Swine, which is destitute of poison, and hurteth onely by biting. But the superstition of the King of Calcut multiplieth their Serpents. For he causeth cottages to be set vp to keepe them from the raine, and maketh it death to whomsoever that shall kill a Serpenter a Cow. They thinke Serpents to be heauenly Spirits, because they can so suddenly kill men. So much hath the old Serpent, both at first, and since, deluded men by this venomous creature. There are Hogges with hornes in the Moluccas: in Celebes and Mindanao are Hogges, which besides the teeth they haue in their mowthes, haue other two growing out of their snouts, and as many behind their eares of a large spanne and a halfe in length.

Offish they haue great plentie and varietie. They haue of Hayens or Tuberos which deuour men, especially such as fish for Peasles. And others bath themselves in cisterns, nor daring to aduenture the Riuers for them. Of fish-monsters like men, and like a Hog some write: and as monstrous is that, which Maffius<sup>k</sup> telleth of a Whale, which with the opposition of his huge bodie, stayed the course of a ship, sayling with eight other ships into India, with so great a noise and shaking, as if they had fallen on a rock. Neither could the windes, which filled the sailes, further her course. The Mariners when they saw two elements of Winde and Current, so strongly encountred, looked out and saw this monster, with her finnes embracing the sides of the ship, and embracing the sterne with her taile, applying her bodie to the keele, which contained about eightie foot in length. They thought presently that some hellish fiend had been sent to deuour them; and consulted of remedie, at last sent out their Priest in his holy vestments, with Crosses and Exorcismes: who (like the greater Diuell) preuailed with these weapons, and the Whale forsooke them without further hurt.

There are<sup>m</sup> certaine fish-shells, like Scalop-shells, found on the shore; so great, that two strong men with a leauer can scarce draw one of them after them. They haue fish within them. A ship (called Saint Peter) fell vpon sands, sailing from Cochin, and safe. The men saved themselves, and of the wood of the old ship built a Caruall, wherein to get the Continent, but in the meane while were forced to make a sconsse, and by good watch to defend themselves from certaine Crabs of exceeding greatnesse, and in great numbers, and of such force, that whosoever they got vnder their clawes, it cost him his life, as two Marriners of the ship told Linschoten.

Crabbes

Crabbes heere with vs haue a sympathy with the Moone, and are fullest with her fullness in India there is a contrary antipathy, for at full Moone they are emptiest.

They haue Oysters, in which the Pearles are found, which are fished for by duckers, that diue into the water, at least ten, twenty, or thirty fathom. These men are naked, and haue a basket bound at their backs, which being at the bottome, they rake full of Oysters and durt together, and then rise vp and put them into boats. They lay them on the land, where the Sunne causeth them to open, and then they take out sometimes many, sometime few Pearles, as each Oyster yeeldeth, which is sometimes two hundred graines and more. The King hath one part; the souldiers, a second; the Iesuits, a third; and the fishers themselves the fourth: a small recompence for so great a danger, in which many men euery fishing-time lose their liues. The Hollanders found Turcoises so great that ten men might sit and dine within one of the shells.

Of the Indian Plants diuers haue written, both in their generall Herball, as Pendul and Label, Gerard, with other Herbarists: and in peculiar workes of this subiect, Clusius, Garcin de Oria, Christophor Acofta, &c. Some also pretending themselves Natural Principall Secretaries, haue found out in these and the like, not onely temperaments, learned by experience; but * Signatures of Natures owne impression, fitted to their seuerall and speciall uses in Physicke, finding out a strange harmonie and kinnesse in the Greater and lesser World: But leauing these speculations to better leason, let vs take a little view of the Indian Trees, Plants and fruits. Of their Fruits, Ananas is reckoned <sup>n</sup> one of the best: in taste like an Apricocke, in show a farre off like an Artichoke, but without prickles, very sweete of sent. It was first brought out of the West-Indies hither: it is as great as a Melon; the iuice thereof is like sweete Must: it is so hard of Nature, that if a knife sticke in it but halfe an houre; when it is drawne forth, it will bee halfe eaten vp: yet moderately eaten, hurteth not a man. Iacui are bigger then the former, and grow out of the bodie of the tree: they are of so many pleasant tastes, but hard to digest. Of Mangas there are three sorts, they are as bigge as Goose-egges. The first sort hath stones, which the second wanteth: the third is poyson so deadly, that yet no remedie hath bene found against it. Of the like bignesse is the Caiou, yellow, of good saueur, full of iuice like Limons: the end (as Apples haue a stalke, so) this fruit hath a Nut like the kidney of a Hare, with kernels toochsome and wholesome. The Iambus exceedeth in beautie, taste, smell, and medicinable vertue: it is as bigge as a Peare, smelleth like a Rose, is ruddie; and the tree is neuer without fruit or blossomes, commonly each branch hauing both ripe and vnripe fruits, and blossomes all at once: Linschoten saith, On the one side, the tree beareth ripe fruits, and the leaues fallen, the other covered with leaues and flowres, and it beareth three or foure times in a yeare. The langonius grow on a tree like a Plum-tree, full of prickles, and haue power of binding. The Papaio will not grow, but male and female together: but of these, also the Carambolus, Iambotins and other Indian fruits, I leaue to speake, as not writing an Indian Herball, but onely minding to mention such things, which, besides their Countrey, haue some varietie of Nature, worthie the obseruation. For the rest, Gracius ab Horto translated by Carolus Clusius, Paludanus, Linschoten, Christophorus Acofta (writing particularly of these things) and others in their generall Herballs, may acquaint you.

Of this sort is the Indian Figge-tree: if it may bee called a tree, which is not above a mans height, and within like to a reede, without any woodie substance: it hath leaues a fathom long, and three spannes broad, which open and spread abroad on the toppe of it: It yeeldeth a fruit in fashion of the clusters of Grapes, and beareth but one bunch at once, containing some two hundred figges at least, which being ripe, they cut the whole tree downe to the ground, leauing only the root, out of which presently groweth another, and within a moneth after beareth fruit, and so continueth all the yeare long. They are the greatest sustenance of the Countrey, and are of verie good taste, and smell, and in those parts men beleete that Adam first transgressed with this fruit.

But of greater admiration is the Cogno-tree, being the most profitable tree in the world, of which in the Ilands of Maldua they make and furnisht whole ships: so that

o Of this, besides Linschoten, see Garcin de Oria, with Clusius notes. Exot. lib. 7. c. 26.

(save the men themselves) there is nothing of the ship, or in the ship, neither racking, merchandize, or ought else but what this tree yeeldeth. The tree groweth high and slender, the wood is of a spongie substance, easie to be sowed, when they make vessels thereof, with cords made of Cocau. For this Nut (which is as bigge as an Edridge egge) hath two sorts of huskes, as our Walnuts, whereof the vppermost is hairy (like hempe) of which they make Oream and Cordage, of the other shell they make drinking-cups. The fruit, when it is almost ripe, is full of water within; which by degrees changeth into a white harder substance, as it ripeneth. The liquor is very sweet, but with the ripening groweth sowre. The liquor extracted out of the tree is medicinally, and if it stand one houre in the Sunne, it is very good vineger, which being distilled, yeeldeth excellently Aqua-vita, and Wine. Of it also they make, by setting it in the Sunne, Sugar. Of the meat of the Nut dried, they make oyle. Of the pith or heart of the tree, is made paper for bookes and evidences. Of the leaues they make coverings for their houses, mats, tents, &c. Their apparell, their firing, and the rest of the commodities which this tree (more plentifull in the Indies, then willowes in the Low-Countries) yeeldeth, would be too tedious to recite. They will keepe the tree from bearing fruit, by cutting away the blossomes, and then will hang some vessel thereon, which receiveth from thence that liquor, of which you have heard. It is the Cannijns living, and they will climbe vp these trees, which yet have no boughes, but on the toppe, like Apes. This tree hath also a continuall succession of fruits, and is never without some.

No lesse wonder doth that tree & cause, which is called Arbre de rais, or the tree of roots: Clusius calleth it (by Plinius authoritie) the Indian Fig-tree: and Gorgius (with more confidence, then reason) affirmeth it to be the tree of Adams transgression. It groweth out of the ground, as other trees, and yeeldeth many boughes, which yeeld certaine threads of the colour of gold, which growing downewards to the earth, do there take roote againe, making as it were new trees, or a wood of trees, cousing by this meanes, the best part sometimes of a mile: in which the Indians make galleries to walke in: The figges are like the common, but not so pleasant.

The Arbor vitæ & deserueth mention: It grows at Goa, brought thither (in thought) from Malacca: The Hollanders saw one at Acaia in Samatra. In the day-time and at Sunne setting, you shall not see a flowre on it; but within halfe an houre after, it is full of flowres, which at the Sunne rising fall off; the leaues shutting themselves from the Sunnes presence, and the tree seeming as if it were dead. The flowres in forme and greatnesse are like to those of the Orange-tree, but sweeter, in Acoftas iudgement, then any flowres which euer he smelled: the Portugals have vsed all meanes to haue it grow in Europe, but our Sunne hath refused to nourish such sul'en vnhankefull contents.

And that yee may know the Indians want not their Metamorphoses and Legends, they tell that a man, named Parisatico, had a daughter, with whom the Sunne was in loue; but lightly forsaking her, he grew amorous of another: whereupon this Damofell slew her selfe, and of the ashes of her burned carcase came this tree.

Bettile: is a leafe somewhat like a Bay-leafe, and climberh like Iuie, and hath no other fruit: neither is any fruit more in vse then these leaues: at bed and boord, and in the streets as they passe, they chew these leaues; and in their gossipings or visiting of their friends, they are presently presented with them; and eate them with Auca, which is a kind of Indian Nut. It saueh their teeth from diseases, but couloureth them as if they were painted with blacke blood. When they chew it, they spit out the iuice, and it is almost the onely exercise of some, which thinke they could not liue, if they should abstaine one day from it.

They haue an herbe called Dutroa, which causeth distraction, without vnderstanding any thing done in a mans presence: sometimes it maketh a man sleepe, as if he were dead the space of foure and twentie houres, except his feete bee washed with cold water, which restoreth him to himselfe; and in much quantitie it killeth. The women giue their husbands thereof, and then in their sights will prostitute their bodies to their lewder louers, and will call them Corndow, stroking them by the beard: the p Clusius describeth this tree out of the Relations of Plin. lib. 12. Curt. l. 9. Strabo lib. 5. Theophrastus lib. 4. and mentioneth like kinds (if not the same) out of Lopez de Castagneda lib. 7. Oniedo lib. 6. Lopez or Pigafetta of Congo, &c. Cluf. Exot. lib. 1. c. 1. q Garcias ab Horto, lib. 2. c. 1. c. Acofta, c. 37. saith it growes most in Malabar.

the husband sitting with his eyes open, grinning like a foole, and when he returneth to himselfe, knoweth nothing but that he hath slept.

Another strange herbe is called Sentida, or feeling<sup>a</sup>, for that if any passe by it, and toucheth it, or throweth sand or any thing else on it, presently it becommeth as if it were withered, and closeth the leaues; so continuing as long as the man standeth by; but so soone as he is gone, openeth fresh and faire: and touching it againe, it withereth as before. The Indians suppose it will procure loue, and restore Virginitie: A Physician amongst them became madde with studying to finde out the nature of this herbe. Pigafetta speakes of another sort, as after shall follow.

But the strangest plant (for so may we terme it) is, that at Goa the hornes of beasts slaughtered are throwne together in one place, lest they should bee occasion of indignation and reproch to any; the shewing or naming of a horne being there ominous. These hornes thus cast forth, after a certaine time, take root, and the rootes grow two or three spannes in length.

Pepper (whereof there are diuers sorts) groweth at the foot of Arecca, or some other tree, on which it climbeth, as Bettele or <sup>b</sup> luie; growing in bunches like grapes, half a spanne long, and as bigge as ones finger, Greene like luie when it is gathered, and in five or sixe dayes drying in the Sunne becomes blacke.

Cinamom <sup>c</sup> is the inner barke of a tree as bigge as an Oliue; with leaues like Bay-leaues, and fruit like an Oliue: The drying of the barke maketh it roll together. Within three yeares after, the tree yeeldeth another barke, as before. In Seylon is the best. They of Ormuz call it Darchini, that is, wood of China: and selling it at Alexandria, call it <sup>d</sup> Cinamomum.

Cloues <sup>f</sup> grow in the Moluccos on trees, like Bay-trees, yeelding blossomes, first white, then Greene (at which time they yeeld the pleasantest smell in the world) and last of all red and hard, which are the Cloues. They are so hot of nature, that if a paille orub of water should stand in the chamber, when they clense them, or any vessell of wine or other moistur, in two dayes the Cloues would sucke it out and drie it. The same nature is in the vnspunne Silke of China.

The Nutmegge-tree, <sup>g</sup> is like a Peach or Pease-tree, and groweth most in Banda and Iaua. The fruit is like a Peach, the inner part whereof is the Nutmegge, which is couered and interlaced with the Mace or flowre, and ouer that, is the fruit like a Peach, as if haue seeme them conserued. When the fruit is ripe, the first and outermost part openeth, as it is with our Walnuts, then the Mace flourisheth in a faire red colour, which in the ripening becommeth yellow. Cardamomum is of three sorts; the Indians vse it in their meats, and commonly chew it in their mouthes, as being good against a stinking breath, and euill humors in the head: it is much like to Panike. <sup>h</sup> Lac is a strange drug, made by certaine winged Pisfaires of the gumme of trees, which they sucke vp, and then make the Lac round about the branches, as the Bees make hony and waxe. The raw Lac is of a darke red colour, but being refined, they make it of all colours, and therewith varnish their beds, tables, and vse it for other ornaments, and for hard waxe.

Annil or <sup>i</sup> Indigo growes in Cambaia: the herb is like Rosemary, and sowne as other herbs, in due time pulled and dried: then made wet, and beaten, and then dried againe, and prepared; first it is Greene, and after blew. Of <sup>k</sup> Sanders there are three sorts, white, yellow and red. In Tymor, an Island by Iaus, are whole woods of Sanders; the trees are like Nut-trees, with a fruit like a Cherry, but vnprofitable; onely the wood (which in the Sanders) is esteemed. <sup>l</sup> Snakewood groweth in Seylon, and is good against the sting of Snakes and other poyson, a medicine learned of the beast Quil, which being in continuall enmitie with Snakes, herewith healeth their bitings. The trees of <sup>m</sup> Lignum Aloes are like Oliue trees, but somewhat greater: the innermost part of the wood is best, with blacke and browne veines, and yeelding an Oylie moy-sture: it is sold in weight against Siluer and Gold. There is another kinde <sup>n</sup>, where-with they burne their dead Bramenes. It were an endlesse peece of worke, and not so pertinent to our purpose, to speake of the rest of the spices, drugges and fruits in India: These (as the rarest or chiefe) I haue chosen so (as it were) to recreate our Reader with a walke, and howres-view in this Indian Garden, being before full cloyed with our tedious Narrations of their Superstitions. It is thought that these stones doe proceed of the pasture whereon these beasts feede. ### CHAP. XIII.

A generall Discourse of the Sea, and of the Seas in and about Asia.

FTER our long perambulation of the Asian Continent, the sea inuironing doth sollicite our next endeouours, that the Reader might there refresh his wearied sense, with a new succession of Natures varieties, and humane vanities. And first, while our barke bee made readie to shippe vs ouer to some of those Ilands, let vs (as it were on the shore) take view of this, so strong, so weake, so constant, and so vnconstant waterie Element. That the Earth and Sea make one Globe, we haue elsewhere shewed in the Historie of their Creation. In which, the Earth being (as it seemeth) at the first forming of it, more perfectly sphericall, and wholly couered with waters, by the power of that Almighty decree and word (Let the waters be gathered into one place, that the Island may appeare) both the waters (as some gather) were more condensate, which before were more suttile, and therefore occupied more roome; and the earth was in some places lifted vp, in others depressed with deepe Furrowes and Trenches, to make more and conuenient receptacles for the Sea; and withall fit matter yeelded for the elevation both of Mountaines about the ordinarie height of the earth, and of the earth and continent also in the higher places, whence the greatest Rivers deriue their Originall, in comparison of the lower and maritime partes, where they empty themselves into the Sea. This is the proper seate of the element of water, called aqua, quod signifies of the equall and plaine face and superficies thereof, or as Lactantius with a further fetch obserueth, a qua nata sunt omnia, because hence all things are bred and nourished. Now because waters are eyther without motion, as in Lakes; or of an vniform motion, as in Riuiers; or diuerse, as in the Sea; the Heathen ascribed a trident or three-fold Scepter to Neptune their supposed Sea-God.

That the Earth and Sea haue one and the same Center, both of grauity and greatness, appeareth by this, that the parts of Earth and Water falling from a high place, without other impediment, haue the same direct descent: a peece of earth also falleth perpendicularly into the water, with equall and right angles. And that the water naturally inclineth to a roundnesse, appeareth in the small drops thereof, which gather themselves into that forme, and by the easier discerning things on shore from the tops of the hatches of a ship in the Sea: likewise by the eleuation or depression of the Pole and Starres, no lesse in sayling, then land-trauels, to the North or South: also in preventing or lengthning the Sunnes light by sayling East or West, as before hath bene obserued in the Spaniards and Portugals, meeting at the Philippina's, and differing a whole day in their reckoning, the Portugals loosing by meeting the Sunne in their Easterne course, that which the Spaniards get by following him in a Western. Yea, even in one dayes sayling this may be manifest, as Record instanteth in a ship sayling West from Island, in one of their dayes of twentie houres getting halfe an houre, and in the next day returning with like swiftnesse, looseth as much of the Sunne. Yea in Riuiers of very long course, besides that descent (before mentioned) from higher to lower passages, some obserue a kinde of roundnesse or circular rising in compassing the globe, which else must needes be exceedingly deformed in the Riuiers of Nilus, Amon, and others which runne neere an eighth part thereof.

The Sea is great and wide, saith the Psalmist: and at first covered the whole earth like a garment, till for mans vse the drie land appeared, which for mans abuse was againe in the dayes of Noah couered. And had not God set the Sea a bound which it cannot passe, it would (so some translate it) returne to couer the Earth for ever. It is his peremptorie decree, who commanded, and it was made, that though the waues thereof rage, yet they cannot preuaile, though they roare, yet they cannot passe ouer. And thus many of the ancient and later interpreters of Genesis, doe auerre, that the earth is indeede lower then the waters, as in the beginning of this Worke is obserued; as if God did by a kinde of miracle in Nature, bridle and restraîne the tempestuous force of the Sea, Regnum omnium uulnificissima (to vse Basils wordes) debilissimaq; arena: with Sand the weakest of all creatures. Thus held Aquinas, Carthusianus, Catharinus, and others. Which opinion being granted, how easie were it for the Sea to enclose the earth in her watry mantle, and againe to make a Conquest of the drie land, hauing such forces of her own, and such re-enforcements from the Ayre and the Earth it selfe? Her owne power, even by order of Nature and proportion of the Elements, cannot but seeme dreadful: in which, as the ayre exceedeth the water, and is it selfe exceeded of the fire; so the water to some seemes no lesse to surmount the earth, as the lowest and least of the elements. And what Armies of exhalations doth the Sunne daily muster in the great vnder plaine, which would succour their mother in such an attempt? Besides that, even the earth, as it is euery where compassed of the Sea, doth compasse in it selfe so many Seas, Lakes, Riuiers, in the vppermost face thereof, as professed partakers; and the inward bowels thereof haue daily intelligence, and continuall conspiracie with the waters, by those secret pores and priue passages, whereby it commeth to passe, that albeit all Riuiers runne to the Sea, yet the Sea is not filled. And were it possible that so many worlds of waters should daily and houely flow into this watric world, and that such a world of time together, and yet the Sea nothing encreased, but that (as Salomon there saith) The Rivers goe to the place from whence they returne and goe ? that is, they runne into the Sea, and thence, partly by the Sunnes force, elevated and restored in rains, and other Meteors, partly by filling the veynes of the Earth with Springs, doe both wayes returne againe in Rivers to the Sea. This <sup>a</sup> appeareth by the Dead Sea, and by the Cassian, which receiue many Rivers without open payment thereof to the Ocean: and at the straits of Gibraltar, the Ocean commonly hath a current in at one end, and the Euxine Sea at the other, besides abundance of other waters out of Europe, Asia, Africa, and yet is no fuller.

Many indeed are the wonders of the Lord in the deep, and this concerning the height, depth, and profunditie thereof one of the highest, deepest, and requiring the profoundest skill to search. That the waters are gathered on swelling heapes in round forme, compassing the earth, is already proued; which to a vulgar capacitie may seeme to enforce a height of the water about some parts of the earth: but seeing that the earth and waters haue one center, and height is properly to be measured by distance from that center; it seemeth vnlikely that the water should be higher then the earth: or altogether equall to the height thereof, in whose channels and concavities it is contained. And though the Sea swelleth, and lifteth vp it selfe into that forme which best agreeth to that globe which is compact of it and the earth: yet is it not capable (being a liquid fluible bodie) in the greatest depth and widenes, of such elevations as we see in high and mountainous Regions, whereby the earth seemeth to exceed the due and iust proportion of her owne globositie, and thereby no lesse to excell the highest elevation (as we may terme it) of the Sea, then the cliffes and shores doe those waters which approach them. And what needes a conceit of miracle in the very ordinarie constitution and conseruation of Nature? though all Nature if we regard it as a Creation by supernaturall power, be nothing else but miracle. Some indeed dreame of I know not what proportion of the elements, whereby they would haue the water to exceede the earth, as before is said: and it is true that the vpper face and vtter superficies of the waters (as ought that is knowne to the contrary) is as great <sup>b</sup> as that of the earth. But if we compare the depth of the waters with the diameter of the earth, we shall finde that in most places the one is not so many fathoms as the other is miles. Yea who euer soundeth at such depth? And whereas the Diameter of the earth is by some reckoned 6872  $\frac{1}{2}$  miles, and by some more, who euer cast line and leade into the Sea to measure 1000. fathom? Yea, in <sup>c</sup> Scaligers opinion, the earth is so much greater then the water, that if the mountaines were cast downe into these watric receptacles, and the earth brought into a perfect roundnesse, there would no place in it be left for the water. Records recordeth not so much as he, yet holdes the earth almost 10000. times as great as the Sea and all other waters. And if we receiue the Iewish Tradition, mentioned by our Apocrypha <sup>e</sup> Esdras, this may be more probable: for he saith, that (euen in the vtter face of the globe) the waters were gathered into a seventh part, and fixe parts of the earth kept drie. Some imagine <sup>f</sup> a bottomlesse depth, passing quite thorow the earth, through which the Moone being in the other Hemisphere, causeth the heightning of the tydes, no lesse then when she is present in ours; which gaue no small helpe also in their conceit in the generall deluge: which if it be true, addes a greater proportion to the Sea then we haue obserued. But because little reason, and no experience can be shewed for this assertion, I will not insist in refutation. But that deluge being caused by breaking vp the fountaines below, and violent stormes from aboue, confute that opinion that the Sea should be higher then the Earth, which then might haue effected the flood without eyther of those former causes. But why doe I drowne my innocent Reader, with my selfe, in these depths of the Sea? which some measure by the height of hills; others <sup>g</sup> resemble those extraordinary land-heights to extraordinary whirlpooles, but seeing the Sea is tenant to the earth, which hath (as before we haue said) remoued it selfe in some sort, to make way and room for it, the more ordinarie height and eleuation of the one may seeme to answer the more ordinarie depth and descending of the other. These bottomes of the Sea haue also their diuersified shape and forme, some, as it were of hillockes mountaines, valleyes, with the<sup>h</sup> Acclivities and Declivities of places, as in the shelves, shallows, rockes, Ilands, appeareth.

The saltnesse of the Sea some ascribe to the first creation; some, to the sweat of the earth, rotted with the Sunne; some, to the saltnesse of the earth, especially in Minerals of that nature; some, to a dust vapours, partly lea fall on the Sea, partly raised from it to the brinnes and face thereof; some to the motion of the Sea; some, to vnder-earth or vnder-sea<sup>h</sup> fires of bituminous nature, causing both this saltnesse and the motion also of the sea; and some, to the working of the Sunne, which draweth out the purer and finer parts, leaving the grosser and baser behinde: as in this little world of our bodie, the purest parts of our nourishment being employed in, and on the bodie, the vaine and other excrements remayning, doe retain a saltnesse. I will not determine this question, neyther that of the ebbing and flowing of the Sea, which (some<sup>l</sup> say) is the breath of the world; some, the fires aforesaid boyling in and vnder the water; some, the waters in holes of the earth, forced out by spirits; some, the meeting of the East and West Ocean; some ascribe it to the<sup>m</sup> Moone, naturally drawing water, as the Load-stone, Iron; some to the variable light of the Moone: a variable light they all give. They that send vs to God and his Decree in Nature, haue said what is the true cause, but not how it is by naturall meanes effected. Certaine it is, that the Ocean and the Moone are companions in their motion: vncertaine whether the Ocean hath a naturall power in it selfe, or from the Moone, so to move: which is made so much the more doubtfull, by reason that they follow not the Moone in all places of the world alike. Vetmannius writeth, that in Cambaia the tides are contrarie to the course they holde in these partes; for they encrease not with the full, but with the wane of the Moone: and so the Sea-crabs doe likewise. In the Iland of Socotora, Don Iohn of Castro obserued many dayes, and found (contrary both to the Indian and our wont) that when the Moone riseth it is high Sea, and as the Moone ascends, the tide descends and ebbereth, being dead-low water when the Moone is in the Meridian, and this operation he found continuall. With vs also our highest tides are two dayes after, and not at the very full and change. About Vaigat Stephen Barrrough found it to flow by fits, very vncertaine. Sealiger saith, that the full-Moones at Calecut cause the increase of the water, & at the mouth of Indus (not farre thence, in the same Sea) the new-Moons. But what exceeding difference of the tides doe we finde in the Downes, and other places on our owne coasts, both for time and quantitie? that at once in the compass of ones light, there should be both floud, ebbe, and these differing in degrees: and that in some places of our coast it should rise one fathom, in some two, in the Thames three, neere Bristol ten, and on some part of the French coast, neere St. Malos fiftene, whereas our shore ouer against it riseth but two. The like differences may be obserued between the Terrhene Sea, and that on the opposite coast of Barbary, the one swelling, the other not at all heightned: in the East and West Indies I could instance the like, not mentioning those currents which hinder all courses of tides. Further, the floud continueth in some places seuen houres, in some foure, in most fixe. In Negropone it is said to ebbe and flow seuen times a day; and Patritius affirmeth, that himselfe obserued at Auffer in Liburnia in a hand-made strait of Sea water, the same to happen twentie times in a day. Again we see these tide motions differ, according to their daily, weekly, monethly, and as some adde, halfe yearly and yearly alterations. All which varieties cannot be attributed to one simple cause, neyther to any vniuersall, whether Sunne, Moone, or Native heat of the Sea, or any the like: although we must needs acknowledge (which we cannot know) one principall cause; hindred or altered by manifold accidents, and therefore producing effects thus diuersified. Other motions also may be obserued in the Sea, as that namely which is continuall (and if we call the tides the breathing, this may be termed the pulse of the Sea) whereby the waters alway wash the shore falling on and off, couering and presently vncouering the feete of such as stand by, which hath force to expell all Heterogeneous or differing natures, as drowned carkasses, wrackes, and the like. This (as that of the tides) Patritius, Pentem, Lidyate, & others, attribute to a kind of boyling, which (as in a vessel of seething water) causeth it thus to rise and fall, and to expell the drosse and things contrary. But the

the heate which causeth this boyling one ascribes to the Sunne, another to fires in the Sea, another to the naturall heate of the Sea ingendring spirits, and causing rarefaction and motion. Patricius doth not onely ascrib this, but that the Sea is as a sublimine Planet, moving it selfe, and moved by the superiour bodies to effect the generation of things: for which cause q Orpheus calls the Ocean father of Gods, men & other things. The saltnesse thereof is (in his opinion) the instrument of this motion, and the nearest inward and most proper cause of marine movings, as in the two Merian<sup>r</sup> Lakes appeareth, the one whereof is salt, and ebbes and flowes, which the other being fresh, doth not. This saltnesse (saith he) with greater heate ingendreth more spirits in moisture: the cause of greater tides he thinketh to be the shallownesse, and narrower shoares, the force of the Ocean thrusting the same most forwards where it findes interruptions and indraughts: the certainty of these motions he ascribes (according to his Philosophie) to the soule of the world, moving this, as other Planets. For my confuze, it shall be rather on my selfe then these opinions, where silence rather then boldnesse be commended. ¶ Even a foole whiles he holdeth his peace is accounted wise. And, to borrow the wordes of a subtile Disputer, Quod ubiq; clamare soleo, non sibil scire, maxime convenit his disquisitioni, quæ maris tractat motum. Let this also be arranged amongst the wonders of the Lord in the deepe, rather to be admired then comprehended.

I might here speake of other Sea-motions, eyther particular or accidentall; as in the open Seas betweene the Tropikes, & vncertaine whether it may be termed an Easterly winde, or some impetuous violence, caused by the superiour motions which draw together with them the inferiour elements: likewise those currents in divers coasts, as at Madagascar on the African, and in the great Bay on the American shores. From other accidents arise other motions; caused by the windes in the ayre (which somewhere have their set seasons) by whirle-pooles, or other contrary currents, meeting in the Sea by capes, indraughts, riuers, llands of the land: by the conceptions and traueilling throwes in the waters, in bringing forth some imminent tempest, and the like. I might adde also touching the Originall of Fountaines, which both Scripture, and reason finding no other store sufficient, deriue from the Sea, how they are from thence conveyed by secret channels and concavities vnder the earth, and by what workemen of Nature thus wrought into new and fresh waters. Scaliger experiment to proue the Sea water at the bottom fresh, by bottles filled there by cunning Diu<sup>r</sup> or otherwise, is by Patricius his experience, as he saith, found false. And this freshnes of the springs, notwithstanding their salt originall from the Sea, may rather be ascribed to percolation and straying through the narrow sponge passages of the earth, which makes them leaue behinde (as an exacted toll) their colour, thicknesse, and saltnesse. Now how it should come to passe that they should spring out of the earth being higher then the Sea, yea, out of the highest mountaines, hath exercised the wits of Philosophers; some ascribing it to a sucking qualitie of the thirstie or spongie earth, some to the weight of the earth pressing and forcing the waters yppwards, some to the motion of the Sea continually (as in a Pumpe) thrusting forwards the water, which expelleth the weaker ayre, and followeth it till it finde an out-let, whereof both by the continuall protrusion of the Sea, and for auoyding a vacuum or emptinesse (which nature abhorreth) it holdeth continuall possession: some find out other causes. And Mr. Lichard in a Treatise of the Originall of Springs, attributeth the same to vnder-earth fires, which no lesse by a naturall distillation worketh these waters vnder the earth, into this freshnesse and other qualities, then the Sunne and heauenly fires doe by exhalations aboue. Yea, such are his speculations of these hidden fires, that he maketh them the causes of Windes, Earth-quakes, Minerals, Gemmes, fertilitie and sterilitie of the earth, and of the saltnesse and motion (as is before said) of the Sea. But loth were I to burne or drowne my Readers in these fierie and waterie Disputes: let vs from these speculations retire our selues to the experimentall profites and commodities which this element yeeldeth.

Concerning the commodities of the Sea, as the world generally, so the little models of the world, the llands (whereof this of Great Britanne is iustly acknowledged the most excellent of the world, sometime accounted another world) haue great commodities to celebrate and acknowledge the same. It is a wall of defence about our shores, Great conveyer of the worlds commodities to our use, conuey of the surquedrie and excesses of Rivers, vniser (by traffick) of nations which it selfe seuereth, an open field for passages of peace, a pitched field in time of war, disdayning single personall combats, and only receiving whole cities and Castles, encompassed, with wals of wood, which it setteth together with deadly hatred & dreadfullst force of the Elements, the fierie thunder, syrie blasts, watry billowes, rockes, sheldes, and bottomes of the earth, all conspiring to build here a house for death, which by fight or flight on land is more easily accomplished (and how did it scorne the Invincible title of the Spanish Fleet in 88, and effect thus much on our behalfe against them?) The Sea yeeldeth Fish for diet, Pearles and other jewels for ornament, variety of creatures for vse and admiration, refuge to the distressed, compendious way to the Passengers, and Portage to the Merchant, Customes to the Prince, Springs to the earth, Cloudes to the skie, matter of contemplation to the minde, of action to the bodie; once, it yeeldeth all parts of the world to each part, and maketh the world (as this Treatise in part sheweth) knowne to it selfe. Superstition hath had her Sea. prophets which haue found out other sea-profits, as for the purging of sinnes: and the Roman Diuines caused <sup>b</sup> Hermaphrodites to be carried to the Sea for expiation, the Persian Magi thought it pollution to spit or doe other natural necessities therein. But of these in diuers places.

The Sea is commonly diuided into the Mediterranean and Ocean: and vnder that Med-land appellation are contained all the Seas and Gulfs that are seated within the Land, as the Arabian, Persian, Baltike, Bengalan, and especially such as the Sea of Sodom and the Caspian, which haue no apparant commerce with the Ocean: but principally is that Sea called Mediterranean, which entring at the Straites of Gibraltar, is both larger then any of the rest (contayning about ten thousand miles in circuit) and sheweth not on one onely, but on all the parts of the elder world, washing indifferent-ly the shores of Asia, Africke, and Europe.

The Seas beare also the names of the Countries, Cities, Hills, Rivers, and Landes, by which they passe, or of some other accident there happened; as the Atlantike, or Germane Ocean, the Adriaticke, the redde, white, or black Seas, the Sea of Ladies, the Euxine by a contrarie appellation, for their inhospitalitie.

But to contract our speech vnto Asia, we finde the Sea prodigall of his best things, and of himselfe vnto it, clasping, with a louely embrace, all this Asian Continent, saue where a little Necke of Land diuides it from Africa; and no great space, together with Tanais, from Europe. Yea, as not herewith satisfying his loue to this Asian Nymph, in many places he insinuates himselfe within the Land by Gulfs or Bayes, making his louing armes about some whole countries: otherwhere (as it were) by hostile ynderminings he maketh Seas farre from the Sea; and hath yeelded so many Islands, as rather may seeme admirable then credible.

Of those Seas banished from communie and societie with the Ocean, are that Sea of Sodom largely described in our first booke. Many other Lakes also, as of Kitaisa, Yan, Chiamay, Dangu, Guian, and the like, as great or much greater, doe no lesse deserve the name of Seas: but the most eminent of all the rest is the Caspian, or Hyrcan Sea, called in these dayes diuersly of the places thereon situate, as the Sea of Bachu, &c. the Moores call it (as they doe also the Arabian Gulfe) Bohar Corfun, that is, the Sea enclosed. It hath bene diuers times sayled on and ouer by men of our Nation, passing the way into Tartaria, Media, and Persia. The first of whom was Mr. Anthony Jenkinson in 1581, who affirmeth, that this Sea is in length about two hundred leagues, and in breadth a hundred and fiftie, without any issue to other Seas: the East part ioyneth with the Turkemen Tartars, the West with the Chyrcaesses and Caucasus, the North with the Nagay Tartars, and Volga, which springing out of a Lake neere Nouogrode, runneth two thousand miles, and there with seuentie mouthes falleth into the Sea: the South hath Media and Persia. In many places it hath fresh water, in others brackish, in others salt, as our Ocean, If we hold the Sea naturally, or by selfe-motion, or by exhalation, salt: then the freshnes may be attributed to the abundance of fresh Rivers, which all com running with tributes of their best wealth to this seeming close-fisted miser, which which (for ought the world can see of his good workes) communicateth with no other sea, any part of that abundance, which the Rivers Volga, Yaic, Yern, Cyrus, Arax, Ardok, Oxus, Chelchel, and others many, bring into his coffers. And yet is this Winter neuer the richer, Nature it selfe holding a close conspiracie to dispossesse him of his needlesse treasures. Yea the Rivers themselves (his chiefe Factors and Brokers) in the Winter time grow cold in allceagance, and frozen in respect of wonted ductie: or else are detayned by a greater Commaunder, the Generall of Winters forces, Frost, who then closeth and locketh vp both them and him in Icie prisons, till the Sunne taking a nearer view of this incroaching vsurper, by the multitude of his Arrowes and Darts chase him out of the field, and freeth this Sea and Riuer from their colde fare and close dungeons, wherewith Ice their hard Gao'ler had entertained them. Christopher Barroughs relateth, that from the middle of Nouember till the midst of March, they found this frozen Charity of the Caspian to their cost: being forced with great perill and paine, to trauell many dayes on the Ice, and seare their ship in the Sea, which there was cut in pieces with violence of the frost. And yet is Althacan on the Northerne shore, (where Volga and the Caspian holde their first conference) in fixe and fortie degrees and nine minutes, from whence this Sea extendeth beyond the fortieth degree Southwards. The freshnesse of the Rivers make it thus subiect to frost, which hath no power ouer the salt waters of the Ocean, as by most learned men is holden: which appeareth in the Baltike and Euxine Seas, which holding not so full commerce with the Ocean, and filled with fresh Rivers, are made an easie prey to that Icie Tyrant, whose forces the more open Seas, with their salt defence easily withstand; and although from the mouthes of Rivers, Bayes, and Shores, he brings whole lands of Ice into those waterie Plaines; yet euen vnto the Pole, so farre as hath beene discovered, the Sea with an open mouth proclaimeth defiance, and enioyeth his Elementary freedome.

The Euxine Sea which is deuided from the Caspian by a hundred leagues of land, hath this reason of the freezing ascribed by Disarius in Macrobium, that the fresh waters which flow from so many Rivers, being lighter then those on the Sea swimme on the top, and are subiect to frost, which the Sea water is not. And this force of the fresh waters is common to most great Rivers, as Plata, Zaire, and others: and in the Euxine it is obserued of Phasis by Arrianus. The thawing of those frosts is the cause of those foggies and mists, which so much infect these Seas, and are so great a hinderance in all Northerne Discoveries. And hence in likelyhood came the prouerbe of Cimmerian darkenesse, rather then from that Hansum which Haithon mentioneth (a place of a hundred miles, compassed with a wall of pitchie darkenesse, whence sometimes the crows of Cockes and like sounds are heard, but none dare enter) or other like fabulous conceits of the Poets. From these darke mists the Euxine is called also Mare Maurum, or the blacke Sea; it was in olde time called the Sarmatian, Cimmerian, Taurican, Caspean, Phasian, Pontike, and what other titles, peoples, hills, riuers, or speciall occurrences fixed on it. Of the description thereof, Arrianus hath written a whole Treatise, and Strabon hath largely commented thereon, and Ortellius hath bestowed good paines in that argument, to whom I referre the Reader. Arrianus was employed in this Discovery by Adrian the Emperour, beginning at Trapezond; where he set up Adrians Image, and where before that was a Temple dedicated to Mercurius and Peleusius his Nephew. He sayled from thence descrying and describing the Coasts, Riuer, Cities, about the Sea. In Phasis he obserueth the lightnesse of that water, fresh on the top, salt in the bottom where it is mixed with the Sea, or rather slideth ouer it. They had here a lawe that none might carrie water into Phasis; and if they had any in their stups, they must at the entrance of this Riuer cast it forth, otherwise fearing an vnquiet and dangerous Nauigation. The water of this Riuer (he saith) will last vnconcorrenne yeares. This Phasis, Aeschylus calleth the limit of Europe and Asia. At the left hand of the entrance was set the Image of the Phasian Goddesse, seeming by her Cymball in her hand, and Liona drawing her Chariot, to be none other then Asia. There also (as a holy relique) was shewed the Anchor of the ship Argo, which because it was of Iron, seemed to our Author to be counterfeit, especially there being the fragments of an Anchor of stone, which seemed more likely to be that of the Argonautes, so much chaunted by the Poets. Other monuments of Iason he found none.

But to looke backe to the Strait or Thracian Bosphorus, he there nameth the Temple of Iupiter Urius, Donsa and Gyllus report the pleasantnesse and fertilitie of these parts. Iason did sacrifice to the twelue Gods, and buile a Temple to them. Apollo had his Temple neere the Strait, the most ancient at Chalcedon, giuing place to none of the Oracles, two at Bizantium, and the other neere thereunto. But with these and manifold other antiquities, Gyllus can best acquaint the more leasurely Reader. Of all the Cities along this shore, I cannot but mention Heraclea, where were obserued the donations of Iupiter Stratus, his Altars, and two Oakes, planted there in his honour by Heracles. This Citie was also made famous by the Legend of Hercules, descending to hell of Cerberus, Acheron, and the like. Of this Citie Mennon wrote a large Historie, some parts whereof doe yet remaine. Cotta after a strait siege subduing it to the Romans, among other spoyle seized vpon the pyramidall statue of Hercules, (whom he would haue serue him in a thirteenth labour) exceeding in sumptuousnesse, greatnesse, and price: neere to which was his Clubbe of solid golde, as was also his Lions skinnie and his Quiver. Many monuments and offerings he carried out of the Temples. Both Mennon and Eliau tell of Dionysius sonne of Clarchus King of Heraclea, which grew into so grosse and vnwonted degree of fatnesse, that it made him vnfit, not for state-affaires onely, but for necessarie functions of life, especially in his sleepe. From which to awaken him this remedie was deuised, to thrust long needles into his flesh, which whiles they passed through that new-come flesh and fatnesse, were no more like stones of a stone, til they came to the more naturall flesh of his bodie. When he fate judgement, he had a kinde of Cupbord which hid the rest of his bodie, leauing his face onely open to be seene. Marcianus Heracleotes, one of this Citie, hath written a Periplos or Circumnauigation of these and other Seas. But lest I seeme frozen in these colder Narrations, or to haue lost my selfe in these Cimmerian mists, I will get me out of this Sea, and obserue the principall Ilands adiacent to Asia. For if I should follow these Discourses of the Sea, enter into a new, of the huge Whales and other varieties of fishes and monsters, inhabitants of the Sea, which is thought to haue creatures resembling in some sort all those of the land, both men and beasts: I should grow tedious; and Gaeser with others haue done it already.

IF we should shippe our selues for the Discouerie of the Ilands in the Northeast Seas of Asia, we were like to finde coldes entertainement. Sir Hugh Willoughby with his companie, lost themselves in this search, being frozen to death. Stephen Burrough after attempted, and found out (scarce worth the finding) Vaygats and Noua Zemla. As badde or worse hath bene the successe of Pet, Iackman, and others, both Dutch and English. And the Russians reports to Herbert are in some things so melancholick (as of their Slaty Baba, and of men dying euery Nouember, and reuiuing in the following) that a man may well suspend his credite to the rest. What Balakus in his letter to Mercator, Hesselin in his late maps of these partes, or any other haue written, will be but meane spokemen to procure any Reader with vs in this Northward Discouerie. Stirring therefore another course, and coasting another way to the South parts of Asia; let vs take a briefe survey of that World of Ilands in the Indian Seas, reseruing a more full Description of the chiefe of them to the chapter following: and then proceede to a more leasurely view of the Arabian, and some of the Mediterranean Ilands. Iland, h Of the Islands of Asia.

Benedetto Bordone and T. Portacchi haue written large Treatises of this Iland-subiect.

Iland, or<sup>b</sup> Islands rather, bearing the name of Iapan; the principall whereof are three: of which more afterwards.

Some mention (beleue it that list) neere to Iapan certaine Islands of Amacoz, with which the Iaponites yearly haue both worldly and fleshly traffique: and when a ship commeth from Iapan, so many women as there are men, come to the shore, and leaue each a paire of shooes with her marke, which who so taketh vp is her Paramour. These are seconded by the Islands of China, which doe (as it were) hedge and fence in; of which, there is little in Authors worthie mentioning. In Macao, or Amacoz, the Portugalls haue a Colonie, but the chiefe Island of China is Anian, in the Gulf of Cauchin-China.

Further from the Continent, from Iapan Southwards, are many Islands, called by the names of Laquid, the greater, and the lesse, rich in golde: nigh to the same is Hemosa; and next to these the Philippinz, so called of Philip the second, King of Spaine, by whose charge and charges they were discovered in the yeare 1564. long after that Magellanus had lost his life in the discoverie of these partes. Some make this name holde some proportion to the Spanish ambition, calling all the Islands Philippinz, which are betweene New-Spaine, and the Gulf of Bengala, in all, after their account, eleuen thousand; whereof onely thirtie are subiect to the Spaniard, as Thomas à Jesu hath obserued.

They beginne their reckoning at Nona Guinaa; where first we see Cainan. The next Banda, which name is proper to an Island so called, and common also to her neighbours, Rosolarguin, Ay, Rom, Neyra, in foure degrees to the South, which alone in the world are<sup>k</sup> said, by some, to bring forth Nutmegs and Mace. The more there are Merchants, the women attend to husbandrie. The Islands del Moro abound with Rice and Sagu (the pith of a tree which yeeldeth Meale) where<sup>l</sup> are wilde Hennes, which sit not on their Egges, but burie them a good depth vnder the sand, where the Sunne hatcheth them. They haue no Kine, but a Fish of like lineaments, which they take in their Nets. Gilolo hath a Mahumetane Prince, and is a great Island; the people are Meate-eaters. Amboino is the name of many Ilands, rude both in soyle and people, which eate their owne parents when they are olde: Daniel Middleron in a written Discouery of one of his Indian voyages, mentioneth an Island amongst or neere these of Ambina, called Bangaia, the King whereof is a Gentile. A Hollander here obtayned such sway, that none durst displease him. He had two houses full of the daughters of the Inhabitants which best liked him, besides many slauers of both sexes. His life is merely Epicurean: he will dance and sing and be drunke two dayes together: nor will he be commanded by any of his countrey-men. He is Collector or Treasurer to the King of Ternate in those parts, and sends him what he can spare. At Banda the Hollanders would not suffer the English to trade: and euery where else, both East, and West, and North, and South (as may be instanced in the particulars) if force or fraude by slauers raised on our people can effect it, they testifie that gaine is more precious to them then the loue of our Nation. Neere to the Ilands last mentioned are the Moluccs, five in number, Ternate, Tidor, Motir, Macbian, and Bachian; famous through the world, as being Natures Store-house of Cloues.

Their worship is directed to the Sunne, Moone, and other heavenly and earthly creatures. The King of Tidores chiefe Priest came aboard the Consent, of which Ship Daniel Middleron was chiefe. In the Moluccas are found those admirable birds of Paradise, or as the Portugals call them, fowles of the Sunne. The<sup>m</sup> Selsebes abound with golde, abandoned of goodnesse, peopled with Idolaters and Meate-eaters. The Islands of Moratay are more Northerly, where Barrata-roots is their bread, their neighbours face in the Islands of Tarrao, Sanguin, Solor, and others.

In those Ilands, which more properly beare the Philippine title, Mindanao is of very large circuit, and hath diuers famous Cities: Tendaia, for her excellence, was by the first discoverers called the Philippina. Luzon incompasseth a thousand miles, in which the Spaniards haue built a Towne, called Manilla, and haue thither carried cattle for breed. This ciitie standeth in foueteene degrees and a quarter.

Borneo is reputed as bigge as Spaine, richly attended with many Ilands of smaller circuit.

circle. It hath a Cisie of the same name, founded on Piles, in the salt water, with sumptuous buildings of hewed Stone, covered with Coco leaues. The King is a Mahumetan.

The greater Iava is by Seahger called an Epitome, or Summe of the world; rich in many commodities. The Cabal is a wilde beast in this Iland, whose bones do restrain the blood from issuing in wounded parties. The South part is Gentiles, as the countie within the land; but towards the shore they are Mahumetans. Touching the lesser Iava, there is some controuersie which should be it.

Betwixt Malacca and Samatra Nature hath (as it were) sowed that Field of waters with Ilands; the principall of which is Bintam. Samatra, within the countrey, is Echinus; towards the coast are Moores; an Iland large, rich, and populous, diuided into many Kingdomes.

The Gulfe of Bengala is (as it were) guarded with a double ranke of Ilands, which Hieronymus hath seras Garisons of those Seas. But these all are not worthy the honour due to Zeilan, called in olde times Taprobana, which name others apply to Samatra. From thence, alongst the coast of India, are scene few Ilands of any greatnesse: but further into the Sea are the Maldina, so called of Maldius, one of their number, whose name signifieth a thousand Ilands; (Hieronymus de Sancto Stephano numbred them betwixt seven and eight thousand) some of which are diuided by larger Seas, some by smaller Armes; the Ocean somewhere with his greatnesse threatening to swallow them, and in other places as curious of his delightfull search, stealing rather, then forcing a separation, prouoking the passengers to communicate in his sports; who sometimes, helped with some over-growing Tree, can leape from one Iland to another. In hath our Nature, thus diuersifying their situation, yeelded them diuersitie of her riches, sauing that it seemeth heere she hath chosen her chamber for the Palme, or Coquo-Nuts, which in other places she hath, in comparifon, but scattered, here stowed, that by this store the people might supply all their other wants. Yea, besides the Land-Coquo, there groweth another vnder the water, bigger then the former; a speciall Antidote for poyson. The Inhabitants are addicted to subtiltie and sorcerie, and the Ilands next to the Continent, Moores beare sway; in the rest, Pagans. Other Ilands of smaller reckoning, we reckon not. Diu hath long bene famous for the wares therein; vainly attempted by the Turke and Indians against the Fortresse of the Pungall.

The Persian Gulfe hath left some remnants of Land extant; the chiefe is Ormus, a famous Mart, which the Moores there maintained, vnder the gouernment of a Moore, since made tributarie to the Portugall; which Nature hath made barren, Industrie plentifull: the more fertile Element yeelds barrennesse and Sands; the barrenner brings in a double wealth, pearles, and merchandise.

Iohn Newbury which sailed downe Euphrates to this Sea, and so to Ormus (visiting heere by the way, which he saith is twentie or fife and twentie miles, Southward from olde Babylon) testifieth of the women in Ormuz, that they slit the lower part of their eares more then two inches, which hangeth downe to their chinne. This our Countrey-man died in his trauels, hauing trauelled to Constantinople, into the blacke Sea and Danubius, and through the Kingdomes of Poland and Persia, the Indies and other parts of the world. But for the description of the passage downe the River Euphrates to the Persian Gulfe, I know none which hath done it so exactly as Cosmo Balbi a Venetian, which that way passed to Ormuz and India; who relateth the same in the Diarie of his trauels: sometimes the Trunkes or bodies of trees, vnder the water of this River conspiring dangerous attempts; sometimes Zelebe and other over-hanging Mountaines, threatening ruine, and euen now seeming to swallow them in their darke deuouring iawes; sometimes the violence of some steeper current, as it were hurling them into a Whirle-poole; alway the Arabians readie attending for prey and spoyle. One Citie, or rather the carkasse of a Citie, whereof onely the ruines remaining, stands on the left hand of this River, greater in his opinion then Cairo in Egypt: the Mariners affirmed to him that by the report of the olde men it had three hundred threescore and sixe gates: from morning to noone with the helpe of the streame and foure Oares, they could scarcely passe one side thereof. This is called Elerfi, perhaps that which was aunciently called Edeffa. He speaks of the Caragmali, inhabiting as they passed, which agree neyther with Turkes, Moores, nor Persians in their Sect, but haue a Heresie by themselves. He trauelled more then one whole day by one side of olde Babylon: from Telugia to Bagdad, though the ground be good; yet saw he neyther tree nor greene hearbe, but all barren, and seeming to retaine some markes of the Prophecies threatened by Esay against this place. They which dwell here, and trauell from hence to Balsara, carrie with them Pigeons, whom they make their Letter-posts to Bagdad; as they doe likewise betweene Ormuz and Balsara. The coasts of Persia as they sayled in this Sea, seemed as a parched Wildernesse; without tree or grasse: those few people which dwell there, and in the Ilands of Lar and Calon, liue on fish, being in manner transformed themselves into the nature of fishes; so excellent swimmers are they, that seeing a vessell in the Seas though stormie and tempestuous, they will swimme to it fure or sixe miles to begge almes. They eate their fish with Rice, hauing no bread; their Cats, Hennes, Dogges, and other creatures which they keepe, haue no other dyet. In the Iland of Bairen, and those of Confiar, they take the best pearles in the world. In Muscat, threescore miles from Ormuz, they dare not fish for them, for fishes, which are as cruell to the men, as they to the innocent Oysters. They hold that in Aprill, the Oysters come to the top of the water, & receive the drops of raine which then fall, where with they return to the bottom again: and therefore fish not til the end of Iuly, because that substance is not before ripened and hard. In sayling from Ormuz to Diu he saith they passed ouer a bay of a hundred and thirty leagues of water, white like milke. I haue seene an extract of a Chronicle written by Pachatur, hnyas, which reigned in Ormuz three hundred yeares agoe; testifying that one Mahomet being King of Amen in Arabia Felix, pretending title to Persia, built a Citie on the Continent of Hormuz, which his posteritie held in succession of many generations, it happened that King Cabadanis fleeing from the King of Creman, came to Larim, that is, a Wood; so they called this Iland, which is almost all of salt, the Riuer being brackish from a salt Mountaine in the midst thereof, and the sides of the Riuer white salt. Yet there then grew thinn woods. Here he built Ormuz; which Albuquerque made tributarie to the Portugals, being Lady of the Ilands thereabouts, and principall Stople of Merchandize for those parts of the world. Odoricus speaketh of the intolerable heate in these parts: and Balby testifieth that neere Balsara many persons die of the extremity of heate, which hapned to foure of their company, which forced by heate and wearinesse fate downe, and with a hote blast of winde were all smothered.

In the Discourse of these Asian Seas and this Persian, among the rest I thought it worthe relating, which Louis de Vrreta, in his Aethiopian Historie telleth of a certaine Jew. He trauellling alongst the shore of this Persian Sea, by some In-lets and Armes thereof, which embay themselves within the Land, saw the Sea losie and swelling, by force of the Windes and Tides, seeming to threaten the higher Elements, but euen now readie to swallow vp the Earth, roaring out a loude defiance in such sort, that the poore Jew was amazed, and dreadfully feared therewith: and this continued the space of some dayes, whiles the Jew trauelled thereby. But on the Saturday and Sabbath, Superstition commanded the Jew; and Nature (the hand-mayde of Dominie) enioyned the angrie Elements to rest; a sudden calme followed, as if Waves and Windes would accompanie the Jew in his deuotions, and had forgotten their former furie and wonted nature, to remember the sanctification of this Day. The Jew hauing heard before, that there was a Sabbaticall Riuer, (which some place in Aethiopia, some in Phoenicia, others they cannot tell where) in a credulous fancie perswades himselfe, that this Arme of the Sea was that Sabbaticall streame, and that he now haue the experiment of that relation with his eyes. Fancie had no sooner affirmed, but superstition sware to the truth, and credulitie tickles him with gratulation of diuine fauour to himselfe, that had liued to see that blessed sight. Rauished with this conceit, he fills his Budget full of the Sand, which is of a more crosse and cleauing nature, then in other places, and carrieth it with him as a great treasure vnto the place of his habitation. There he tells his Countrey-men that now the Messias would not be long before he came, for now he had found this signe thereof; the Sabbaticall River; shewing this Sand in proofe thereof. Credis Iudeum Apella, the Iewes beleue quickly all but the truth, especially in Portugall, whither hee came with this report. Many thou- sand moued by his wordes, remooued their dwellings, and selling their substances, would needes goe into these partes of Persia, by the Sabbaticall River to fixe their habitation; there waiting for their promised Messias. One, and a chiefe of this supersti- tious expedition was Amatus Lusitanus, a Physician of great note, accounted one of the best learned of his profession, and a writer therein; and Iohn Micai, a Merchant of great wealth. They passed through Fraunce, Germanie, Hungarie, their company (as a snow-ball) encreasing as they went, with the addition of other Iewes of like credulitie. When they came to Constantinople, there were of them in many bands or companies thirtie thousand. Cobasius Bassa, the Turkish Commander, thought to gain by this occasion; and would not suffer them to passe over the water into Asia, with- out many hundred thousands of duckats: except they would passe on horse-backe. This example was soone both spread and followed of the other Bassaes and Comman- ders in Asia, as they went; their wealth and substance being euery where so fleeced, that they came into Syria, much lessened in numbers, in estate miserable and begger- ly; new Officers euery where, as new hungrie Flies, lighting on these wretched car- uels (so I may call them): some they whipped, some they empaled, some they han- gued and burned others. Thus were these miserable Pilgrims wasted: and Don Iohn de laser was present, when Amato aforesaid being dead with this affliction, his Phy- sicks booke were at an Out-erie to be sold at Damasco, and because they were in little use, no man would buy them, till at last another Iew became chapman. Micai, one of the wealthiest men which Europe held, died poore in an Hospitall at Constantino- ple. And this was the issue of their Pilgrimage to the Sabbaticall streame, which they supposed to finde in this Persian Gulfe; where we haue too long holden you the spe- cimens of this Iewish Tragedie.

And yet let me intreate your patience a little longer in considering the occasion of this rout. We haue elsewhere mentioned this Sabbaticall River: now you shall vnderstand that the Iewes generally haue drowned their wits therein. Rambam calls it Gizan. Genebrard alledgeth many R.R. testimonies of it: but of all let Eldad Danius his tale (which Genebrard hath translated) finde some fauourable enter- tainment; the rather because one of our Apocryphall Authors seemes to weaue the same webbe, which as the worthier person, deserueth first examination. Esdra there- fore (so we suppose him, and this is not all his Iewish fables) reporteth, that the same Tribu which Salmanafer ledde captive, took counsell among themselves to leane the moun- taine of the Heathen, and goe forth into a further countrey where neuer mankinde dwelt: that they might there keepe their statutes which they neuer kept in their owne land. And they entered into Euphrates by the narrow passages of the River. For the most High then bound signes for them, and held still the flood till they were passed ouer. For through that countrey there was a great way to goe, namely, of a yeare and a halfe: and the same Region is called Asareth. Then dwelt they there untill the later time. And now when they shall beate come, the Highest shall stay the Springs of the Streame againe, &c. Here you see no lesse miracle then in Iordan, or the Redde Sea, for their passage: which seeing it was through Euphrates, ye will pardon our Iew for searching it neere this Persian Gulfe, es- pecially seeing his good Masters the Rabbins had increased this tale, with the inclosure of these Iewes from passing againe into our world; not by the continuall course of Euphrates, as Esdra insinuateth, but by the Sabbatizing of the Sabbaticall streame, which by Eldads description is two hundred cubites ouer, full of sands and stones, without water, making a noyse like thunder as it floweth, which by night is heard halfe dayes journey from it. On the Sabbath it is continually quiet and still, but all that daye miseth thence a flame, that none dare enter, or come neere by halfe a mile. Thus the fire (if not the Religion of the Sabbath) then detaines them no lesse then the

stonie streame on the weeke dayes: and what stonie heart can refuse them credit? Yet doth not he and Esdra agree of the inhabitants, both deriuing them from the Ten Tribes; but Eldad challenging no lesse antiquitie then from Ierobeam, who contending with Rehobeam, the godly Catholike Israelites refusing to fight against the house of Dauid, chose rather to attempt this Pilgrimage; and so passing the River Phison, (for the Scriptures had forbidden them to meddle with Egypt, Ammon or Amalek) they went and went till they came into Ethiopia. There did the foure Tribes of Dan, Nephthali, Gad, and Aser settle themselves, which continually warre vpon the Kingdomes of Tusiga, Kamtua, Koha, Marhugia, Tacul, Bactra, and Kacua (he on the simplicitie of our Geographers which know not one of these, no better then Esdra his Arifareth): they haue a King whose name is Huziel Mathial, vnder whom they fight, each Tribe three moneths, by course. The Tribe also of Moses (for they imagine his children claue to their mothers religion, which was a Madianite or Ethiopian) is turned to their truth: and they all obserue the Talmud, the Hebrew tongue, the Ordinances of the Elders, and suffer nothing vnckeane amongst them: Yea, no Vroopian State comparable to theirs. He tells the like tales of the other Tribes. But how came he thence to tell this newes? Truly I wonder no lesse then you: yet he saith he got to the Sea (forgetting that before he had compassed his countrey with the Sabbaticall Streame) and there was taken captiue, and by his leanenesse escaping the Cannibals (else our far storie had bene deuoured) was sold to a Jew, of whom perhaps this forged tale procured his redemption. Howsoeuer; the Tradition holdes, both for these inclosed Jewes, and that Sabbaticall streame, that it should be sought here-a-ways, or found no where. The reciting is sufficient refusing to a reasonable vnderstanding; and yet the Jewes are not onely besotted with these, their inclosed brethren, imagining their Messias may be amongst them, although they know not whether to ascribe this transportation to Salmanser, or to Alexander the great, or to the dayes of Ierobeam; but Christians also tell of them about the Pole, and they know not where. And I haue seene a printed Pamphlet of their coming out of those their inclosures in our times, with the numbers of each Tribe. Yea, Poßellus, Boterus, and many other deriue the Tartars from them: which dreames, they which please may read a large confused by Master Brerewood. It was about the yeare 1238. when Eldad came from thence into Spaine. If any maruell why in a Discourse of the Sea we adde this, I answer, that wee cannot finde the land whereto it is due: and therefore one absurditie must follow another. But let vs proceede.

The Redde Sea, or Arabian Gulfe, seemed vnwilling to be the Oceans subiect: so many small Islands doth she continually muster in resistance, besides her vndermining the Sea with her shallow Channell, conspiring the destruction of many heedlesse Mariners, that here will aduenture as tenants to the Sea in their mouing houses. Once (by a mightier hand) was it helped to preuaile against the Seas force, to discover a new land in the midst thereof, and with her waterie erected walls to guard these new passengers, till the same hand reuered it, or rather rewarded the then emptie bellie thereof with the prey of so many thousand Egyptians. Babelmandel, Camaran, and Mazra are accounted amongst the chiefe of these Isolets: Suachen hath most Soueraignie, being the seat of the Turkish Bessa for Abassia.

Arianus in his Periplus of the Redde Sea, and Agatharchides in a Treatise of like argument, mention not many Islands therein: Orine, Alalex, Catacumene, and that of Diodorus in the mouth of the Strait. Don Iohn of Castro hath written an exact Treatise (from his own experience) of these Seas and Islands, which Master Hakluyt hath in a written Copie; out of which we shall obserue more in our coasting about Africke. Thomas Jones, who was in the Ascension in this Sea, speaketh of twelue or thirtene desolate Islands, where they found refreshing with Cokos, Fish, and Turkedoues, whercof one may with his hands take twentie dozen in a day. The Straits are a mile and halfe ouer, but now not chained. Mokha is the chiefe Staple of Indias commodities, which passe that way to Cairo and Alexandria. Aden is the key of Turkish gouernment in those parts.

Socatera is without the Strait. The Naturals are Christians, of Saint Thomas Sect, who is heere said to haue suffered ship wracke; and of whose broken ship was erected a Church. They are great warriours, both men and women, and great Magicians. They haue no vse of Trafficke, Letters, or Navigation, and yet are esteemed the noblest people in the world. It is (as Don Iohn of Castre obserued) in twelue degrees, and 7. twen-tie leagues long, and nine broad. Their prayers are in Chaldzan. The men haue differing names as in these parts: but the women are all called by the name of Mary. They haue no King, Gouvernour, Prelate, nor Politie. Most dwell in Caves, some in tharched Cottages. Their food was Flesh and Dates: their drinke milke, and seldome, water.
 They worship the crosse: haue no offensive or defensible weapons, but certaine swords: and are without all industrie for fishing and navigation. By the later Obseruations of Henry Hippert, we heare that they haue a King which is sonne and heire to a King in the Continent of Arabia, and that all the chiefe men are Moores, the vulgar Caphars.
 The Moores will not steale, but if they finde a thing, will enquire after the loser. A man came to them out of the mountaines, which reported that in ten daies he had not seene the Sonne, which yet shined to them cleare and hot. They are subiect to cold vapors, and therefore care not for drinke in twentie daies space.

Two other Islands confront this; of which one (they say) is the habitation of men, and the other of women, which sometimes haue encounter one with the other, beside the Ayre (Natures inexorable and heauie handmaid) not suffering any long abode to each, but in their owne allotted portion.

Loath am I to looke any further into that boisterous Sea, and therefore leauing all this huge Tract of Africke, as compassed by a sudden thought, but vnfulured, we shall passe ouer Asian Islands in the Mediterranean. And because, being now wearied, the description would be tedious, a passage for vs, nether are there many llands worth noting in Propantia, or the Euxine, we will speake a little of Rhodes and Cyprus, and then remember how long we haue forgotten our selues.

The former of those containeth about an hundred and twentie miles: fertile in soile, and of most pleasant ayre, caused by that loue which Phabus beareth to it; there neuer passing day, in which he doth not, in his bright and shining apparell, salute it. And for this cause happily was that huge Colossus of Brasse (gilded ouer, and reputed the most wonderfull of the Worlds seven Wonders) here dedicated to the Sunne (though some ascribe it to Iupiter) the workmanship of Chares Lindius, of threescore and ten cubits, (or as others tell, an hundred fortie three feet, but it selfe told fourescore cubits in height, which, falling by an Earthquake, the Oracle forbad the Rhodians to erect againe. But nothing forbad Mabius, or Anani, the fifth Caliph, after his seven yeares waile about Constantinople (as saith Constantinus out of Theophanes) inuading this lland, to carrie away nine hundred (Constantinus numbred many more) Camels burthened with this Brazen carcasse.

The Temple of Liber was heere enriched, with many presents of the Greekes and Romans, to both which the City of Rhodes was had in friendly and honorable regard.
 Much was their force by Sea in ancient times, and for two hundred yeares space it was the Seat of the Hospitular-Knights, which now reside in Malta; driuen thence by mighty Solyman.

These Knights had also, by purchase of King Richard the first of England, the lland of Cyprus, dedicated by the Poets to Venus, to whom the Inhabitants were too much addicted, as appeared by their Temples and other vanities in her honor. At Paphos shee was worshipped in the liknesse of a Nauell; and round thereabouts (by the Diuels working) it rained not. Trogus writeth, That the Cyprians prostituted their daughters (before they married them) to Marriners on the shore. Wee haue seene at home (saith R. Volateranus) the attendants of Queene Carlotta, neuer a whit better then those ancient.

Of Cyprus, thus reporteth Ammianus Marcellinus; Lib. 4. It is ennobled by two Cities, Salamis and Paphos; the one famous for Iupiter Images; the other, for the Temple of Venus. It is so plentifull in all things, that it needs no helpe of other Nations, and of her owne abundance is able to set forth a Shippe, from the Keele to the Top-saile, with all prouision, furnished to the Sea. Neither grieue I to tell it; the Romans more greedily then iustly, made themselves Lords thereof. For Ptolomey the King being confederate with vs, was profetibed without any fault, but the defect of our Treasure, who therefore poisoned himselfe, and the Isle became tributarie. Strabo Rafius saith as much. Amas was the first, if we beleue Herodotus; who first conquered Cyprus, and made it tributarie. He also saith (Lib. 7.) That the Cyprians were partly from Salamine and Athens, partly from Ascadia, partly from Cyprus, from Phoenicia, and from Ethiopia. Pliny affirmeth; That it was sometime the Seat of nine Kings, and was diuersly named, as Acamanis, Cerastis, Aspelis, Andrubia, Macaria, Cryptus, and Colima. It was such a Forrest of Trees, that when in their Shipping and Mines were not able to waste them, it was made lawfull for any man to fell and destroy them, and for his labour to possesse the land which hee had cleared. Bartholomew Salerniacus, saith he saw flying fishes in the sea about Cyprus, which in the Atlantike Ocean are common: he saw also a Raimme in Cyprus with iuen hornes.

In the time of Constantine it was forsaken of the Inhabitantes, as before forsaken of the Elements, which refused to water with any droppe of raine that Island (sometime accounted happy) the space of seuen teene yeares together, or as others haue it, five and thirtie, re-peopled from diuers parts by Helena, the mother of Constantine, and remaining to the Greeke Empire, till that Lion of England made it a prey, and the Knights purchase, who sold it to Guido Lusignan: whose posteritie failing, the Venetians succeeded, till Selym the second, minding to erect a Religious Hospitall, to shew his Magnificence, began with an irreligious foundation. For whereas their holy lawes will not suffer any thing to be dedicated to holy uses, which their owne sword hath not conquered, he brake League with the Venetian, and robbed them of this Island, which they are thought, not with the iustest title, before to haue possessed. But it is high time to bethinke vs of our Indian shore, whence we haue taken so large a prospect; where we are stayd to be transported into the chiefe of those Islands there to take a more leisurly view of their Regions and Religions. And if any be desirous to read the ancient names and descriptions of the Seas and Islands about Asia, Marcellinus Heracleotas, and Scylax Caruandensis haue written especiall Treatises thereof, which David Hæschelius hath published in Greeke, very profitable to the learned Students of the ancient Geographic, as are the workes also of Isidorus Characenus, Themidorus Ephesus, and Dicaarchus Messenus, which he hath ioyned with them.

CHAP. XV.

Of the Islands of Iapan, and their Religions.

THe Iesuits haue not more fixed the eyes of the World vpon them in the Westerne parts, then they haue fixed their owne eyes on the Eastem; heere seeking to repaire, with their vntempered Mortar, the ruines of their Falling Babylon: there laying a new foundation of their hopes: heere, by their Politike Mysteries and Mysticall Policies, endeavouring to reconer; there, by new Conquests to make supply to their losses: heere, for busie intruding into affaires of State, suspected by their owne, hated by their aduersaries; there, by seeming to neglect Greatnesse, and to contemne Riches, of the mightiest are not feared, while others beleue, obserue, and admire them. Both heere and there they spare not to a compass Sea and Land, to winne Proselytes; euerie of their Residences, or Colledges, being as so many Forts to establish this new Romane Monarchie, but with vnlike advantage, encountering there with Reason (or rather with the carcasse of Reason) attended with Ignorance, and Superstition, whose Ouylish eyes cannot endure the interview of Truth, though darkened with those Clouds, wherewith they ouercast it: Heere with Truth, yea, the Soule of Truth, true Religion; whose Shield of Faith, and vail against. A Spanish Faction of Spanish humour and successe, more easily conquering a world of the naked Americans, and effeminate Indians, then keeping all they had in Europe. Such are the armes of the one, and the preaching of the other.

Yet would I faine bee thankfull to the one and the other<sup>b</sup>, the first for furthering Geographie with knowledge of a new world; the other, for making a possibilitie of a better world to some, whereas otherwise there was a generall desperation of all.

Neither are the wounds of Popish superstition so absolutely mortall, as the Ethnike Atheisme; the one having no foundation at all; the other shewing the true foundation: although their Babylonish slimes even heere supplied the roomes of better matter, besides their stubble, hay and wood built vpon it. Better a mixed Truth, then a totall error: and a maimed Christ, then none at all. But howsoeue they be beholden to them for their Diuinitie, it were inhumanitie in vs, not to acknowledge a beholdingnesse to them; for that they giue vs in the knowledge of many peoples, although in all their Discourses this caution is necessarie, not to yeeld them a Catholike and vniuersall credence, where we any way may spie them dawbing the walls of their pretended Carholic Church. In relating their Miracles, and such like, we will remember they are Le-suits: in other things not seruiceable to Rome, we will heare them as Trauellers, when lying doth not aduantage them, nor hurt vs. But as the Labours of the Iesuits may e-uery where breed shame to our negligence in a better quarrell: so in Iapon it is most of all admirable, that the furthest part of the World should be so neere to their indu-strie. And that you at last may be acquainted with Iapon, we will borrow of them to pay our hopes, by this long introduction suspended.

Maffew (who hath translated and set forth more then thirtie of those Iaponian Epistles) in the twelfth Booke of his Indian Historie, doth thus describe it. Besides other lesse, three principall Islands beare the name of Iapon; which the first and greatest more particularly challengeth, containeth in it three and fiftie Kingdomes or Principalities, the chiefe Citie whereof is Meaco: The second is Ximum, diuided into nine Seignories: The third, Xicoe, quartered into foure Lordships, so that there are in all of this Iaponian Dominion, threescore and fixe Shires, or petite Kingdomes. The space of Land is measured two hundred leagues in length, in breath some-where ten, in other places thirtie, betweene the thirtie and thirtie eight degrees of Latitude: Eastward from China. (Our Countrey-man William Adams which now liues there, and hath done these many yeares, and therefore hath better meanes to know the truth; placeth it from the 35. to the 48. degree of Northerly Latitude: the length East and by North, and West and by South, for so it lieth, is two hundred and twentie English Leagues that way, and South and North two hundred and threescore Leagues, almost square). The soile is not very fertile; subiect to much snow, the aire holesome. The bowels of the earth are stored with diuers mettalls; the trees are fruitfull, and one wonderfull, in that it abhorreth moisture, and if happily it be moistened, it shrinketh and becommeth withered; which they remedie by plucking it vp by the roots, and after it is dried in the Sunne, to set it in drie sand; if a bough be broken off and nailed on again, it groweth. They haue two high Mountaines, one of which casteth forth flames, and in the toppes thereof the Diuell vseth to shew himselfe in a bright cloud to some, that (by long fasting) haue prepared themselves to this sight: the other, called Fuymiana, is by some leagues higher then the clouds. They much esteeme a tall per-sonableness: they plucke off the haire on their head (children before; the common people halfe way; the Nobilitie almost all) leauing but a little growing behinde: to touch which, were to offer great indignitie to a man. They can endure much hardship: an infant new borne in the coldest of Winter, is presently carried to the Riuer to be washed: their education is hard: yet are they neat: they vse forks (as the Chinois) or sticks, not touching the meat with their fingers, and therefore neede no naperie:
they sit on carpets, and enter the roomes vnshod, their tables are a hand high, some eigheteene inches square, curiously wrought, to each guest one, and changed at eue-ry new service or change of meate. Quabacandonus, against a solemne and festiuall entertainment of his father, prepared an hundred and thirtie thousand of these tables,

They vse much the powder of a certaine herb called Chia, of which they put as much as a Walnut-shell may containe, into a dish of Porcelaine, and drinke it with hot water. At the departure of friends they will shew all their most precious household furniture, the best whereof they employ about the heating water, or other vses for this herb, which is of precious account with them. The women in Iapon which wanted means to bring vp their children, with inhumane butcherie did deprive them, being borne, of that life, which not long before they had communicated to them. Their houses are most of wood, because of often Earth-quakes: and some of stone. Temples and Monasteries they haue for both Sexes; and more had, till Nabunanga destroyed them. Their language is one, and yet exceedingly diuersified, according as they differ in State or Sexe: or as they speake in praise or dispraise, vsing a diuers Idiom. They use Characters in writing and printing, as in China. Their swords are of a most excellent temper. Their customes differ in many things from other men. • Blacke is a festiual colour, white a funerall: their meates, drinckes, perfumes, are as dissonant to ours. Their teeth are coloured with blacke, as beauties livery borrowed of Art, which we by Art would auoid. They mount on the right side of the Horse. They sit, (as we rise) to entertaine a friend. They giue to the sicke persons, salt things, sharpe and raw: neuer let blood: we contrary (as in other rites) either to other ridiculous. All their Nobles are called Toni: amongst whom are diuers degrees: all of them holding their all in capite, to finde so many souldiers to the warres, at their owne costs. Generally the whole Nation is wittie: pouertie is a disgrace to no man. Reproches, Theft, Injuries, Dice-play are hatefull: very ambitious they are in all things, respectiue to their credit, full of courtisie each to other, neuer brauling, no nor at home with their bow-holds. The inconstancie of that State learneth them by vse to prepare for, and to welcome, every State. They are exceedingly subrill, hypocriticall and double-dealing: they are also of cruell disposition, not to their enemies alone, but sometimes will assay the goodnesse of their blade and strength of their arme, on some innocent bodie; and in case of distresse, they esteeme it a credit to prevent the sentence f of law by bloody execution done on themselves, which they vsually doe in ripping vp their breastes crosse, a servant or friend attending to smite off his head: and if it bee a man of any sort, his friends and followers in like manner with their owne hands plucke out their bowels to testifie their loue. The Gouvernours haue absolute rule ouer their inferiours: yea, in euery priuate Familie, the authoritie extendeth to life or death. The people (saith Adams) are exceeding courteous and valliant; they are gouerned in great civility (no land better) with seueritie of Iustice. They are very superstitious, and of diuers opinions. Many Iesuits and Franciscans haue conuerted many, and enioy there many churches. This our Countrey-man went chiefe Pilot of a Fleet of Hollanders of five sailes, 1599. and wintered in the Magellan Strait from Aprill to September. Neere to the Ile of Saint Marie in seven and thirtie degrees in the South sea, the ship wherein he was, and another of the Fleet lost their men in fight with the Indians. They sailed thence to Iapon, and sought the North-Cape (which is false placed in Maps) in thirtie degrees, but found it in 35°. In this voyage from Saint Mary hither, they were foure months and two and twentie dayes: and then there were but fixe besides himselfe that could stand vpon their legges. They anchored neere Bomage: and two or three dayes after a Iesuit from Langasack came aboard them. The King of Bungo befriended them with house-rooms, and refreshing for their sicke; but three of their company died the next day, and three after; onely eightene were left. The Emperour sent five Gallies or Frigates for them, about fourescore leagues distance: and demanded of them many questions touching our Countrey, and the termes of warre and peace in which it stood with others. Then was he commanded to prison, and two dayes after conuened to gaine, and demanded the cause of his voyage: The Iesuits and Portugalls informed against them as robbers of all Nations, and vsed their best friends to their worst designements: so that euery day they looked to bee crossed (or crucified, which is there the vsuall death of malefactors). But the Emperour answered, they had not hurt him: and after long imprisonment, he was suffered to returne to his shippe, and restitution of the goods (before seized on) commanded, but without effect, because because they were dispersed. They had fiftie thousand rials giuen them. This Citie was called Saca, two leagues and a halfe from Ozaca. From thence they were removed to Quanto, an hundred and twentie leagues Eastward, neere to Eddo, where the Emperour resided. They could nor obtaine leaue to goe where the Hollanders traded, but were allowed each man two pound of Rife a day, and eleuen or twelue ducats a yeare. In proceffe of three or foure yeares, the Emperour employed Adams in making him a ship after the fashon of ours, which, <sup>a</sup> as he could, he did, which wani him fauour and a larger annuitie: Hee after built him another of an hundred and twentie runnes: and by this meanes, and acquainting him with some principles of Geometrie, and the Mathematickes, grew in such fauour, that the Iesuits and Portugals (his quondam enemies) were now glad to vse him as a mediator in their suits to the Emperour: He hath now giuen him a lordship, with eighty or ninetie husband-men or slaues, to serue him, fauour neuer before done to any stranger. He could neuer obtaine leaue to returne home to his wife: but the Emperour was contented he should write for a dutch and English trade to be there established yearly. They haue there (he saith) an Indies of money. But let vs here leaue our Country-man, and returne to Maffens:

All Iapon sometime obeyed one Prince, called Vo, or Dairi, <sup>b</sup> who at length addicting himselfe to his priuate delights, and putting off the burthen of ruling to his officers, grew in contempt: and at last euery one seised on his owne prouince, whereof you haue heard there are threescore and fixe, leauing the Dairi a bare title, and a Herldes Kingdome, to giue termes of honor at his pleasure, whence he raiseth great reuenue, otherwise subiect (excepting his Title) as are all the rest, to the Lord of Tensa (so they call the noblest Kingdome adioyning to Meaco.) This <sup>c</sup> Vo, or Dairi descendeth by succession from the ancient Kings, out of which he is chosen, and is honoured as a god. He may not touch the ground with his foot; which if hee doe, he is put by the place: neuer goeth out of his house, seldome is seene of the people. He sitteth in his chair with a bow and arrowes on one hand of him, on the other a Dagger. If he should kill any, or if he shew himselfe an enemy to peace, hee is deprived as well as if he had fallen on the ground. All great men haue their factors with him to procure new titles of honor, the onely fewell of his greatnesse. The King of China giuing royall ensignes to Taiosama, perswaded him to depose and abolish the Dairi, which yet I doe not see that he did.

They haue another generall Officer or chiefe Justice, which denounceth Warre, and iudges, giueth sentence on matters in controuersie. But these are but the Instruments of the Lords of Tensa, as are also the Banzij. These are their Religious, among whom one is supreme in cases spirituall, by whom all their old holies are ordered, and all new confirmed or dashed. The Tundi, (which are as their Bishops) are by him consecrated and confirmed, although their nomination be by lay-patrons. Hee dispenseth with them in diuers priuiledges and immunities: he enioyeth great reuenue and sovereignty, and is aduanced hereto by money and kindred. The Tundi giue Priestly Orders, and dispense in smaller matters, as eating flesh on dayes prohibited. They are subiect in spirituall things to these, in secular affaires to their Kings and Ciuill Magistrates. Through their diuisions and many warrs, they were much infested with robbers and pyrates, till Quabocodonus, in stead of so many Tyrants, erected one, and became vniuersall Monarch of Iapon. Betweene him and the King of China hapned wares about the Kingdome of Coray, which the Iaponites left vpon his death: and the Chinois also, as caring for no more then they already had. Many of them still are pyrates, very much feared, and not suffered to land in any place. Captain Dani had experience of them to his cost, for hauing taken a ship of them, and not possessing himselfe of their weapons, because of their humble semblance, they watched opportunity, and slew him; and thought to haue taken their takers, and made themselves masters of the English shippe: hauing a watchword or token for those aboard their owne ships, to murder the English there. Dangerous had this fray proved, had not the commanding peece, with almost a cleane riddance of them, cruelly decided the quarrell. Yet would they not desist their lutes, and pulled the pikes of such as had wounded them, throw their bodies, to reuenge it with their swords,

They

They haue many Sects, some reckon them twelue; all truly agreeing, in disagreeing with Truth: Some of them Epicure-like denying Gods providence, and the soules immortalitie. They hold that a man hath three soules, which one after another come into, and depart out of the bodie. Few of their Bonzij will openly teach this Doctrine, but labour to hold the people in awe. Amida and Kaca they preach, as Saviours, and to be worshipped. Some of their Sects * doe beleue an eternall life, and promise it to all such as call vpon these supposed Deities, as Saints which sometime led so another a life, for the sinnes of mankind, that for a man to vex his minde, or macerate his bodie for his owne sinnes, or to doe good workes, would not onely be superstitious, but offensive and derogatorie to their merits. And heere the kinde-hearted Iesuit is paged with a fit of Charitie to yoke the Lutherans with them; as if the sufferings of Iesus were but the superstitions of Amida, as if either the sufferings of man, imperfect, burned, durie, could be; or the sufferings of God could not be meritorious; or as if the Lutherans denied Christian contrition (whose affect is Indignation,<sup>h</sup> effect (selfe-remy)) as they doe Popish Confession and Satisfaction. These gods they call Fotogues. Other gods of a lesse mould, they call Camis, which haue their charges and peculiar offices, for health, children, riches, &c. as among the elder (that I trouble not the quakers by the mackes of the later) Romanes.

These were Kings and Noble-men, or Inuenters of Arts, of whom they haue as true tales as Homer or the Legend yeeldeth. Taicofama that died a few yeares since, (the first which in these many later ages tooke the title of a King, which, together with the Crowne, he receiued of the King of China) ordained before his death, that his bodie should not be burned after the wonted manner, but closed in a Chest, and, in a sumptuous Temple, for that purpose built, <sup>k</sup> his Image should be enshrined, and worshipped with the Title of Scimfaciman, or New Faciman, the name of their Mars or warlike god; which was also done. Thus he, which in his youth had vsed to cut wood and carrie it into the Marketto sell for his daily sustenance, for his valour promoted in martialle honours, at last became the greatest Monarch that Japan had scene in eight hundred yeares, and not contented with humane greatnesse, would aspire to that diuine, whereof he himselte had beene a derider in others. His name before was Faxiba, called after Quabacondonnu; the highest Title next to the Dairi, and signifieth the chief of the treasure: next borrowing a Kingly Stile from China, would (madde folly) on his death-bed bequeath Godhead to a man, and immortalitie to a carkasse: when he could no longer hold out his pride, crueltie, and other wicked courtes, which made his presence dreadfull, his memorie detestable. Nabunanga was his predecessor in his sin and impietie, arrogating diuine honor to himselte, <sup>l</sup> but destroying the Temples of their Gods, together with the Temple-keepers, the Bonzij. This appeared at Fransama, a famous vniuersitie of those Bonzij, nine miles from Meaco, wherein eight hundred yeares past, a Iaponian King had erected three thousand and eight hundred Temples, with houses adioyned for the Bonzij: allowing to their maintenance the third part of the reuenue of the Kingdom of Vomen. Hence proceeded their orders and government in affaires both of State and Religion, being a Seminary of Lawes and Superstitions. But these Temples in time diminished to eight hundred, and the Bonzian discipline as much empaiied, and altered from austerity (in some) to wantonnes, (in others) from Arts, to Amnes. The Bonzij tooke part with Nacbiu, enemy of Nabunanga, who enraged hereat, made truce with the one, to destroy the other. The Bonzij not prevailing by their suing for peace, fortified themselves for warre in the Temple of Quonnu their god of health and long life, much frequented with Pilgrims from all parts, much solemnized with their pompous processions (like in all parts if ye beleue the Iesuit to their Corpus-Christi solemnitie) which grew the more famous, for that these were but the preamble to the like pompe in the Gibon-Festiuall at Meaco. But all preuailed not with Nabunanga, who destroyed both Temple and Priests with fire and sword, burning foure hundred other Temples for company, in the yeare 1572. At Meaco he burned twentie of these Bonzian Cloisters of the greater sort, besides fourescore lesse, and in one of them three score Bonzian women or Nunnets, whose Deuotion was employed in begging for the reparation of the Temple of Daijndi. Grecians had their Mercury with his Caduceus; so the Japonians haue their Iziz with his Trident, to conuey soules departed into their allotted eternall residences: The Bonzai his Chaplaines by lots inquired whether they should remoue him; he commanded it, and they with great solemnity performed it, but out of a place, which then escaped, to another, wherein, and wherewith he was burnt. Fachusangin was another Bontzi Acolyte, adorned with many Colledges, which he destroyed. Xangwen the King of Cai nochiou shaued his head and beard: and professed himselfe a Bonzai, and not only attired himselfe in their habit, but thrice a day did performe their superstitions, hauing six hundred Bonzai to his followers. He writ to Nabunanga, intitling himselfe the Patron of these Religions: the other in his answer stiled himselfe the Tamer of Diuels, and enemy of Sects. But after that he would be a god, soone did he cease to be a man; the immortal God, liating corriuals, by his owne subiects destroyed his life, riches, and memory. These Bonzai are for the most part gentlemen, whom their parents (hauing many children) for want of maintenance thrust into Cloisters; Shanen (as you haue heard) and Shamors, couetously pilling and polling the people of their money by many deuises, as by selling them scrolles to keepe them (by the Diuell) from hurt of Diuels after death: borrowing of money heere, to repay with great interest in the Future world; giuing the Creditor a bill or scroll of their hands for securitie: by telling of things stolen or lost, (which they doe by enchantments, calling a Diuell into a Child, who being so possessed, answereth their questions) by selling their blessings and curses, like Balaam. Some by vow (the most) liue vnmarried: as the Bonzian women.

Another Sect, called Ianambuxos, before their admission into that Order, liue two thousand or more together on a high mountaine, for the space of threescore dayes murthering themselves with selfe-inflicted penance; the Diuell in diuers shapes meane-while appearing to them, and after this they are received into that damnable fellowship, distinguished by white flockes hanging downe their neckes, curled haire, and blacke hats, and so wander from place to place, giuing notice of their coming by a little bell. Another Sect, called Jenguis, dwell on some high hill, blacke of complexion, and (as is supposed) horned, marry wiues of their owne kindred, passe ouer great summes by the diuels help, who on a certaine hill, at times appointed, appeareth to them; of whom by the name of Amida he is worshipped. In another hill he was wont to appeare to his deuoute followers, whom then he would lead, as they thought, to paradise: indeed to destruction, they say that a sonne, not able to perswade his father from this village to Paradise, secretly followed him with his bow and arrowes, and when the Diuell appeared shot and wounded a Fox, whom hee followed by the blood to a lake wherein he found many dead-mens bones. They haue another Vniuersity in Iapon called Cala, whose Bonzian students are of the Sect of Combendaxia, supposed the Inuentor of the Japonian Letters*. He in his old age digged a foure-square Caue, into which he conueyed himselfe, affirming that he then died not, but after some millions of yeares would returne in the dayes of one Miroza, which then should be a most worthy King in Iapon. About his sepulchre burne many lampes, sent thither from diuers Nations, with opinion that such as enrich that monument, shall themselves here be enriched, and liue the other life by Combendaxia patronised. In the Colledges here liue six thousand of these Shanlings: from whom women are restrained vpon paine of death. At Fatono shew, the Bonzai trained vp wittie and proper youths in all tricks of subtilty and guile, acquainting them with Genealogies of Princes, that so they might counterfeit to be the sonnes of such or such great men, and borrowing money on that credit, might enrich their wicked Colledge: till the sleight being found, they were killed of the Inhabitants. There be that worship the Sunne and Moone, who haue an Image with three heads, which (they say) is the vertue of the Sunne, Moone, and Elements. P These worship the may be pardoned, and therewith giue him no small quantitie of their gold. His yearly Festiuall is so honored with thronging of the people, that in the entrie of the Cloyster many are troden vnder foot, which yet is of the blinde people accounted a happinesse, many willingly yeelding themselves to be killed in that presse. And in the night, whiles his praises are sung, there is a great howling and lamentation. Neguron was Author of the Sect Fogmexan. But of other their superstitions you shall heare more in the next Chapter.

MEach their chiefe Citie is chiefe also in superstitions, hauing had (if report lie not) on the hill neere to it seuen thousand Cloisters or Abbies: one of which is so famous, that the Kings in their Warres will vnder great summes of gold, and after victorie pay the same there: the people also in distresse make it their sanctuarie, where the Diuell by visions deludeth them. In August they celebrate the Feast of Gibon with Pageants: fiftene or sixtene Chariots couered with silke, go before, in them are children with Minstrallie. Every Chariot is drawne with thirtie or sortie men, and followed by their peculiar companies or trades: and after them Chariots of men armed, which all passe by the Temple in the morning. In the euening, two Litters come forth, carried by men; the one of the god, the other of his Lemman; then followed the third of his Wife, with which the men runne vp and downe in such a confused manner, as may figure her icalousie. Heere the people weepe and pray to their goddesse, whom yet with a contrary deuotion they comfort: and lastly (as if by the peoples mediation) the Litters are ioyned together, and carried into the Temple: In the same moneth they haue their Feast of All-soules, in which they light many lampes at their doores, and all night walke vp and downe the Citie: and many suppose at a certaine place they meete with the walking ghosts of their deceased friends, and after welcoming ceremonies, they in victualls <sup>a</sup> before them, at least in that place, where hauing a while attended, they inuite them to their houses. The reason of this refreshing they alleage the long iourney to Paradise, which in lesse then three yeares space cannot be passed, and therefore they haue need of heartning. Two dayes this Feast lasteth, in which they cleanse their garments and giue presents to the Bonzij. In March they haue festiuall Playes, in which many meete in the afternoone painted with the Images of their gods on their shouldears: and parting themselves into two rankes, the Boyes beginne with stones, the men continue the fray with arrowes, poles, and swords, alwayes with the death of some, and impunitie of the doers.

At Sacai in Iuly they keepe the Feast of Daimagoin, to whom many Temples are dedicated: in which the Idoll is carried with much pompe on hore-backe, followed first by the Bonzij, then the Nobilitie, after them certaine Witches, whom armed troups of souldiers follow. Then commeth the Litter of the god, all gilded, carried by twentie men, answering each other in certaine Hymnes; the people worshipping.

Some of their Bonzij professe a militarie discipline, as the Knights of Malta. The profession called Nengori was instituted by Cacubau (who is therefore deified) in which some intend their prayers, whiles others fight, and others performe their task of making fise arrowes a day. Their Gouvernement is an Anarchie; every one obeying and commanding, the meanest person amongst them hauing a Negative in all their consultations: And nothing is agreed on till all be agreed. In the night they often kill one another without remorse, and yet (such is their Religion) this Sect holdeth it a sinne to kill a Flie or any liuing thing. Amongst the Bonzij there <sup>b</sup> are two principall men, which if vnder their hand-vvriting they giue their testimoniall to either of their Order, it is as conferring a Degree, yea a kinde of canonization.

For thence forwards they sit in a chaire, and are adored, and appoint to other Students their tasks of meditation. One of these puffed vp with vanitie and arrogance, professed to know what he was before he was borne, and what should become of him after death. Valentine Carnagliani in relating the death of some principall Nobles, which withstood Daisufama the present Emperour, speaks of a certaine Bonzi, which neuer stirres out of doores but vpon such occasions, who accompanied with many of his Sect, after other hallowing ceremonies did giue them a certaine booke to kisse, and laid it on their heads, wherein they reposed much holines, and worshipped it as a god: but one of them, named Augustine, reiected him, crying out he was a Christian, and therewith rooke out a picture of Queene Catharine of Portugall, sister to Charles the fifth, in which were also represented the holy Virgin, and our Lord, and with great reverence laid it three times on his head, and so resounding the names of Iesus and Mary, was beheaded. This I mention to let you see the Iaponian Christianitie. Some of the Bonzi are diligent Preachers, with great zeale and eloquence declaring the goodness of their Amida, and exhortation to call vpon him.

c Val. Carn.

They beleue diuers Paradises, into each of which their peculiar Gods carry their owne worshippers: And some make ouer-hastie journeyes thither on this sort. Hee watcheth certaine dayes, and then out of a Pulpit preacheth of the contempt of the world. Others betake them to be his companions, while some giue their almes. On the last day he maketh an Oration to his fellowes, who all drinking wine go into their Shippes, carrying a fishe to cut vp all the brambles in their way; and putting on their clothes, stuffe their sleeues with stones, and hanging a great stone about their neckes to helpe them the sooner to their Paradise, hurle themselves into the Sea. And great honour is done to them being thus dead. I say one (saith Vilela) that had seuen of these companions, which with their great alacritie, and my great amazement, did this. But they which worship Amida, obserue another rite. Being wearie of liuing, they put themselves in a strait hole of the earth, receiuing breath onely by a reede, and so continue fasting and praying till death. Some in honor of a certaine Idoll, doe cast themselves downe from an high Tower, where this Idoll is placed, and after their death are reputed Saints. Others<sup>d</sup> saile to their Paradise (as before) but when they haue launched into the deepe, make holes in the shippes keele for death to enter, and the sea to swallow both it and them.

d Pet. Alcaena.

Iosephus Acofta tells of a strange Confession; which is obserued in this order. There are (saith he) in Ocaca very high and steepe Rockes, which haue pikes or points on them about two hundred fadome high; One of which, higher and more terrible then the rest, daunteth and terrifieth the Xamabusis (which are certaine Pilgrims) to looke vp vnto it: vpon the top of the point there is a great rod of Iron of three fadome long, placed there by a strange deuise: at the end of this rod is a ballance tied, whereof the scales are so big, as a man may sit in one of them. And the Goguis (which be Devils in humane shape) command those Pilgrims to enter therein, one after another, not leaving one of them. Then with an Engine or Instrument, which moueth by means of a wheele, they make this rod of Iron to hang in the aire; one of the Xamabusis being set in one of the scales, which (because there is no counterpoise in the other scale) presently hangeth downe, and the emptie one riseth to touch the rod aforesaid, whereupon the ballance hangeth. Then the Goguis telleth the poore Pilgrim that hee must confesse all his sins, that he can remember, with a lowde voice, that all may heare: Which he presently doth, some of the hearers laughing, some sighing. At euery sinne mentioned, the other scale fallies a little, till that hauing told all, it remaines equall with the other, wherein the sorrowfull penitent sits. Then the Goguis turnes the wheele, and drawes the rod and ballance vnto him, and the Pilgrim comes forth, and another enters till all haue passed. If any concealed any sinne, the emptie scale yeelded not, and if when he was vrged to confesse, he grew obstinate, the Goguis cast him downe from the top, where in an instant he is broken in a thousand peeces. A Iaponian who had seuen times made triall hereof, being conuerted to Christianitie, reported this. But the error was such (saith he) that few would conceale any thing. The place hereof is called Sangenotocoro, that is, the place of confession. Thus must Acofta, whom as I thanke for the Storie, so I would a little trouble (for hee would more partially heare and beare, then some of his hotter brethren) with a question concerning confession. And if the question come too late, yet the Societie liueth (and will longer then a better thing) in to a Colledge of whom Iapon hath brought vs, as their names beere testifie.

The question is, whether every residence of the Iesuits be not a Sangenotocoro of Ocaca, that is, a place of confession (so doth Sangenotocoro signifie) of which we may exclaime ŏ xian, and if you will ŏ xian, the one for the cruell terrour wherewith it filleth the Conscience, and the later for the fleshly filthines wherein Ocaca is not blamed, but their Churches haue beene Stewes, and Confession the Baude. But to let this passe, and consider the former. What Racke or Rocke can Ocaca yeeld like to this, which the Council of Trent hath framed, that full Confession of all mortall finnes (loe heere the Racke) even the very thoughts against the two last Commandments, with the circumstances of the sins, is necessary by diuine ordinance vnto all which haue sinned after Baptisme; and (loe heere the Rocke) Anathema to the gain-sayers. Tush, your coine is not currant, although you yeeld it profitable, and comfortable, and satisfactory to the offended Church, except you yeeld all necessary, all diuine. Diuers shal I call you, or Goquis, Diuels in the flesh, that make a hell in the spirits of men with your debita prae meditatione, and with your omnia & singula peccata, etiam oculta, etiam circumstantias, & circumuent poore Christians, and put them in an Ocaca ballance ouer hell-mouth, there to fall, without such fauour as to be braken in peeces. Go Cardinall, and write whole volumes for the prooffe hereof, yet would I rather chuse to enter the Sangenotocoro-scale; then your Confession-schoole. Easie it may be indeed to seared Iesuiticall Consciences, that account Treason Religion, yea pleasure and delightfull to such Statists, to haue Kings vpon the knees of their bodies, to powre out before them the secrets of their soules, and (they are wiser then Salomon which esteemed it impossible) to search out the Kings hearts. But to such as haue business enough to know and rule themselves, and doe indeed make Conscience of every day, what intollerable anguish is heere prepared? when mans heart, besides that it is wicked and deceitfull about all, who can search it? is like an untamed Heifer, who can rule it? Had I not need alway to haue a Priest at mine elbow, to whom to shew me? Who knoweth the errors of his life? and who knoweth when he hath made his disposition meditation, to examine them? This made Bellarmino vse the difficultie of Confession as an argument of the diuine Institution thereof. It is so difficult (saith he) that no power of man or the Church could haue imposed it, and therefore it was diuine, I will not say, who instituted the ballance of Ocaca, and yet it was a hard thing, and neuer the like heard of; I say, that the Gospell imposeth not such hard things (this wete bring vs backe to the Law) but prescribeth an easy yoke, and a light burthen: easie such as loue not their ease, light to such as like and delight in it. But this, euen to that that dote vpon it, and deuote themselves to it, is not onely hard, but altogether impossible: Witnesse Bellarmino himselfe, Quid enim molestius, quid onerosius, quam ut ingantur etiam viri principes, Regesq; potentissimi, sacerdotibus qui & ipsi homines sunt peccata sua omnia detegere, quamuis arcana, quamuis turpia, &c. Witnesse experience such as haue tried it more neerely then Bellarmines Controuersies would giue him leisure, yet liuing in continuall disquietnesse, and torment of their Consciences, in the vse of their Sacrament of Confession, receiuing no rest day nor night, as seruing gods, who cannot giue it them. These are the words of Sheldon (happily brought out of that darknesse, wherein, and whereof he was a Priest and Minister, to a cleare light) who out of his owne knowledge addeth; That it is not imaginable what inconsolable liues, some, that are frequent in the vse of Confession (as necessarie to saluation) doe leade: there is no stonie heart which would not pittie them, knowing their torments. But lest any man thinke, that some Goquis hath hurled me out of the scale of my History, to fall and split my selfe vpon these Iesuiticall rockes, I will remune to our Narration of the Iaponites.

Diuers of them before their Images in desperate distresse disembowell themselves in that bloudie manner before mentioned. To tell of their Idoll Casunga, of whom they they begge riches, Tamondea, Bosomondea, Hamecondia and Zoisia: to which foure, their superstitious opinion committeth so many heauens in custodie. Canon and Xava, the sonnes of Xaca, Maristenes, Trigu, and others, would be too tedious to report. Organismus telleth, That whiles vpon a time the Feast of this Iaft was solemnizing, a shower of stones rained with such violence, that the company, to the number of twene thousand, betooke them to their heeles. But Amida is most worne in their lippes; beggers asking and begging in his name; chapmen in buying and selling, sounding and singing it: the Banzij promising saluation to all that inuoke it. Admirable are the Temples for matter and workmanship erected to him; one neere to Meaco is an hundred and fortie ells in length, with a huge Image of Amida, hauing thirtie Images about it of souldiers, besides Ethiopians and Diuels, yea windes and thunders figure, and a thousand Images of Canon (on each side of the Temple fise hundred) all in like, but monstrous shape, with thirtie armes, two onely holding proportion to his body, the breast adorned with seuen faces; all the Images and other furniture so glittering with gold, that it dazleth the beholders eyes. Amida describeth a Temple of stone in Meaco, called Cobucus, which had three Porches, with so many Cloisters, with other peeces of stately and costly workmanship. Two mightie Colosses or statues of Lions, were set as porters at the doore. In the midst of the Temple were set Xaca and his sonnes about him. There were threescore and ten pillars of Cedar of such height, that (as the Register booke of the Temple testified) each of them cost fise thousand ducats. These and the walls were painted, the roose artificially framed: a Hall for the Banzij fortie ells long and twelue broad of like workmanship with the Temple: whereunto were annexed their Chambers, an hundred and fourscore in number, a Library full stored with bookes; Bathes, Butteries, Kitchens, huge Caldrons well deepe, to heat their water for drinke, which they neuer drinke cold, neither in Summer nor winter; Parlors foure and twentie, with lights burning in them all night. Before it is a Fish-poole fiftie ells square, full of fish, which none may touch. It is fise hundred yeares since the foundation of this Temple. The pleasant and spacious walks before the Temple of Casunga, planted with lustie Cedars and Pines, watered with a goodly streame, arched with a double row of pillars, adorned with fiftie Lanternes on each side, of solid metall covered with gold, and curiously wrought, which burne all night: the large Monasterie of Bonzian Nunnes, which being about fise and fortie yeares old devote themselves to these holies; the Quire not to be entred by any but certaine religious, which there sit in garments of silke: these with other like might tempt my pen to be tedious. And so might the Temple of Facbiman in the same groue, more costly and curious then the former, and another without it consecrat to Dai, but, which hath two Giantly porters of stone fourtene ells high, fourscore and eightene pillars of wonderfull height, and three ells and a halfe in compasse: it was built seuen hundred yeares since, and was twentie yeares in building. A Tower or Steeple of wood aborne vp with thirtie pillars, in which did hang a brazen bell, the mouth whereof was two ells, the compasse fise, the depth three and a halfe, the thickeesse about thirtie inches. There are many Deere and Doves consecrated to the Temple, which go into mens houses, no man touching them. Their walks set with Orange trees, and other their rarities of Art and Nature: they which would further learne, let them resort to Amida our Author. One Temple is dedicated iust by, to a Lizard, (which they make Author and Patron of learning) without Altar or Image in it. He that readeth of the huge workes of Taisosama, holding sometime an hundred thousand workemen in labour at once, may present to his Imagination the incredible buildings which those Tyrants, by so many slauiish hands, can raise. Their busie wits appeare by their vniuersall questions to Iohn Fernandez, of the nature of the Soule, of Angels and Diuels, &c. and foure of them seeing the absurdities of the Banzij worshippe nothing at all. The Banzij, as the Iesuits report, raised slanderous rumours of them, to brekers of mens flesh, and causes of the warres and plagues which their gods promoted by this new Sect sent amongst them: they slandered the new Conuertrs as miserable Apostataes, which became Christians, because they would not bee at the charges of their Idolatrie.

a L. Frois Epist.

They are very curious and ambitious in setting forth their Funeralls; thus briefly. The friends assemble in their best array to the fire: the women of his acquaintance goe forth in white rayment, with party-coloured veiles on their heads, and their husbands attending: their chiefe women are carried in Beds, or Litters of Cedar. After them follow the men in sumptuous habite: next comes the chiefe Bonze of his sect in his pontificalibus, carried in a costly bed, attended with thirtie other Bonze in their linnen vestments. Then one in Ash-coloured garments (for that is also a mourning colour) with a long Torch lighted, sheweth the Corpse the way to the fire; followed with two hundred Bonze singing to the Deitie which the dead had chiefly observed: others beate on a Balon till they come at the fire: others carry paper baskets full of painted flowres, which they shake out by the way, as a token that his soule is gone to Paradise. Eight Bonze draw Banners on the ground, in which is written their Idols name: ten Lanternes, with the same inscription, are carried with lights burning. Two follow with Torches vnlighted, wherewith after ward they kindle the fire. Many come after in Ash-coloured habite, with three-square cappes on their heads, with the same also of their Diuell therein written, which name another beareth written in a table with large letters of gold. After all these (did you thinke you had lost him?) comes the Corpse sitting in a Bed, in white, borne by foure men, his hands ioyned in a praying gesture. His children are next, the eldest carrying a Torch to kindle the fire. Lastly comes the multitudes with such cappes as we spake of. After an houres halloeing their holies by all this multitude, and three times compassing about the inclosed square place, in which (besides tables for viands) the fire is made, the chiefe Bonze in an vnknowne language mumbleth ouer an Hymne, and lighting a Torch doth thrice brandish it about his head (thereby signifying that the soule is without beginning or end) and then casts it away. Two of his children take it vp, and after a triple ceremonie (the bodie being laid thereon) kindle therewith the wood: on which they hurle costly woods and oyle, and so burne the carkasse to ashes. Which done, the children, making incense, adore their father, as now assumed to the heavenly society, and richly reward the Bonze. Next day they returne and put the reliques of this corpse, ashes and bones, into a gilded vessell, which is hanged in the house, there to receive like exequies, and afterwards with no lesse ceremonie buried; every seventh day, and seventh moneth, and seventh yeare, his children renting their deuotions. The poorer spend herein two or three hundred, the rich as many thousand ducats. After so much wickednesse of men, let vs adde somewhat of the admirable workes of God in Japon.

b L. Frois Relat. de Legat. Cinens. Addeth many other strange effects hereof in Bungo and other places. Vid. & Pet. Gomez,

On the two and twentieth day of Iuly, in the yeare 1596. it rained ashes round about Meaco, couering the ground as if it had beene snow. Soone after it rained both there and in other places, red sand, and after that, as it had beene, womens haire. And not long after followed an Earth-quake, that hurled downe Temples and Palaces (wherein Tairosama had then newly employed night and day an hundred thousand worke-men, to his exceeding cost, and their intollerable slavery) which with their ruines destroyed thousands: fixe hundred gilded Images in the Temple of Ianzasangu were cast downe, and broken in peeces, as many remaining whole. It brought vp the Sea a great way vpon the maine Land, which is carried backe with it into the Sea, not leauing mention that there had beene Land. So was the Citie Ochinofama swallowed, Famaoqui, Ecuro, Fingo, Cascicanaro, the neighbour-Townes attended her in this new voyage, and became Sea. The Shippers in the Hauens found no more securitie, but were also deuoured. The like happened in the yeare of our Lord 1586. to Nagafama, a place frequented with Merchants, which the Sea before had enriched, then with an Earth-quake deuoured, the Earth in many places opening such vvide mouthes, that a Calliuer-shot could scarce reach from the one side to the other, belching out of that yawning passage such a stincke, as none were able to passe by. The Earth and Sea not onely shooke with feare, but bellowed out such roaring cries vnder that blow of their Creation hands, as did make the accident more dreadfull. Yet was all soone forgotten and Tairosama fell to building of new Pallaces. Francis Fernandes writeth that in the the way from Malacca to Japan they are incountr'd with great stormes, which they call Tafoss; that blow foure and twenty houres, beginning from the North to the East, and so about the compass these happen in June and Iuly. It is there colde in November, December, January, and Februrarie, because of continuall North & North-west windes. Their women are as faire as with vs.

He that listeth further to be acquainted with Iaponian affaires, may resort to the Estates of the Iesuites, which, besides these I haue named, are many: and of that society more many lesse then two hundred in this Iland, which also is now become an Episcopall See. Some Cities are become wholly Christian, if we beleue the Iesuites, who say that all their Ethnick Paganisme and Idolatrie: would God no leaues were left with their Christianity. Perier Marinus, their first Bishop tells of aboue twenty thousand in a yeare converted to Christian Religion: whereas in China they haue had small successe, notwithstanding that they there promised to themselves a more plentifull harvest then in any other Nation. The first of them was Xauer (one of the first companions, and like to haue bene canonized before him too) which died in China 1552, and lieth buried at Goa: of which Arrius Blandinus, and the Iesuites say many strange things. But the first finding of this Iland is by Gilgannus ascribed to Johny Mara and his fellowes 1542: But before these M. Polo writeth of this Iland, which he calleth Tepanagu; whither Cublas the great Tartarian Cau in the yeare 1264 sent two Captaines to conquer the Iland. The windes (as angry with the Tartarians, making part with the Islanders) raised so stormie a Sea, that (when there were now three thousand of their companie, landed in a little Iland) they were forced to put off to sea, and scattered with tempests. The Islanders set forth a Nauie to take those Tartarians, which so confusedly ordered that enterprize, that the Tartarians found meanes to make themselves Masters of their enemies Nauie, and therewith to saile away. Marcus Paulus reporteth like things of their Idolatrous Religion, as you haue heard: of idols with heads of Oxen, Hogges, and Dogges, and other deformed shapes: and here with many handes, as a testimonie of their great power. The enemies which they tooke in warre, not able to redeeme themselves, he saith they did eate in solemne feasts: he addeth, that in the Iaponian language Mangi was called Cin; as now it is Cin or China.

I haue presumed to adde a peece of a Letter of Quabacondon to the Viceroy of India, which after other things, hath these wordes: Iapon is the Kingdome of Chamis, which we esteeme to be the same with Scin, which is the beginning of all things. This Scin is the substance and very being of all things: and all things are one and the same with Scin, and into Scin are resolved, which in Scin is called Iuto; and in Tescincu Yapo. In the obseruation of the lawes of this Chamis, consisteth all the politique government of Iapon, both inward and outward, &c.

The King of Bungo, Arima, and Omur sent their Embassadors to the Pope (then Gregory the thirteenth) with Letters of their deuotion to his Holinesse, and had audience in the Consistorie the three and twentieth day of March ann. 1585. This was the Iapones pollicie (saith Linschoten) to make the Iaponites to know the magnificence of Europe, and by that meanes principally to enrich themselves with gifts and priuileges. Howsoeuer; the Iaponites thought themselves hereby much obliged to the Pope, as by the letter of Don Sancio, the King or Lord of Omur, and Protasius of Arima to Pope Xistus 1590. appeareth. But for a farewell to these Iaponian Iesuites, I like them being there so well, that I could wish all of that societie were preaching in that Iland, or acting the Scripture. stories vpon the Stage (which is one way of instructing the Iaponites) or, if you like that rather, a whipping themselves in their vaine-glorious Processions (which is another of their Iaponian Lectures) that so they might in some measure expiate the crimes of their European brethren; or any way else, so that our Europe were well ridde of such vermine.

Touching the Kingdome of Iapan, we cannot set downe the number and order of their Kings in auncient times. It seemeth that these last eight hundred yeares they haue bene much disquieted with ciuill warres; euery one getting as many shires or Kingdomes (which in Iapan are threescore and fixe) as he could. Nabunanga was a great Prince;

Prince; and Quabacondon a greater; both great Tyrants. The last caused his Nephew to be made Quabacondon, contenting himselfe with the title of Taicofama; but soone after, jealous of his greatness, he forced him (after the Laponian manner) with his companions, to kill himselfe. He having no children but one infant, when he was sicke and neere to death, sent for Giciso, the chiefe of the Laponian Nobles, Lord of eight Kingdomes, and made him administrator of the Kingdom till his sonne should be of age; and further to binde him hereunto, hee made a marriage betwixt Giciso Neece, two yeares old, and this infant of his about the same age, causing the same presently to be consummated. He tooke an oath of him, and the other Nobles for their fealtie to his sonne. He ioyned to him foure other great Princes, and so those five by other of his owne raising, that these Discemments might secure the Seste for his sonne in this his minority. But after his death there arose 7 great contentions, which Giciso (now calling himselfe Daisufama) appeard, and after some 7 battels against his adversaries, inuested himselfe in the Empire, Anno 1601. This he did then in young Taicofamas name; but since he hath seized the Empire fully to himselfe. And calling himselfe Cubo, since that time (as the later Epistles testifie) hath entituled his owne sonne the Laponian Empire. And for that cause forsith himselfe in Quanto, one of the ancient Kingdomes; and in Gicudo a towne thereof, at the charge of his subjects, which he hath had at once there working continually, from Februarie to September, three hundred thousand; he hath raised strong fortifications, and ruleth with great Policie, none daring to molest him. Lewes Frois speaketh of a great nation of wilde people to the North of Iapon, three hundred leagues from Meaco, which are clothed with beasts skinnes, with great beards and muttachoës; a people giuen to wine, valiant, dreadfull to the Iaponites. They worshippe the Heaven: and other Religion they haue not.

CHAP. XVII.

Of the Philippina's.

Tis already shewed, that those Ilands receiued this name of Philipp the second, King of Spaine, and that this name sometime is in a large sort attributed to all these Ilands in those huge Seas, but more properly to those which Legaspi discovered in the yere 1564. and where the Spaniards haue since that time had some places of abode; Mendanao, Tandaya, Luzon, and their neighbours, lying farre into the Sea betwixt Cauchin-China and Cambaia, betwixt the seventh degree and the twentieth of Northerly latitude: but first of all other Tendaia was called Philippina, by the Spaniards which discovered it out of New-Spaine 1543. as Iuan Gaetan, one of them, testifieth. They are many in number, some of them very great, rich in Rice, Honey, Fruits, Birds, Beasts, Fishes, Golde; and enriched further with trade from China. Seuentie of these Ilands are Subjects or friends to the Spaniards. Of ancient time they were subject to the Chinois, vntill they did voluntarily relinquish them: the cause of much ciuill war amongst themselves, that Anarchie prouing worse to them then a Tyrannie, or rather the worse tyrannie, euery man becomming a Tyrant, and as hee had meanes of strength and followers, preying vpon others, vsing or selling them for slaues: which their diuisions made an easie way to the Spanishe Conquest.

They worshipped the Sunne and Moone, and the men and women, which in their language they called Maganitas, obseruing in their honour solemne and sumptuous Feasts. In the Illocs they worshipped the Diuell, and offered to him many sacrifices in recompence of a great quantitie of golde, which they said he had giuen them. Their Feasts and Sacrifices were done by women, which were Witches (of them called Hagoi) reuerenced amongst them as Priests. These had ordinary talke with the Diuell, and many times in publike. These wrought strange witchcrafts; they answered vnto all questions that were demanded of them: (although their answers were often either lies or riddles) they used lots as the Chinois, and were observers of times. If they began a journey, and met with a Lizard or other worme, they would returne home, saying the heavens prohibited their proceeding.

They have now amongst them many Preachers and Monasteries of the Augustinian, Franciscan, and Iesuites. But the wicked life of the Spaniards is so offensive to the Inhabitants, that the Discourser (himselfe a Frier) telleth heereof a notable Storye. A certaine Ilander soone after his baptisme, died, and appeared after to many of his Countrey-men, perswading them to be baptised, as a way vnto that happinesse, whereof he now had in himselfe most blessed experience: onely they must be baptizd, and observe the Commaundements, of which the Spaniards preached to them, of whom, and of others like vnto them, there were in that happy place infinite numbers. Hereupon he vanished, and some were perswaded: but others of them refused, saying, that because there were Spaniard souldiers in glorie, they would not goe thither, because they would not be in their company. A like Historie Bartholom de las Casas d relateth of a Western Indian, at the time of his death answering to a Dominick Frier, which counsell'd him to die a Christian, and so to be capable of heauen (when he heard there were Spaniards in heauen) hee would rather be in hell with his forefathers, then in heauen with the Spaniards.

The Spaniards haue their Bishop and Archdeacon, and besides other Religious, foure Colledges of Iesuites. Batruus f saith, that the King of Spaine had thought to haue made Manilla an Archbishopsricke, and added three other Archbishopsricks, Capitanie & Nours (a Dutch-man that compassed the world) lost a ship heere in fight with the Spaniards, and sunke one of theirs: he affirms that the conuerts of these parts are more populosly Christian, then in the midst of Rome or Spaine, and more addicted to their superstitious follies.

In these Philippina's b some carue and cut their skinn, with sundrie strakes and deuises all ouer their bodie. Moreouer, as we haue spoken of Balls worne in their yards, by the men of Pegu; so here, the men and men-children amongst them haue nayles of Tin thrust quite through the head of their priuie part, being split in the lower end, and inserted, which is done when they be young, and the place groweth vp againe, without any great paine. They take it out, and put it in, as occasion serueth. This here, as that in Pegu, is said to haue bin practised to auoyde the sinne of Sodomie, whereto before they were prone. The males also are (at least in some of the Philippina's) circumcised. The people worship the Diuel, who oft times appeareth to them in conference, in most ugly and monstrous shape. There is amongst them an Iland of Negro's, inhabited with blacke people, almost as bigge as England, in nine degrees.

Here also be those k blacke people called Osapnas, Man-eaters and Sorceters, among whom Duels walke familiarly, as companions. If these wicked Spirits find one alone, they kill him, and therefore they alwayes vse company. Their Idols they adorne with Ostrich feathers. They vse to let themselues bloud with a certaine hearbe laide to the member, and licked with the tongue: with which they can draw out all the bloud in their bodie. They are like the Casers or Ethiopians, and are diuided into many Kingdomes, as * Nunnes writeth.

Migindinao, Mindanao, or Vendenao is a great Iland, containyng by Iuan Gaetans obseruation, three hundred and fourescore leagues in compass. It is inhabited of Maiores and Gentiles: there are many Kings. In stead of bread they vse Rice and Sago. There is Pepper, Ginger, and Golde singularly good. Tendaia (which first obtained the Philippine title) enuironeth a hundred and sixtie leagues, from twelue to fiftene degrees of latitude: the people Idolatrous, abounding with Pepper, Ginger, Golde, and Mynes.

When as Adagellan, first of all men, l by the West discovered these Easterne Ilands, in the Ilands of Buthoan and Caleghan he could learne no other Religion obserued amongst them, but that lifting vp their handes closed together, and their face towards heauen, they called on their God by the name of Abba. In Zubut (in token of friendship) he & the King did let themselues bloud on the right arme, for so was their wont to confirme leagues of amitie. The King had his skinn painted with a hose Iron Pen-

They weare in their yard a naile of golde. They had many wiues, but one principall. They<sup>m</sup> obserued many ceremonies in killing a Hogge, in sacrifice, as it seemed to the Sunne. After the sounding of their Cimbals, and certaine Cares set down in Platters, two olde women came forth with Trumpets or Pipes of Reede, and did reuerence to the Sunne, and then clothing themselues with sacred vestments, one of them put about her fore-head a haire-lace with two horns, holding another haire-lace or skeife in her hand, and so beganne to sound, daunce, and call vpon the Sunne, wherein shee followed by the other, both of them in this manner dauncing about the Hogge, which is there fast tied. The horned Beldame still muttereth certaine wordes to the Sunne, and the other answereth her: then doth she take a cup of wine, and after some ceremonies poureth it on the Hogge: and after that with a launce, after dances and flourishes shee killeth the Hogge. All this while a little Torch is burning, which at last shee taketh into her mouth, and biteth it: and the other woman washeth the Pipes with the Swines blood, and with her finger embrewed with blood, marketh the fore-head of her husband first, and then of the rest. Then doe they vtire themselues, and only with women associates, eate the cheere in the Platters: and after singe the Hogge, and eate him.

From hence Magellan went to Mathan, where in a battell with the Ilanders he was slaine. In Pulaoan they keepe Cockes for the game, but eate not of their flesh, forbidden by their superstitions. In Cumbubon they found a tree, which had leaues like those of the Mulburie, hauing besides on each side of the leafe, as it were, two seere, with which (as if it had bin mouing and sensible) it would stirre and go vp and down. Pigafetta kept one eight dayes in a Platter, and when he touched it, presently it would flee from him, and moue vp and downe: he thought it liued of the ayre.

n Maf. Transl.

In Burneo the people are partly Moores, and partly Gentiles, and according to their Religions, haue two Kings and two royall Cities, situated in salt-water. The Moores when they kill a Hen or a Goate, vse first certaine wordes to the Sunne. The Gentiles worship the Sunne and Moone, esteeming the one Male and the other Female, him the Father, this the Mother of the Starres, whom also they reckon in the catalogue of their demi-gods. They salute the Sunne in his morning-approch, with certaine verses and adoration: which they also performe to the Moone, and demaund of them children, riches, and other their necessities. After death they expect no future state. The Spaniards heard of great Pearles as bigge as egges, which the King of Burneo had: and if you beleue them, theyooke an Oyfter themselues, whose fishie substance weighed seuen and fortie pounds. The Moore-King in Burneo was serued in his Palace, and attended onely by women and maydens.

p<sup>2</sup> 396.

In Gilolo they are likewise, some of the Arabian Sect, the others Gentiles. The Moores had two Kings of their law, each of which had six hundred children. The Gentiles vsed to worship the first thing they encounter in the morning all the day following. They were sometime man-eaters: some of the Ilanders were by the Portugalls conuerted; but the King being poysoned by a Mahumetan, they declined. Yet one Noble-man named John, first killed his wife and children with his own hands, lest they should apostatize, and then offered himselfe to endure any torment.

q Sir Fr. Drake.

The Moluccos are vsually reckoned five (as before is said) but many other Ilands are subiect to them, and by some Authors called also by that name. The King of Ternate is said to haue seuentie Ilands vnder his subiection, and in his Port represented great Majesty. Both here and in Banda the Mahumetan superstition hath set footing, and preuailed, as in the other adioyning Ilands, the Moores being as zealous to winne Profelites, as to enrich themselues. None of these Ilands is aboue fixe leagues in compass, enriched with Cloues, but of other fruits barren and poore. One tree they haue, which out of the cut branches yeeldeth a white, wholesome, and saourie liquor for drinke; they call it Tuaga, and the pith thereof affoordeth them meate called Saga, casting in the mouth lik fowre Curds, melting like Sugar, whereof they make certaine Cakes, which will endure good for food ten yeares. The Cloue trees not onely sucke up all the moystrure of the earth where they grow, disdayning any other plant should grow nere them (like our Inclosers) suddenly drinking vp all the heauens liberality in showers, but with their thirsty appetite intercept the running waters that descend from the mountaines, before they can betake them to their mothers lap, the Oceans refuge. In this Iland are said to be men hauing anckles with spurres like to Cockes; here are bogges with hornes: a Riuer stored with fish, and yet so hote, that it flaieth off the skin of any creature which entereth it; Oysters so large, that they christen in the shells: Crabbes so strong, that with their clawes they will breake the yron of a pickaxe: Bananes which grow like fish, whereof they make lime.

In Ternate is a mountaine, which (as it were) angrie with Nature, for being fastned to the earth, doth not onely lift vp his high head above the airie Regions of clouds, but endeoureth also to conioyne it selfe with the fierie element, wherewith it seemeth to hold some entercourse, with dreadfull thunders, belching out light flames mixed with a darke smoake, like prowd Greatnesse, wasting it selfe with it owne flames, and filling the neighbouring valley with ashes. It is not much about a hundred yeares, since first the Sect of Mahumet entred the Moluccas. But now both here and in Amboino the Iesuites haue their residences, and haue perswaded many to their Catholike faith, and whipping Processions. Stephanus Hagan in the year 1605. wanne this Iland of Amboino, and the sort of the Portugalls, to the States: it is a Cloue-Iland. The King of Ternate is Mahumetan.

Much conflict was sometime betwene the Kingdomes of Spaine and Portugall, about these Ilands: and some warre since betwixt the Portugalls and Hollanders, ended (if ended) with the Hollanders losse. These Moluccians are treacherous, faithlesse and inious: they suffer no man to see their wiues; yea, themselves see not their wiues vnill they be contracted.

In Ternate Theft is neuer suffered unpunished: the Hollanders saw a boy of eleuen or twelue yeares, for stealing a lease of Tobacco, led vp and downe with his hands bound behinde him, for a publique spectacle and detestation to other boyes. They maintain deadly warres with the Portugalls, and spare none of them that they can get. If an eclipse of the Sunne or Moone happen, they howle and make piteous lamentation; perswading themselves, that their King, or some great man amongst them will die. Experience thereof was the sixt of August 1599. when the Moone was eclipsed about eight of the clocke at night, they euery way by crying out, by strange gestures, praying and beating their Basons and Drummes, expressed a lamentable passion of grieffe, for the feare aforesaid. And the eclipse being past, when they see that neyther the King, nor any other is dead, they obserue the next day solemnely festiuall with publike procession of olde and young, of all sorts. They esteemed it a miracle when the Hollanders tolde them that there were in their Countrey which could prognosticate of eclipses long before. Columbus vsed the like simplicitie of the Iamaicans to his persuasion: for when they forsook him, he threatned vnto them the anger of God, whereof they should see an euident token in the darkening of the Moone within two dayes, which according to the naturall reuolution of the heauens (knowne to Columbus) comming to passe, the Ilanders with dread and feare shewed all readinesse to his seruice. The conceits of the Moones eclipse haue bene diuers, some Indians thinking that she was whipped by the Sunne till the blood followed: the Greekes attributing the same to Thessalian charmes, for remedie whereof, they vsed to beate on instruments of brasse, and lighted Torches, and cast fires vp towards heauen. And the Athenians persecuted Naturall Philosophers, and Meteorogians, as aduersaries to Diuinitie, as appeared in Diagoras, Protagoras, and Socrates, till Plato brought them to another minde. Plutar. Nescius.

The Water about Ternate is so cleare, that they fish by the eye, and can see the Anchors in the bottome of the Water, at sixteene or seuteene fathom depth, as if it were but a foote: and espie euery Fish which passeth, to no small aduantage of their Fishing.

The Moluccians are better proportioned then other Indians, haue more beard (which the elder men nourish and weare long for their greater authoritie) browne of colour, and meane of stature. For valour they haue not their like in all India, especially those of Ternate, chusing rather to die then flee, and esteeming it a great credit to fight against greater multitudes. Their shields are of wood, two spans broad, and foure foot long. They are exceedingly addicted to sloath and ease, none working in any handicraft; their houses are of timber and reedes, without one nail in them, which their slaues build, and doe also their other labors. They haue no money, and the silver which they haue is employed to vessels of plate. Their riches are their Cloues, wherewith they prouide them of other necessaries. They neuer see their wiues till they are married; nor the wiues them. Makian and Mohr are now subiect to the King of Ternate: Tidore and Batian haue their peculiar Kings. This people haue the power to elect their King, so that they choose one of the royall and ancient family. The King of Ternate calleth himselfe King of Gilolo, whereof he hath but a part, and that by conquest. The birds of Paradise (saith this Author) haue two feet as well as other birds; but as soone as they are taken, they are cut off with a great part of their body, whereof a little is left with the head and necke, which being hardned and dried in the Sunne, seeme to be so bred. The Moores<sup>b</sup> made the Ilanders beleue that they came out of Paradise, and therefore call them Manucodiath, or holy birds, and haue them in religious account. They are very beautifull, with varietie of feathers and colours.

Amboyna bringeth forth Oranges, Citrons, Limons, Cloues, Coquos, Bonans, Sugar-canes, and other fruites, being a very fertile Iland. The Inhabitants are simple, liue sparingly, and are attired like other the Moluccans. They spend much Rice, whereof they make loaues like Sugar-loaues. They haue Gallies<sup>c</sup> after their maner, formed like Dragons, which they row very swiftly: they call them Karkellen. The Admirall came to the Hollanders with three of these, full of armed men, which rowed round about them, expressing manifold signes of ioy with Songs and Drums; the slaues singing as they rowed. They had three pieces of Ordinance in euery Galley, which they discharged, answered in that kinde by the Hollanders. But two of the Holland-ships not finding sufficient store of commodities for them all, went to Banta, passing by Pod Setto, an Iland not inhabited, bearing Northwest from Banta five Dutch miles. They say it is inhabited of Diuels, and whosoever must passe by, maketh all possible hast to be gone, much affrighted eyther by selfe-fancies, or diuellish impostures.

Banta is foure and twentie Dutch miles from Amboyna, and diuided into three parts, which comprehend five miles. The chiefe Citie is Nera. In this Iland are more store of Nutmegs then elsewhere in the Moluccas: for which cause they resort hither from Iaua, China, and Malacca. They professe Mahumetisme so deuoutly, that they neuer goe to their Watches before they haue prayed in the Mesquit, whereinto they enter, being first washed (after the Mahumetane manner) but pray so loude, that they may be heard a great distance: their wordes of prayer are Stofferolla, Stofferolla; Afcebhad an la, Afcebhad an la; Tilla, Afcebhad an la; Till lolla, ll lolla, Mahumed die Rosulla. At the pronouncing of which last wordes, they stroke their handes ouer their face; in which gesture they thinke is much holinesse. Other prayers they mutter ouer very softly, with little mouing their lips. They stand vpon Mats, and lift vp their eyes twice or thrice to heaven: after which they kneele downe, bowing their head twice or thrice to the earth. Thus they doe often euery day, both at home and in the streets. They

They haue their publike meetings and Bankets in their Temples very often, euery one bringing his part of the cheere: which sometimes they doe in the Woods a hundred in a companie. At these times they consult of publike affaires.

They haue Ciuill Warres, Nera and Lontoor holding together against three other Townes. Two little Ilands, Polleruijn and Poelvuay take part with Nera, and when occasion requireth, come thither with their Boates to consultation, where they are entertained in publike Feasts: the manner whereof is, that they sit downe in order, in stead of a Table euery one hath a peece of a leafe of the Bonanas Tree: then is set before each a peece of Sagu bread, after that, a dish made of the leafe of another Tree, with a little sodden Rice and Flesh-pottage, which they hurle by handfuls into their mouths, deuouring rather then eating the same. In the meane while the Gentlemen arise with their weapons, and exercise themselues in Martiall Games, with Daunces. The quarrell betwixt these Islanders grew about the cutting of certaine Trees, from whence it is come to cut and kil one another with cruel butcheries. They exercise Sea-fights in their Caracox, or Galeots, with great dexterity, with great shouts and cries, the Gentlemen dancing on the Hatches very actiuelly. They are very bloody and barbarous, yet burie the heads of their enemies with sweet Odours. If any of their friends die, the women made a shrill and loud cry to call him againe; which not effected, they provide a great Feast, whereunto all the kindred and friends are inuited. They burie them almost after our fashion, in a white sheete, the corpes being caried on mens shoulders, the men first, and women after, following. A Censer is there left fuming all the day and night; and in the night they keepe a light burning in a little House, which they haue set ouer the Graue. In the morning and euening all of all sortes come and say their Prayers a long while together at the Graue; and being asked wherefore? they said, That the dead should not arise againe. They haue a play with the ball, exercised by many of them, not as amongst vs with the hand, but with their feet, tossing the same vp into the Ayre, and taking it one of another with admirable sleight.

Before we leaue these Moluccas and their dependant Ilands, we may conclude with a Tragedie, wherein blinde Superstition, and beastly crueltie, were principall Actors. When Menesius was Gouvernour of the Portugall Fort in Ternate, hee kept a Sow, which some of the deuouer Mahumetans killed. He getting the chiefe Priest (accessorie to the fact) into the Castle, at his deliuerie made his face bee greased with Bacon by the Taylor, which caused the people to offer abuse to some Portugals. Menesius in reuenge cut off the handes of two of them, the third had his handes bound behind him, and was bayred with two Dogges on the Sea-shore: which his implacable enemies transported him into like dogged humour (though hee were not with Hecuba transformed into the shape) insomuch, that fastening with his teeth on one of their eares, he held fast, till his strength failing, he sunke into the Sea with the Dogge, and was drowned.

In Selebes they eat mans flesh. The King of the Moluccas was wont to send condemned persons to Celebes, to be deuoured. Nicolaus Nunnis writeth that Selebes is very large and containeth many and great Ilands: the soile is exceeding fertile; the inhabitants comely and tall, rather rudie then blacke. They haue manie Kings; which is cause of many contentions. Three of them were conuerted. Peter Mascarenia in a letter dated a thousand five hundred sixtie nine, speaketh of a King of Sion in Selebes, which was baptized, and his subiects therefore rebelled against him, one Towne only excepte: and that hee and the King of Sanguim did take vp a Crosse on their owne shoulders which the chiefe men had before heuen of a faire peece of wood, and helped to erect the same, and then with the multitude kneeling downe worshipped it.

Southward of Celebes is situated a little Iland, where Sir Francis Drake graued his Shippe. This Iland is thoroughly growne with Woods, in which euery night certaine fire Flies made such a light as if euery twigge or tree had beene a burning Candle. Here they found Battes as bigge as Hennes, and plentie of Cray-fishes so great, that one would suffice foure men to their dinner they digged themselves holes in the Earth like Conies.

From hence they sayled to Iaua; of which name M. Paulus and Nic. di Conti reckon two great Ilands, ascribing to the one two thousand, and to the other three thousand myles in circuit. The lesse is neere to the firme Land of the South Continent, where Beach, and some other Prouinces, are named by Paulus and Vertomannus, of Heathenish Superstitions. The lesse Iaua had in the dayes of M. Paulus eight Kingdomes in six of which himselfe had beene, which he nameth; Felech, wherein the ruall inhabitants were Idolaters, the Citizens Moores: the Idol-worshippers eate any flesh whatsoeuer, of man, or beast, and obserue all day what they first see in the morning. M. Paulus 1. Basma 2 the second, acknowledged the great Chams Soueraigntie, but payed him no tribute. Here were certaine Vnicornes, headed like Swine, footed like an Elephant, with one horne on their forehead (with which they doe not hurt any, but to their end vse certaine prickles that grow on their tongues:) They delight also in the Myre like Swine. Here are little Apes, much resembling men in their countenance, which they vsed to preserue with certaine Spices, hauing slayed off their skinnies, and left the haire growing in those parts, where Nature causeth men to bee hairie, and sell them to Merchants, to be carried ouer the World as the bodies of little men; happily the onely true Pygmies the World yeeldeth. In Samara, the third of those Kingdomes, none of the North-stars can be seene. They are Man-eaters, and Idolaters; but not so brutish as in Dragorian, the next Kingdome: where, if a man bee sicke, his kinsmen consult with their Sorcerers, who enquire of the Deuill, Whether he shall escape, or no? And if the answer be Negative, they send for certaine men, specially designed to that villanous Mysterie, which strangle him; and then they dresse and eate him amongst the kindred, euen to the very marrow in his bones. For (say they) if any flesh should remaine, it would putrifie, and wormes would breed thereof, which after (for want of sustenance) would perish, whereby the soule of the dead partie would be much tormented. The bones they bury safely, that no beast should touch them: such dread haue they of death and crueltie, in a more then beastly crueltie, and such a care to obserue humanitie and pietie in a most impious inhumanitie. Lambri, the next Kingdome, hath in it some men with tayles, like dogges, a spanne long. The last is Fanfur, where they line of bread made of pith of trees, the wood whereof is heauie, and sinketh to the botome, if it be put in water, like yron, and therefore they make Launces thereof, able to pierce Armour: for it is three-fingers thicke betwixt the hollow and the barke.

To let passe Pentan, Sonda, and other Idolatrous Ilands, and come to Iaua Maior: This Countrie is very rich, but in times past of most abhominable custome. Nic. Conti sayth, That they feede on Cats, Rats, and other vermine, and were most vile murderers, not sticking to make tryall of the good cutting or thrust of their blades on the next bodie they met with, and that without punishment, yea (if the blow or thrust were deliuered with fine force) with much commendation. Vertomannus 3 affirmeth of them, that some obserue Idols, some the Sunne or Moone, others an Oxe, and manie the first thing they meet in the morning, and some worship the Deuill. When men were old, and not able longer to worke, their children or parents carried them into the market, and sold them to others, which did eate them. And the like they vsed with the younger sort in any desperate sicknesse, preuenting Nature with a violent death, and esteeming their bellies fitter sepulchres then the earth, accounting others fooler which suffered the wormes to deuoure so pleasant foode. For feare of these man-eaters they stayed not long there. It seemeth that they haue much left their brutish customes, since wone to more ciuilitie by trading of the Moores and Christians, especially such as are of the Arabian Law: although, as our owne Countrey men report, which haue there liued, a mans life is valued to the murderer at a small summe of mony. They are a proud Nation: 4 If a man should come in where they are set on the ground after their manner, & should sit on a Chest or high thing, it were as much as his life were worth.

When they are sicke, 5 they vow vnto God, vpon their recouerie, a more honourable death, which they performe after their recouerie, by the murderous hand of some other vpon them. They are 6 great Inchanters, and obserue houres, and fitting minutes and moments of time, for composing their Blades and Armour, of which they are conceited, that, being tempered with their Charmes and Superstitions, with the lest drawing drawing blood of another, they will kill him; themselves, in their enchanted Armour, safe from others blowes. They abide in expectation of these martiall minutes, for their coniuured Armours, sometimes eight or renne yeares, before they can finish them. The Iauans say, That their Auncestors came from China, which Countrey they forsooke, because of the tyrannie wherewith they were oppressed, and in great multitudes peopled this Island. They wear their haire and their nailes long. They are dutifull to their superiours. The great men stirre not forth, without a great troupe of followers. They are seldome idle, much busied about their Scabberds and Weapons, which they use to poyson. They are not without their Weapons night or day, which they will not suffer another man to touch. They are so eager of reuenge, that they will presse on their aduersaries weapon, drawing it through their owne bodie, to kill him that hath wounded them. They haue Mahumetane Temples, where they doe their deuotions with great silence. They acknowledge Iesus, Mahomet, Dauid, and Moses, foure Prophets. They obserue their houres, and two Fast, or Lents. The great mens wiues neuer goe out of the doores to be seene. Their Cities are Ballambua, and Panarican (a hill from whence is a burning Hill, which first brake forth 1586. and oppressed infinite numbers of men, and cast great stones into the Citie, for three dayes space making one continued night of darkness) Passarua, the King wherof married the King of Ballambua's daughter, and the second night after he had lyen with her, slew her and her attendants, because she would not turne Mahumetane. Ioartam, Surrahaia, Tuban, Matara, are also royall Cities, as are Daunia, Taggal, Charabaon, and many others. But Bantam is of most trafficke, frequented by Portugalls, Dutch, and English, in which euerie day are three seuerall Markets. Here Marchants, when they come may buy a Woman for their fleshly and Worldly businesse (you may adde the Deuill too, make vp the number) which at their departure they sell againe. Publike affaires are treated and handled by night, at which time the Counsellors of State meete, and ascend some tree, at the roote of the house, viewing the Heauens till the Moone arise, and then goe into the Sepat-house.

Not farre from Bantam liue certaine of the Passarans, which being there oppressed by their King, came hither, and heere obtained a piece of ground, to builde them a Citie which is called Sura. They haue a King or Governour, and liue quietly, following Husbandrie: they eate nothing that hath life (a common Superstition of the Iouians) weare white Clothes of Paper, made of the leaues of Trees, and neuer marrie (therein resembling the Iewish Esses) yet neuer want succeeding generation: Many of the Iouians daily consecrating themselves vnto their Societie. The Chinois in Iaua doe sometimes bring vp Crocodiles, and eat them.

The King of Tuban is the richest King, and mightiest in all Iaua. They haue many Houses, and make great account of them, decking them with gallant furniture of Gold, Silver, and the counterfeits of Dragons and Deuils, on their Saddles: they ride and manage their Horses with great skill.

Madura is North from Iaua, a fertile Island of Rice, the soyle whereof is so moist and waterish, that their Buffalls and men goe almost knee-deepe, when they sow it. Amboyna is the chiefe Citie. They are theuifish, and giuen to spoyle, and captiued many of the Hollanders, which went thither on shore, to buy commodities; which they were forced to redeeme at a deere rate. In these parts, are Battes as bigge as Hennes, which the people roft and eat.

The Island Baly is East from Iaua, verie populous, containing (as is thought) fixe hundred thousand inhabitants; they are Ethnikes, and worshipping that which they first meet in the morning. Here and in Pulo Rossa the women are burnt with their dead husbands: one man is said to haue had fiftie of his wiues (for they marrie as many as they please) burned with him, while the Hollanders were there. The Island hath many Bulls, Buffals, Goats, Swine, Horse, with many kindes of Fowles, Fruits, and Mettalls: The goods are carried by slauers on seats borne on their shoulders, or else in Chariot drawen with Buffals.

In the Voyage of M. Thomas Candish is mentioned made of a Iauan King, called King of Amboyna, very aged, which had a hundred wiues, and his Sonne had fiftie

Their custom is, that when the King dieth, they burn the bodie, and preserve the ashes. Five dayes after, the wiues of the dead King goe to a place appointed, and there (there which was decreed in his fauour, throweth a ball from her; and where that ball resteth, thither they goe all, and turning their faces Eastward, stabbe themselues with a Crisse or Dagger to the heart. They are very resolute people, and dread no attempt which the King shall enioyne them, be it neuer so dangerous. All the race of this King Balamboam was raised and vitally destroyed by the Passarum, after a long siege: which warre was begun in the blood of the King of Balamboam's daughter, whom hee slew, as is before said, and added this Drunkennesse unto his thirst.

Ioartam, or Ioartam<sup>2</sup>, containeth about a thousand households. The Inhabitants are Ethnikes, and haue their Temples in Woods, to which they resort to say and doe their Holies at noone, before their deform'd Diuell-formed Pagodas. In this Citie dwelleth the chiefe Pope, or High-Priest, of that Superstition, whose authority is great in all those parts. He was a hundred and twentie yeares olde, and had many wiues which nourished him with their milke, being not able to take other sustenance: a deadly enemy to the Christians, whom the King did yet with some priuiledges fauour. Edmond Scott writeth that they vse in Bantam martiall lawe: adulterie is death. The free Iauan must to euery wife keepe ten women-slaves, which are their Concubines also: some keepe fortie. But they may haue but three wiues. They are proude and (by this multitude of slaves) poore: cruell and cowardly. Their Crisse or Daggers are two foote long waued Indenture fashion, and poysoned, that few escape. The vulgar sort haue litte Religion, but many pray to the Diuell (whom for that end they haue painted in their houses, and set Waxe Candles & sing before them) for feare of hurt, which they doe not to God because of his goodnesse. The most of their worke is to cut sticks for their Crisse handles. They are couisers, theues, idle, gluttons; take Becke, Opium, Tobacco. They haue diuers sects, yet most are in manner Atheists. Many Chinois dwell there; some thinke, that if they be good, they shall be borne againe after death to great riches, and that wicked men shall be turned into Toads or other vgly beasts. Every New Moone they burne sacrifices, and sing ouer them certaine papers, in the meane while tinging a bell, which at the end of euery prayer they ring out: which is also their Passing-bell ceremonie, when any are readie to die. They furnish their Altars with Goats, Hennes, Duckes, sometimes raw, and sometimes ready dressed, all which they eate: onely certaine papers painted and cut out in curious workes, they burne. Many of them haue some skill in Astronomie. They keepe no Sabbath, but what day they begin any great worke they after keepe holy. They haue Soothsayers which sometimes runne vp and downe the streets like madde men, with swords in their hands, tearing their haire, and throwing themselues against the ground. Chinois cut not their haire, for then they may not returne to China. They buy slaves, and children of them, which they carrie with them to China, but sell the mother. The *Moore*s, if they be great men, haue Moschees in their owne houses: they haue one great one in the Citie. Forreiners (whereof are many from many places) inhabit the Suburbes. They buy by night distilled wines of the Chinois, and drinke it secretly, being forbidden it by their Mahumetan law. It was about the yeare 1560, that this people became of that sect. The men and women passe their time day and night in much sloth, dalliance, and chewing Betele, Epicuride guge porci.

AN APPENDIX OR ADDITION TO THE SIXTH CHAPTER, of such things as since the printing thereof

came to my handes, touching the Moor

GOLO or MOGOR, &c.

AS I was pressed for this Hand-voyage, & ready to set saile for Samarra, I know what contrary winds and currents haue driuen me on shore in the Gulfe of Bengala, on the continent subiect to the Great Mogor (of whom you haue heard) there to take a reuiue of his Greannesse with the eyes of later (almost too late) intelligence.

So it is, that Mr. William Hawkins being Captaine in the ship called the Hector, after a long and tedious voyage (from March 1607. to the foure and twentieth of August 1608.) arrived at Surat, subiect to the Mogor, or Mogoll (so he calleth him) and after much kindnesse offered, and indignities suffered, by reason and treason of the Portugalls (who had by bribes and flanders wrought the Vice-roy or Deputy, called Maorib Chan against him) passed thence to Agra, to the Court, as Embassadour, with a Letter from the King of England. Pensero a Iesuite, before in this booke mentioned (observe the Conversations & conuersations of that societie in those parts) like a worthy Factor for his Nation, had profered to Maorib Chan fortie thousand Rials of eight, to send him to Daman, that so he might become their prisoner, and the English negotiation might be hindered: and now, when the name of an Embassadour had protected him from such courses, plotted with him to overthrow his journey, both by detraction of necessarie forces to assist him in a way so full of out-lawes and rebels, and suborning his Trudge-man and Coach-man, to poyson or murder him by the way; which was not farre from effecting. The Portugalls had also dealt with the Lord of Cruly to be readie with two hundred Horse-men to assault him in the way: so that he was forced to hire a strong conuoy for the securitie of his person. Being come to Agra, he was brought with great State to the King, who kindly entertained him, and sware by God, & by his fathers soule, to perform the Kings Maiesties request, in the Letter contained, notwithstanding the deprauation thereof by the Iesuite, to whom the King had giuen free rode. He promised also to allow him three thousand and two hundred pound a year, or foure hundred Horse (for so they reckon all their fees, much like the Turkish Timariots) and caused him to take a wife of the countrey, the daughter of an Armenian Christian called Maharika Sha, sometimes a Commander in the warres of Ekber Padsha, father to this present Mogor, or Mogoll, whose name is Selim. This King is so fickle and inconstant, that what he had solemnly promised for an English Factory, was by the Portugalls meanes reuerfed, and againe promised, and againe suspended, and a third time both graunted and disannulled: so that the second of November 1611. Captaine Hawkins departed from Agra, and the last of December came to Cambaya, where he heard of English shipping, in which he passed first to the Redde Sea, after to Sumatra and Bantam, and died on the Irish shore in his returne homewards. Whiles he kept at Agra, his living assigned him by the King, was much empaired by the Officers, who appointed to him such places where Out-lawes and Rebels lived, so that he receiued about three hundred pound. His attendance whiles he was in fauour, was honorable and neere the King; so that the Mahumetans enuying a Christian such dignity became his prouide enemies, and assistants to the Portugalls; which was enuied by a Present the King sent him publikely, being a wilde Boare, killed in his hunting, progresse, and by him and his eaten. The insolencies of the Guzarats, if they may be suffered, and as much basenesse of their dejected cowardly courages being kept in awe (which is also the disposition of all the Indian Ethnikes, both white and black) the Portugalls pride and treacherie: the fittest places for our Indian traffique, whether we follow the colours of Mars or Mercure: and other his diligent obseruations. I omit. But so I cannot, the rarities of the Mogolls Court, customes, puissance, wealth and government (notwithstanding our former Discourse) hauing met with so rare a guide. This Selim Padasha rebelled against his father Ekber, yea, durst not abide the hazard of a battell, but yeilded: whereupon he was committed, and his sonne Cosero proclaimed beire appatant: which Ekber on his death-bedde repoked, and restored Selim Cosero continuing his claime, warred vpon his father, and after much losse on both sides, was taken, and still remaineth in prison, and (as is thought) deprived of his eyes, by his father Selim command: about nine yeares since for the greatnesse of his State: hee reporteth that his Empire is deuided into five great Kingdomes, the first named Pengab, the chiefe Citie whereof is Lahor: the second Bengal, and Sonargham the mother Citie: the third Malua, the chiefe seate Vagain: the fourth Deekan, in which Bramport is principall: and so is Amadaur in the fifth Kingdom, which is Cambaya. Hee hath sixe principall Castles for the keeping of his treasure, at Agla (which is in the heart of all his Kingdomes) Guallier, Ner-

Of five Toles a piece, fixe and twentie thousand. Of Sauoys (each of which is a Tole and a quarter) two Leckes. Of Japans (whereof five make fixe Toles) one Lecke.

In Jewels of Diamants one Batman and a halfe: a Batman is five and fiftie pound weight English: these are rough, and of all sorts and sizes: but none lesse then two Carrets and a halfe. Of Ballase Rubies two thousand. Of Pearles twelve Batmans. Of Rubies of all sorts two Batmans. Of Emeralds of all sorts five Batmans. Of Emeralds, which stone comes from Cataya, one Batman. Of Stones of Emen, a kinde of red stone, five thousand. Of all other stones, as Corall, Tepazes, &c. the number is innumerable.

Of Jewels wrought in golde, two thousand and two hundred swords, the hilts and scabbards set with rich sorts: two thousand ponyards. Of saddle-drummes of golde set with stones, vied in Hauking, five hundred. Of rich broches for their heads, in which their feathers are set, two thousand. Of saddles of golde and silver, set with stones, one thousand. Of Tuikes five and twentie. This is a great launce covered with golde, and the fluke set with stones, and are carried when the King goeth to warre in stead of colours. Of Kittabols of Stare to shadow him, twentie. None else in his Empire may haue any of any sort carried for his shadow. Of chaires of Stare five, and of other sorts which are of silver and golde, one hundred. Of rich glasses two hundred. Of Vases for Wine set with Jewels one hundred. Of drinking cuppes five hundred.

of which are fifty very rich, as of one stone, &c. Of chaines of Pearle and other chaines, strings with jewels, &c. are infinite, which the keeper onely knowes. Of all sorts of Plate wrought, as dishes, cups, basons, &c. Two thousand Batmans, Of gold wrought, a thousand Batmans.

Of Beasts: twelve thousand Horses: as many Elephants, five thousand with teeth, and female and young. Camels, twentie thousand: of Oxen for service ten thousand. Of Moxles, a thousand. Of Deere for game, three thousand, Ounces for game, five hundred. Hunting-Dogges, four hundred. Lions tame, an hundred. Boffles, five hundred. Hawks, four thousand, Pigeons for sport, ten thousand, Singing-Birds, five thousand. He hath also Armours to arge five and twentie thousand men in armour wearing.

All this concerning his Treasure, expence, and monthly pay, is in his Court or Castle of Agra: and every one of the Castles, about named, hath a severall treasure: and hath Labor also, which was not mentioned. And if any censure this Story for want of truth, and not for want of judgement, in relating such thinge so fully: for it, I must leave it to the Authors credite, for my selfe, I was induc'd by the raritie of the subject (because in this distance to be knowne, nor by Travellers, except such as this Author, whose Embeſſage, and exceeding grace with the King, for the greatest part of his residence, might further his intelligence herein) besides the rareness of the Copies, whereof I know but one, and that written by himselfe. Time may make further triall. Nor say any measure those parts of the Indies for wealth in these kindes, with our European, or any other: and that which so many Kings and States had in many ages since together, by the event of warre became Eckara, the father of this Selim: of which you have heard of the incredible wealth of the King of Cambia alone. Besides, if you observe his customes, it makes it so much more creditt. For when any Nobleman dies, all devoweth to him: and well it is with the wife and children, if he hath much Land, and what he pleaseth, on them, and the fathers Title on the eldest sonne. One died in my time (saith our Author) named Raga Gupin, on whose goods the King seized, which besides jewels and other treasure, amounted to threescore thousand in gold, every mine is five and fiftie pound weight. None likewise may come before the King with any kind of civill, handed, and on certain Festival dayes they bring him rich presents, as before is said. India besides Mines, must needs be full of money, for all Nations bring it, and exchange commodities for it: so that once in thence yeares it cometh to the King. All Lands in his Monarchie are his, given and taken at his pleasure. His boats are many by reason of his revenue.

Of all sort of his wealth (except Coine) is brought daily a certaine quantitie before him, for which purpose he bestirre, and all things of value are divided into three kindes, and as before said, so that the same things come but once in the yeare to his view. He hath three hundred Elephants royall for himselfe to ride on, which are brought with pompe, richly couched, twentie or thirtie men going before with him, and his female with her youngling, or youngling following, besides four or five other young ones attending as Pages. These are disposed amongst the great ones to successe the King, allowing them for it, but scarcely sufficient, and they dare not make bold of them in any plight. One of them is seen every day in butter, graine, fish, sugarcornes, &c. they are very tame. I saw one take up the Kings owne footstole by his appointment, being a child of twenty yeares. There are thought to be in this Empire twelve thousand Elephants, of his, and his Nobles, of which, twentie thousand are reserved for warre.

When the King rides in progress, his Tents are in campe as large as London, and hundred thousand people usually following his Campe. This King is esteemed the greatest Emperour in the East. He hath many Dromedaries, whose swiftnesse and hardnes much in his sudden Expeditions of warre. Those valiant Capitaines which Eckara and Selim have by tyrannie beene diminished. Five times a weeke hee commands his Elephants to fight before him, which often in their coming in, or going out, kill many: and if any be but wounded, and might escape, yet he commands him to be cast into the River, saying he will curse him as long as he lives, and therefore best to dispatch him: He delights to see men executed, and torne with Elephanes. Of these tyrannies he reckons many particulars which he saw: and some for no fault, but for his lust set to fight with the Lion, and one valiant man to buffet with a very fierce Lion, without any weapon offensive or defensive. If any of his subiects hath any precious stone of value, and make not him the offer of it, it is death to him: he must have the refusall of all, and yet gives not the worth by a third part. That Jewell he weareth this day, is not worne againe till that day twelue month: all his Jewells being proportioned to such a course. All his feuetitie and tyrannie cannot cleare (perhaps this ensereth them) his Countrey of Out-lawes. There is one betweene Agra and Amudnary, which commands as much Land as a good Kingdome, he is strong twentie thousand Horse, and fiftie thousand foot, and keepes on the Mountaines. Men can scarcely dwell for Outlawes. The often shifting of men from their lands, makes them exact more cruelly in the time they hold them, grinding the face of their poore tenants in rusefull manner. If they continue but six yeares they raise a great state; sometimes they hold not halfe a yeare: If any be employed in warres or businesses in another place, he must forgoe his land heere, and be assigned it there. The Kings allowance otherwise is exceeding, as for euery horse twentie Ropias a moneth for the warres; and for so many more which he hath of Farms; he is allowed two Ropias a moneth for the maintenance of his table.

Selims Religion and Customs.

Concerning the Kings Religion and behauiour, it is thus. In the morning about breake of day, he is at his Beads, his face to the Westwards; in a priuete faire room, ypon a faire Iet-stone, hauing onely a Persian Lambe-skinne vnder him. He hath eight chaines of Beads, euery of which containeth foure hundred: they are of Pearle, Diamonds, Rubies, Emeralds, Lignum aloes, Eshen and Corall. At the vpper end of this Iet-stone, are placed the Images of Christ and our Ladie; grauen in stone. He turneth ouer his Beads; and saith so many words, to wit, three thousand and two hundred; and then presenteth himselfe to the people to rectiue their Salutes or good morrow, for which purpose multitudes resort thither euery morning. This done, he sleepeth two houres more, then dineth and passeth his time with his women: at noone he sheweth himselfe againe to the people, sitting till three a clocke to view his pastimes, by men and beasts, euery day sundry kinde. At three all the Nobles in Agra, whom sickness detaineth not, resort to the Court: and the King comes forth in open audience, sitting in his Seat-royall, euery man standing in his degree before him, the chiefe within a red raike (which was allowed to our Author, hauing but fise before him) the rest without. This red raike is three steppes higher then the place where the rest stand. Men are placed by Officers: there are others to keepe men in order. In the middest, right before the King, standeth an Officer with his master Hangman, accompanied with some others of the same profession, with hatchets on their sholders, and others with whips. Heere the King heareth causes some houres: euery day; and then departs to his house of prayer, which ended, foure or fise sorts of well dressed meats are brought him, whereof he eateth what he likes, to stay his stomack, drinking once of his strong drink. After this hee comes forth into a priuate room, where none may come; but such as himselfe nominates. Two yeares together our author was one of the Attendants: in this place he drinkes other fise cuppes, which is the portion that the Physicians allow him, after which he eateth Opium, and then layes him downe to sleepe; euery man departing home. When he hath slept two houres they awake him, and bring his supper to him, thrusting it in his mouth, not being able to feed himselfe. This is about one of the clocke at night; and so he sleepeth the rest of the night. In this cup-space he doth many idle things: but nothing without writing, be he drunken or sober. For he hath writers by course, which write all, not omitting his going to the stoble, or how oft he lieth with his women, & with whom: to the end, that when he dieth, these writings may be brought forth, and thence what is thought fit may be inserted in their Chronicles.

When any poore men come to demand iustice of the King, they goe to a certaine rope fastened to two pillars, heere where the King sits: this rope is full of bells, plaid with gold, and with shaking the rope, the King hearing the sound, sendeth to know the cause, and doth iustice accordingly.

* The Kings of India sit daily in iustice themselves, and on the Tuesdaies doe execution.

While

While our Author was with him, he made his brothers children Christians, not for sale, (as the Iesuits thought) but in policie, (to disappoint a Prophecie of certaine learned Gentiles, which fore-told their succession in the Kingdome) to make them odious to the Moores. God take the wise in his craftinesse, and conuert this peruerie policie to their true Conuersion.

One of his sonnes, Sultan Sbariar, of seven yeares, could not by diuers cruelties purposely inflicted on him by his father, be forced to crie, pretending his Nurfes inductions to the contrarie.

He keeps many Feasts in the yeare, but some principall: one called Nourous, or New-yeares-day. Then hath hee a rich Tent pitched, curiously and cosily wrought, two acres of ground in compasse, so richly spred with silke and gold Carpets, and pretiously hanged, as is more admirable then credible. There are roomes also for his Queenes to see vnscene, round about, so that in all it may be five acres. Every Nobleman makes his roome, each struiuing to excell other in cost. The King will come, to which of them he affects, and is sumptuously feasted and presented: But because hee will not receiue any thing as a present, he allowes as much as the Treasurer values it, which is halfe the worth: Thus all prouide and present. At this Feast commonly every mans state is augmented; it beginneth at the beginning of the Moone in March. Some foure moneths after is the Feast of his Birth-day, which every one struieth to honour with his richest apparell and jewells: after many Pallace-pastimes, hee goeth with the greatest pompe to his mothers, to whom euery Noble-man presents a jewel. After banquet ended, he weigheth in a ballance of gold against himselfe in one scale, other things of diuers sorts to the worth of ten thousand pound, which is giuen to the poore: but his richer subiects present him that day ten times as much. On his Fathers Funerall-day is solemnized a Feast at his Sepulchre, where himselfe meaneth to be buried with all his posteritie: at which time much meate and money is giuen to the poore. Of this Sepulchre is elsewhere spoken: we may adde out of this Author, that it hath bene foureteene yeares in building, and is thought will not be finished in few yeares more; notwithstanding three thousand at least be daily at worke thereon; but one of our work-men will dispatch more then three of them. It is by his description three quarters of a mile about, made square, hath seven heights each narrower then other, till the top, where his herse is. At the vtmost gate before you come to the Sepulcher is a stately Pallace in building; the compasse of the walles ioyning to the gate, &c. may be at least three milles: it is foure miles from Agra.

The Kings custome is euery yeare to make a hunting progresse of two moneths: but when he comes forth of his Pallace, if he mounts on a horse, it is a signe of his going to the warre: if on an Elephant or Palamkin, it is but a hunting iourney. Let vs leave him on hunting, and bethinke vs of our forgotten Iland-discovered.

Of Samatra, and Zeilan.

Samatra is esteemed by some to be the greatest of the Easterne Ilands, stretching it selfe almost seven hundred miles in length, in breadth above two hundred. The Ayre is not very wholesome, by reason of the situation vnder the Line, and the multitude of Lakes and Rivers, whereout the Sunne drinketh more then he can well concoct, and therefore (as it were) belchereth out heere continually such crude and vndigested vapours. Their food is Miller, Rice, Sagu, and Fruits. Their riches are Pepper, Ginger, Cassia, Silke, Beniyoyn, Gold, Tinne, Iron, &c. The Kingdome of Campa yeeldeth Trees, whose pith or marrow is Aloe, which is prized in India at the like weight (some say) of Gold: the Barke is called Aquila. In the Sea-coast they are Moores in Religion, and so haue bene about these last two hundred yeares: y<sup>e</sup> within Land they are Pagans, and in many places, as in the Kingdoms of Andragiri and Aru, they are Man-eaters.

eatres. They were diuided, before the Portugalls entred India, into nine and twentie Kingdomes, whereof the chiefe was Pedir, after that Pacem, and now Acem. For Abraham, sometime a slave, since King of Acem, hath conquered almost all the North part of the Island; and with helpe from the Turke and the Arabians distressed sometimes the affaires of Malacca. This King <sup>b</sup> gaue in marriage with his daughter, to the King of Ior, a peece of Ordinance, such as for greatnes, length, and workmanship, can hardly be matched in all Christendome. Heere is a <sup>c</sup> Hill, called Balatvannu, which continually burneth; and a Fountaine (as is reported) which runneth pure Balsame. Some <sup>d</sup> thinke, that this was Chersonesus Aurca of the Antients, Galuanus <sup>e</sup> writeth, That the Bacai, or Man-eaters in the Mountaines of Samatra, gild their teeth, and esteeme the flesh of blacke people sweeter then of the white. The flesh of their Kine, Buffes, and Hennes, is as blacke as Inke. They say, That there are certaine people there called Dardui Dara, which haue tayles like to Sheepe. Heere is said also to grow a Tree, the iuyce whereof is strong poyson, and if it touch the blood of a man, killeth him, but if a man drinke of it, it is a soueraigne Antidote. As for those tayled-people (a slander by Beckets Legend <sup>f</sup> reported of some Kentishmen, injurious to that angrie Saint, and after applied to our whole Nation; many indeed esteeming the English to be tayled) Galvano affirmeth, That the King of Tidore told him, that in the Islands of Batto-China there were some which had tayles, hauing also a thing like vnto a dugg betweene their coddies, out of the which there came Milke.

Nicoli Di Conti <sup>g</sup> saith, in his time the Samatrans were all Gentiles; and the Man-eaters amongst them vsed the skulls of their eaten enemies in stead of money, exchanging the same for their necessities; and he was accounted the richest man, which had most of those skulls in his house. In Vertoimannus time they had money in Pedir, marked on the one side with a Diuell, on the other with a Chariot, drawne with Elephants. Their <sup>h</sup> Religion (he saith) is the same with those of Tarnassari, burning their wives in like manner. The inhabitants are cunning Artificers, Merchants, and Saylers: their Ships haue at each end a Prow, which with maruailous agilitie they can dispose forwards, or backwards, making vse of the same, according to the diuersitie of Winde and Channell, which there are very changeable.

In Acen <sup>i</sup> are Mesquits of Timber and Reede, with Vessells of water at the entrie for them to wash, according to the Arabian custome. The King comes little abroad, nor may any go to him, except he be sent for by an Officer with a gilded staffe or dagger. To his Pallace they passe thorow seven gates one after another, garded with women expert at their weapon, and vsing both Peecces and Swords. He hath none other guard for his person: In saluting the King, they lay their hands fouled on their head, which in other salutations they lay on the forehead.

Sultan Aladin the King, was (as Cornelius Houtman reporteth) first a Fisher-man, and growing famous for his exploits by Sea, was preferred to the marriage of the Kings kins-woman, and the Office of Admirall. Afterwards he became Protector of the yong King (the former being dead) but proued his murderer, and sent a thousand of the chiefe men to follow him into the other world, ennobling base fellowes of his conspiracie, and vsurped the State to himselfe. Hee was supposed an hundred years old; so old, that his eldest sonne (whom he kept at home with him, hauing made his yonger King of Pedir) imprisoned him, alleging that he was too old for Government, and warrud on his brother. Our English first <sup>m</sup> had Trade heere in the last times of Queene ELIZABETH, whose name was then famous in those parts for her exploit against the Spaniards. The Queenes Letters directed to this King were receiued with great State. First he entertained the Messenger with a Banket, gaue him a Robe, and a peece of Gallie wrought with gold, and offered pledges for the Generalls safety for whom he sent six Elephants, with Drummes, Trompetts, Streatchers, and much people. The greatest Elephant being thirtene or foureene foot high, had a small Caste like a Coach, couered with Velvet, on his backe: in the middlest whereof was a great basin of gold with a rich covering of Silke, wherein the Letter was put. The Generall was mounted on another Elephant; but was staied at the Court-gate, till the King pleasure and licence was againe sent. The King made him a feast; the dishes were of gold, or Tambaycke (which is mixed of gold and brasse) their wine is of Rife, in which the King dranke to the Generall out of his Gallery (a fadom higher then where they sit) it is as strong as Aquavisa. After the feast the Kings Damosells made musicke and dances; which was a great fauour, for they are not commonly seene. The chiefe Prelate was appointed one of the Commissioners for Articles of League, which were concluded. They tooke a prize of nine hundred tunnes, and were like to be taken themselves by a strange spout (as they call it) which fell not farre from them (as in one whole droppe enough to haue suncke any shippe, and sometimes continueth a quarter of an houre together, as powred out of a vessell, the Sea boyling therewith). The King sent a Letter and a Present to the Queene: and at their departure asked if they had the Psalmes of Dauid, and caused them to sing one, which hee and his Nobles seconded with a Psalme (as he said) for their prosperitie.

The Court<sup>n</sup> hath three guards, betweene each of which is a great greene. The King may see all that come, himselfe vnseene. The walls of his house are hanged sometimes with cloth of Gold, Veluet, or Damaske. Hee sits crosse-legged, with foure Cushions, two before and two behinde, very rich. Fortie women attend him with fannes, clothes, singing and other offices. He eateth and drinketh all day, or chewing Betele and Arecca, talking of Venerie and Cock-fighting. When they would doe reuerence (which we vse to performe by vncovering the head) they put off their hose and shooes, holding the palmes of the hands together, and lifting them about the head, with bending of the bodie, and saying, Doulat. They vse not to put malefactors to death, but cut off their hands and feet, and banish them to the Ile Polowey: and if they execute them, it is by Elephants tearing them, or thrusting a stake in their fundament. This King had an hundred Gallies, of which some will carrie foure hundred men: open without decke, their oares like shouels, foure foot long, rowed with one hand. A woman was Admirall, he not daring through selfe-guiltinesse to trust men.

They had many differing dignities and degrees for their Clergie; vsed to pray with Beads, had Schooles: they had one Prophet disguised in his apparell, whom they much honored. They burie their dead in the fields, with their head towards Mecca, laying a free stone at the head, and another at the feet, with signification what the deceased had beene. The Kings haue them, not of stone, but of gold: and this King had two made for him, each weighing a thousand pound, enriched with stones. They haue a tradition that Achen is Ophir. Once every yeare they obserue a solemn ceremonye of going to Church to see if Mahomet be come. Then are there fortie Elephants richly couered, and on them the Nobles, one spare for the Prophet, and another whereon the King rideth, with much pompe. When they haue looked into the Moskee and not seene their Mahomet, the King returnes on that spare Elephant. Pider, Manucabo and Aru are tributaries to Achen. In Nicobar they are base people, and till not the ground.

In Macazar (an Island not farre from the former) the most are Ethnickes, some also Moores, and some Christians. They vse the Malaican, or Malaian Tongue, which is generall through the Indies. Their Arrow-heads are of Fish-bones, enuened with incurable poyson. In Macazar the Priests conforme, or rather deforme themselves to the fashion of women, nourishing their haire on the head, and plucking it out of the face: they guild their teeth, and vse broken, wanton, and effeminate gestures. They are called Bees; they marrie one another. For them to lye with a woman, is capitall, and is punished with burning in Pitch. These Men-monsters, Women-Diuels, were great impediments to the Portugalls, in drawing them to Christianitie.

Zeilan (which some call Seylon, other Ceilan) is by Barrim auerred to be Taprobana: Sometimes (according to Marcus Paulus o his Reports) thought to haue comprehended three thousand six hundred miles in circuit; since much impaired by his o-mightie neighbour the Sea, which hath now left not about two hundred and fifty miles in length, and an hundred and fortie miles of breadth vnto it. ¶ The Indians call it Tamrisim, or the delicious Land, and some are of opinion, that this was Paradise. (So iust are the iudgements of the Highest, that, when as man wandered from him, caused caused him also to wander from himselfe, and from his habitation; yea, the place it selfe hath also wandered, in mens wandering conceits, ouer the World, yea, and out of our habitable World altogether, as before is shewed; men now seeking it as vainely as before they lost it). It is in fashion resembling an egge, by a shallow channell separated from the Cape Comori. The Heauens with their dewes, the Ayre with a pleasant holesomenesse and fragrant freshnesse, the Waters in their many Ri- uers and Fountaines, the Earth diuersified in aspiring Hills, lowly Vales, equall and indifferent Plaines, filled in her inward Chambers with Mettalls and Jewells, in her outward Court and vpper face stored with whole Woods of the best Cinnamon that the Sunne seeth, besides Fruits, Oranges, Leimons, &c. surmounting those of Spaine; Fowles and Beasts, both tame and wilde (among which is their Elephant, honou- red by a naturall acknowledgement of excellence, of all other Elephants in the World.) These all haue conspired and ioyned in common League. to present vnto Zeilan the chiefe of worldly treasures and pleasures, with a long and healthfull life in the Inhabitants, to enioy them. No maruell then, if sense and sensualitie haue heere stumbled on a Paradise. There, wooddie Hilles (as a naturall Amphitheatre) doe encompasse a large Plaine: and one of them, as not contenting his beetle-browes with that onely prospect, disdaineth also the fellowshippe of the neighbouring Mountaines; lifting vp his steepe head seuen Leagues in height; and bath in the toppe a Plaine, in the middest whereof is a stone of two cubits, erected in manner of a Table, holding in it the print of a mans foote, who (they say) came from Deli- thither, to teach them Religion. The Iogues and other deuout Pilgrimes resort thi- ther, from places a thousand Leagues distant, with great difficultie of passage both hither and heere. For they are forced to mount vp this Hill by the helpe of nayles and chaines fastened thereto, Nature hauing prohibited other passage. Maffei and Boterus could perswade themselves, that this foote-sterpe is a relique and memo- rie of the Ethiopian Eunuch: others will haue it further fetcht, and father it vpon Adam, the first father of mankind, of whom the Hill also is named, Pico de A- dam. The Moores call it Adam Baba, and say, That from thence Adam ascended into Heauen. The Pilgrims are clad in their Palmers-weed, with yron chaines, and skinnies of Lions, and other wilde Beasts: Vpon their armes and legges they wear buttons with sharpe points, that cut the flesh, and draw bloud, which (they say) they doe in Gods seruice.

Before they come at the Mountaine, they passe by a fenny valley full of water, wherein they wade vp to the waste, with kniues in their hands, to scrape from their legs the bloud-leeches, which else would end their pilgrimage and life before the time. For this durty and waterie passage continueth eightene miles, before they come at the Hill, whose proud top would disdain climbing, if Art did not captiue Nature; and binde the Hill with chaines of iron, as is said. When they are mounted, they wash them in a Lake or Poole of cleere springing water, neere to that foot-stone, and ma- king their prayers, doe thus account themselues cleane from all their sinnes. This ho- ly journey is generally performed by the Ilanders (saith Vertmannus) once a yeare. He addeth that a Moore told him, that his foot-print was two spannes long: and that Adam heere a long time bewailed his sinne, and found pardon. But Odoricus affir- meth, that they reported this mourning to haue been for Abel, and to haue lasted three hundred yeares, and of the teares of Abel and Ene this purifying water to haue pro- ceeded: which Odoricus y proued to be a tale, because he saw the water springing continually, and it runneth thence into the sea. He saith that this water had in it many precious stones; and the King gaue leaue at certaine times of the yeare to poore men to take them, that they might pray for his soule; which they could not doe; but first annoynted with Limons, because of the Horse-leeches in that water. Adams Hill is supposed to be seuen leagues in height. In Candy were Statues artificially wroughte fise or sixe fathomes high, which these Symmetrians proportioned to the stature of A- dam, gathered by that print of his foot.

In Vintane, is a Pagode or Idoll-Temple, the compasse whereof is an hundred and thirtie paces: it is very high, and all white, except on the top, which hath the spires thereof

decorat gilded; in so much that men are not able, when the Sunne shineth, to looke upon it. It hath a Tower or square Steeple of excellent workmanship. There are many other Temples, and a Monasterie also of Religious persons, which are attired in yellow, haue their crownes shauen, with Beads in their hands, and alwayes seeme to mumble ouer somewhat of their deuout Orisons, being in high estimation of sanctitie with the vulgar, and freed from publike labours and burthens. Their Monasterie is built after the manner of the Popish, being also gilded with gold. In their Chappells are many Images of both sexes, which, they say, represent some of their Saints: they are set on the Altars, and are clothed with garments of Gold and Silver. Before them are the Images of Boyes, which beare vpon great Candle-sticks, with waxen candles burning therein night and day. Euery houre they resort to these Images to their Mumpsimus. They held a solemne Procession, whiles the Hollanders were there, in which their Abbot rode on an Elephant richly attired, lifting vpon his head, with a golden rodde therein: the Monkes went two and two before him in order, partly bearing, and playing on many Instruments of Musick, partly bearing waxe-lights and Torches: the men also, and after them the women and maydes, following in like order: and the fairest Virgins were busied with games and daunces, being naked from the nauell vpwards, beneath couered with smocks of diuers colours, their armes and eares adorned with Gold and Jewels. Any man that should see it (sayth our Author) would thinke, our Westerne Monkes had lately borrowed their Ceremonies. Their Images are in euery corner of the way, which they adorne with flowers. In Candy, the chiefe Citie of that Kingdome, were Pandemonium innumerable. The houses or Temples were of stone, like the Temples in these parts: some Statues were as high as the mast of a ship. The people heere, if they haue once touched meate, which for quantitie or qualitie they cannot eate, they cast it to the dogges: neither will any man (be he neuer so meane) eat that which another hath touched. The women gonaked from the waste vpwards. They marrie as many wiues as they can keepe.

The King makes vse of their Superstition: For pretending to build Temples, he ascribes them vnperfect, excusing himselfe, that they had not contributed sufficient summes of money, and therefore exacteth a new. There is one Statue of great stature, with a sword in his hand, which by illusion of the Diuell (if it be not the delusion of fabulous reports) made as though he would strike the King with his sword, as he was entering the Temple, and put him in great feare, whereas before he had made a mocke of him. The Singales or Native Inhabitants, say that the world shall not perish, as long as this Image continueth safe. When any one is sicke, he sacrificeth to the Diuell, hanging a boxe hanging in his house to that end, therein to gather somewhat for his offering. Some pray vnto the Image of an Elephants head, made of wood or stone, that they may obtaine wisdom (whereof this prayer argues their great want): some eate to quicken creature. They eate no Beefe, nor drinke any Wine; they worship whatsoever first meeteth them in the morning.

George Spilberge was bountifully entertained of the King of Candy, * but Sebaldus Hart was with diuers of his companions slaine, after he had received much kindness of the King; his importunitie to get the King into his ship, making him suspect some treacherie.

The King of Motecalo had eares adorned with Jewels, and hanging downe (the lappets of them were so stretched) to his shoulders. He was kinde to the Hollanders: but they incensed him against them by killing certaine Kine; for some of them said, that the foules of Kine slaine after that manner, were hurled forthwith into hell. Hee obserued one Pagode, to whose Feast he went while the Hollanders were there, the solemnitie whereof was to continue (ten dayes) till a new Moone, with great concourse of deuout persons.

Of the superstitions of Perimal, and the worshippe of the Apes tooth, celebrated in this Island, wee haue alreadie shewed in the Chapter * of Narsinga. The Cingalan language which they speake in this Island, is * thought to haue bene there left by the Chinois, sometimes Lords of Zeilan. Yet in Marcus Paulus his dayes the Tartari-ans had not pierced thus farre. For the King then raiguing, refused to sell to Cosmas Can (then the greatest Monarch in the world) at a price, a Ruby which he had left him by his Ancestors, esteemed the richest Jewell in the world, being (as he said) a spanne long, and as bigge as a mans arme, cleare and shining, as if it had bene a fire.

In this Iland were reckoned nine Principallities, or Kingdomes, but vntill long since their chiefe King was murdered by a Barber, who draue the other Kings out of the Countrie, and vsurped the Monarchie to himselfe, practising hostile against the Portugalls.

The Cingales are very cunning Artificers in all mettalls. One of them presented the Arch-bishop of Goa with a Crucifix, so cunningly wrought, as if he had given life to the Image of one dead. He sent it to the King of Spaine as a rare Jewell, not to be equalled in Europe. The Inhabitants heere are active and expert in Iugling, both men and women, travelling through India with their strange Hobby-horses, to get money by this vanitie. The Sea-coast (as in other Indian Ilands) is inhabited with Moors, the Inland with Pagans.

The Portugalls haue a fortresse at Colombo. The Ilanders are not warriours they giue themselves to pastime and pleasure: they goe naked from the girdle upward:
they make wide holes in their eares, which they stretch out with the weight of their jewels to their shoulders. The Hollanders found exceeding, both good and bad, entertainment with the King of Candy. Now for that question, whether Zeilan or Sa-matra be that Taprobane of the Ancient is very doubtfull. Yet that report in Pliny
b. of Taprobane, seemes more to encline for Zeilan. For he saith, That in Claudian time, a seruant of Annius Placamus, which was Customers for the Red-sea, was carried from the Coast of Arabia, besides Carmania, in fiftene dayes, which, I thinke, could not possibly be done to Samatra. Likewise the excellencie of the Elephants, beyond all the Indian, agrees to Zeilan: and had Samatra bene so knowne at that time, the other parts of India (it is like) had bene better discovered then they were in those times. This Taprobane was discovered to be an Iland, by Onesicritus, Alexanders Admirall of his Fleet in these parts. It was then accounted another world, and therefore shall be the Period of our PILGRIMAGE, and Pembulation in this Asian Part of the World: which (by the gracious goodnesse of his Almighty guide) the Pilgrime hath now passed, and hath led the Industrious Reader along with him.

The Popish Pilgrimes were wont to beguile their wearie steps with Musick: or pleasant tales (according to the delicate deuotion of those times) and easie was their pardon and penance at their iourneyes end. And in these our times Madonna di Loretto must giue entertainment to many Pilgrimes, which (as if Vannus were become her Chamberlane) haue their Curtizan-consolations to solace their Pilgrim-paines:
the deuout Friars and Nunnes themselves, that haue defied the Diuell, and denied the World, by a new Vow deuoted to the Flesh, disguise themselves in Lay-habits, travelling thither, and from thence as man and wife, onely at Loretto couering all with their Cowles. And if Confession discover, it hideth againe as a double couering.
But to vs, Vowes, Cowles, and such salace-solaces are wanting: the end of this labour is but the beginning of another: our penance endureth all the way; neither haue we hope of Pardon and Indulgence from some seuerer Penitentiaries and Cen-sours, whose greatest vertues is to finde or seeke faults in others. Had the Muses bene propitious, and the Graces gracious, wee would haue had some musicall and grace-full harmonie, at least in Phrase and method: but even the Muses (which whilome so graced that Father of Historie, Herodotus, that each of them vouchsafed, if yee vouchsafe it credit, to bestow that Booke on him, which he entitled with their names) seemed afraid of so tedious a iourney; nor would the Graces grace with their company. Many indeed offered themselves with their Rules, Methodi, and Precepts of Histories, as Bodinus, Chytrius, Possennius, Mylau, Folietta, Viperanus, Zinger, Sambucus, Riccobonus, Patritius, Pontanus, Foxius, Robertellus, Baldunius, and others which haue written Treatises of that Argument: but I thought such attendance would

would be chargeable, especially to a Traueller: and their many rules would not haue added wings to my head and feete, (as the Poets paint their Mercury) but rather haue fettered my feete, and made my weake head forget it selfe with their remembrances. I therefore followed Nature (both within mee and without mee) as my best guide, for matter and manner, which commonly yeeldeth Beauties as louely, if not so curious, as those which bankrupt themselves with borrowing of Art: the lines of our bodies and mindes herein being like, Quas matres student, Demissis humanis, vinclo pectore vs gracila sint, saith Cherea in the Comedie, Tameisi bona natura, reddunt curatura inuicem: Too conceited curiositie may hide rather then commend Natures bountie, which of it selfe is alway more honest, if not more honorable. Neuer could the Persian Court parallele the goodlinesse of Ester and Aspasia, which yet neglected the Persian Delicacies. Once, I haue had sufficient burthen of the businesse in hand; enough it was for mee to goe, though I did not daunce vnder it. But it is time to leaue this idle discourse about our course in this if any other g can giue more probable Etymologie of the Name, I list not to contend.

Nor is it meet for me to be religious in these questions of names, in this quest and inquirie of Religions. It is a great Peninsula, by one Isthmus, or necke of land betwene the red sea, and Mediterranean, ioyned to the continent, which with the red sea aforesaid is the Easterne limit of Africa, as the Mediterranean on the North, and elsewhere the Ocean. For Nilus is a more obscure, and vncertaine vmpire. Some diuide the World into two parts, Asia and Europe, accounting Africa a part of Europe, which opinion Varro ascribeth to Eratosthenes, Salust, Lucan, and Ethicus, with Simlerus, mention it. It is twice <sup>h</sup> as bigge as Europe, and yet not so much peopled: Nature hauing made heere her solitarie place of retiring, attended by scorching heates, and showres of sands, as a counterfeite of those heauenly raines, and mouing waters, which the aire and seas afford in other places. Such are the many deserts in Africa, only fertile in barrenesse: although in other parts it is both fruitfull and populous. The Equinoctiall Circle doth in manner diuide it in the middest. And yet old Atlas neuer sheddeth his snowie haire, but hath alwayes on his huge and high toppes vnmolten snow, whence sometime it is dispersed (as from a store-house) in such incredible quantitie, that it couereth Carts, Horses, and the toppes of trees, to the great danger of the Inhabitants: and the Fountaines are so cold, as a man is not able to endure his hand in them. Mount Atlas aforesaid, stretcheth from the Ocean, <sup>i</sup> bearing name of him, almost to Egypte. Other Mountaines of name are those of Sierra Leona, and the Mountaines of the Moone, &c.

One Lake Zembre, yeeldeth three mightie Riuer, disemboking themselves into three seuerall seas: Nilus, which runneth Northwards fortie degrees from hence in Astronomically reckoning; Cuama which runneth into the Easterne; and Zajre into the Westerne seas: of which Riuer, and of other like, the Reader shall finde more in due place spoken.

Some parts of Africa are beyond admiration for barrenesse, some for fertilitye. Pliny <sup>k</sup> mentions a Chie in the middest of the Sands, called Tacape, in the way to Lep- tis, which hath a spring of water flowing plentifully, and dispensed by course amongst the Inhabitants. There vnder a great Date-tree groweth an Oliue, vnder that a Fig, vnder that a Pomgranat, vnder that a Vine, vnder that Wheat, Pease, Herbs, all at once. The Vine beares twice a yeare, and otherwise, very abundance would make it as bad as barren. Somewhat is gathered all the yeare long. Foure cubits of that soyle square, not measured with the fingers stretched out, but gathered into the fist, are sold for so many Denarij. This Budens <sup>l</sup> summes and proportions by the acre, after the Roman measure, and saith, That an acre of that ground, after that rate, is prised at 1200. Sester- tij nummi, which maketh French 320 crownes, not reckoning that defect of the cubit, which being added, addes to the summe.

The Romans reckoned sixe Prouinces in Africa: Ptoleme numbred twelue, but then was not Africa so well knowne as now. John Leo <sup>m</sup> (a Moore, both learned and experienced) hauing spent many yeares in trauell, diuideth Africa into foure parts; Barbaria, Numidia, Lybia, and the Land of Negros. Numidia he calleth Biledulgerid, or the Region of Dates: and Lybia, he calleth Sarra, for so the Arabians call a desert. But he thus excludeth Egypt, and both the higher and lower Ethiopia, which others <sup>n</sup> adde hereunto, and make vp seuen parts of Africa.

Many are the <sup>o</sup> Creatures which Africa yeeldeth, not vsuall in our parts. Elephants are there in plentie, and keepe in great herdes together. The Giraffa, or Camelopar- tis; a beast not often seene, yet very tame, and of a strange composition, mixed of a Li- bard, Hart, Buffe, and Camell, <sup>p</sup> and by reason of his long legs before, and shorter be- hind, not able to graze without difficultie, but with his high head, which he can stretch forth halfe a pikes length in height, feeds on the leaues and boughes of trees. The Ca- mels in Afrike are more hardy then in other places; and will not only beare great bur- then, but continue to trauel fifty daies together, without carrying with them any come to giue them, but turne them out at night to feed on thistles, boughes, & the little grasse they find: and no lesse patient are they of thirst, being able to endure fifteen daies with- out drink vpon necessity, and five daies ordinarily. The Arabians in Africa count them their greatest wealth: for so they describe a mans riches, saying, He hath so many thou- sand Camels: and with these they can liue in the deserts without dread of any Prince. Of Camels they haue three sorts: the first called Hugium, of great stature & strength, able to carry a thousand pound waight: the second lesse, with two bunches on the backe, fit for carriage and to ride on, called Bechets, of which they haue onely in Asia. The third sort called Regmabil, is meagre and small, able to travell (for they are not vsed to burthen) about an hundred miles in a daie. And the King of Tombuto can send messengers on such Camels to Segelmessie or Darha, nine hundred myles distant, in seven or eight dayes, without stay or change by the way. Their Camels also are docible: they will more bee perswaded to hold on a iourney further then ordinarie by songs, then blowes. In the Spring they are mare-wood, and mad of copulation, in which time they are very readie both to hurt their followers, and to kill their maisters, or any that haue whipped or hurt them. Of horses they haue both wilde (which they entrap by subtilty) and tame: of which the Barbarie Horse is famous, in Europe and Asia highly prized. The Lant or Dant is a kinde of wilde kine, but swifter then almost anie other beast. They haue also wilde Kine and wilde Asses. The Adimmain is as bigge as an Assie, otherwise resembling a Ramme. They haue other sheepe, whose Tailes weigh twentie pound, and sometime fourescore or more, carried on little Carts behind them. But those Adimmain are found in the Deserts, and kept to profit, yeelding them Milke and Cheefe. The Females onely haue hornes.

The Lyons in cold places are more gentle, in hotter are more fierce, and will not see the on-set of two hundred Horsemen armed. Mr. Iohn Vassal (a friend and neighbour of mine) told me that he brought out of Barbarie a Lyons skinne, which from the snout to the toppe of the Taile contained one and twentie foot in length. Strange it is that a Lyonesse by shewing her hinder parts to the Male, should make him run away. In time of their coupling eight or ten will follow one Female, with terrible and bloudie battels amongst themselves. They engender backward, as doe the Camel, Elephant, Rhinoceros, Ounce, and Tyger. They spare such men as prostrate themselves, and prey rather on men then women, and not at all on Infants, except compelled by hunger. Plinie tels that Alexander set thousands on worke by hunting, hawking, fishing or other meanes to take and learne the Natures of Creatures, that Aristotle might be by them informed thereof, who wrote almost fiftie Treatises of that Subiect, whereof it seemeth most are lost. He citeth out of him, that Lyons bring forth small deformed lumpes, at the first time fiew, and (euery yeare after) one lesse, after the fift barren remaining barren. It cannot stirre till it be two monethes olde, nor goe till it be fiew if you beleeeue him. The Lybians beleeeue that the Lyon hath vnderstanding of prayers, and tell of a Getulian woman, which lying at the Lyons mercy besought him to Noble a Beast, not to dishonour himselfe with so ignoble a prey and conquest, as shee a weake woman was. The like is tolde of a Spaniard Dogge, of one Didacus Salazar a Spaniard. This man according to the bloudie practise of that Nation, minding to fill his Dogges belly with an olde womans flesh which was his Captiue, gaue her a Letter to carrie to the Gouvernour, and so soone as shee was a little past, loosed his Mastiffe, who presently had ouer-taken her. The Woman terrified, prostrates herselfe to the Dogge, and sues for her life; Good Maister Dogge, Master Dogge (saith she) in her language, I carry this Letter to the Gouvernour (and shewes it him) Be not frowne on me Master Dogge. The Dogge (hauing changed, it seemes, with his Master his doggednesse for the others humanitie) made a stay and lifting vp his legges ouerly pisset on her and departed, to no small wonder of the Spaniards that knew him.

But to returne to the King of Beasts. His Taile seemeth to bee his Scepter, whereby he expresseth his passion. He shrinkes not at danger, except some couert of Woods shroude him from witnesses, and then he will take the benefit of flight, which otherwise he seemes to disdain. Mentor, a man of Syracusa, was encountered with a Lyon, which instead of tearing him, fawned on him, and with his dumbe eloquence seemed to implore his aide, shewing his diseased foote, wherein Mentor perceiued a stubbe sticking, which hee pulled out. The like is reported by Gellius out of Polybistor, of a fugitiue Seruant who hauing performed this kinde of office to a Lyon, was by him graunted for a long space with a daily portion of his prey. But after this the man was taken and presented to his Master (a Roman Senatour) who exhibited Games to the Romanes, wherein Seruants and condemned Persons were exposed to the furie of the Beastes, amongst whom hee placed this Seruant; and by a wonderfull Fate, this Lyon also was a little before taken and bestowed on him for this solemne spectacle. The Beasts running with violence to their bloudie encounter, sodainly this Lyon stayed, and taking little better view fawned on this his guest, and defended him from the assault of the other Beasts: whereupon, by the peoples entreatie (who had learned the Storie of him) he was freed, and the Beast given him: which followed him with a Line in the streetes, the people pointing and saying; Hic est homo Medicus leonis, Hic est Lepus hominis. One Elpis a Samian performed a cure on another Lyon, pulling a bone out of his throate, at the Lyons gaping and silent mone: and in remembrance hereof built a Temple (at his returne) to Bacchus at Sango whom before he had inuoked being in feare of a Lyon.

Plinius and Solinus among other African Beastes mention the Hyena, which some thinke to be male one yeere, and Female another, by course: This Aristotle denies. This Beast hath no necke ioynt, and therefore stirres not his necke, but with bending about his whole bodie. He will imitate humane voyce, and drawing neere to the shepcoates, hauing heard the name of some of the Shepheards will call him, and when he comes, deuoure him. They tell that his eyes are diuersified with a thousand colours, that the touch of his shadow makes a Dog not able to barke. By engendering with this Beast, the Lyonesse brings forth a Crocuta. of like qualites to the Hyena. He hath one continued tooth without diuision throughout his mouth. In Africa also are wild Asies, among which, one Male hath many Females: a jealous beast, who (for feare of after-croching) bites off the stones of the young Males, if the suspicious Female preuent him not by bringing forth in a close place where he shall not find it. The like is tolde of Benevers,<sup>i</sup> which being hunted for the medicinable qualitie of their stones, are said to bite them off when they are in danger to be taken, paying that ransom for their liues. It cannot be true that is reported of the Hyaneum, s<sup>a</sup> stone found in the Hyena's eye, that being put vnder the tongue of a man he shall foretell things to come, except hee foretell this, That no man will beleue what our Authour before hath told. The Libard is not hurtful to men except they annoy him: but killeth and eateth Dogs. Dabuk is the name of a simple and base Creature like a Wolfe, saue that his legges and feet are like to a mans:<sup>h</sup> so foolish, that with a song, and a Taber, they which know his haue will bring him out of his denne, and captiue his eares with their Musicke, while another captiuateth his legges with a Rope.

The Zebra of all Creatures for beautie and comelineffe is admirably pleasing: resembling a Horse of exquisite composition, but not all so swift, all ouer-laid with partie coloured Laces, and guards, from head to Taile. They liue in great Heards, as I was told by my friend Andrew Battle, who liued in the Kingdome of Congo many yeares and for the space of some monethes liued on the flesh of this beast, which hee killed with his Peece. For vpon some quarell betwixt the Portugals (among whom he was a Sergeant of a band) and him, he liued eight or nine monethes in the Woods where he might haue view of hundreds together in Heards both of these, and of Elephants. So simple was the Zebra, that when he shot one, hee might shoot still, all standing still at gaze, till three or foure of them were dead. But more strange seemed which hee tolde mee of a kinde of great Apes, if they might so be termed, of the height of a man, but twice as bigge in feature of their limmes, with strength proportionable, hairie all ouer, otherwife altogether like men and women in their whole bodily shape. They liued on such wilde fruits as the Trees and Woods yielded, and in the night time lodged on the Trees: Hee was accompanied with two Negro-Boyes: and they carried away one of them by a sudden surprize: yet not hurting him, as they use not to doe any which they take, except the Captiue doe then looke vpon them. This slaue after a monethes life with them conuayed himselfe away againe to his Master. Other Apes there are store, and as Solinus reporteth, i Satyres with feet like Goats, and Sphynges, with breasts like women, and hairie; whereof Pirrius saith he saw one at Verona, and a kind of Conies also at the same time, foure times as bigge as the ordinary, and (which is more incredible) had each of them foure genitall members. Phlippus

i Satyres (if there be any such) are thought to be conceiued of humane copulation with Goats. Dradius in Solin.

Aristotle speaketh in his Relation of Congo, of other Beasts in Africa, as of the Hyena fierce and cruell as Lyons making prey of man and Beast, yet rather deuou-ing blacke men, then white: whose Mustachies are holden for mortall poyson, and hanging in meates, cause men to die maade. The Empatanga is somewhat like to them. Their Sheep and Goats neuer bring forth lesse then two, and sometimes three at once a time. They haue Wolves, Foxes, Deere, (Red and Fallow) Robuckes, Citelines, Sables and Martens.

They haue Snakes and Adders, whereof some are called Imbamus five and twentie fingers long, living in Land and Water, not venomous but rauncous, and looke in time for which taking purpose, Nature hath giuen it a little horne or claw within which three footes of the Tasse) waiting for their prey, which having taken, it deuoueth hooves, and all, although it be a heare. And then swolne with this so huge meate is as it were drunke and sleepey, and vnweidie for the space of five or six daies.
The Pagan Negroes roast and eate them as great dainties. The biting of their Vipers killeth in foure and twentie houres space. Africa for monsters in this kinde hath bene famous, as in the Roman Historie appeareth. Atrilius Regulus the Roman Consul in the old Punike Wars, at the River Bagrada encountered with a huge Serpent, and planted Engines and Artillerie against the same, whose skinn, sent to Rome for a Monument, was in length a hundred and twentie foot, as Gellius out of Tubers reporteth.
The skinn armed it from all hurt by darts or Arrowes, and with the breath it killed any, and had eaten many of the Souldiours before they could with a stone out of an Engine destroy this destroyer. The Rivers of Niger, Nilus, Zaïre, and others, haue kindes of Crocodiles, whereof some are of incredible bignesse and greedie deuourers.
Aristotle saith that Crocodiles haue no tongues, but I my selfe haue seene both great and little (saith our Authour) dead and dried, in all which I found a tongue, but very short, flat and large. Strange it is that they tell of the number of sixtie in this beast, his age, yeares, 60. teeth, egges, and dayes of hatching 160. being.

Maure Atlas hath plentie of Dragons, grosse of bodie, slow of motion, and in biting or touching incurably venomous. The Deserts of Lybia haue in them many Hydras. Dabb is the name of a kinde of great Lizard, not venomous, which neuer drinketh, and if water be put in his mouth he presently dyeth. He is counted daintie meat, and three dayes after he is killed, at the heate of the fire hee mouth as if hee had life.
In Congo is a kinde of Dragons like in bignes to Rammes, with wings, hauing long Tails, and Clappes, and diuers lawes of Teeth, of blew and Greene colour, painted with scales, with two seete, and feede on raw flesh. The Pagan Negroes pray to them as Gods for which cause the great Lords keep them to make a gaine of the peoples deuotion, which offer their gifts and Oblations. The Chameleons are knowne among us, admirable for their aerie sustenance, (although they also hunt and eate Flyes) and for the changeablenesse of their colours into all (as Theophrastus saith) but redde and white. The Tarandus is a Beast somewhat resembling an Oxe, in quantitie, a Horse in shape, the skinn hard, a finger thicke, fit for shields, haired like a Beare, liuing, as Theophrastus affirmeth in Sarmatia, Solinus saith in Ethiopia, seldome seene, of incredible changeablenesse to the colour of that which is next it. The Polypus feedeth by his breath to change his colour, his lunges extending almost through all his bodie: which Aristotle testifieth he doth both for feare and hunting his prey: adding the same qualitie of another Fish called a Cuttill. An other Serpent hath a rundle on his Tails like a Bell, which also ringeth as it goeth. But if any desire to know the varie-tie of these Serpentes, Solinus in his thirteenth Chapter will more fully satisfie him and Plinius in his obseruations.

Manifold are these kindes of Serpents in Africa as the Cerasfas, which hath a little Crown of foure hornes, whereby he allureth the birds vnto him (lying hidden in the bushes all but the head,) and so deuoureth them. The Tatuli dart themselues from Trees on such Creatures as passe by. The Amphibena, hath two heades, the Tails also operated (I cannot say honoured) with a head, which causeth it to moue circularly with crooked windings: a fit Embleme of popular sedition, where the people will rule their Princes, needes must their motion be crooked, when there are two heades, and therefor none. The Scythale is admirable in her varied Lacks. The Dipas kills those whom shee singeth, with thirst. The Hypanale with Aerp, as befall to Cleopatra the Hemerois with ynstanchable bleeding. The Prester with swelling. And not to forget you with names of many other of these poysonfull Creatures, the Basiliske is fighned with her sight, or hissing. Galen describes it, and so doe Salim and others. It hath halfe a foot long, and hath three pointels (Galen saith) on the head, or three Salim strikes like a Mitre. It blasteth the ground it toucheth, the Hearthes, and Trees, and feareth the Ayre, so that Birds flying ouer fall dead. It frayeth away other Serpents with the hissing. It goeth vpright from the belly vpwartles. If any thing bee slain by it, the same also proueth yreous to such as touch it. Onely a Monte still kin in the Bergameni bought the carcasse of one of them as an incredible summe, which they hung in their Temple (which Apelles had made famous) in a Rhes of Gold, to preserve the same from Birds and Spiders. The Catoblebas is said to bee of like yreous nature, alwayes going with her head into the ground, her sight otherwise being deadly. As for the Monsters, that by mixt generations of vnlke kinds Nature naturally produeth, I leane to others discourse. Lemnius tells that of the marrow in a mans backbone is engendred a Serpent, yea of an Egge which an old Cocke will lay, when he is unable to tread Henne any longer, is (saith he) by the same Cockes sitting, produced a Basiliske: and tells of two such Cockes at Zirizea, killed by the people, which had found them sitting on such Egges. Thophrastus also saith that Serpents are plentifully engendred of much raine, or effusion of mens blood in wine. Mice are multiplied in drie seasons (which the store of them this drie Winter confirmeth) of which he saith there are great ones in Egypt with two feet, which they use as handes, not going but leaping.

Ostriches keepe in companies in the Deserts, making shewes a farre off as if they were troopes of Horsemen: a ridiculous resort to the Carauans of Merchants: a foolish Bird, that forgetteth his Nest, and leaueth his Egges for the Sunne and Sunbeames to hatch, that eateth any thing, even the hardest Iron: that heareth nothing. They hate Eagles, parrots, and other Fowles. But none more strange then that which is termed Niir, bigger then a Crane, preying vpon Carrion, and by his flight burthens his great bodie in the Cloudes that none may see him, whence hee espyeth his prey, and liueth so long that all his fethers fall away by age, and then is fostered by his young ones.

Other Fowles they haue too tedious to relate. Grasshoppers doe here often renew the Egyptian plague, which come in such quantitie that they intercept the shining of the Sunne like a Cloud, and hauing eaten the fruits and Leaues, leaue their fowles behinde (worse then their predecessours) deuouring the very barks of the Lease-like Trees. The old depart none, knowes whither: and sometime with a South-East wind are caried into Spaine. The Arabians, and Lybians eat them before they haue spawned, to that end gathering them in the morning, before the Sunne hath dried their wings, and made them able to flie. One man can gather foure or five bushels in a morning. Orosius tells that once they had not onely eaten vp Fruits, Leaues, and Barke, while they liued, but being dead, did more harme: for being carried by a wind into the Sea, and the Sea not brooking such morsels, vomiting them vp againe on the shore, their purrified carcasses caused such a plague, that in Numidia died thereof eight hundred thousand: and on the Sea coast nere Carthage and Vtica, two hundred thousand: and in Vtica it selfe thirtie thousand Souldiers, which had beene mustered for the Carrisons of Africa. In one day were caried out of one gate one thousand and five hundred carcasses. They are said to come into Barbarie seuen yeares together, and other seuen not to come, at which times Come before so deere, is sold for little, and sometime not vouchsafed the reaping, such is their soile and plentie. The iuice of the young is poyson. Plinie calls them a plague of Diuine Anger: they flie saith hee with such a noyse that one would take them for other fowles, and passe ouer huge tracts by Sea and Land. In Italie the people by them haue beene driuen to a Sibilline remedie for feare of famine. In Cyrenaica there is a Law thrice a yeare to warre against them, destroying the Egges first, then the young, and lastly the growne ones. In Lemnos certain there is appointed for each man to bring of them to the Magistrate. And they are in high regard because they kill them with flying against them. In Syria they are compelled to kill them: in Parthia they eat them. The Scriptures also often mention and censure this plague as Gods great Armie. But other where they are thought to be a blessing. In Ethiopia they have this principall habitation. Cleopatra mentioned their mischiefs about Fesse, where they bring Cart-loades of them to sell, the people devouring these devourers.

In his 32. and 33 Chapters, tel of these Grasshoppers in Ethiopia, that in some places they made the people trudge up bagges and baggage, and seek new Habitations where they might find victual: The Countie all desert and destroyed, and being on fire had swallowed there, by reason of the unharked Trees, and the fieldes of wheat, the great stalkes whereof were troden downe, and broken by them: and in another place a Tempest of Raine and Thunder left them more then two yarmes thicke, on the banks. This he saw with his Eyes. But if we stay a litle longer on this subject the Reader will complaine of their troublesome companie here.

The fictions of Natures rarities in these parts, may resort to Lea, and others, as also for their further satisfaction in the Fishes and Monsters of the water; as the Hippogryph, in shape resembling a horse, in bignesse an Ass; they goe into the Corne ground of the Egyptians, and in their feeding goe backwards, towards the River; so when men who looking forwards for them, they meane while conuay themselves into the Water. In this River of Nilus, in the time of Mauricius, Maria being Governesse of Egypt, there with many other saw neere the place where Cairo now standeth a cloudy monster, from the bottome of his belly upwards about the water like also unto a man, with flaxen haire, frowning countenance, and strong limmes. Some imagined him to be Nilus the supposed River-deitie. After hee had continued in the common view of all men three houres, hee came forth of the Water another like a woman with a sunnocks face, her haire partly hanging, & partly gathered into a knot and like of colour; her face very faire, rosie lippes, fingers and breasts well proportioned, her lower parts hidden in the water: Thus from morning till Sun-set, they fed their gazetes with this spectacle, which then saoke downe againe into the Waters.

Some speake of a Mermaid taken in the Netherlands, and taught to spinne: I sweare me the truth of it. But many Histories speake of some like men in their whole shape both in our and other Coastes, and some like Lyons: and for Mermaides, in the Voyage of Hermie Headson for Northerly disquerie 1608. Thomas Hall and Robert Juet saw one rise by the Ship side on the sixteenth of Iune; from the Nauill upwards her backe and breasts like a Womans, as likewise her bignesse of bodie: her after-pieces like a Porpise, and speckled like a Mackerill: when they call their companie to her, she sank downe. Imight adde manie other Creatures strange and wonderfull, and yet not so wonderfull, as the effects and vertues which Albertus Mizaldus, and others tell of these and other Creatures. Such are the Sea, The Sea Kine, lesser then the Land Kine, the Tartarica a Tortuise, which liueth in the Deserts of huge bignesse, &c.

The people which inhabite Africa are Arabians, Moors, Abissines, Egyptians, and some sort of the Heathens, differing in Rites from each other, as shall follow in our discourse. The Monsters which Pliny, and others tel of, besides Manster and Sabellicus out of them, I neyther beleue, nor report.

Of Egypt and of the famous River Nilus: and her first Kinges, Temples, and Monuments according to Herodotus, Diodorus, and others.

FTER our generall view of Africa Egypt may iustly challenge the principall place in our African discourse, as being both in situation next to Asia (whence we are lately come) and consequently from thence first peopled; besides that Religion, our Load-Starre, hath here found the soonest and solemnest entertainment. in Politie, Philosophie, and Artes, the Grecians<sup>f</sup> which would seeme the first Fathers of these things have bene Disciples to the Egyptians, as Am. Marcellinus and D. Siculus, Plutarch; and many others affirme. Hence Orpheus, Musæus and Homer taught their Theologie; Lycurgus and Solon their Lawes; Pythagoras, Plato, Anaxagoras, Endoxus, Democritus, Diculus; here borrowed that knowledge for which the World hath ever since admired them. Let it not then bee imputed to mee as a tedious officiousnesse, if I longer detain the Reader (other wise delighted with the view of those rills which hence have flowed among the Greeke and Latine Poets and Philosophers) in surueighing these Egyptian Fountaines and well-springs, whence have issued especially a deluge of Superstitions, that in elder times drowned all the neighbouring partes of the World: Nor let it be tedious vnto vs to behold (in this Historically Theater) those Egyptian Rarities; the sight whereof hath drawne not Philosophers alone, but great Princes too, and mighty Emperours, to the vndertaking of long and dangerous journeyes: As h. Seuerus, who though hee forbad Iudaisme and Christianitie, yet went this Pilgrimage, in honour of Serapis; and for the strange sight of Memphis, Memmah, the Pyramides, Labyrinth, &c. Vespasian also and others did the like.

The name of Egypt (saith Isophus) is Mesra, of Misraim, the sonne of Cham, and the Egyptians themselves Mesrai. So the Arabians at this day call it (as Leo<sup>a</sup> affirmeth) but the Inhabitants they call Chibth. This Chibth they say was he which first ruled this Countrey, and built houses therein. The Inhabitants also doe now call themselves thus: yet are there not now left any true Egyptians, save few Christians: the Mahumetans having mingled themselves with the Arabians and Africans. These Christians are hereupon<sup>1</sup> called Coptis, of their Nation, as Mr. Browne obserueth, not of their Religion, which is the same with the Iacobites. And the Egyptians in some ancient monuments are termed Egophis: and the name Egyptus (which some deriue from Egyptus brother of Danau) is likelier to come of the Chibth: or this Egophis: and all these names may seeme to borrow their original from Koptus, a chiefe Citie in Egypt, as both Sealiger<sup>a</sup> and Lidyat are of opinion, scilicet at Koptus, the Land of Kortus: so is Ethiops of As and Thebais, or Thebais, scilicet the Patriarch of Antioch, in an Arabick Epistle written to Sealiger, calleth Egypt the Land of Kopti, where he speaketh of Era Kopti, or the computation of yeares by these Koptite Christians, reckoned from the nineteenth yeare of Diocletian, at which time he destroyed the Christian Churches, and slew an hundred and fortie foure thousand Martyrs in Egypt; and other seuen hundred thousand exiled. The Turkes<sup>m</sup> call both the Countrey it selfe, and principall Citie (Cairo) by the name of Misra. Thus singeth an old Pilgrime in written rimes, without name of the Authour,

In Egypt is a Citie faire,
That beight Massar or else Kare.

Egypt was before called (if we may beleene Stephanus<sup>n</sup> and others) Aeria and otherwise also by the names of Actia, Potamia, Ogygia, Melambolos, Hæphestia, Ethiopia. Some adde<sup>o</sup> Hæcia, as Nilus was also called Melas of the blacknesse. The River was first called Oceanus then Egyptus and after that Nilus, and Triton.

Egypt hath on the East the gulfes, and some part of Arabia; on the South the fildes and mountaines of Aethiopia; on the West the Deserts of Lybia; on the North, the Mediterranean Sea: all which Nature hath set not onely as limits, but as fortifications also to this Countrey. Nilus is by Ovid<sup>q</sup> called adurna, for his forreine Springs by Tibullus fertilis, which supplieth the place of showers to Egypt, whereupon Claudian singeth,

Egyptus sua nube forax, imbre quæ serenos dola tenet, secunda poli, non indiga ventis, and Lucan,
Terra suis contenta bonis, non indiga merces,

Ant. Ionis in solo tanta est fiducia Nilæ.

Egypt no raines nor Merchandise doth neede, Nilus doth all her wealth, and plentie breed.

This River runneth through the midst thereof, fixtie miles from Cairo, making (by division of himselfe) that Delta, to which some appropriated the name of Egypt, resumed by Iupiter Ammon, whose Oracle (saith Herodotus) reckoned all that Egypt, which Nilus overflowed. Ptolemaus numbred three of those Deltas. Touching the head of this Bredembachius affirmeth, that many Soldans haue sent men on purpose furnished with kill and prouision for the Discouerie, who, after two or three yeares, retiring affirmed that they could finde no head of this River, nor could tell any certainty, but that it came from the East, and places not inhabited: both of like truth. For indeed the River riseth (as by late Discoueries is found) out of a Lake in twelue degrees of Southerly Latitude, out of which not onely this Riuer runneth Northwards into the Mediterranean, but Nare also, Westward Zuama, and Spiritu Santo Eastward into the Ocean, as is said: all overflowing their Territories in the same time, and from the same cause. What this cause should be, many both olde and later Writers haue laboured to reach. Herodotus, Diodorus, Pliny, and Solinus haue lent vs the coniectures of Antiquities herein. Fracasiorius and Rhamusius haue bestowed their Discourses on this subject, as Goropius also and others of later yeares haue done. The most probable cause is the raines, which Goropius in his Niloscopium, deriueth from a double cause, first the Sunne in places neere the Line, doth shew more mightie effects of his fierie prouidence, exhaling abundante of vapours, which in terrible showers he daily repayeth, except some naturall obstacle doe hinder (as in some places of Peru where it seldome conuenieth). And hence it is, that the Indians both East and West, and the A- fricans reckon their Summer and Winter otherwise then in these partes of the world:
in the time of the sunnes neere presence with them they call winter, in regard of these dayes shortnes; which he seemes to recompence them with other fixe moneths continuall sereneitie and faire weather; not then raising (by reason of his further absence) any more exhalations then are by himselfe exhausted and consumed, which time for the cause they call Summer. Goropius therefore out of his coniectures telleth vs of a double winter, vnder both Tropikes at the same time; vnder Cancer the rainy winter, which in manner (as ye haue heard) attends on the Sunne; vnder Capricorne the Altimoniacall winter in the Sunnes absence, where also he supposeth it to raine at that time, by reason of the high hills there situate, and the great lakes which minister store of moisture, besides that Cancer is then in the house of the Moone. Again, the windes Eusy (that is to say, ordinarie every yeare) in their annuall course, euery winter lift vp the cloudes to the tops of the hills, which melt them into raine, whereby all the Riuer of Ethiopia are filled: and cause those ouerflowings, which in Nilus is strangest, because it is in Egypt, farthest off from the raines that cause it. Aristoteles saith that A- fricans found by his wit, and Alexander by experience, sending men thither for that purpose, that raines were the cause of this ouerflowing; and that those rains were caused by Etesian windes, which (saith he) are by the approaching Sunne ingendered in the North parts, and carried to the South, where meeting and multiplying on the tops of the high Ethiopian hills, they cause raines. The like ouerflowing is common to many other Riueres; as to Niger in Africa, to Neman of Pegu, and Indus (which Philostratus inducts other things compares to Nilus) and the riuer of Siam in Asia; and to the Ri-uer of Amazones, and Guiana in America. Luys de Vretha ascribeth the ouerflowing to some secret passages and pores, whereby the Ocean, and the mountaines of the Moone holde mutual commerce. This increase of Nilus beginneth about the mid-del of Iune, continuing fortie dayes, after which followeth the decrease as long. In the middle of Nilus (saith Leo) ouer against the olde Citie of Cairo, standeth the Isle Mekius, or the measuring Isle, contayning one thousand, and five hundred Families, and a Temple, and a foure square Cistern of eightene cubits depth, whereinto the water of Nilus is conuaid by a certaine sluice vnder the ground, in the middest where.

of is a pillar marked also with eighreene Cubits, to which Officers for the purpose resort daily from the 17. of Iune, to obserue the increase, which if it amount to fifteene Cubits, and there stay, it doth portend fertilitie, and how much ouer or vnder, so much lesse abundance. In the meane time the people deuoutly exercise prayer and almsgiuing: And after, the price of victuals, (especially of Corne) is proportionably appointed for the whole yeare. The Cities and Townes of Egypt, whiles this inundation lasteth, are so many Islands. And thus saith Herodotus, The Land of Egypt doth not onely owe the fertilitie, but her selfe also, vnto the slimie encrease of Nilus: for raine is a stranger in this Countrie seldome seene, and yet ofner then welcome, as vnto some to the inhabitants. But Geoponius reasoneth largely in confutation of this opinion. The mouthes or falles of Nilus, numbred by the Prophet Esey and other in old times, seven and after Plinius (who reckoneth the foure smaller) eleuen: are now (as Strabo saith) Tyrius out of his owne search, testifieth) but foure, or, as other writers, but three worthie of consideration: Rosetta, Bahisima, Damiate, where the saltnesse of the Earth, and shelles found in it, may seeme to confirme Herodotus opinion, that Nilus hath wonne it from the Sea. Aristotle doth not only auerre the former opinion with Herodotus, but addes that all the mouthes of Nilus, except that of Canopus, may seeme to be the labour of men, and not naturall Channels to the River.

Egypt was anciently diuided into Thebais Delta and the Region interiacent and these subdiuided into fixe and thirtie Nomi, which we call Shires, whereof Tanis and Heliopolis were the assignement of Jacob's Family: then called Goshen, from whence Moses after conducted them into Canaan, as Strabo also witnesseth. The welth of Egypt, as it proceedeth from Nilus, so is it much encreased by the lit conveyance in the naturall and hand-laboured channels thereof. Their harvest beginneth in Aprill, and is threshed out in Maie. In this one Region were sometimes (by Herodotus and Plinius report) twentie thousand Cities: Diodorus & Strabo saith eighreene thousand; and in his time, three thousand. Hee also, was told by the Egyptian Priests, that it had bene gouerned about the space of eighreene hundred yeares, by the Gods and Heros; the last of whom was Orus: after whom it was vnder Kings vntill his time, the space almost of fifteene hundred yeares. To Herodotus they reported of three hundred and thirtie Kings from Menes to Sesostris.

The Scripture, whose Chronologie convinceth those lying Fables, calleth their Kings by one generall name, Pharao (which some interpret a Sauour, Iosephus in his signifieth Authoritie) and maketh Ancient mention of them, in the dayes of Abraham. Some beginne this Royall computation at Mizraim. If our Berosus which Strabo hath set forth were of authoritie, hee telleth, that Cham, the Sonne of Noah, was by his Father banished for particular abuse of himselfe, and publike corruption of the World, teaching and praesiding those vices, which before had procured the deluge, as Sodomic, Incest, Buggerie: and was therefore branded with the name Chemusius, that is, dishonest Cham, in which the Egyptians followed him, and reckoned him among their Gods, by the name of Saturne, consecrated him a Citie, called Chemus Min. The Psalmes of David doe also thus entiale Egypt, the Land of Cham: which name was retained by the Egyptians themselves in Ierusalem dayes. Chemus, Chemus, Diodorus was hallowed to Pan, and the word signifieth Pan: Citie: in Herodotus his time it was a great Towne in Thebais, having in it a Temple of Perseus, square, and surrounded with Palme-trees, with a huge Porch of stone, on which were two great statues, and in it a Chappell, with the Image of Perseus. The Inhabitants vnto their marvellous Legend, of the Apparitions of their God, and had a relique of his, a fardale of two Cubits which he sometimes ware. They celebrate festiuall games in his honour after the Greeke manner. Herodotus also mentioneth an Island called Chemus, which the Temple of Apollo in it. Some say Thebes was called in their Hokes, Chemus, or Chamia: and all Egypt was sometime called Thebes.

Lucian saith, the Egyptians were the first that had Temples, but these Temples had no Images. Their first Temples are reported to haue bene erected in the time of Ofsis and Isis, whose parents were Isis and Imno, children to Saturne and Phaon, who succeeded Nileus in this Kingdome. They built a magnificent Temple to Isis and and Iano, and two other golden Temples to Iupiter Calensis, and Iupiter Ammon, or Chama, which we before spake of, instituting vnto them Priests and golden statues. Ammon is reckoned the first King after those Demi-gods, who built a Temple to Vulcan and taught the people to sacrifice, and other rites of Religion; Long after him, Nubus built Thebes, which was said to haue a hundred Oares, and many stately erections of Temples, Colosses, Obeliskes; by the one name they call their more then Countie Images; by the other, their Pillars of one stone, fashioned like a Needle. Pomponius Mela, and Marianus speake of two of these Obeliskes with hieroglyphicall inscriptions, carried from Hieropolis in Egypt by Augustus to Rome, the one foure foot high, the other an hundred & thirtie, which was broken in the raising, Plinius mentions these and others at Rome, one of which he made serue for the measuring of the shadow in Campus Martius, in Dyall wise: Hee speaketh of an Obeliske at Thebes made and raised by cwentie thousand men.

Of foure Temples, there was one contayning in circuit thirteene furlongs, in height four and foure cubits, the wall foure and twentie foot thick. The ornaments answered the structure. But the golde, silver, luerie, and jewels weretaken away by the Persians, when Cambyses burned the Egyptian Temples. Out of those fires they report to haue three hundred talents of gold, and two thousand and three hundred of silver amongst the seuen and forty Sepulchres of their Kings, that of Sardanapalus was reckoned most sumptuous, the gates whereof were two hundred foote long, and five and fiftie cubites high: within was a square Cloyster, contayning in each square foure hundred foote, borne vp with statues of beasts in stead of pillars, of fiftene cubites, the roofe made of stones, of two paces broad, beautified with statues: Then was there another gate like to the former, but fuller of worke, with three huge statues to him, his mother, and daughter: Within this was another Cloyster, more beautifull then the former: But for the particulars of these things, let our Reader resort to Diodorus Siculus, who partly from the Priests Relations, and in great part from his owne sight, describeth them at large. He addeth, that there was an inscription contayning the cost and charges hereof to be thirtie and 100. millions of Minæ. These summes are admirable, and scarcely to be paralleld in any Historie, excelling euen those summes which Dauid left Salomon for the Temple, and onely surmounted by those which Sardanapalus is said to haue consumed, together with himselfe in his funerall fire. For we account our Mina three pound two shillings and fixe pence, as Master Breewood hath obserued of the Atticke Mina, out of many Authors, (which yet is lesse then the Egyptian, and but halfe so much as that of the Hebrewes and Alexandrians) it comes to tenne thousand millions of our pounds, a summe incredible, improbable, that I say not impossible. Yea, neyther are those things credible which Ctesias tells of Sardanapalus, which Breewood summeth after the Atticke talent, at two and twentie thousand and fiftie hundred millions of pounds in golde, and eightene thousand, two hundred and fiftie millions of pounds in silver. Euen in those things also which the sacred Historie recounteth of Dauid, howsoeuer the truth is beyond all names of exorbitancie, yet the imagination of that truth is not fully agreed vpon. For that which Isa. vi. is vnderstanded (recounting the talent but fixe thousand crownes, as some doe) Mr. Breewood hath learned worke of that argument, raised it to a farre higher summe, estimating the talent at 4500 l. so that the 10000 talents of gold which Dauid had provided for that worke, amounte to 4500. millions of our pounds: and his million of silver talents (each of which is 375 l.) to 375 millions, besides 12 millions, and 500000 l. in golde, and 600 millions & 25000 l. in silver, afterwards by him offered to the same purpose; & by Isa. 66. 24. 25. 26. 27. 28. 29. 30. 31. 32. 33. 34. 35. 36. 37. 38. 39. 40. 41. 42. 43. 44. 45. 46. 47. 48. 49. 50. 51. 52. 53. 54. 55. 56. 57. 58. 59. 60. 61. 62. 63. 64. 65. 66. 67. 68. 69. 70. 71. 72. 73. 74. 75. 76. 77. 78. 79. 80. 81. 82. 83. 84. 85. 86. 87. 88. 89. 90. 91. 92. 93. 94. 95. 96. 97. 98. 99. 100. 101. 102. 103. 104. 105. 106. 107. 108. 109. 110. 111. 112. 113. 114. 115. 116. 117. 118. 119. 120. 121. 122. 123. 124. 125. 126. 127. 128. 129. 130. 131. 132. 133. 134. 135. 136. 137. 138. 139. 140. 141. 142. 143. 144. 145. 146. 147. 148. 149. 150. 151. 152. 153. 154. 155. 156. 157. 158. 159. 160. 161. 162. 163. 164. 165. 166. 167. 168. 169. 170. 171. 172. 173. 174. 175. 176. 177. 178. 179. 180. 181. 182. 183. 184. 185. 186. 187. 188. 189. 190. 191. 192. 193. 194. 195. 196. 197. 198. 199. 200. 201. 202. 203. 204. 205. 206. 207. 208. 209. 210. 211. 212. 213. 214. 215. 216. 217. 218. 219. 220. 221. 222. 223. 224. 225. 226. 227. 228. 229. 230. 231. 232. 233. 234. 235. 236. 237. 238. 239. 240. 241. 242. 243. 244. 245. 246. 247. 248. 249. 250. 251. 252. 253. 254. 255. 256. 257. 258. 259. 260. 261. 262. 263. 264. 265. 266. 267. 268. 269. 270. 271. 272. 273. 274. 275. 276. 277. 278. 279. 280. 281. 282. 283. 284. 285. 286. 287. 288. 289. 290. 291. 292. 293. 294. 295. 296. 297. 298. 299. 300. 301. 302. 303. 304. 305. 306. 307. 308. 309. 310. 311. 312. 313. 314. 315. 316. 317. 318. 319. 320. 321. 322. 323. 324. 325. 326. 327. 328. 329. 330. 331. 332. 333. 334. 335. 336. 337. 338. 339. 340. 341. 342. 343. 344. 345. 346. 347. 348. 349. 350. 351. 352. 353. 354. 355. 356. 357. 358. 359. 360. 361. 362. 363. 364. 365. 366. 367. 368. 369. 370. 371. 372. 373. 374. 375. 376. 377. 378. 379. 380. 381. 382. 383. 384. 385. 386. 387. 388. 389. 390. 391. 392. 393. 394. 395. 396. 397. 398. 399. 400. 401. 402. 403. 404. 405. 406. 407. 408. 409. 410. 411. 412. 413. 414. 415. 416. 417. 418. 419. 420. 421. 422. 423. 424. 425. 426. 427. 428. 429. 430. 431. 432. 433. 434. 435. 436. 437. 438. 439. 440. 441. 442. 443. 444. 445. 446. 447. 448. 449. 450. 451. 452. 453. 454. 455. 456. 457. 458. 459. 460. 461. 462. 463. 464. 465. 466. 467. 468. 469. 470. 471. 472. 473. 474. 475. 476. 477. 478. 479. 480. 481. 482. 483. 484. 485. 486. 487. 488. 489. 490. 491. 492. 493. 494. 495. 496. 497. 498. 499. 500. 501. 502. 503. 504. 505. 506. 507. 508. 509. 510. 511. 512. 513. 514. 515. 516. 517. 518. 519. 520. 521. 522. 523. 524. 525. 526. 527. 528. 529. 530. 531. 532. 533. 534. 535. 536. 537. 538. 539. 540. 541. 542. 543. 544. 545. 546. 547. 548. 549. 550. 551. 552. 553. 554. 555. 556. 557. 558. 559. 560. 561. 562. 563. 564. 565. 566. 567. 568. 569. 570. 571. 572. 573. 574. 575. 576. 577. 578. 579. 580. 581. 582. 583. 584. 585. 586. 587. 588. 589. 590. 591. 592. 593. 594. 595. 596. 597. 598. 599. 600. 601. 602. 603. 604. 605. 606. 607. 608. 609. 610. 611. 612. 613. 614. 615. 616. 617. 618. 619. 620. 621. 622. 623. 624. 625. 626. 627. 628. 629. 630. 631. 632. 633. 634. 635. 636. 637. 638. 639. 640. 641. 642. 643. 644. 645. 646. 647. 648. 649. 650. 651. 652. 653. 654. 655. 656. 657. 658. 659. 660. 661. 662. 663. 664. 665. 666. 667. 668. 669. 670. 671. 672. 673. 674. 675. 676. 677. 678. 679. 680. 681. 682. 683. 684. 685. 686. 687. 688. 689. 690. 691. 692. 693. 694. 695. 696. 697. 698. 699. 700. 701. 702. 703. 704. 705. 706. 707. 708. 709. 710. 711. 712. 713. 714. 715. 716. 717. 718. 719. 720. 721. 722. 723. 724. 725. 726. 727. 728. 729. 730. 731. 732. 733. 734. 735. 736. 737. 738. 739. 740. 741. 742. 743. 744. 745. 746. 747. 748. 749. 750. 751. 752. 753. 754. 755. 756. 757. 758. 759. 760. 761. 762. 763. 764. 765. 766. 767. 768. 769. 770. 771. 772. 773. 774. 775. 776. 777. 778. 779. 780. 781. 782. 783. 784. 785. 786. 787. 788. 789. 790. 791. 792. 793. 794. 795. 796. 797. 798. 799. 800. 801. 802. 803. 804. 805. 806. 807. 808. 809. 810. 811. 812. 813. 814. 815. 816. 817. 818. 819. 820. 821. 822. 823. 824. 825. 826. 827. 828. 829. 830. 831. 832. 833. 834. 835. 836. 837. 838. 839. 840. 841. 842. 843. 844. 845. 846. 847. 848. 849. 850. 851. 852. 853. 854. 855. 856. 857. 858. 859. 860. 861. 862. 863. 864. 865. 866. 867. 868. 869. 870. 871. 872. 873. 874. 875. 876. 877. 878. 879. 880. 881. 882. 883. 884. 885. 886. 887. 888. 889. 890. 891. 892. 893. 894. 895. 896. 897. 898. 899. 900. 901. 902. 903. 904. 905. 906. 907. 908. 909. 910. 911. 912. 913. 914. 915. 916. 917. 918. 919. 920. 921. 922. 923. 924. 925. 926. 927. 928. 929. 930. 931. 932. 933. 934. 935. 936. 937. 938. 939. 940. 941. 942. 943. 944. 945. 946. 947. 948. 949. 950. 951. 952. 953. 954. 955. 956. 957. 958. 959. 960. 961. 962. 963. 964. 965. 966. 967. 968. 969. 970. 971. 972. 973. 974. 975. 976. 977. 978. 979. 980. 981. 982. 983. 984. 985. 986. 987. 988. 989. 990. 991. 992. 993. 994. 995. 996. 997. 998. 999. 1000.

of this worke, which would haue yeelded this question a fitter place was printed) with a probable coniecture, that the Hebrew word in that place doth not signifie a talent; or that the word talent doth not alway signifie the same summe in Scripture, euen as amongst other Nations it also varied, and sometimes, was vsed for a small summe; as he sheweth out of Homer, Pallax, and others. Howsoever therefore I will not so vilifie this talent here, as to esteem it with som bus a shekel, yet I would take in (as the notation of the word may inferre) but for some massie plate of Silver. But we haue digressed too farre in this Hebrew and Egyptian talent, let vs returne. This cost of Simandius, although enlarged in the telling, doth not disagree to the Egyptian opinion, esteeming their houses their Innes, and their Sepulchres their euernall habitations. Of the race of Simandius was Ogdous, that built Memphis (called in the Scripture Noph) compassing a hundred and fiftie furlongs, at the parting of Nilus into that Delta-diuision, where the succeeding Kings abode, forsaking Thebes till Alexandria was after built by Alexander.

Thebes was called Diopols, or Iupiters Citie, where (as Strabo & reporteth) was consecrated to Iupiter a beautifull Virgine of noble birth, who, vntill the time that she had her naturall purgation, had the carnall companie of whomsoever she pleased, and at this her monstrous accident was bewailed as dead, and after married. Such Virgins the Greeke (saith hee) called Pallades. Many yeeres after Ogdous, succeeded Sesoftris. Josephus is of opinion, that Herodotus erred in the name, and ascribed the deedes of Shishak to Sesoftris; to which also the computation of Herodotus doth agree reasonably in the time. Others account him the same with Sesachis in Diodorus. The huge Conquests of this Sesoftris are beyond all that euer Alexander achieved, if we credite Authors. At his returne he builded in euery Citie of Egypt a Temple to their chiefe God at his owne costs; and offered a shippe of Cedar, two hundred and eightie cubites in length, siluered on the in-side, goulded on the out-side, to the chiefe God at Thebes, and two Obelisks one hundred and twentie cubits high, which were ingrauen the greatnes of his Empire and reuenues. At Memphis in the Temple of Vulcan he dedicated statues of himselfe and his wife, thirde cubites high, of his children twentie. And when he went to the Temple, or through the Citie, his Chaire was drawne by Kings, as Lucan singeth:

Venit ad Occasion mundi, extrema Sesoftris;
Es Phario turris Regum cernicibus agit
Sesoftris in the Westerne world, by warrs Compelled Kings to draw his Memphian Carre.

Thus we read in our owne Chronicles of Edgarus Pacificus, sometimes King of England, rowed in a Boate by eight Kings, himselfe holding the Sterne.

Tacitus telleth of Rhamses an Egyptian King, who conquered the East and South partes of the world, helped herein (as the Priests tolde Germanicus) with the forces of Thebes, who had then seuen hundred thousand fighting men. This was written in Egyptian Characters at Thebes, interpreted by one of the Priests; together with his reuenues not inferior to the Romane or Parthian Empires. Pharon, the sonne and successor of Sesoftris, enraged at the rage of Nilus, swelling aboue eighteene cubits, cast a dart against the streame, and thereupon lost his sight, which by the aduice of the Oracle in Butis was restored by the vrine of a woman, which had neuer knowne sex but her husband; which caused him to burne his owne wife and many other, failing in this new experiment, and to marry her whom at last he found by this prooffe to be honest. He set vp in the Temple of the Sunne two Pillars, each of one stone of 100 cubits high, and eight broad. After, heeceeded Memphitis; Rhamisius, and Cheops. This last shut vp all the Temples in Egypt; and busied them in his owne worke, one hundred thousand by courses ten yeeres together, in building a Pyramis for his Sepulchre. The least stone was thirte footte, and all grauen. Nilus passeth vnder it by a trench, was reckoned among the Wonders of the World. His daughter and brother made more heinous therefore to the Egyptians who will not once name them. He measured one of the foure squares of one of them, which contained three hundred and twenty and twentie large paces, This was hollow, the other solid. They did it (saith he) in hope of the resurrection. For they would not interre their dead bodies, because of the Wormes; nor burne them, because they esteemed Fire a living Creature, which feeding thereon, must together with it perish. They therefore with nitre and Cedar did preserve them. Scaliger saith, * they set these bodies in their drying roomes, where their children and nephewes might behold them whiles they were eating. Some also report, * That they used hereunto the slimie Bitumen of the dead Sea, which had preserved an infinite number of Carcasses in a dreadfull Caue (not farre from these Pyramids) yet to be seene, with their flesh and members whole, after so many thousand yeares, and some with their haire and teeth. Bellonius thinketh the fables of Zeus and Dionysus to have flowed from that Lake, by which the dead bodies were brought hither. Of these is the true Mumia. Not farre hence is that Sphinx, a huge Colosse, with the head of a Maid, and bodie of a Lyon, supposed by Bellonius to be the monument of some Sepulchre. It yet continueth all of one stone, and is a huge face, looking towardst Cairo. The compasse of the head sayth P. Martyr, and eye-witnesse, is fiftie eight paces. Plinius numbred eight Pyramids, and sayth, That the compasse of this Sphinx, about the head, was 102. foot, the length 143. 360000. men were twentie yeares in making one of the Pyramids, and three were made in euentie eight yeares and foure moneths. The greatest (sayth he) couereth eight acres of ground; and Bellonius affirmeth, That the Pyramids rather exceed then fall short of the reports of the Auncient; and that a strong & cunning Archer on the top is not able to shoot beyond the fabrick of one; which Villamont being there, caused to be tried and found true. William Elibon writeth that the height of one is 1092. foot, as their Dragoman tolde them: the top thereof is all one stone, which he measured seuentene foot in euery square yet on the ground seemed as sharpe as a pointed diamond. The other are lower, and want steps to ascend on them. They are of marble. But I would be loath to burie the Reader in the sumptuous Monuments, the witnessses of vanitie and ostentation; of which, besides the Auncient, Martyr, Bellonius, Eusebium, Villamont, and other eye-witnesses haue largely written.

Myserius is reckoned the next King, better beloued of his Subjects, whose daughter was buried in a wooden Bul<sup>h</sup> in the Citie Sai; to which euery day were odours offered, & a light set by night. This Oxe once a yeare was brought out to the people. Next to him was Apychus, who made a Pyramis of bricke; and these bricke were made of Earth, that claued to the end of a pole for this purpose, in a vaine curiositie thrust into a lake. Yet were all these wonders excided by the Labyrinth, the worke (say some) of Phameticus, or (after Herodotus) of the twelue Petres which reigned in common as Kings partly aboue ground, partly beneath, in both containing 3500. roomes. Herodotus saith he saw the vpper roomes, the lower he might not, as being the Sepulchres of the Founders, and of the sacred Crocodiles: all was of stone, and grauen. The lake of Mæris was not lesse wonderfull compassing 3600. furlongs, and 50. fadom in depth, made by Mæris whose name it beareth: in the midst were 2. Pyramids 50. fadom aboue, and as much beneath water, one for himselfe, the other for his wife. The water flowes 6. moneths out, and 6. moneths in, from Nilus. The fish were worth to the Kings coffers twentie of their pounds a day, the first 6. and a talent a day, the last 6. moneths. Of Necus whom the Scripture calles Pharaoh Necho and of his victory against the Syrians in Magdolo, or Magiddo, where he slew King Iosiah Herodotus witnesseth. He also makes this Necus author of that trench, from Nilus to the red Sea, which Strabo ascribes to Sesostris. Pliny makes Sesostris first author, seconded by Darius, who in this warre was followed by Ptol. 100. foot broad, 37. miles long; but forced to leaue the enterprise, for feare of the red sea ouerflowing Egypt, or mixing his water with Nilus. Tremellius thinkes it to be the labour of the Israelites, in that seruitude from which Moses freed them. He consumed in this worke 120000. Egyptians. After him reigned Sonchis, and then Apries. About these times Nabuch conquered the Egyptians, according to Ezech. prophecy. Ezech. 30. But they had also ciuill warres. Amasis deprived

Apries, who, being of a base birth, of a great basin of gold in which himselfe and his guests had vied so, wash their feet, made an Image and placed it in the most convenient part of the Citie and observing their Superstitious deuotion thereunto, said that they ought not now no lesse to respect him, notwithstanding his former base birth and offences. When he was a private man, to maintaine his prodigall expenses, hee vied to steele from others: and when they redemanded their owne, hee committed himselfe to the censure of their Oracles. Such Oracles as neglected his thefts, he being a King did neglect. He brought from the Citie Elephanta twenty dayes sayling, a building of solid stone, the roofe being of one stone, one and twenty Cubits long, fourteene broad, and eight thick, and brought it to the Temple at Sai. CHAP. III. Of the Egyptian, Idols, with their Legendarie Histories, and Mysteries.

If wee stay longer on this Egyptian Stage, partly the varietie of our Orizons may excuse vs which have entreated of this subiect, partly the varietie of matter, which adding some light to the Diuine Oracles, (not that they neede it, which are in themselves a lumen in a dark place, but because of our need; whose slowly eyes cannot so easily discern that light) deserue a larger relation. For whether the Histories of the Olde Testament, or the Prophecies of the New bee considered, both there literally wee read of Egyptian Rites practised; and heere mystically of like superstitions in the Antichristian Synagogue reuiued, therefore be called spiritually Sodome and Egypt. No where can Antiquitie plead a longer succession of error; no where of superstition more multiplicitie; more blinde zeale, in prosecuting the same therofolues or crueltie in persecuting others that gainesaid. Oh Egypt! wonderfull in Nature, whose Heaven is brass, and yet thine Earth not Iron; wonderfull for Antiquitie, Arms and Armes; but no way so wonderfull, as in thy Religions, wherewith thou hast disturbed the rest of the World, both elder and later, Heathen and Christian, to which thou hast beene a sinke and mother of Abominations. Thy Heathenisme planted by Cham, watered by Iannes, Iambres; Hermes, ouerflowed to Athens and Rome: Thy Christianisme, famous for many ancient Fathers, more infamous for that Arrian heresie, which rising here, eclipsed the Christian light; the World wandering and groning to see it selfe an Arrian: I speake not of the first Monkes, whose egge, here laid, was faire; and beginnings holy: but (by the Devils brooding) brought forth in after ages a dangerous Serpent: Thy Mahumetisme entertained with like lightnesse of credulitie, with like eagernes of deuotion, no lesse troublesome to the Arabian Sect in Asia and Africk, then before to the Heathens or Christians in Europe. The first Authour (it seemeth) of this Egyptian, as of all other false Religions, was Cham (as before is said) which had taken deepe rooting in the dayes of Ioseph the Patriarch; and in the dayes of Moses; their Priests, Wisemen and Southsayers, confirming their deuotions with lying Miracles, as the Scriptures testifie of Iannes and Iambres; and Hermes Trismegistus, of his Grandfather and himselfe. The Gracians ascribe these deuotions to Osiris and Isis: of whom the Historie and Myserie is so confused; that Typhon neuer hewed Osiris into so many pieces as these vaine Theologians and Mythologians haue done. They are forsooth in the Egyptian throne, King and Queene; in the heauens, the Sunne and Moone: beneath these, the Elements; after Herodotus, they are Bacchus and Ceres: Diadotus maketh Osiris the same with the Sunne, Serapis, Dionysius, Pluto, Ammon, Iupiter: Isis, the Moone, Ceres and Inno. In Macrobius and Seruius she is the nature of things; he, Adonis and Atis: Plutarch addeth to these Interpretations Oceanus and Sinur, as

Isis, Minerva, Proserpina, Thetis. And if you have not enough, Apuleius will helpe you, with Venus, Diana, Bellona, Hecate, Rhamnusia; and Heliodorus nearer home, maketh Osiris to be Nilus, the Earth Isis. So true is it, that an Idol is nothing in the world, and Idolaters worship they know not what. Stappolus interpreteth Osiris to bee Abraham, and Isis to be Sarah, whom Moses calleth also Ischa. Orus & Apolla saith, Isis is the Starre, called of the Egyptians, Sethu, which is the Dog-starre; therefore called Isis, because at the first rising of that Star, they prognosticated what should happen the yeare following. The like was in use among the Cilicians, who obserued the first rising of that Starre from the top of Taurus, and thence saith C. Manilius,

Qua, valitudo veniat, concordia quanta, &c.

Thence they foretell what store of fruits or want,

What times, what health, what concord, they descant.

Tully in the first Booke of his Diuination, reciteth the same out of Heracides Ponticus of the Celi. But the Egyptians had more cause to obserue that Starre, because Nilus doth then beginne to encrease, And therefore from thence they began to reckon their Tekybas or quarters of their yeare; as the Jewes from Nisan.

But to search this Fountaine further, you may read the Egyptian opinion in Diodorus; shew that the world, being framed out of that Chaos, or first matter, the lighter things ascending, the heavier descending, the Earth yet imperfect, was heated and hardened by the Sunne; whose violent heat begate of her slime softnesse certaine pumpe swellings, couered with a thinne filme, which being by the same heat ripened, brought forth all manner of creatures. This muddy generation was (say they) first in Egypt, most fit (in respect of the strong soile, temperate ayre, Nilus everflowing, and exposed to the Sunne) to beget and nourish them; and yet retaining some such vertue as the new slaking of the Riuer, the Sunne more desirous (as it were) of this Egyptian

Concubine, whom the waters had so long detained from his sight, ingendring in that lush fit many Creatures, as Mice and others, whose fore-parts are seene moving before the hinder are formed. These newly-hatched people could not but ascribe Diuinitie to the Author of their Humanitie, by the names of Osiris and Isis, worshipping the Sunne and Moone, accounting them to be gods, and everlasting; adding in the same Catalogue, vnder disguised names of Iupiter, Vulcan, Minerva, Oceanus, and Ceres, the fine Elements of the World, Spirit, Fire, Ayre, Water, and Earth. These eternall gods begot others, whom not Nature, but their owne proper merit made immortall, which reigned in Egypt, and bare the names of those celestiall Deities. Their Legend of Osiris, is, that he hauing set Egypt in order, leauing Isis his wife Governour, appointing Mercurius her Counsellour (the inuenter of Arithmetike, Musicke, Physicke, and of their superstition) made an Expedition into farre Countries, hauing Hercules for his Generall, with Apollo his brother, Anubis and Macedon his sonnes, (whose Ensignes were a Dog and a Wolfe, creatures after for this cause honored, and their countreys worshipped) Pan, Maron, and Triptolemus, and the nine Muses attending with the Saryres. Thus did he invade the world, rather with Arts, then Armes; teaching men husbandrie in many parts of Asia and Europe, and where Vines would not grow, to make drinke of Barley. At his returne, his brother Typhon slew him, rewarded with like death by the reuenging hand of Isis and her sonne Orus. The dispersed peeces, into which Typhon had cut him, shee gathered and committed to the Priests, with injunction to worshipping him, with dedication vnto him of what beast they best liked, which also should be obserued with much ceremonie, both aliue and dead, in memorie of Osiris. In which respect also they obserued solemnely to make a lamentable search for Osiris with many reares, making semblance of like ioy at his pretended finding, whereof Lucan singeth, Nunquam, satis quasius Osiris; alway seeking (saith Lactanius) and alway finding. To establish this Osirian Religion, shee consecrated a third part of the Land in Egypt for maintenance of these superstitious rites and persons: the other two parts appropriated to the King, and his souldiers. This Isis, after her death, was also deified in a higher degree of adoration then Osiris selfe. One thing is lacking to our tale, which was also lacking a long time to Isis in her search. For when since had with the helpe of waxe made vp of six and twentie parts, which shee found so many Images of Osiris, all buried in severall places: his priuities, which Typhon had drowned in Nilus, were not without much labour found, and more solemnitie interred. And that the Diuell might shew how farre he can besot men, the Image hereof was made and worshipped; the light of this darknesse shining as farre as Greece, whose Phallus, Phallogia, Ishiphallus, Phallopheia, an Phallopheia issued out of this sincke, together with their membrous monster Priapus. Yea, the Egyptians hauing lost their owne eyes in this filthie superstition, bestowed them on the Image of Osiris his stones, which they puttrayed with an eye.

Athenaeus k telleth of Ptol. Philadelphus in a solemnitie, wherein he list to shew to the world his madnes; or (as it was then esteemed) his magnificence (a place worth the reading to them, who are not heere glutted with our tedious Egyptian Banquet) he among many sumptuous spectacles presented a l Phallus of gold, painted, with golden crownes, of an hundred and twentie cubits length, hauing a golden starr on the toppe, whose circumference was six cubits. This was carried in a Chariot, as in others the Images of Priapus, and other Idols. Of Typhon the Poets * fable, that alitt the gods, by the helpe of mortall men, had slaine the Giant, the Earth in indignation for the losse of that her Giantly brood, lying with Tartarus, brought forth Typhon, which exceeded all the former: for his heigh surmounted the Mountaines, his head reached to the Starres, one of his hands to the West, the other to the East, from which proceeded an hundred heads of Dragons: his legges were entwined with rolls of Vipers, which reached to his head, filling the world with terrible hissing: his bodie couered with feathers, his eyes flaming with fire, a flame streaining also out of his mouth. Thus was he armed, and fought against Heauen, and made the gods runne away into Egypt, and turne themselues into many formes: with many tales more which I leaue to rehearse.

Of the Isiacall rites, m that brazen Table (supposed to haue beene some Altar-couer) after possessed by Card. Bimbus, full of mytticall Characters, explained by Lactantius Pignorus in a Treatise of this Argument, may further acquaint the desirous Reader. Diodorus thinketh this the cause why they consecrated Goates, and erected Images of Satyres in their Temples; affirming that their Priests are first initiated in these bawdie rites. Their canonized Beasts, of which the Egyptians and Syriani, (saith n Tully) conceived stronger opinions of Deuotion, then the Romans of their most sacred Temples, were o Dogs, Cats, Wolues, Crocodiles, Ichneumons, Rammes, Goats, Bülles, and Lions, in honor of Isis: their sacred Birds were the Hawke, Ibis, Phanicopterus: besides Dragons, Aspes, Beetles, amongst things creeping: and of fishes, whatsoever had scales; and the Ele. Yea their reason did not onely to sensible things ascribe Diuinitie, but Garlike and Onions were free of their Temples, denied therefore by p Inuental,

O sanctas gentes quibus hac nascuntur in hortis Numina.*

Onions or Leekes by old Egyptian Rite,
It was impietie to hurt or bite:
Oh holy people! in whose gardens grow
Their gods, on whom deuotion they bestow.

For this cause some q thinke the Hebrewes were in such abomination to the Egyptians, that they would not eate with them, as eating and sacrificing those things, which the other worshipped. Example whereof Diodorus an eye-witnesse telleth, That when Ptolemy gaue entertainment to the Romans, whose friend he was declared; a Roman, at vnawares hauing killed a Cat, could not by the kings authority, sending Officers for his rescue, nor for feare of the Romans, be detained from their butcherly furie. For such was their custome for the murder of those sacred creatures, to put to death by exquisite torments him that had done it wittingly, and for the Bird Ibis and a Cat, although vnwittingly slaine. And therefore if any espie any of them lying dead, he standeth aloofe lamenting and protesting his owne innocencie. The cause of this blinde zeale, were the metamorphosis of their distressed gods into these shapes; secondly, their ancient Ensignes; thirdly, the profit of them in common life. Origen addeth a fourth, because they were vsed to diuination, and therefore (saith he) forbidden to the Ihsa-ians to vncleane: Eusebius out of the Poet citeth a fift cause, namely, the Diuine Name diffused into all creatures, after that of the Poet:

Deum namq; ire per omnes

Terrasq; wallusq; maris, calumq; profundum.

God goes thorow Sea and Land, and loffie Skies.

I might adde a fixt, that is, transformation, which Pythagoras (it seemeth) heere borrowed. Yea Enchiridion a Platonike, in his Theophrastus or Dialogue of the soules immortalitie, affirmeth, That Plato learned this opinion of the Egyptians, and dispersed it through all his Bookes, as did Plinius and vther his followers after him, numbring amongst the rest Porphyrius and Iamblicus.

If I might, with the Readers patience, I would adde somewhat of their Mysterie of magicke, and the mysticall sense of this iniquitie. For as many haue sweat in vnfolding the mysteries of that Church, which spiritually is called Sodome and Egypt, as Ambro-sius, Armeriole, Amalaricus, Durandus, Durandus, and others: so here haue not wanted mysticall Interpreters, Porphyrius, Iamblicus, Plutarch, and the rest. Such is the language of Satan in the shallownesse of humane, both reason and truth. Water and Fire vsed in all their Sacrifices, and doe them deuoutest worship (saith Porphyrius) because those Elements are so profitable to mans vse: and for this vse-like they adored many creatures: at Anubis they worshipped a man. But especially they held in veneration those creatures which seemed to hold some affinity with the Sunne. Euen the flinking Beetle or Scarabee did these (more blinde then Beetles) in their flinking motions obserue, as a living Image of the Sunne, because, forsooth, all Scarabees are of male sex (and therefore also saith Helian, Souldiers wore the figure of the Scarabee in their Rings, as thereby insinuating their masculine spirits) and hauing fled out of the dung, doe make a ball thereof, which they rowle to and fro with their feet, imitating the Sunne to his circular iourney. Iulius Firmicus inueigheth against them for their worship, and supplications; and superstitious vowes made to the Water: and for that their fabulous Legend of Osiris, Isis, and Typhon, vnfolding the Riddle and Mysterie. Eusebius followeth this Argument in the seuerall beasts which they worship; but to auoid tediousnesse, I leaue him, to looke on Plutarches paines in this Argument. He maketh Isis to be deriued of the verbe is scire, to know, as because the Goddesse of Wisdome and Knowledge: to whom Typhon for his ignorancie is an enemy. For without Knowledge, Immortalitie it selfe could not deserue the name of Life, but of Time.

Their Priests shaued their owne haire, and wore not woollen but linnen garments, because of their professed puritie, to which the haire of man or beast being but an excrement, disagreed: and for this cause they reiected Beeces, Murton and Porke, as meats which cause much excrements. Yea their Apis might not drinke of Nilus, for the others faining qualitie, but of a fountaine peculiar to his holinesse. At Heliopolis they might not bring wine into the Temple, holding it vnseemely to drinke in the presence of their Lord. They had many purifications wherein wine was forbidden. Their Kings, which were also Priests, had their sacred flints of wine; and did not drinke it till before Psammetichus time, esteeming wine to bee the blood of them, which sometimes wanted against the gods, out of whose flaine carcases Vines proceeded, and hence proceedeth drunkennesse, and madnesse by wine. Their Priests abstaine from all Fish:
 they eat not Onions, because they grow most in the waste of the Moone; they procure no heats and thirst. Their Kings were chosen also either of the Priests, or of the Souldiers; and these also after their election, were presently chosen into the Colledge of Priests. Osiris signifieth many eyes, in the Egyptian language. Os is much, and iris, eye. The Image of Minerva at Sai, had this inscription, I am all, which is, which shall be, which shall be, whose shining light doth mortall man hath opened. Ammon they call Am (the same as is before said with Ham or Cham, the sonne of Noah) in the vo-cabularie, as inuocating him, whom they hold the chiefe God of the world, to main-fest himselfe. They esteemed children to have a diuining facultie, and obserued the voyces of children playing in the Temples, and speaking at aduenture, as Oracles, because Isis seeking after Osiris, had enquired of children. They interpret Astronomically the Dog-starre to belong to Isis; the Beare, to Typhon; Orion, to Horus.

The Inhabitants of Thebais acknowledged nothing for God which was mortall; but worshipped Cneph, which they said, had neither beginning nor ending. So many are the interpretations in their mysticall Theologie, that Truth must needs be absent, which is but One: and these may rather seeme subtile fetches of their Priests, to gull their people, then the true intents of their first authors of Idolatrie. Because Typhon was of red colour, they consecrated red Bulls, in which yet there might not be one haire blacke or white. They esteemed it not a sacrifice acceptable to the gods, but contrarie, as which had receiued the soules of wicked men: and therefore they cut the head of the sacrifice, which they hurled into the Riuer: and since have vsed to sell to strangers. The Diuell happily would reach them an apish imitation of that sacrifice of the red Cow, Numb. 19. The Priests abhorre the Sea, as wherein Nilus dieth; and salt is forbidden them, which they call Typhons spittle. In Sai, in the Porch of Mineruas Temple, was pictured an Infant, an old Man, a Hauke, a Fish, and a Sea-horse. The mystrie was, One that are borne, and die. God hateth shamelesse persons. The Hauke signified God, the Fish Hatred, the Sea-horse Impudencie.

By their Osiris and Typhon, they signified the good and euill, whereof we have not onely vicissitudes, but mixtures, in all these earthly things. And heere Plutarch is large in shewing the opinion of these wise-men, which when they saw so much euill, and knew wihal that good could not be the cause of euill, they imagined two beginnings, one whereof they called God, the other Diuell: the good, Ormazas; the bad, Arimanius. This opinion is fathered on Zoroastres. Betwixt these two was Mithras, whom the Persians called a Mediator. So the Chaldeans had among the Planets, two good, two bad, three of middle disposition. The Grecians, their Jupiter and Diu, and Hermionia begotten of Venus and Mercury. Empedocles called the one Friendship, the other Discord: the Pythagoreans call the good, One, bounded abiding right square, &c. The other, Duplicitee, infinite, moued, crooked, long, &c. Anaxagoras the mind and infinites; Aristotle, Forme and Priuation. Plato the Same, and Another. Hence appeareth how true it is, that the Natural man perceiues not the things of God, nor can know them: and hence grew the Manichæan Heresie.

All the deformitie and defect of things, Plutarch ascribeth to Typhon (whom they also called Seth, Bebon, and Smy, saith Pignarius) that which is good, to Osiris, and Isis first, to this the matter, to him the forme. In the Towne of Idjhyia they burned living men, whom they called Typhonians, scattering their ashes, and bringing them to nothing. This was openly done in Dog-daies. But when they sacrificed any of their sacred beasts, it was done closely, and at vncertaine times. According to which custome, Achilles Statius & frameth his Historie of Leucippe, sacrificed by Egyptian Robbers and Pirats, for expiation of their villanies, and protection against their enemies: the Rites whereof were, after some Hymnes sung by the Priests, to kill and rippe her, and hauing viewed and tasted the liuer, to burie her.

He that would further be acquainted with these mysteries, let him resort to Euclid and Plutarch. Jamblichus hath written a large Treatise, De Mysterys, wherethe more curious Reader may further satisfie himselfe. He mustereth in their ranks and orders, first the Gods, then Arch-angels, next Angels, then Dæmones, after them Heroes, Principalities and Soules in their subordinate orders. Marcellinus Ficinus doth thus dispose his Egyptian mysteries, or mysticall opinions of God. The first in order is Unum Super Ens. The second, Unum Ens, or Vnitatis Entis. The third, Intellectus Intellectus, Prima Libbon. The fourth, Emeph, the Captaine of the heavenly Deities. The fifth, Captaine of the workmen of the world, the vnderstanding of the soule of the world, called Amun, Phiba, Kulean, Osiris. But these wayes are too rough, cragged and thornie for a daintie traveller: they that will, may reade Jamblichus Proclus, Porphyrius, translated by Marcellinus Ficinus, Calixtus Calagagninus: hath also written a large Treatise of these Egyptian Mysteries.

Mercurius

Mercurius Trismegistus (so called, <sup>k</sup> because he was thrice greatest King, Priest, and Philosopher) was (saith <sup>l</sup> Lactantius) called Thoth or Thoyth, of whom they name their first moneth, acknowledging to have receiued their lawes and letters from him. Hee buile the Citie Hermopolis, and of the Saits was honored for a god. Of him also Augustinus De Cinitat. Dei, lib. 8. cap. 26. illustrated by the Annotations of Ysaie, will further acquaint you. Geoponici <sup>m</sup> from a speech of Iamblichus, That all sacred writings were ascribed to Mercurius Trismegistus, gathereth after his farre fetched fashion, that Trismegistus signifieth God in Trinitie and Vnitie (which he gathereth also out of the word Got, or God) and that no mortall man was intended by Mercurius, but God himselfe; called Thoyz, or Thent, as the head of all things, and that the small wisdom of God first taught men letters <sup>n</sup>. That the Egyptians were subdued by the Cymmerians, who came thither out of Phrygia, and changed their Religion, leaving them both their Hieroglyphicall Characters (wherein also were included mysteries of holy things) and their language, both which the Priests obserued in their Lyrgies and Deuotions. Diuine things were not meete to bee ascribed to men, and therefore all the bookes of their Diuinitie were ascribed to Mercurius, whose Image was a head ending in a square Statue, a resemblance of that diuine wisdom and constancy. They vsed to set vp these Images in the high wayes, therein engraving some good morall admonitions, for which cause they were called Mercuries and Hermes, as his Dutch Erymologies declare, Herman signifying nothing but a publike admonishing, and Merkmán, that which men ought to marke, and most diligently to attend. The like be doth in the names of Harpocrates, and other their Deities, some of them through ignorance from Hieroglyphikes (as the Emblemes of George, Christopher, and Margaret, amongst the Romists) becoming gods. Whether these things be true, or doctrine, for which Sachigor censureth Geoponici, I list not to determine, nor to fill these pages with store of matter of this nature from him, with whom the desirous Reader may himselfe finde entertainment: where he will shew the mysteries of their Pyramides to be the same as the fortis fons of the world, and obeliskes the Sunne, and other things more than the Egyptians themselves conceived. For how could they without helpe of Geoponici in Dutch?

Franciscus Patricius (as he hath taken great paines, out of Pselus, Iohannes Pico, and others, for the opening of the Assyrian, and Chaldean opinions, and hath collected three hundred and twentie Oracles, and sacred sentences of Zoroaster, so he) hath with lesse industrie published twentie bookes of a Hermes or Mercurius Trismegistus. He affirmeth, that there were two of that name, the one Grand-father to the other: the elder of which was counsellor and instructor of Isis, and the scholar of Nephthys. He had a sonne named Tot, which begate the second Hermes, which Hermes had a sonne also called Tot, by which likensse in name great confusion and unlikelihoode hath happened in Historie. This second Hermes (hee supposeth) lived in the dayes of Moses, but was some what more ancient. Both the elder and younger were Writers, as he sheweth out of their workes: and called Trismegisti, not for that hee was greatest King, Priest, and Philosopher, as Ficinus saith, nor for their cleare sentences touching the Holy Trinitie, but (as the French vse the word thrice, for the Superlative) as men thinke most excellent in learning. The same Patricius hath set forth three Treatises of Asclepius: of which name were three learned Egyptians, Asclepius Kleanis, inuenter of Physicke, Asclepius Imuthes, inuenter of Poetry, and another which had no surname, to whom Hermes dedicated some of his bookes: and the same Asclepius in the beginning of his first booke, calleth himselfe the scholler of Hermes. In the writings of these Egyptians, translated into Greeke, and explained by the Egyptian Philosopher, the Greeke Philosophers, especially the Platonikes and Pythagoreans, teach their Diuine, Morall, and Naturall Philosophy. Antiquitie and Learning hold no longer in these mens companies, the more curious may haue recourse to their owne Asclepius had more than thirty thousand bookes ascribed to Hermes: some say thirty six thousand five hundred and twentie five. He in his Asclepius, translated by Apuleius, thus writeth. Egypt is the Image of Heauen, and the Temple of the whole World. But the time shall come when

And no manuell, seeing that these gods were Idolls, the workes of mens hands, as himselfe after sheweth: and when as they could not make soules, they called, or contured into them the soules of Diuels or Angels, by which the Images might haue power to doe good or euill. <sup>a</sup> Lucien. de

Hus farre haue we launched out of this Historie, into their Mystricks. To returne to the relation of their Beasts and bestiall superstitions, Lucian <sup>a</sup> saith, That Apis represented the Celestiall Bull, and other beasts which they worshipped, other signes in the Zodiacke. They that respected the Constellation of Pisces, did eate no fish; nor a Goat, if they regarded Capricorne. Aries a heauenly Constellation, was their heuuenly deuotion: and not heere alone, but at the Oracle of Iupiter Ammon, <sup>b</sup> Strabo saith, That they nourished many, which they accounted sacred, but not gods. This nourishment, after <sup>c</sup> Diodorus, was in this sort: first they consecrated vnto their maintenance sufficient lands. Such Votaries also as had recovered their children from some dangerous sicknesse, accustomed to shauie their haire, and putting it in gold or silver, offered it to their Priests. The Haukes they fed with gobbets of flesh, and with birds caught for them. The Cats and Ichneumons, with bread, and milke, and fish: and likewise the rest.

When they go their Processions, with these beasts displayed in their Banners, every one falleth downe and doth worshipping. When any of them dieth, it is wrapped in fine linnen, salted and embalmed with Cedar and sweet oynments, and buried in a holy place, the reasonlesse men howling and knocking their breasts, in the exequies of these vnreasonable beasts. Yea, when famine hath driuen them to eat mans flesh, the zeale of deuotion hath preserved vntouched these sacred creatures. And if a Dog die in a house, all in that household shauie themselves, and make great lamentation. If Wine, Wheat or other food be found, where such a beast lieth dead, superstition forbiddeth further vse of it. Principall men, with principall meates, are appointed to nourish them in the circuit of their Temples.

They bathe and annoint them with odoriferous oynments. And they provide to euerie one of them a female of his owne kinde. Their dead they bewaile no lesse, then of their owne children: In their funeralls they are exceeding prodigall. In the time of Ptolemey Lagi, their Apis or Bull of Memphis being dead, the Keeper bestowed on his funerall, ouer and aboue the ordinary allowance and offerings, fiftie talents of silver borrowed of Ptolemey, that is, twelue thousand and six hundred pound of our money after the Egyptian talent, or after the Alexandrian, eightene thousand seven hundred and fiftie pound. And in our age, saith Diodorus, an eye-witnesse of these relations, some of these Nourishers haue bestowed an hundred talents on this last expence, which is twiue as much as the former. After the death of this Bull, which they call cal Apis, was made a solemne and publike lamentation, which they testified by shauing their heads, although their purple locks might compare with those of Nisus, saith Lucan and after his buriall were an hundred Priests employed, in search of another like the former; which being found, was brought to the Citie Nilus, and there nourished every dayes. Then they conueyed him into a close ship, hauing a golden habitation, in which they carried him to Memphis, and there placed him in the Temple of Osiris for a god. At his first comming <sup>f</sup> onely women were permitted to see him, who I know not in what hellish mystrie, lifting vp their garments, shewed him Namens secrets, and from thence-forth might neuer be admitted the sight of him. At his first finding, the people cease their funerall lamentations. At his solemne receiuing, in Memphis, they obserue a seuen-dayes festiuall, with great concourse of people. His consecration was done by one wearing a Diadem on his head. They made the people believe he was conceived of lightning. He <sup>g</sup> had a Chappell assigned to him, and called by his name. He was kept in a place enclosed, before which was a Hall; and in that another enclosed roome, for the Dame or Mother of Apis. Into this Hall they brought him, when they would present him to strangers. Psammeticus was the founder of this building, borne vp with collossees, or huge statues of twelue cubits, in stead of Pillars, and grauen full of figures. Once a yeare <sup>h</sup> he had sight of a female, chosen by especiall marks, and slaine the same day. On a set day, which he might not outlie, according to their rituall bookes, they drowned him in the bottome of a sacred fountaine: and then buried him as aforesaid, with much mourning. After this solemnitie it was lawfull for them to enter into the Temple of Serapis. Darius to curry fauour with the Egyptians, offered an hundred talents to him that could find out a succeeding Apis. Of this Apis, thus writeth <sup>i</sup> Augustine. Apis was the King of the Argiues, who sailing into Egypt, and there dying, was worshipped by the name of Serapis, their greatest god. This name Serapis was giuen him (saith Varro) of his funerall Chest, called in Greeke σέρapis, and from thence Serapis, as if one should say, Serofapis, after Serapis. It was enacted, that whosoever should affirme, that he had bin a man, should be done to death. Hence it is, that in the Egyptian Temples Harpocrates, an Image holding his finger on his mouth, is deemed a companion to Isis and Serapis, in token of concealing their former humanitie. Suidas <sup>k</sup> saith, that Alexander built vnto him a magnificent Temple, of which, and of this Serapis we shall largely declare in the next Chapter. Vines out of Nymphodorus saith, that this carcasie in that Chest, whereof the name Serapis was deriued; was of a Bull, got of a man. Eusebius <sup>l</sup> nameth two Kings called by this name Apis, one a Sicyonian, the other of Argos: the first more ancient; the other the sonne of Iupiter and Niohe, called after, Serapis. But Apolodorus <sup>m</sup> affirmeth him the sonne of Phoroneus and brother of Niohe. And therefore the Sicyonian King is more likely to be the Egyptian builder of Memphis: for the other <sup>n</sup> died in Peloponnesus, which of him was called Apis. Calius Calpagninus <sup>o</sup> affirmeth, that their Apis was but the symbole of the side of Osiris; and that Serapis is an Egyptian word, and signifieth ioy and mirth. But who can finde truth in falsehood, or certaintie in superstitious errors? The marks <sup>p</sup> of the true Apis were these; All his bodie was blacke, with a white starre in his forehead, saith Herodotus, or in his right side, saith Pliny, like vnto a horned Moone. For hee was sacred to the Moone, saith Marcellinus. On his backe he had the shape of an Eagle, a mark on his tongue like a Beetle. If such an one, might seeme to some impossible to be found, as no doubt it was rare, and therefore costly; Augustine <sup>q</sup> attributeth it to the Diuinitie working, presenting to the Cow in her conception such a phantasticall apparition; the power of which Imagination appeareth in <sup>r</sup> Iacobs example.

But what a beastly stirre haue we heere (mee thinkes I heare some whining Reader say) about beasts and Bulls? I answer that it deserueth the more full relation, both for the multitude of Authors, which mention something of this History; for the antiquity, and especially for the practise of the same superstition, <sup>s</sup> in Aarons and Ieroboams Caluities, after their returne from Egypt, the schoole of this Idolatry. Besides this Apis of Memphis, they in other places obserued others, as Mneuis a blacke Bull, consecrated to the Sunne, as Apis was to the Moone: with his haire growing forward, worshipped at Heliopolis; Bacis <sup>t</sup> another that was fained to change colour euery houre, at Hermunthus, besides Onuphis, and Menuphis other where. Thus by sinne beasts became gods, men became beasts, if this be not a baser degree of baseness to worship beasts, and in them diuells: to content themselves with meane houses, and neuer to be contented with the magnificence and sumptuousnesse of their Temples to beasts. Splendidissima cum lucis, & templa cum vestibulis & porticibus admirandis: introgressum autem videbis adorari solem, &c. That is, They haue glorious Chappels, with Grotes and stately Temples, with goodly gate-ways and porches: but when you are within once, you shall see nothing but a Cat (or some such Carrion) worshipped, &c. And even in this day in Cayro and other places of Egypt, they account it (according to their Mahometan superstition) no small point of charitie to be bountifull and liberall to birds which they will redeeme to libertie, and to Dogges, Cats, and other beasts, setting them meat, and good prouision at appointed times. As for the Camell that hath carried the Alcoran at Mecca in their Pilgrimage yee haue heard already, how religious they esteeme the touch thereof: Dowla saw the like at Constantinople, some plucking off his haire as holy reliques, some kissing him, some wiping off his sweate therewith to rubbe their faces and eyes; all entertaining him with frequent concourse, and at last eating his flesh, distributed into small parts for that purpose.

We are further to know, that although Egypt worshipped beasts, yet not all, the same: These only were vniuersally receiued: three beasts, a Dog, a Cat, a Bull: two fowles; the Hauke and the Ibis: two fishes; Lepidotus and Oxyrinchus. Other beasts haue their Sects of worshippers; as a Sheepe among the Thebans and Saits; the fish called Latus among the Latopolitans: a Cynocephalus at Hermopolis (which is a kind of great Ape or Monkie naturally circumcised, and abhorring from fish) a Wolfe at Lycopolis. The Babylonians neere to Memphis, worshipped a beast called Copus, resembling in the face a Satyre, in other parts, partly a Dog, partly a Beare: likewise other Cities, other beasts, which caused great dissention, whereof Immenal.

Strabo saw, in the nomus or shire of Arfinoe, diuine honor given to a Crocodile, kept tame in a certaine lake by the Priests, and named Suchus, nourished with bread, wine, and flesh, which the Pilgrimes that came to visite him offered. Now the Tentyrites, & those of Elephantina killed Crocodiles. And in the city of Hercules they worshipped an Ichneumon, a beast that destroyeth Crocodiles and Aspes, and therefore euen at this day of much estimation, as Bellonius obserueth, where you may see his description. These imagined that Typhon was transformed into a Crocodile. At Hermopolis they worshipped a Goat: and Goats had carnall mixture with women. The Ombites (more beastly) esteemed themselves fauoured of their Crocodile god, if he filled his paunch with the flesh and bloud of their dearest children, as Bulbi and others report of the moderne Inhabitants of Pegu, before related. King Menas built a Citie called Crocodile, and dedicated the neighbour-fenne to their food. They were as scrupulous in the vse of meats: some abstained from Cheefe, some from Beanes, some from Onions, others after their owne fancie. This multiplicity of sects is ascribed to the policie of their ancient Kings, according to that rule, Diuida and Rule. For it was not likely they would ioyne in conspiracie, whom Religion (the most mortall make-bare) had disioyned. At Coptus, where the holies of Isis were most solemn, there were (saith Ælian) store of great Scorpions, which presently killed such as they stung: but yet the women which there lamented Isis, no lesse then widowes the death of their husbands, or mothers of their children, and going barefoot, are neuer hurt by them. Hence they deuoted the male Goats to their bellies, the females to their goddesse. Haukes were consecrated to Orus or the Sunne, because they fly and looke directly against the Sun-beames: of this bird they fabled that it liued seven hundred yeares. They which will, may finde in that his tenth booke, the reasons of diuers other their beastly and faine deuotions, too tedious for this place.

They held Serpents in so sacred account, <sup>b</sup> that Osiris is neuer painted without them: and Iosephus <sup>c</sup> saith, That it was reckoned a happines (which I thinke few would enuy them) to be bitten of Aspes, as also to be deuoured of Crocodiles. Venemous was that old Serpent, which both here and in other Nations, then, and at this day, hath procured diuine honor to this first Instrument of Hell: As if he would thus exalt this trophie of his ancient conquest, in despite both of God and Man, in that Creature whereby man perished, and which God had cursed; except we will rather attribute it to a diabolish malice, or apish imitation of that brazen Serpent set up by MOSES <sup>d</sup> in the wilderness, the figure of Christ crucified, who brake this Serpents head. Jeremy the Prophet was stoned (some <sup>e</sup> say) at Tanis in Egypt, and was after worshipped of the Inhabitants there (such was their difference of Sects) for his present remedying the Stings of Serpents.

I thinke by this time, either my relation or their superstition is tedious: and yet I haue not mentioned other their gods, both stinking and monstrous. Loath am I to touch the waters for their deified Frogs, and Hippopotami, or play the scavenger, to present you with their Beetle gods out of their priuies: yea their priuies <sup>f</sup> and farts had their vsuauory canonization, and went for Egyptian Deities; lettice sutable to such lippes. So Hierome <sup>g</sup> derideth their dreadfull deitie, the Onion, and a stinking fart, crepitus ventris inflatusque Pelusiaca religio est, which they worshipped at Pelusium. Lesse brutish, though not lesse Idolatrous, was it in Ptolemæus Philopator, <sup>h</sup> to erect a Temple to Homer, in which his Image was placed, comely sitting enuironed with those Cities which challenged him for theirs.

Their sacrifices were so diuersified in their kinds, that Pencer <sup>i</sup> saith, They had six hundred threescore and six severall sorts of them: some they had peculiar to speciall gods, <sup>j</sup> as to the Sunne, a Cocke, a Swanne, a Bull; to Venus, a Dove; to the celestiall ignes, such things as held correspondent similitude. Besides their sacrifices of red men to Osiris, Busiris <sup>k</sup> is said to haue offered Thrasius (first author of that counsell), worst to the counsellor) thereby to appease angrie Nilus, that in nine yeares had not overflowed. They offered euery day three men at Heliopolis, in stead of which bloudie Lues Amasis after substituted so many waxen Images.

Thus were their gods beastly, their sacrifices inhumane; or humane rather too much: Other things they obserued of their owne inuention, framing to themselves deformed and compounded shapes, whose Images they adored. Such were their Canopi, swaddled as it were in clouts (so resembling Orms) with heads of Dogges or other creatures. Osiris <sup>l</sup> is sometime seene with the head of a Hauke, Isis with the head of a Lion, Anubis alway with the head of a Dog, and contrariwise beasts pictured with the heads of Osiris and Isis: monstrous mishapen figures, or mishapen monstrous mysteries.

They borrowed of the Iewes abstinence from Swines-flesh and circumcision of their males, to which they added excision of their females, still obserued of the Christians in those parts. Theodore testifieth <sup>m</sup> that Pythagoras received circumcision of the Egyptians, which they receiued of the Hebrewes. Ambrose <sup>n</sup> affirmeth, that the Egyptians circumcised both sexes at the age of fourteen years (as the Ismaelites at thirteene) because that then the lusts of copulation beginne to burne; which reason teacheth, to need circumcision; and therefore (it seemeth) they vsed it in those parts that are the seats and instruments of lust: and not either in regard of originall corruption, or the promised seed, which were hidden mysteries to their mysticall superstitions. It is like the Diuell would thus prophane this Diuine Sacrament of circumcision, as at this day in the Heathen Nations about Congo, & in Iucatan in America before the Spaniards came there. They so abhor Swine, <sup>o</sup> that if one by the way touch them, he presently washeth himself & his garments. Neither may a Swineheard haue access into their Temples, or marrie with their daughters. Yet do they offer Swine to the Moon & Bacchus (Isis & Osiris) when the Moon is at full. In this sacrifice they burne the taile, milke and lease: & (which on another day would be piacular) on that day of the full they eat thereof. Alian <sup>p</sup> giueth this reason of their hatred of Swine, because it is a gluttonous beast, not sparing the flesh neither of their owne yong, nor of men: as on the contrary they worship the Storke for her piety in nourishing her aged parents (that I speak not of their wed-locke chastitie, for breach whereof, Crollin <sup>m</sup> tells from the relation of an eye-witnesse, that in a wood neere to Spire in Germanie, the male complaining to a congregation of Storkes, caused them to teare his make in peeces). The Egyptians also had a conceit, that Swines milke would breed the Leprosie: and that Swine were beasts odious to the Sunne and Moone. He citeth out of Eudoxus that they spared them, for treading their seed into the ground, which was their harrowing and tillage, when Nilus had newly left the softened earth, to send these labourers, their Kine and Swine to tread in the mirie earth the corne which they sowed therein. The Egyptians <sup>n</sup> sware by the head of their King, which oath, whosoever violated, lost his life for the same, without any redemption.

The Priests in old time renowned for their learning, in Straboes time were ignorant and vnlearned. No woman <sup>o</sup> might beare Priestly function. These Priests might not eat eggs, milke, or oyle (except with sallads) they might not salute Marriners, nor looke vpon their children or kinsfolkes. They <sup>p</sup> washed themselves in the day-time thrice, and in the night twice: they were shauen, wore linnen garments alwayes new washed, were daily allowed sacred meats. <sup>q</sup> Of their ancient Priests, thus Du Barin singeth in Syluesters tune;

*The Memphian Priests were deepe Philosophers,
And curious gazers on the sacred Starres, Searchers of Nature, and great Mathematickes, Ere any letter knew the ancient Æt Attickes.*

Their Magicks skill appeared in Iannes and Iambres, which withstood Moses, and in Hermes testimonie of himselfe. R. Salomon on Exod. 8. writeth that Pharao said to Moses and Aaron, Doe you bring straw into Ophraim a Citie full of straw? and doe ye bring inchantments into Egypt which aboundeth therewith? Postellus deriueth the Egyptian and Orientall Sciences from Abraham, to whom he dares to attribute their diuinations by the Aire, Water, Fire, Earth, Birds: and allegeth Rambams authoritie, That the greatest part of the Alcoran is taken out of the Egyptian learning; and saith that Moses and Salomon studied the same, and expounded in Scripture what Abraham had taught them: to which also hee ascribeth the Iewish Exorcismes in casting out Diuels. But some Diuell, I thinke hath taught him so to commend these diuellish Arts, as he doeth no lesse the Alcoran, and the Iewes Cabala, calling them an excellent appendix to Moses, and both of I know not what magicall facultie, first infused into Adam in the partie of his Creation, and taught by the Angell Raziel, by him deliuered in verball tradition, written first by Henoch, the booke whereof Nimrod stole from Noah; which Abraham might learne either in that Chaldean Nation, or from Melchisedech. But let vs obserue these Priests further.

When they sacrificed, they made choice of their beasts by certaine religious marks: (a Cow they might not sacrifice, as consecrated vnto Isis;) they kindled a fire, & sprinkling water ouer the sacrifice, with inuocation of their god killed it, cut off the head, which either they sold to the Grecians, if they would buy it, or cast it into the River with imprecation, that whatsoeuer euil was imminent to them or their country, might be turned vpon that head. This ceremony <sup>r</sup> seems to haue come to them from the Iews. And they haue bin as liberal of their rites since the Catholikes (for so they will be called) as appeareth both by this relation, and by the testimony, not only of Moresinus (a Protestant, but Maginus, <sup>s</sup> Polidorus, Boemus & Beroaldus, Popish writers, although dandied ouer with new mystical significations, as in Bellarmino and other the purest Catholikes is seene. Their Priests <sup>t</sup> were their Iudges, the eldest of which was chiefe in pronouncing sentence. He wore <sup>x</sup> about his necke a Saphire jewel, with the Image of TAVT therein ingrauen. The Priests <sup>y</sup> of Isis, besides their shauings and linnen garments, had paper-shoes; on their heads, Anubis; in their hands a Timbrell, or a branch of Seawormewood, or a Pine-apple. They had one chiefe Priest, or Primare of Egypt, as appeareth <sup>z</sup> by Iosephus and Heliodorus, who maketh Thyamis to succeed his father Cala. Isis in this high Priest-hood at Memphis. Manetho also enioyed this Pontificall Hierarchie, archie, as appeareth by his Epistle to Ptolemy, which after shall follow. Philostatus speaketh of Gymnosophists, which some ascribe to India; Heliadotus to Ethiopia; a Philost. de vit. Apol. lib. 6. c. 3. Ethiopia and Egypt. These, saith he, dwelt abroad without house, on a hill a little off the banks of Nilus, where grew a Grove, in which they held their Generall Assemblies, to consult of publike affaires, having otherwise their studies and sacrifices apart, each by himselfe. Thebesion was the chiefe of this Monkish Colledge, when Apollonius after his visitation of the Babylonian Magi, and Indian Brachmanas, b Domitians impetratore. came thither. These held the immortalitie of the Soule, and accounted Nilus for a god. If a man at Memphis had by chance kild a man, he was exiled till those Gymnosophists absolved him. c Pius 2. Apha. d Pol. Vir. lib. 3.

Heracles Temple at Canopus was priuiledged with Sanctuary, to giue immunity to fugitiues, and malefactors: thus elsewhere, Oferis in Syria; Diana, at Ephesus; every Cardinalls house (saith a Pope) in Rome; Saint Peter, d at Westminster; and other Popish Oratories, priuiledged dens of theues. e Herod. lib. 3.

Their Feasts were many: of which, e Herodotus reckoneth one at Bubastis, in honor of Diana. To this place the men and women, at this festiuall solemnitie, sailed in great multitudes, with Minstrelsie and shoutings; and as they came to any Citie on the waters side, they went on shore, and the women, some danced, some played, some made a brawle with the women of the place: and thus resorting to Bubastis, they there offered great sacrifices, spending in this Feast more Wine, then in all the yeare besides. Hither resorted of men and women, besides children, seuen hundred thousand. In Busiris was solemnized the Feast of Isis, in which, after the sacrifice, many thousands beat themselves: but with what they did beat themselves, was not lawfull to relate. The Carians that inhabited Egypt, did also cut their foreheads with swords, signifying thereby, that they were foreigners. This Citie was in the midst of the Egyptian Delta, and in it, a very great Temple of Isis. A third Feast was at Sai, in honor of Minerva, where assembling, by night they lighted candles full of salt and oyle, and therewith went about the walls of the Citie: This solemnitie was called f Light-burning, or if you will, Candlemasse. This night they which came not hither, yet observed the setting vp of lights throughout Egypt. A fourth was at Heliopolis, in honor of the Sunne. A fifth at Butus, of Latomia, wherein only sacrificing was vsed. At Papremis was obserued the solemnitie of Mars, with sacrifices, but till Sun-set, onely a few Priests were busied about the Image: a greater number of them stood before the doors of the Temple with wooden clubbes, and over-against them about a thousand men that payed their vows, each with clubs in their hands, who the day before carried the Image out of a gilded Chappell of Timber into another sacred roome; those few which were chosen for the Idol-service, drawing a Wagon with foure wheelles, on which the Chappell and Image were carried. Those that stood at the Porch, forbade these to enter; but the Votaries, to helpe their god, beat and draue them backe. Heere began a great club-fray, in which many were wounded, and many (although the Egyptians concealed it) died of the wounds. The cause (forsooth) was, because heere was shruied the mother of Mars, to whom her sonne, at ripe age, resorted to haue lien with, but was repelled by her seruants: whereupon, he procuring helpe elsewhere, was reuenged of them. Hence grew that solemnitie.

On the seuenth day of the moneth Tybis (which answereth to our January and December) was solemnised the coming of Isis out of Phœnicia; in which many things were done in despite of Typhon. The Coptites then hurled downe an Asse from a steepe place, and abused ruddie men for this cause. They had h also, in their Bacchanall solemnities, most filthie Rites, in which being drunken, they carried Images of a cubite length, with the priue member of a monstrous size, with Musicke, accompanied with the elder Matrons. This yard, which they called Phallus, was vsually made of Figgetree, Herodotus * saith, That besides their Swine-Feast they obserued another to Bac- * Lib. 3. chus, without Swine, in like sort as the Grecians: in which, they had cubitall Images made of sinewes, or as Calins: readeth it, made to be drawne to and fro with sinewes or strings, carried by women. In the moneth Thoth (which most-whar agreeth to September) the nineteenth day k was holy to Mercury, in which they did eate Honie and Figs, saying withall, Truth is sweet. On the ninth day of this month they observed another Feast, wherein every man before his doore did eat roasted fish: the Priests did not eat, but burne the same. Before was mentioned the seeking of Osiris. This was an Egyptian Feast observed in the month Arhyr (which answereth somewhat to November) from the seventeenth day (in which they imagined that Osiris perished) four dayes were spent in mourning: the causes were foure; Nilus flaking, the Winds then blowing, the Dayes shortening, the Winter approaching. Heere is the Mystery unfolded. On the nineteenth day they went by night to the Sea, and brought forth a sacred Chest, in which was a golden Boxe, into which they poured water, and made a shout, That Osiris was found. Then they mingled the Earth with Water, adding Spices and costly Perfumes, and made an Image of the Moone, applying these mysticall Rites to the nature of the Earth and Water. About the Winter Solstice they carried a Cow seven times about the Temple<sup>1</sup>, in remembrance of the Sunnes circuit, which in the seventh month would be in the Summer Solstice.

The originall of Isis seeking Osiris, is before shewed. Some make Typhon the husband of Isis, which slew Osiris her sonne, or brother (as diuers diuersly esteeme him) for Incest committed with her, and cut him in peeces. Anubis her Huntsman, by helpe of his dogges, found out the peeces againe. This (saith Minutius <sup>m</sup> Felix) is resembled every year, Nec desinunt annis omnibus vel perdere quod inueniunt vel inuenire quod perierunt. Hæc Egyptia quondam nunc & sacra Romana sunt. Truly the Playes of Christ his Crucifying and Resurrection, which is observed in all Churches of the Roman Religion yearly, might seeme to haue had this Egyptian originall. Once, Inductus <sup>g</sup> gatorius hath cut out Vines Tongue, where he speaketh against them, as <sup>a</sup> before upon like occasion is noted. This Feast is also mentioned by Iulius Firmicus and others.

They had another Feast called Pamylia, of Pamyle the Nurse of Osiris, who going to fetch water, heard a voice, bidding her proclaime, That a great King and Benefactor was borne. On this holy-day was carried in Procession an Image with three stones, or (as Plutarch <sup>a</sup> saith) with a three-fold yard, in which beaustly Rite he findeth a foolish mysterie, not worth the telling: But I thinke this Feast of Feasts hath glutted euery man.

The Egyptians had many Oracles of Hercules, Apollo, Minerva, Diana, Mars, Iupiter, and others. The Oracle of Latona at Butys <sup>p</sup> Cambyse, That he should die at Ecbatana, whereby he secured himselfe for Syria, and yet there died, in an obscure Village of that name, whereas he had interpreted it of the great Citie in Media. Their Apis and Serapis were also esteemed Oracles. Anubis was deceived by the Oracle of Serapis, telling him of his death, which he construed of Libya, and fell out in a place of the same name in Bithynia. At Pelusium, if we may beleue Achilles Statius <sup>q</sup>, was the Temple, Image, and Oracle of Iupiter Cassius: and by an Oracle, he maketh Leucippus a Virgin to be appointed for sacrifice. At Memphis a Cow, at Heliopolis the Bull Minotaur at Arfinoe the Crocodiles were their Oracles. But it were too tedious to relate the rest. That the elder Romans entertained these damnable Egyptian holies, appeareth by the Temples, Chappels, Streets, Coines, dedicated vnto Isis, Serapis, &c. mentioned by Onuphrius, Rosinus, Victor, Fabrianus, Apianus, Amantius, and other Writers of Roman antiquities. Of Isis and Serapis were certaine publike places in Rome, named Iseum and Serapeum. Iosephus <sup>r</sup> relateth of one Paulina, a Noble woman of Rome, married to Saturninus, deuoted to the superstition of Isis, whom Decimus Mundus had solicited in vaine to dishonestie, notwithstanding the offer of two hundred thousand Drachmes (which comes to five thousand six hundred and twenty five pound) for one night: but with a quarter of that summe hee corrupted the Priests of Isis, one of which told Paulina that the god Anubis inflamed with her loue, had sent for her, which message was welcome to her, and to her husband not distastfull. Thus Mundus vnder pretext of Anubis, obtaining a nights lodging, meeting her three daies after, merily iested at her for sauing his mony, but not her honestie: whereupon Tiberius banished him, crucified the Priests, and rased the Temple, commanding the Image of Isis to be cast into Tiber. But these superstitions were reuiued soone after, Vitellius <sup>s</sup> the Emperour not refusing to weare a linnen religious garment openly in her solemnitie. Vespasian also Somewhat of the Egyptian inuentions. Husbandrie by ſome is aſcribed to them, but falſely, Adam, Cain, Noah, and others were in this before them. Aſtronomie alſo is not their inuention, but taught them by Abraham. Geometrie is more like to be theirs, driuen to ſeek out this Art by Nylus overflowing. Idolatrie to the Starres was firſt here practiſed (ſaith Lactantius) for lying on the rooſes of their houſes (as yet they doe) without any other Canopie then the Azure ſkie, firſt they beheld, then ſtudded, laſtly adored them: Gaudensius Brixienſis applyeth the deſtroying of the Egyptian firſt-borne, to the periſhing of Idolatrie through the light of the Goſpell: the Egyptians (ſaith he) being the firſt, which worſhipped the Images of dead men.

Magicke is alſo aſcribed to them; of whoſe timely profeſſors Iannes and Iambres are an inſtance. Phyſicke is fetched alſo from hence; and Writing, both after the vulgar ſort, as alſo that of the Priests, Hieroglyphicall, whereof Hieropallo an Egyptian, Pierius, Goropius, beſides Mercerus and Haeſebelinus, with others, haue written. Ælianus accounteth Mercurius the firſt inuenter of their lawes. But I am not of their mind. This Elogie or commendation is giuen them by Martial:

*Niliacis primum puer hic naſcitur in oris,

For no land elſe ſuch knaueerie can breed.

And Propertius:

Is noyſome, and a Connie-catching land.

We may here adde out of Flauius Vopifcus a teſtimonie of the qualities of the Egyptians. They are (ſaith he) inconstant, furious, braggarts, iniurious: alſo vaine, licentious, deſirous of nouelties, euen vnto common Songs and Ballads, Verſifiers, Epigrammatists, Mathematicians, Wiſards, Phyſicians both for Chriſtians and Samaritans; and alway things preſent, with an vbridled libertie, are diſtaſtefull to them. He bringeth alſo, for witneſſe of this aſſertion, Ælius Adrianus, who in an Epiſtle to Serapianus, affirmeth thus: I haue learned all Egypt to be light, wauering, and turning with every blaſt of fame. They which worſhip Serapis, are Chriſtians, and euen they which call themſelues Biſhops of Chriſt are deuoted to Serapis. No Ruler is there of the lewith Synagogue, no Samaritan, No Chriſtian Prieſt, which is not a Mathematician, a Wizard, a Chirurgion (or annointer of Champions.) This kinde of men is moſt ſeditious, moſt vaine, moſt iniurious: the Citie (Alexandria) rich, wealthy, fruitfull, in which none liues idle. Gowie men haue ſomewhat to do, blinde men haue ſomewhat to do, or haue ſomewhat which they may make; nor are the gowie fingered idle. They haue no God; him doe the Chriſtians, him doe the Iewes, him doe they all worſhip. I wiſh them nothing elſe, but that they may be fedde with their owne Pullen, which how they make fruitfull, I am aſhamed to tell. Thus much Adrianus.

The Pullen he ſpeaketh of it ſeemeth, are ſuch, as euen to this day they uſe to hatch (not vnder the Henne, but) in Furnaces of dung and aſhes, wherein thouſands of Egges are layd for that purpoſe. That which he ſpeaketh of the Chriſtians, is eyther of ſome Heretickes, or luke-warme Time-ſeruers to be vnderſtood: or elſe remember, that it was Adrian, an Ethnike, whoſe intelligence was from ſuch as himſelfe in thoſe times times hating the Christians; of whom, through blinde zeale of their Idolatrie, what did they? What did they not faine and deuise? Even more odious then here is expressed, as Ecclesiasticall Histories shew. The Iewes had given Adrian cause, by their Treasons to hate them; and flatterers opportunitie to belie them. Let him that loves me, tell my tale. But a man would marvell to heare Adrian blame the Egyptians so much for that, for which himselfe in Authors is so much blamed; namely, Superstition and Sorcerie. For he made Images of Antinous, which he erected almost in all the world, saith Dion. This Antinous was in high estimation with him (some thinke his minion :) He died in Egypt, eyther drowned in Nilus, as Adrian writeth, or (which is the truth) was sacrificed. For whereas Adrian was exceeding curious, and addicted to Diuinations and Magicall Artes of all kinds (in the hellish rites whereof was required the soule of such a one as would die voluntarily) Antinous refused it not, and therefore was thus honoured, and had a Citie in Egypt newly repaired from the ruines, and dedicated in his name. Yea, he reported he saw a new starre, which (forsooth) was the soule of this Antinous. The Greekes made a God of him, and a giuer of Oracles; whereof Prudentius singeth:

Ammianus Marcellinus ascribeth to the Egyptians a contentious humour, addicted to lawing and quarrells, Affuetudine perplexis litigandi semper latissimum. Their vanitie and superstition may further appeare by that which Diopantes recordeth of one Syrophanes, a rich Egyptian; who doting on his sonne yet liuing, dedicated an Image in his house vnto him, to which the seruants at any time, when they had displeased their Master, betooke themselves, adorning the same with Flowers and Garlands, so recouering their Masters fauour. Some make the Egyptians first inueners of Wine (which they say, was first made in the Egyptian Citie Plinthis) and of Beere, to which end they first made Mault of Barley, for such places as wanted Grapes. When a man proued more in shew then in substance (as hypocrites, whom the Truth it selfe calleth Whired Tombes) the Prouerbe tearmed him an Egyptian Temple, because those buildings were sumptuous and magnificent for matter and forme to the view, but the Deitie therein worshipped, was a Cat, Dogge, or such other contemptible creature. The naturall surie and crueltie vsed amongst the Egyptians, hath made them infamous among Authors, both Prophane and Diuine. And Stephanus Byzantinus saith that they which practised close, subtil, craftie, couenages were said Avyovulm, to play the Egyptians: Æschylus also the Greeke Poet makes them Mince-matters herein; and perhaps those rogues which wander ouer so many countries, and liue by their wits and thefts, were therefore called Egyptians.

But least I also should impose too cruell a taske on my more willing Readers, I will proceed to other obseruations. I haue heere in this Egyptian Relation of their Rites, Manners, and Mysteries, beene the larger, both because Authors are herein plentifull, and especially because Egypt hath beene an olde storer and treasurer of these mysticall Rites for that later vpstart, the Mysticall Babylon, in the West; which, as she is spirituall called Sodome and Egypt, so, like that strumpet mentioned by 9 Solomon, hath not a little decked her bed with the Ornaments, Carpets, and Laces of Egypt. Wiser were the Romanes of olde, which made diuers lawes to expell the Egyptian Rites out of their Citie, which the later Popes entertaine.

CHAP. V.

Of the manifold alterations of State and Religion in Egypt by the Persians, Gracians, Romans, Christians, Saracens, and Turkes: with the Egyptian Chronologie, since the beginning of that Nation till our Times.

THe last Egyptian Pharo was Psammetichus, vanquished by Cambyses, sonne of Cyrus the Persian, who quite extinguished that Egyptian Gouvernement, and much eclipsed their superstitious solemnities. For Cambyses proclaimed defiance, not to the persons onely of the Egyptians, but to their Gods also: yea, he set their sacred Beasts in the forefront of his battell, that being thus shielded by their owne devotion, he might easily ruinate the Kingdom. Such a disadvantage is Superstition to her followers, being indeed but a life-lesse carcasle of true Religion, which alway breedeth true Fortitude; as Ptolemy and the Romans vsed the like stratageme against the Jewes on their Sabbath, which (in it selfe a diuine Commandement) they construed to a superstitious Rest, a Sacrifice without Merce, wherein they might helpe their beasts, but suffer themselves, like beasts, to be ledde to the slaughter.

Cambyses hauing pulled downe their Temples in Egypt, intended: as much to the Oracle of Iupiter Ammon, in which exploit he employed fiftie thousand men, which (as the Ammonians report) were ouerwhelmed with a tempest of Sand. Other newes of them was neuer heard. Himselfe meane-while, meanelly provided of victuall for such an enterprise, made an Expedition against the AEthiopians; in which, Famine making her selfe Puruey for the Armie, fedde them with the flesh of each other; every man being allotted to this bloudie seruice. Thus with a double discomfiture altogether discomfited, he retireth to Memphis, where hee found them observing their festiuall solemnitie of the New-found Apis, and interpreting this joy, to haue proceeded from his losse, he slew the Magistrates, whipped the Priests, commanded to kill the Citizens that were found feasting, and wounded their Apis with his sword, vnto death. He practised no lesse hostilitie vpon their Obeliskes, Sepulchres, and Temples: The Sepulchres they esteemed Sacred, as their eternall Habitations: (and no greater security could any Egyptian giue vnto his Creditor, then the dead bodies of their Parents.)

The Temples, every where accounted holy, here were many, and those magnificient. At Memphis they had the Temples of Serapis, Apis, Venus, and the most ancient of them all, of Vulcan, with the Pigmei-Image of Vulcan in it, which Cambyses derided: of Serapis at Canopus, where Pilgrims by dreames receiued Oracles: at Heraclion, Sai, and Butis, to Latona; at Mendes to Pan; at Momemphis to Venus; at Necropolis, Nicopolis, and other places to other supposed Deities. Cambyses also burned the Images of the Cabyrians, and the Temple of Anubis at Heliopolis, whose stately building and spacious circuit Strabo describeth as likewise at Thebes.

They write, That after, as he was taking Horse, his sword, falling out of the Scabbard, wounded him in the thigh (where he before had wounded Apis) and slew him. In the time while the Persians enioyed Egypt, the Athenians, by instigation of Inarus King of Libya, inuaded Egypt, wonne Nilus and Memphis: but after sixe yeares lost all againe.

Ochus, one of his successors (called of the Egyptians, Asse) killed their Apis, and placed an Asse in his roome, which kindled such indignation in Bagoas an Egyptian, (one of his Eunuches) that he murdered Ochus, whom he hurled to be rent and torne of Cats, that this beast, sacred to Isis, might reuenge the indignitie offered to Apis. But this eclipse of the Egyptian superstition, caused by this Persian interposition, had an end, together with that Monarchie. For Alexander did not onely leaue them to their wonted Rites, himselfe: sacrificing to their Apis, and solemnizing Games in his honor, but added further glory to their Countrey, by erection of that famous Citie, named of him-himselfe Alexandria<sup>a</sup> (whereas some,<sup>b</sup> thinke the Citie No had before flood, destroyed by Nabuchodonosor) second in reputation to Rome, the<sup>c</sup> receptacle of Jewish, Grecian, and Egyptian Religions, adorned with his many Temples and Pallaces, Successors, Ptolomaeus Lagi (of whom the following Kings were all called Ptolomaei and Lagida) Philadelphus, Euergetes, Philopator, Epiphanes, Philomator, Euergetes the second Physcon, Lathyrus, Auletes the father of Cleopatra, whom Julius Caesar made Queene of Egypt (the price of her honestie) and Antonie his wife, whom, together with her selfe, her ambition overthrew, adding to the greatnesse of Alexandria, Plato's Philosophie was not only first borrowed of the Egyptians, but was publicly read at Alexandria as well as at Athens: which continued many ages. Sixe hundred yeares after his death Ammonius surnamed (of his former occupation being a Porter) Sacrus seemed to haue lighted on the bookes of Hermes, and thence learned the Doctrine of the Trinity: of whom his Disciples Ploimus and Aurelius write, and after them their Schollers Porphyrie and Theodorus Asineus; and their Auditours Iamblichus and Syrianus; to this last succeeded at Athens Proclus, Elycius, and after him the last of the greatest Platonikes Damascius: which haue written many thinges of the three beginnings.

The same Ammonius with like philosophicall happinesse found the Oracles of Zoroaster, which the two Julians the father and sonne, Chaldeans, translated out of their tongue into Greeke, in the time of M. Aurelius the philosopher. Pythagoras had before learned it of Zabratius in Assyria: which it seemeth Plato heard of the younger Archylus, and dispersed closely the seedes thereof in his Bookes, so that the elder interpreters conceived him not till the time of this Ammonius the Porter, from whom here (as from Socrates a Statuarie in Athens) flowed this Diuine wisdom. He taught at Alexandria in the dayes of Clement Alexandrinus about two hundred yeares after Christ, Origen was his hearer. Iamblichus comprehended these Oracles of Zoroaster in 30. Bookes or thereabouts: for Damascius citeth the 28.

The wealth of the Ptolomies reigning in Egypt appeareth by Strabo's report of Auletes his reuenues to bee twelue thousand five hundred Talents, which yet was counted dissolute and vnthrifitie. This by Mr. Brerewood is summed two millions three hundred thirtie three thousand and seven hundred and fiftie pounds of our money: Whereas the reuenues of Darius Hystaspis (accounted a hard man) is by Herodotus reckoned fourteenthou thousand five hundred and sixtie Euboike Talents, which makes 1820000. a great deale lesse summe, from that greater Empire. But they had other improuements. Alexander is said to spend more then this on Hephestions funerall, by fiftie five thousand pounds. Yea the Roman reuenues are by Plutarch summed at 8500. Myriades, which in our monie is two millions, sixe hundred fiftie six thousand, and two hundred and fiftie pounds, not hugely exceeding the Egyptian.

As for the deuotion there practised, wee may read in Ruffinus of the Temple and Image of Serapis in his time destroyed by Theophilus, successour to Athanasius, Bishop of Alexandria. This Temple was borne vp with Vault-work, with great lights and secret passages, the space of an hundred steps: on the toppe whereof round about were losie Roomes, in which the Keepers of the Temple, and they which made themselves chaste (Agnostes) remained. Within these were Galleries, or Cloysters, in squared ranks, and in the midst of all was the Temple, lifted vp on costly Pillars, and built of Marble. Post Capitolium nihil orbis terrarum cernit ambitiosius, saith, another: Except the Capitoll, the World hath not a statelier Peece. Here was the Image of Serapis, reaching with is right hand to the wall on one side, with his left hand vnto the other, being framed of all kinds of Wood and Mettals. It had on the East a little window so fitted, that when on a solemne day the Image of the sunne was admitted to salute this Serapis, the iugling Priests so obserued the time, that euen then the Sunbeames, through this window, should seeme to kisse Serapis. They had also another trick, by a Load-stone placed in the Roofe, to draw vp the yron Image of the Sunne, as if it did then bid Serapis farewell. The superstitious Ethnickes had a Tradition among them, That if euer mans hand did offer violence to that Image, the Earth should presently returne, and resolu it selfe into the first Chaos, and the Heaueus would suddenly daily fall. All this notwithstanding, a Christian Souldier dismembred the same, and burned Serapis openly, the Mice running out of his diuided trunk.

Rome (sayth Ruffinus) esteemed this Serapis to be Imper, and that hee ware a Measure (Modius) on his head, as he which governed all things in measure, or else did libally feed men with the fruites of the Earth. Others coniectured him to bee Nilus; others, Ioseph that fed Egypt in the seven decre yeares. Others thought him to be one Apis, a King in Memphis) who in the time of famine, with his owne store, supplied the peoples want: for which benefit they built a Temple to him after his death, where in they nourished an Oxe, in remembrance of him, whose Husbandrie and Tillage had nourished them. This Beast they called also Apis.

He mentioneth the Temple of Saturne, whose Priest called Tyrannus (vnder presence of *Saturne*s commaundement) would demand the companie of what Ladie he liked, to beare the God companie at night: which the husband did not much sticke at, esteeming it an honour to haue a God his corriuall. But Tyrannus shutting the woman into the Temple, by secret passes conueyed himselfe thither into the hollow Image of Saturne, in which he held conference a while with the woman, and after by a deuise putting out the lights, satisfied his lust in committing in the darke those workes of darkness, which after being brought to light, caused the Temples destruction.

They had Breast-plates of Serapis in every House, in the Walles, Entries, Posts, Windows; in stead whereof they after fastened Crosses. The Crosse in the Egyptian Mysteries signified life to come. They had a tradition, That their Religion should continue, till there came a Signe, in which was Life. And by this occasion many of their Priests were conuerted. Sozomen reporteth the same, That in purging of Serapis Temple at Alexandria, the Crosse, being found among other their Hieroglyphicks, was occasion of the conuersion of many vnto the Christian Faith. This Temple, and the Temple of Bacchus, were turned into Christian Churches. Olympius a Philosopher, with a companie of Seditious Ethnikes, fortified themselves in Serapis Temple, and caused many by force to sacrifice: and when the Christians burned their Images, he answered that the Images were but corruptible matter, but the Vertues, or Powers which inhabited Diuine them, were fled to Heauen. This I thought to mention for their sakes, who to their Image-worship haue borrowed the like Heathnish plaster. Isidorus addeth, That in destroying the Temples, they found Reliques of their bloudie Superstition, the heads of infants cut off, with the lips gilded.

The deuotion of Canopus was not inferiour to that of Alexandria. Here, through the subtiltie of the Priest, the Chaldzans were vanquished. For whereas they challenged their God Fire to be the strongest, as deuouring other Woodden and Mettal-Gods, he conueied an Earthen pot full of holes, which he had stopped with waxe and filled with water, into the Image: and when the Chaldzans made their fierie triall hereof, the Waxe melting, the Water issued, and quenched the fire. Hence it is that they made the Image of Canopus with feete and necke short, and a belly like a Barrell, or water-vessell.

Pausanias reporteth certaine miracles wrought at Alexandria by the instigation of Serapis: the curing of a lame and blinde man, whom that God had mooued to seeke this helpe at Vespasians hand; which hee also performed. Hee consulting with this Oracle, saw sodainely behinde him in the Temple one Basilides, whom by present enquire he found to lie sicke foure score miles thence in his bed. The name yet was an ominous signe to him of the whole Empire, as deriued of Basilis. The originall of this God is by some imputed to Ptolomeus Lagi, who hauing in Alexandria erected Temples, and instituted Religious Rites, seemed in his sleepe to see a tall young man, warning him to send into Pontus, to fetch thence his Image, sodainely after vanishing in a flame of fire. When the Egyptian Priests could not satisfie him in the interpretation of these things, Timotheus an Athenian, whom he had sent for to be chief Master of Ceremonies, willed him to send to Sinope, wherein was an ancient temple of Pluto, hauing in the Image of Proserpina. Ptolomey neglecting this; and with a second Vision terrified, sent to Scydrotbemis King of Sinope for the same; being (in the way) further herunto encouraged by the Delphian Oracle. Scydrotbemis protracting the businesse was by diseases and manifest anger of the Gods forced to assemble and perswade his people to suffer the carrying away of their God. But whiles they resisted this enterprise, the ambitious Idoll, without once taking leaue, conueyed him selfe into the Ship, which also, together with himselfe, hee made to arrive at Alexandria in three dayes, where was this Temple built to him, in the place wherein sometime had stood Isis Chappell. Some<sup>a</sup> esteemed him Æsculapius for his cures, some Osiris, some Iupiter, some Pluto, but Serapis was his Egyptian appellation. Ptolomeus c Philadelphus, his sonne, bestowed cost in that famous Librarie at Alexandria containing seven hundred thousand volumes, and amongst the rest he caused the Law; as Iosephus saith, as other hold, the Olde Testament wholly, to bee translated into Greeke by the seuerie and two Interpreters. This Librarie was by d Cæsars Souldiers casually burned. Cornelius Tacitus e relleth no lesse myracle of Memnons stonie Image at Thebes, or as others say, at Abidus, which being stricken with the Sunne-beame at the Sunne-rising yekded a vocall sound. This Image was halfe cut off by Cambyses: Pausanias f sayth that he saw it, and largely describeth it. Augustus, hauing destroyed Antonia and Cleopatra, brought e Egypt into a Prouince, and scowred all the Trenches of Nilus. Hee caused the bodie h of great Alexander to be brought forth, which hee crowned with a Crowne of Gold, and strewing with flowers, worshipped it. He built Nicopolis in memory of his Actian victorie: instituted there Quinquenniall Games: enlarged Apollos Temple: and consecrated the place where he had pitched his Tents, to Nepheus and Mars, adorning it with spoyles.

Onias i one of the Iewish Priests (according to the Iewish manner) literally interpreting Esaies k Prophecie of the Altar in Egypt, built a Temple at Bubastis in fashion of that at Ierusalem, but lesse, by the permission of Philometor, and furnished it with Priests and Levites after the Iewish Religion. At l Alexandria also the Iewes were free and had their Synagogues, as at Leontopolis likewise, and other places. m Præpianus saith, that Dioclesian the Emperour bestowed Elephantina and the partes adioyning on the Blemi and Nobata, whose Religion was a mungrell of the Greekish, Egyptian, and their own: but he caused them to cease humane sacrifices which they used to offer to the Sunne.

And thus was the state of Religion in Egypt during the conquests of the Persians, Greekes, and Romans, each rather seeking to settle heere their Empires then opinions. But when the Sonne of Righteousnesse, the Sonne of God, the Saviour of man, appeared in the world, he honoured Egypt with his infancy, as after with a Religious conquest, by weapons (not carnal) casting downe the holds which these hellish spirits had heere so long possessed; thus fulfilling truly what Esaie had prophesied, and Mercurius foretold. Alexandria became a Patriarchall Sea (the first Bishop whereof was S. Marke) enioying in Lybia, Pentapolis, and Egypt, the same power that the Roman Bishop had in Italy, by decree of the n first Nicene Counsell. Heere also liued the first Heremites (the o first and chiefe of which was Antony, an Egyptian, inuenter of this order) in the sandy Desert, by occasion of those bloudie persecutions wherein many thousand lost their liues. Of these Heremites read so, Cassianus and Seuerus Sulpitius de vita Martini. 3. But when as the Mahumetan Religion and armes began first to peep into the World, Egypt was made a slaue to those superstitions vnder which it groneth till this day.

These Saracens diuided Egypt into 3. parts; Errif, from Cairo to Rosetto; Assatid, the land part from Cairo to Bugia; Maremma, or Bechria, as Nilus runneth to Damiata. It was q subdued vnder the conduct of Hamrus the Sonne of Hafi General of the Arabian forces to Homar or Aumar the second Caliph. He onely exacted tribute, permitting freedome of their conscience to all. He built vpon the banks of Nilus a Towne called by the Arabians Fustat, that is, Tæbernacle because in the desert places, through which he passed, hee was constrained to lie in Tents. The common people call this Towne Mesre Hatichi, the Ancient Citie: for so it is in respect of Cairo, r which was after built two miles from hence, by one Geboar, who of a Dalmatian slaue had bin advanced to be a Counsellour vnto Elcain the Mahumetan Calipha, and was General of his Annie about the foure hundred yeare of their Hegira. Hee called it Elchabira, which signifieth an imperiall Mystress. He walled it round, and built in it that famous Temple called Gemeh Hashara as Hammur had done before at Fustato. In this Towne of Fustato standeth the Sepulcher of a famous Saint of their Sect, called Nafissa, of the line of Mahomet; whose beautifull shrine the Schismaticall Patriarches of Egypt adorned with silver lampes, carpets of silke and other precious ornaments. No Mahumetans cometh to Cairo eyther by water or Land but he adoreth this Sepulchre, and offereth thereat, in so much that the yearly oblations and almes heere offered for the redemption of the poore kindred of Mahomet, and maintenance of the Priestes that keepe it, (which want not their counterfeite miracles to delude the peoples zeale) amount to one hundred thousand Saraffi. And when Zelim conquered Cairo, the Ianisaries rising upon this Sepulchre, found in it five hundred thousand Saraffi in readie coyne besides other riches. Some report that this Nafissa being a dame of honour, yeelded her body without reward, to any that required the same, a bestowing (as she said) this almes for the loue of the Prophet Mahomet. Lettuce suitable to such lips: Like Prophet, like Saint. But Leo would haue you thinke her an honest woman. Fustato is reckoned as a Suburb to Cairo, containing (in Leo's time Anno one thousand five hundred twentie five) five thousand Families: besides many Sepulchres adored of the fond people, which cover the pavement with rich carpets. Hither resort euery Friday great multitudes for deuotion and bestow liberal almes: They heere sprinkle cold water with sweet herbes and leaue boughs.

Baumgarten saith that it was a common report in Cairo when he was there (which was about a hundred yeares since) that on the banke of Nilus was a Moskee, where in the time of their Orisons, the buried persons arose and stood still and after vanished: he thought it an illusion of the Deuill; I thinke some superstitious relaters slandered the Deuill herein. It was reported to him also, that the water in the Lake neere Nilus, once yere became red.

Bab is another Suburb of Cairo vpon the bankes of Nilus, of like distance, and hath in it foure thousand Families with stately Temples and Colleges. Beb Elloch standeth a mile from Cairo, and hath about three thousand Families. Gemeh Tailon was named by Tailon sometime Gouvernour of Egypt with a sumptuous Temple and Palace. Beb Zuaila, another Suburb, containeth twelue thousand Families. Cairo, it selfe within the Walls hath not about eight thousand families, and is full of stately and magnificent Temples. Here is an Hospitall built by Piperis, the first Soldan of the Mamalik: the yearly reuenues whereof amount to two hundred thousand Saraffi, or as some reckon, five hundred Ducats a day. It is open to all sicke and diseased persons, and heere to all that die there. The Plague is sometime so hotte at Cairo, that there die twelue thousand Persons dayly. This was the state of Cairo in Leo's time. Salomon Schuueighen affirmeth that at his being in Cairo Anno one thousand five hundred eightie one, there died daily betwene seven and tenne thousand; nor is any place more plagued with the French disease. Besides that Hospitall, and Nafissas Sepulchre, are three other famous, Zania della Innabari, Imamschafy, Giamalazar. This is the generall Vniuersitie of all Egypt. In this place, Anno one thousand five hundred threescore and six, in the moneth of Ianuarie, by misfortune of fire were burned nine thousand written bookes of great value, wrought with Gold, worth three or foure hundred Ducats a peece one with an other. This was interpreted as an ominous token of their ruine. They thinke also that Mecca will in short time be conquered by the Christians, and her deuotions shall be removed to Rosetto. Neander his conceit is ridiculous, that Cairo should hold as much people as all Italy, and that there are two hundred thousand Temples. John Euesham out of their owne registers numbereth but two thousand foure hundred: and though Cairo considered together with these Suburbs is great, yet is it not all the way continued with houses and buildings; but hath Gardens also and Orchards betwene.

Iudeus a Meggen reporteth that a man can hardly walke the streets by reason of the multitudes of people and beasts: they bring their water from Nilus into the Citie on Camels: on Mules, and Horses the chiefe men ride, and on Asses the poorer. They sell

Because they may not by their Law drinke Wine, they compound a drinke of dry raisons steeped in water and other mixtures; yea and secretly will make bolde with the former. He saith that (besides other calls from their steeples to deuotion) they ascend at midnight to call that the people may encrease and multiply, and therewith their Religion.

Beniamin Tndelenfis numbred in Cairo 2000. Iewes in his time (440. yeares since) in two Synagogues and Sects of the Hellenists and Babylonians. Hee saith that there then raigned in Misraim or Cairo Amir Almuhamin Eli sonne of Abitalib, all whose Subjects were called Morodim or Rebels, for their difference from the Bagdad Caliph. His Pallace was called Soan. And he came forth but twice a yeare, on their Easter solemnity, and then when Nilus ouerfloweth, which extendeth 15. daies journeyes when it ascendeth 12. The water of Nilus serueth for drinke and medicine against reptiles. Old Misraim (he saith) is 2. leagues fro new Misraim, but altogether wast. Baumgarten thinkes there are in Cairo 8000. which liue only by carrying water. And there are diuerse which eyther of their owne vow or bosome Testators charitie offer freely to all that will drinke in siluer vessels: and sprinkle the streets twice a daie because of the heat and dust. There are more in Cairo (hee reporteth such a rumour) which want houses to dwell in then Venice hath Citizens, There are esteemed to be 15000. Iewes. 10000. Cookes which carry their cookerie and boile it as they goe, on<sup>a</sup> their heads. In 9. or 10. houres one can scarcely compasse it. But you must know that this was in the time of the Soldan before the Turke had conquered it.

Alexandria<sup>b</sup> is very vnholosome, as the graue of that Alexandria<sup>c</sup> we before mentioned. Vnder the foundations are great habitations, as if they were two Alexandrias built one vpon another. Vnder the houses of the Citie are cisterns sustained with mightie Arches to recieue the inundation of Nilus. When the Saracens had spoiled it, it remained long desolate vntill a subtle Caliph proclaimed that Mahomet had left great indulgences to such as would heere inhabit. And thus he replenished the Citie with inhabitants, building houses for them, as he did Colleges for the Students, and Monasteries for the religious. Heere yet remaineth a little Chappell, wherein they say that the high Prophet, and King Alexander<sup>c</sup> the great lies buried: to which resort many Pilgrims that adore the same, and bestow there their almes. The Arabians and their Alwan also call Alexander Two-borned, the reason whereof seemeth to bee that his ambitious seeking to be accounted the sonne of Iupiter Ammon: neyther doe the vulgar Arabians know him by the name Alexander, but by that title of Two-borned. And such was his Image in the Cyrenaike coynes. In old time they had a custome mentioned by<sup>d</sup> Galen of executing condemned persons which they would quickly dispatch; to apply to the brest an Aspe, and then cause him to walke a few pases: and suddenly he is at his long home. This he there saw: a practise nor much vnlike the Athenian draught of Hemlocke. There is in Alexandria (as Mr. Euseham relateth) a pillar of Marble called by the Turkes King Pharaos needle, 4. square, in height 90. foot. And without the said citie 400. pases; another round, called Pompeys pillar, standing on a square stone 15. foot high: the compasse of the pillar is 37. foot, the height 101. causing no small wonder how it should be erected on that stone. This haply was set vp in memory of great Pompey, who by the Egyptian treachery was slaine at Pelusium, almost in the sight of Ierusalem (as Eberus noteth) and that Countrie of the Iewes which hee had vniuently wronged and subdued to Romane seruitude; although his hands were purer touching the holy places and treasures, which his curious eyes would needs behold, then those of periured Craesus, which before had suffered deserued vengeance by Parthian execution. Iodocus a Meggen<sup>e</sup> saith that the chanel which bringeth water from Nilus cometh 50. miles: the cisterns which receiue it are as you haue heard: and it is thought (as this our Author affirmeth) that those parts of Alexandria which the ground hideth, cost more then that which is open to the view. Yet doe these cisterns now much decay. The Citie sheweth faire without, but within (they are Baumgartens words) like a heape of stones: few houses are whole. There is yet standing (where Alexanders Palace is thought sometime to stand) an Obeliske of red marble of exceeding height, with hieroglyphicall characters of beasts and other things. Beniamin Tudelensis speaketh of a faire building without the walls in his time, called Aristotels Schoole, wherein were publick Schooles, and betwene them marble pillars: sometimes much frequented (as he saith, but I thinke, deceiued) to heare Aristotels reading. He mentions Vaults a mile long. He found there three thousand Jewes.

Thebes that sometime was so famous a Citie, containeth not now above three hundred Families: and still retaineth some bones of the carcasle of olde Thebes, many Pillars, Walls, inscriptions in Latine, Greeke, and Egyptian Characters. Memphis; her next successor, is vtterly ruinate. The Mahumetans entred Egypt about Anno 647. After, their state sinking vnder the weight of it selfe (which is the ordinarie sickness of greatnesse) they grew to dissensions and sects, as is said in our Saracen Historie. For the state of the Saracenicall Caliphs being by Macamat remoued to Bagdar, which he had builded, there arose new Caliphs in Damasco; in Egypt (whose seare was after at Cairo:) in Cairoan, to whom the Africans yeelded subiection, and after at Marocco. But in Elcamis time, while he sought to win the East from the Caliph of Bagdar, his Lieutenant rebelled against him, & he was faine to liue in Egypt, where Gebbar had builded Cairo. The sect of Hali had before also preuailed in Egypt, for which cause Yussuf father was forced to flee the countrey, yet this sect after was restored by Affandulus, and Solimus his sonne, first Caliph of Egypt. But when the Westerne forces, vnder Goffrey of Bullen, grew terrible to the East, & the Egyptians paid tribute to the Christians, which Dargan the Sultan detayning, was by Almericus King of Ierusalem overthrowne in battell. Noradine of Damasco sent Saracen his sonne to helpe Sauar the Sultan against this Dargan, which Saracen was by the Caliph appointed Sultan, who before had slain the Sultan, and Saladine his successor slew the Caliph (for coming to him with pretence of doing him reuerence, he smote him to the ground with an Iron Mace) and rooted out his posteritie to settle his owne. This Historie is diuersly reported. Peucerus maketh the Egyptian Caliphs to be Schismaticall from their first entrance, which was (as he saith) in Anno 703. which raigned in Egypt foure hundred fortie and seuen yeares, of the profession of Hali. Curio writeth otherwise, as in their Historie we haue shewed. So also doth Leo dissenting from them both, a man leaped in his owne Religion. He saith that the Caliph of Cairo had continued two hundred and thirtie yeares, when as Saladine slew him, and subiected himselfe to the Caliph of Bagdar the onely Caliph then remaining. This Saladine was nephew to Satwan, who chased the Christians out of Syria: His children reigned after him, of which Melechala was last, who first inuented the order of the Mamalukes, which were Christian slaues bought in their youth, and trained vp to Armes, Arts, and Religion of the Saracens, whom he made of his guard. But they slew their Master, and vnrped the Kingdom to themselves, alwayes electing one of their company, the first of which Mamaluke Kings was Turquemenius, who was slaine of his fellow Corbus, and he of Benloder, who was also poisoned, &c. Leo saith, that Saladines family reigned 150. yeares, and Piperis was (saith he) the first Mamaluke King. Campson Gantius, and Tomaspian, the last of these Kings were overthrowne by Zelim the Turke, Ann. 1517. whose successors still holde Egypt, and haue a Bassa resident at Cairo, from whence was carried by water many ornaments to Constantinople. The Caliph as at Bagdar, so here retained some spirituall preheminance, much like the Rex sacrorum amongst the Romanes, whose title was royall, and his office in their superstitious ceremonies to performe those rites which the Kings had vsed personally to doe: but this titulare King was subiect to higher powers of the Pontifex, People, & Senate. Baumgarten saw him in white attire with a forked Diadem or Mitre, a blacke and long beard, with a great retinue coming to salute Tongobardinus a great Mamaluke (which sometimes had bin a Deacon in Spaine, and now had embraced the world, and the world him, possessing Honours, Wealth, and five and thirtie Wiues) in Cairo. Peter Martyr saith that the Caliph selleth the Soldan this Dignitie at a price, and ascending the Throne, dooth giue and commit vnto the Soldan there standing on foote, the absolute power of life and death, and then descending disrobed himselfe, attiring the Soldan with the same robes. So it appeareth, that the name and power of the Caliph, all the time of the Mamalukes (as the Ghost of a selfe) had some almost breakeable shadow left: the life and substance being in the Soldan.

u Example for Christians, in ending Controuersies of Religion.

There is (saith Leo) in Cairo, and in all Egypt foure Sects, differing from each other in Canon and Ciuill laws, all Mahumetans. He which professeth one of these Sects, cannot at his pleasure betake him to another, except being learned he shew reasons therefore. Each of these sects hath his peculiar Iudge, from whom yet lieth an appeal to a higher Iudge, being gouernour of the sect called Essafichia. Whosoever attempteth ought against the precepts of his owne sect, is secretly punished by the Iudge thereof.
And although the Priests of these severall sects vse differing Liturgies and rites, yet doe they not take one the other for enemies, with hatred or mutinies: but if any question arise, learned men by conference debate the same. No man vpon paine of grie-uous punishment may reproch any of the foure Doctors, first authors of those sects.
There is one sect of religious men in Cairo, called Chauisia, which liue vpon horse-flesh: therefore are some Iades bought and set vp a fasting, and sold to such Chauisians, which sect is rise in all Asia. There goe certaine women vp and down the Citie crying, whose office is to excise or circumcise the women, which is obserued in Egypt and Syria, both by the Mahumetans and Iacobite-Christians. Neyther haue the Turkes (although in superstition by themselves acknowledged short of the Arabians and Egyptians) bin altogether idle in their deuotion, which they testifie by their Pilgrimages, and Almes. workes. Bellonius telleth of one Turke that caused water to be brought daily on Camels backs for the ease of trauellers in that desert space betwene Alexandria & Rosetta. Egypt hath in it many Iewish Synagogues, who speak the Spanish, Italian, Turkish, Arabian, and Greeke languages, and are great Merchants. Wee haue had amongst vs Vagabonds, which call themselves Egyptians, the dregs of mankinde. Of these Egypt is selfe hath, no lesse forreine to them then to vs. They wander (saith Bellonius) through all the Turkish Empire, and are cunning in Iron-works. They seeme to be Christians of Wallachia. Thus we see the iudgements of God by the Po-fisians, Gracians, and Romanes for their pristine Idolatrie: and a greater iudgement for their heresie, hatched by Arius, punished by a Saracenicall Apostasie.

x Good works
among Turkes.

y Leo l. 3.

Amongst the differing sects of the Mahumetans (of which wee haue spoken in the third booke) Africa, and especially Egypt, & herein Cairo most of all is pestered with them, which may be called the naked, or the wicked sect, roguing vp and down naked, and practising their fleshly villany, in the open sight of the people, who yet holde them for Saints. The iust hand of diuine iustice, that when men forsake God, not Religion and Truth alone, but reason, but sense shall also forsake them.

also mentions this actiuijie of the Mاماlukes.

Before we leaue these Soldans of Cairo, or rather because you haue stayed so long here, let vs bestow some spectacle on you worthy the sight, as a refreshing to your wearied eyes. They are the same which the Soldan in ostentation of his magnificence made to the Turkish Embassador, Ann. 1507. from Banngartens relations, which was an eyewitness therof. There were assembled 60000. Mamalukes all in like habite: the Soldan himselfe all in white, with a mitted Diadem, and not far from him their Pope or Chap-pha in a lower seat: and beneath him the Turkish Embassador. The place was a spacious plaine, in which were three heaps of sand, fiftie paces distant, and in each a space erected with a marke to shoot at, and the like ouer against them, with space betwene for sixe horses to runne abreast. Here did the younger Mamalukes gallantly adorne, vpon their horses running a full career yeeld strange experiments of their skill, not one missing the marke, first with casting Darts, & after with their arrows, as they ran: and lastly trying their stauces. Others after this, in the like race of their running horses, shot with like dexterie diuers arrowes backwards & forwards. Others in the mids of their race alighted 3. times, & (their horses stil running) mounted againe, & hit the mark peuertheles. Others did hit the same, standing on their horses thus swiftly running. Others
3. times vnbent their bows, & thrice again bent them whiles their horses ran, & missed not the mark: neither did others, which amidst their race, lighted down on eyther side, & again mounted themselves: no, nor they which in their swiftest course leaped & turned

themselves backwards on their horses, and then (their horses still running) turned themselves forwards. There were, which whiles their horse ranne, vngirt their saddles, and at each time shooting, and then againe girding their saddles, and neuer missing the marke. Some sitting in their saddles leaped backwards out of them, and turning on their heads, settled themselves againe in their saddles and shot, as the former, three times. Others laide themselves backwards on their running horses, and taking their muzzles put them into their mouthes, and yet forgot not their ayme in shooting. Some drew out their swords, & flourished them about their heads, and againe sheathed them. Others sitting betwixt three swords on the right side, and as many on the left, thinly clothed, that without great care every motion would make way for death, yet before & behinde them touched the marke. One stood vpon two horses running very swiftly, his feet loose, and shot also at once three arrowes before, and againe three behinde him. Another sitting on a horse neyther bridled nor saddled, as he came at every marke arose and stood vpon his feete, and on both hands hitting the marke, fere downe againe three times. A third sitting on the bare horse, when he came to the mark lay vpon his backe: and lifted vp his legges, and yet missed not his shoot. After all this they ran with like swiftnesse (for all these things, which, where is the Vaulter that can do on his imaginarie horse standing still? these did running) and with their staves carried away those marks, as triumphing over their innocent enemy. One of them was killed with a fall, & two fore wounded in these their feats of actiuitie. They had an old grey man which was their teacher. If I haue long detained thee in this spectacle, remember that the race of Mamalukes should not be forgotten, the rather, because their name is now rased out of the world; and this may seeme an Epitaph on their Sepulchre, after whom none perhaps are left able to doe the like.

As for the Christians in Egypt, yee may reade in the Histories of the Holy Land, what attempts were often made by the western Christians against the Egyptianes. Concerning the present state of Christianitie there, Leo, Baserus, and Mr. Pagninus in his additions to his Englished Leo, may acquaint you. Besides, the forraigne Christians, which resort to these parts for trafficke there, are thought to be fiftie thousand Native of the countrey, which haue Churches, and Monasteries, whereof there are three Christian Churches at Alexandria. They are called Coptic, and Christians from the Gellie, because of their Circumcision, which together with Baptisme they admit. In their Liturgie they vse the Chaldean language. But they reade the Gospell againe in the Arabian. They are accounted of Eutiches heretic. Their Patriarchall See is Alexandria: which from S. Marke to this day hath had a continued succession, as appeareth by the late Letters of Gabriel to the Pope, calling himselfe the fourescore and fiftieth of the Patriarches from Saint Marke. Thus writeth Baronius with a great many swelling wordes, which may puffe vp his Romane Sea. But how credulous is superstition? and that neuer-eyring Sea hath (how often?) bene gulled this way, or sought to gull and couzen others with such Iesuiticall fictions of I know not what conuersions and submissions, as Baronius would make you heleeue of this Gabriel. Thus had Mahomet his Gabriel, and thus our age hath another Gabriel obtruded vpon the vulgar simplicitie: (faire fetched belike is good for their Lady-mother). But Alexandria hath knowne no Gabriel in those times, Patriarch there. George Donsa held a good acquaintance with Meletius, and his predecessor was Saluaster; so that this Romane Gabriel which ascribed so much to that Sea, was a Romane Gabriel indeede, which Alexandria neuer knew. Neyther did Asterius the Patriarch know any such Popall Supremacie, but writeth learnedly against the same, as in an Epistle of his to Iohn Donsa (wherein he maketh mention of our English Embassadour) extant with George Donsas Journall may appeare.

How Christian Religion was first planted in Egypt by S. Marke, and the Apostles, and their successours, and how persecuted by the Ethnikes: after by the Arrians; and how Ethnike Religion was againe by Valens permitted to all that would embrace it, the fore-named Ecclesiasticall Histories make mention: how it was persecuted by the Persian inuasions, and after by the Saracens in time brought to this present passe, and how it now continueth, wee may reade in many both old and new Authors.

Zaga Zaba an Ethiopian Bishop saith, that the Patriarke of Alexandria resideth in Cairo: wheretheir Ethiopian Metropolitan receiveth of him his confirmation. And in their Aethiopian Liturgie, they mention them both in this sort. Pray for our Prince, the Prince of our Archbishops, the Lord Gabriel, and the chiefe of the Church of Alexandria, and for the chiefe of our country, our venerable Archbishop Mark, &c. And thus much of this Egyptian Prelate, as a taste of that which is to be declared in our Christian Relations. Adrianus Romanus,<sup>e</sup> in his Theatrum Vrbinum saith, that besides the Patriarch of the Coptites, here is also a Patriarch of the Greekes and Ambians, which haue their Liturgie in Greeke, but scarce vnderstand the same.

CHAP. VI.

The Egyptian Chronologie, out of Manetho high Priest of the Egyptians, and others.

FTER this so long a Historie of Egyptian affaires, I haue heret added the order of times, wherein those things happed, that this our Relation might be the more complete, although perhaps it may seeme to some more then tedious alreadye. Varro diuided times into three sorts; the first he called Vncertaine; the second Fabulous; the third Historicall.

Joseph Scaliger, a man happily more studious in this subiect of Times, then all Times before haue yeilded vs, reckoneth the two former for one, as not easily to be distinguished. He hath also published to the world not onely his owne learned Observations on Eusebius Chronicle, but such Fragments as our of Cadrenus, Synellus, and others, he could finde both of Eusebius Chronicle in Greeke (for before we had onely the Latine Translation of Hieronymus; much whereof also is vterly lost) as also of Africanus, from whose store-house Eusebius tooke his Chronicle, both for manner and words, almost by whole sale. And whereas Ammius had before couensened the world with counterfeits of Berosus, Manetho, Metasthenus, with other fabulous tales, falsely fathered on the Ancients; he hath helped vs likewise to some reliques of those Histories, which others haue inserted into their workes; the very bones of such carcases being worthy of admiration if not of veneration. The true Manetho therefore in three Tomes wrote the Egyptian Historie vnto Ptolemaeus Philadelphus: his Greeke Epistle Dedicatorie being but short, I haue thus translated:

To the Great King Ptolemaeus Philadelphus Augustus, Manetho High Priest and Scribe of the sacred Sanctuaries throughout Egypt, of the Sabennite Family, a Heliopolitan, to my Lord Ptolemaeus, Greeting. It becometh vs (mightie King) to giue account of all those things which you comsell vs to search out. The sacred Bookes, written by our father Trismegistus Hermes, which I haue learned (according as you, enquiring what things shall come to passe in the world; haue commanded me) shall be declared: Farewell my Lord King.

Hence appeareth the time of Manetho, and his Pontificall dignitie, with the originall of his Antiquities borrowed of Hermes, and the occasion of his writing in the Greeke, as to a Grecian King.

h Patricius out of a holy book
setteth downe
this Genealogie:
He saith the
sonne of Osiris,
he of Chus, and he of Cham or Chamephes.
i Egyptian Dynasties.

He first setteth downe the yeares of the raignes of their Gods. Vulcan, Sol, Aethiopian, Saturnus, Osiris and Isis, Typhon. Then of the demi-gods: Orus, who raigned five and twentie yeares: Mars, three and twentie: Anubis, seuen and twentie: Hercules, fourteene: Apollo, foure and twentie: Ammun, thirtie: Tisboos, seuen and twentie: Isis, two and thirtie: Iupiter, twentie. Things both false in themselves, and in the Copie imperfect. After these he reckoneth in order two and thirtie Dynasties, Lordships, or gouernements in Egypt.

The first of the Thinites; of eight Kings, whose names and yeares of raigne are, Menes, threescore and two: he was slaine of an Hyppopotamus, or River-Horse. Athotus his sonne, seuen and fiftie. He built a Pallace in Memphis, and wrote of Ambrosius. Cemicenes his sonne, one and thirtie. Enophis, his sonne, three and twentie. In his his time was a great famine. He built the Pyramides in Cochon. Saphadu, his sonne, was called: Sumempis, his sonne, eightene: Biencher, his sonne, six and twentie. Sum, his sonne, two hundred threescore and three. Of Menes, the first of these, it is reported * that he first invented the vse of mony: for which long after he was solemnly cursed by a Councell of Priests in the time of Cnephatus, and at Thebes a pillar was erected in the Temple to testifie the same.

Summe, three hundred and two.

6 The sixt of the Memphites. Othos, thirtie: Phios, three: Methusaphis, seven: Phios, a hundred: Menthesuphis, one: Nitochris, twelue: these built the third Pyramis.

7 The seuenth of seuentie Kings, that raigned so many dayes a peece.

8 The eight of seven and twentie Kings, which raigned an hundred fortie and eight yeares. Their names are not expressed.

9 The ninth Dynastie was of the Heracleopolitans: of which were nineteene Kings, that raigned foure hundred and nine yeares. The first of them was Achibors a small Tyrant, deuoured by a Crocodile.

10 The tenth was of nineteene Kings: whose raigne endured an hundred fourescore and five yeares.

11 The eleuenth of the Diospolitans: whose sixtene Kings raigned three and fortie yeares. 22 The two and twentieth, of the Bubastites: Sesonchis, one and twentie: Vorshu, fiftene. The third, fourth, and fift, are not named: to them are ascribed five and twentie yeares: In this space Zara the Ethiopian over-ranne these parts. Takelothis, thirtene: his successor, two and fortie: in all, one hundred and fiftene.

23 The three and twentieth of the Tanites: Petubastes, fortie: Osorchos, eight: Psammet, ten: Zs, — one and thirtie: in all, fourescore and nine.

24 The foure and twentieth, of Bocchoris the Saite, who raigned foure and fortie yeares, was raken and burned of Sabbakon.

25 The five and twentieth, of the Ethiopians: Sabbakon, eight: Seuech, foureteene: Tarach, eightene: in all fortie. This Tarach perhaps was he which built Tarracona in Spaine, if we belecue Taraphas * Collection out of Ensebins.

26 The six and twentieth, of the Saites: Stephambates, seven: Necbepss, six. Thus fare out of Manetho: heere followeth out of Herodotus; Psammetichus, fortie foure: Nechus, seuentene; he slew Iofias: Psammetichus, sixtene: Vaphres, five and twentie; with him Zedekiah entered league. Herodotus calleth him Apries. The Masorites, by their Hebrew points (through ignorance of forren Historie, as Scaliger saith) haue made it Hophra, of whom Ieremie <sup>d</sup> prophecied that destruction which Amasis executed (as Herodotus reporteth) who raigned foure and fortie yeares. The summe of the yeares of this Dynastie is one hundred fiftie and nine.

27 Heere followeth againe out of Manetho: The seven and twentieth Dynastie of the Persians: Cambyses, foure: Darius Hystaspes, six and thirtie: Xerxes, twentie: Artabanus, seven moneths: Artaxerxes Longimanus, fortie: Xerxes, two moneths: Sagdianus, seven: Darius Nothus, eleuen: in all, one hundred and thirtene.

28 The eight and twentieth, of the Mendefians: Amyrtæus Saites, six.

29 The nine and twentieth, Nepherites, six: Achoris, twelue: Psammetichus, one: Nepherites, two moneths.

30 The thirtieth, of the Sebennites: Nektanebis, eightene: Tes, two: Nektanebis, eightene.

31 The one and thirtieth, of the Persians: Artaxerxes Ochus, ten: He reeouered Egypt in the seuenteenth yeare of his raigne: Artaxerxes, foure: Darius Codomannus, six: subdued by Alexander. Hitherto Manetho. The whole summe of whose one and thirtie Dynasties amount to five thousand three hundred fiftie and five yeares.

32 The two and thirtieth Dynastie, of the Macedonians: Alexander Mag. five. Ptolemæus Lagi, fortie: Ptol. Philadelphus, eight and thirtie: Ptol. Evergetes, six and twentie: Ptol. Philopator, seuentene: Ptol. Epiphanes, foure and twenty: Ptol. Philometor, five and thirtie. Ptol. Evergetes 2. nine and twentie: Ptol. Physcon, seuentene: Ptol. Alexander, ten: Ptol. Cleopatra, eight: Ptol. Dionysius, thirtie: Cleopatra, two and twentie: in all, three hundred and one. Some of these Ptolemæys made incestuous marriages with their owne sisters; which it seemes was not vnusuall in Alexandria: whereupon Seneca scoffeth, Athenis dimidium licet, Alexandria totum. Whereupon Turneb. affirmeth, that at Athens they might marry their own sisters by the father (as Lycurgus permitted onely the sisters by mothers side, and forbad to marry with the fathers daughter) but at Alexandria, all sisters were permitted to their licentious beds.

mothers, who have cited some parts of Manetho in their works, it is not much marvell; the Grecians being alway audacious, ready to pervert Authors to their own purposes; besides the oversight of Writers, through negligence or ignorance in forgetting names. Neither is Manetho word an Oracle, who reckoneth so long time before any time was: but either it is to be ascribed to the arrogancie of the Egyptian Priests, who if they had beene agreed) derive their Histories from like Antiquities (saith Scaliger out of Synecerus) which would better appeare if we had the entire bodie, and not a few scattered bones of their Histories: or else we may ascribe it to their confounding of Dynasties, applying to an order of Succession, the divers reignes of severall Dyna-sties, which happily governed at the same time in severall parts of Egypt, as in so small an Island as Crete. Neither yet is Scaliger to be blamed for acquainting the world with these fragments of Manetho, considering that the middle part thereof heldeth the Egyptians deuised otherwise to Herodotus and Diodorus: it was easie for them to deceive strangers, or be deceived themselves. The like Historie of prodigious Antiquities, Augustinus relateth of an Egyptian Priest, that told Alexander of the continuance of the Macedonian Kingdome eight thousand yeares, whereas the Grecians accounted but foure hundred and fourescore. Yea, the Scriptures themselves have not escaped that mis-reckoning of Times; almost all Antiquities being carried downe the stream of the Seueritie Interpreters, which adde many hundred yeares to the Hebrew Text, either of purpose, as some suppose, or as Augustinus thinketh, by error of him that first copied the Scriptures out of Ptolemys Library.

That which we reade of the Dynasties of the Shepherds, Scaliger interpreteth of a barbarous sort, which Moses saith were ahimian to the Egyptians, and seeme to have bene strangers, that inhabited some Fenny places which Nature had fortified, if we beleue Heliodorus, and thence made forrages into the Countrey (the custome of Borderers) and were called therefore Robbers. These (it seemeth) driuen to their (by the hard and tyrannous vsage of the Egyptians, procured (as we reade of the same) their owne freedome, and thraldome of their Lords. The Romans in their time were forced to maintaine a garrison against them, therefore called avallari. And Isidorus mentioneth the Bucalia, where no Christians dwelled, but only a fierce Nation, who lived in servitude, and neuer raigned there. Lydius supposeth the Philistines vnder
Amalech and Phicol to be the men.

Nothing is more obscure in the Egyptian Chronologie, then the time of the departure of the Israelites thence vnder Moses, whom Iustin Martyr affirmeth out of Diodorus to have bene the first that wrote the Egyptian Lawes. Tatianus a Pris, for (who after became an Heretike) saith (and allegeth Ptolemy Mendesium, a Priest, for his author) that this departure was in the dayes of Amasis King of Egypt, who lived in the time of Inachus. Theophilus and Iosephus out of Manetho, in the raigne of Tahuti; Ensebius in the raigne of Cenebras Ceryanus, saith Petisonius: Others otherwise, according to the diuers interpretation of Manetho. The Scripture sheweth it was after foure hundred and thirtie yeares, from the promise first made to Abraham, and that I know both elder and later, Graeke and Latine Chronographers, except Gendard and Adrichomius, reckon it. Lydius thinketh that the drowning of the Egyptian Pharao was the cause of those tumults in Egypt, about Succession, which ascribed to Egyptus and Danau. Orosius reporteth, that the priests of the Charon wheels of the Egyptians, then pursuing the Israelites thorow the Sea, did yet in the same so disorders but that Divine Providence doth re-imprint them in their won-derfull forme.

Hard it is to applie the yeares of the Egyptian Chronologie, to the true account of the Worlds Generation, by reason of the disagreement of Authors, touching the Egyptian Kings, vntill Sesac's time: which (after Lydius) was in the yeare of the World 2029. although even from hence we have but slippery footing. Augustus (after the same Author) made Egypt a Province, in the year 3875. Under which Roman government it continued until the Saracens conquered it, in the time of Omar the third Chalipha, who began his reign, after Scaliger's computation, in his Catalogue 7 of the Chaliphaes, in the year of Christ 643. The names of the Casars belong to another place, and it were tedious here to relate the years of their severall reigns, Omar the fourth Chalipha began in the year of Christ 645. whom the rest succeeded in order, until the year 869. And then the Chaliphaes were divided. Mutamed reigning in Bagdet, and Tolon in Egypt, who died in the year of Christ 883. and of the Hageira 270. whom succeeded Hamaria his sonne: and after him his sonne Athorn, whom Muchtaphi the Bagdet-Chalipha slew, about the year 907. Afterwards, about the year 943. Achhid Muhammid sonne of Tangi reigned in Egypt, to whom a few years after succeeded his sonne Abigud, whom Meaz Ladin Illabi of the posteritie of Pbetima, Mahumets daughter, deprived in the year of our Lord 971, to whom succeeded his sonne Aziz, 975. * Elbacham, in the year 996. Eisab Ladin Illabi, 1020. Muhter atzor Billabi, 1035. Musleale 1095. Elamir Bahacem Illabi 1101. he was but five years old: the Protector of the Kingdome was Aphraza Wizar. Ethaphit Ladin Illabi 1135. Eisaphar succeeded, and he being slaine, Elphaz, who died in the year 1160. and Eisaxar Ladin Illabi his sonne was the last of the Pbetimian race. To him succeeded Asaredin Sbir at boch of the family of Aiub (which were Curdi) after his death Insaph tzelat addin was constituted King by the Chalipha: and the Bagdet Chaliphaes were againe acknowledged in Egypt. This is that Saladin that tooke Jerusalem, in the year of Christ 1190. Heg. 586. He conquered Mesopotamia, &c. he died in the year of our Lord 1193. And as Cardinall Vitriaco affirmeth, reduced the schismaticall Sect in Egypt, to uniformity with the Baldac Chalipha. Elaphizal succeeded him in the Kingdom of Damascus, Melich Elaziz in Egypt, Taber Giani in Halep, or Aleppo; Melich Elaziz exchanged Egypt for Damascus, with his vnkle Eladel. The Egyptians made Aphrazal their King, in the year of our Lord 1202. After Eladel succeeded Elchamel 1219, who died in the year of our Lord 1237. Heg. 635. Elisaboch followed; and after him Elmutam 1242. The Turkemen conspired against him; he fled into a Tower of wood, which they fired; and halfe burned, he leaped into a stream that passed by, and there perished: Turcoman Azeddin Ibib was made King in his place in the year of our Lord 1245. Heere began the reign of the Mamelukes or Slaves. He being slaine, another slave succeeded, whom they called Melich Elmutaphar. This seemeth to be he that Leo calleth Piperitis. Thus farre out of Scaliger, collected by him out of Abraham Zacuthi, which addeth much light to the Egyptian Historie of these times, wherein I could never before satisfie my selfe concerning the erection and alteration of the schismaticall Egyptian Chaliphaes, which with much labour (little availing) I had sought. Iacobus à Vitriaco Bishop of Accon or Ptolemais about foure hundred yeares since, and a Roman Cardinall, in his Orientall Historie * affirmeth that Haly, disdaining to be accounted the successour of Mahomet, whom he thought inferior to himselfe, began a new sect of his owne, which he established in Egypt, the other Mahumetans erecting another at Baldac; but Baldac was of a later erection, and these things have no probabilitie.

These Kings were not called Chalipha's (as the posteritie of Pbetima or Fatima the Sultans. A certaine catalogue of the names, times, and affaires of these Mameluke-Sultans, I cannot perfectly exhibite. Pencerus * nameth in order these names; Turkumensin, Cothus, Bendocader, Melechsaif, Elpis, Melechseraph, Melechnasar, Melechdel, and after many others, Caithbeius, a stout enimie of the Turkes b. This Caithbeius was chosen Sultan, in the year of our Lord 1465. and reigned three and thirtie yeares. Two of his principall Mamelukes Achardin and Campson, full of emulation, were a principall cause of the ruine of that Dynastie. For whereas the Sultan was alway chosen out of the Mamelukes, by most voices amongst themselves, Campson fearing lest Achardin should have succeeded after Caithbeius, fained that his Master had taken order on his death-bed, that his sonne Mahomet should obtaine the roome: and sed meanes to effect it, both by the voyces of those Mamelukes he could suborne, and confirmation of their Calipha, whose hornes these Soldans had shortned, abridging his power, (as before is said.) This Mahomet proued so cruel a Tyrant, and those two Malalokes so banded themselves in factions, that all became confused, and within fixe yeeres after Caithbeius his death the Sultan Throne was fixe times vacant. Tomumbeius his Mahomet: Camsons Ciarchesius is chosen. Zanballat, President of Damascus, rebelleth, and by Tomumbeius meanes imprisoneth him, and vsurpeth the Scepter: but for his crueltie soone after is depriued and captiued by Tomumbeius, and after, strangled; Hee also succeeding in authoritie, tyrannie, and destinie.

After Tomumbeius, was elected Camson Gaurus, whom Zelim* the Turke ouerthrew, and slew in battell, in whose place an other Tomumbeius was chosen: but soone, together with his whole state, came into the Turkes power. Thus being diuided in many factions among themselves, and exercising all cruelties and pillages vpon the people, they made themselves a prey to their neighbour, who like Æsops Vulture, watched this opportunitie to seize on these Lions, hauing now bled out their strength in mortuall and ciuill conflicts, in the yeare of our Lord 1517. The Egyptians affirme that a little before Selim besieged Cairo, for the space of eight dayes together, a great number of Crocodiles were seene in all parts on the bankes of Nilus, and much dispersed abroad in the fields, taking and tearing great store of prey, as a preface of this Turkish seruitude. Soliman succeeded, in the yeare of our Lord 1519. or 1520. (as others say.) Selim the second 1566. Amurat the third 1574. and in the yeare 1595. Mahomet the third, to whom Achmet, who now is the Egyptian and Turkish Souldan. Of these you may bee more fully informed in Master Knolles his Turkish Historie, as also in our former relations.

Of the Oracle of Iupiter Ammon; and of Cyrene: and the Regions adioyning.

LL that lieth betweene Africa Minor and Egypt, <sup>c</sup> Pomponius Mela doth call Cyrenaiica, including vnder that title Marmarica, which Pliny reckoneth by it selfe: who also calleth the former Pentapolitana, and saith it is renouwed by the Oracle of Hammon, which is fiftie miles distant from Cyrene, by the fountaine of the Sunne, and those fixe Cities, Berenice, Arfinoe, Ptolemais, Apollonia, Cyrene. This is now called Barca and Mesima of which, this is inhabited, and rich: the other is most what desert, and poore: Their Religion was like the Egyptians in times past. The Arabians, that liue there now attend on their purchase being the greatest theeces in Africke. But this is vsuall to the Arabians in all places of their abode, or wandring rather, for which cause, it seemeth, Hierom saith the word Arabi signifieth theeces, and is therefore taxed of Dryfus in his Observations: Arabi no therwise signifying theeces, then Chananeus a Merchant, or Chaldzus a Mathematician: because such commonly were their studies and courses. Berenice was sometime sacred, famous for the garden of the Hesperides, neare to which is that Riuer of Lethe so much chaunted by the Poets. Nigh to this place also are the Psylli, a people terrible to Serpents, and medicinable against their poysons both by touching the wounded partie, and by sucking out the poyson, and by exchaunting the Serpent.

The Oracle of Iupiter Ammon is famous among the Ancient. The place, where this Temple was hath on euery side vast and sandie Desarts, in which they which trauelled, as we find in Arrianus and Curtius, seemed to warre with Nature. For the Earth was covered with sand, which yeelded an vnstable footing, and sometime was blowne about with the windie motions of the Ayre; Water was hence banished, neyther clouds nor springs ordinarily affording it. A fiery heate did possesse and tyrannize ouer the place, which the sands and Sunne much encreased. Neyer was here tree, or hill, or other marke for Travellers, to discerne their way, but the starres. Desart, was that sacred Groue (which Silius Italicus calleth Lucus fatidicus) notable with holesome springs, seasoned with temperate aire, and a continuall spring. The inhabitants, called Ammonians<sup>1</sup>, are dispersed in Cortages, and haue the midst of the Groue fortified with a triple wall. The first munition containeth the Kings Pallace; the second, the Serail or lodgings for his women, where is also the Oracle; the third the Courtiers inhabit. Before the Oracle is a Fountaine, in which the offerings were washed before they were offered. The forme of this God was deformed with Rammes hornes crooked, as some paint him: according to Curtius, without forme of any creature, but like a round Bosse, beset with Jewels. This, when they consult with the Oracles, is carried by the Priests in a gilded ship, with many silver bells on both sides of the ship. The Matrons follow, and the Virgins singing their dis-tuned Procession, by which they prouoke their God to manifest what they seeke. These Priests were about fourescore in number. Alexanders ambitious Pilgrimage to this Oracle, is sufficiently knowne by the relations of Curtius and Arrianus. This wee may adde out of Sealiger,<sup>2</sup> That after that, the Cyrenzans to sooth this proud King, which would needs be taken for the sonne of Ammon, stamped his shape in their coynes, with two hornes of a Ram, and without a beard: whereas before they had vsed the forme of Iupiter with a beard and hornes; wherein the other Easterne people followed them. The Syrians vsed the like stampe with the name of King Lyfimachus, which Sealiger (who hath given vs the pictures of these coines) thinketh to be Alexander.

Rammes hornes are said to be ascribed to him, because Bacchus wandering in these desarts with his Armie, was guided to this place by a scellie Ramme. Likewise Paufanias<sup>3</sup> in his Messenica saith, that one Ammon (which built the Temple) a shepherd, was Author of this name to their God. Plutarches<sup>4</sup> reason of Amms we haue before shewed. Others<sup>5</sup> deriue this name from Amu the sand; which may well agree with all Idolatrous deuotion, as being a sandy foundation, although it is here intended to the situation. But that which I haue before noted of Ham the sonne of Noah foundeth more probable, as being Progenitor of all these Nations; and of this minde also is Peucer. This, Strabo in his time saith was not in request, as no other Oracle besides. For the Romanes contented themselves with their Sibills and other diuinations. This Oracle was not given by word, but by signes. This defect of Oracles in generall, and especially of this, occasioned that Treatise of Plutarch<sup>6</sup> of this subiect, enquiring the cause of the Oracles sayling. Neuer had he read that the Gods which had not made beemen and earth should perish out of the earth: nor had he eyes to see that Sunne of Righteousnesse, the light of the world, whose pure beames chased and dispersed these mists of darkness. And therefore are his coniectures so farre from the marke, as not able with a naturall eye to see the things of God. The antiquitie of this Oracle appeareth, in that Semiramis came to it, and inquired of her death; after which, the Oracle promised to her diuine honours. Besides this Groue,<sup>7</sup> there is another of Ammon, which hath in the middes Well, they call it the fountaine of the Sunne, whose water at Sun-rising is luke-warme, and cooleth more and more till none, at which time it is very colde: and from thence till midnight, by degrees exchangeth that coldenesse with heate, holding a kinde of naturall Antipathy with the Sunne, hottest in his furthest absence, coldest in his nearest presence. Plinie and Solinus place this fountaine in Debris, a Towne not very farre from those parts amongst the Garamants. Lucretius mentions it, and Philosophically disposeth the cause thereof,

nimirum terra magis quod

Rara tenet circum hunc fontem, quam cetera tellus.

Multaq; sunt ignis prope semina corpus aquae &c.

The substance whereof is, that the fire, vnder that subtile earth by colde vapours of the night is pressed and forced to that waterie refuge, but by the Sunne beames receiving new encouragement, forsaketh those holdes and holes, and for a little while takes re-possession of his challenged landes. The Ammonian women haue such great breasts,

that

that they suckle their children ouer their shoulder; their breast not lesse, if Inuental be beleued, then the childe;

In Meroe crasso maiorem infante mamillam.

In Meroe, the monstrous Pappe
Is bigger then the childe in lappe.

Pausanias reckoneth an Ammonian Inno among the Libyan deities, as well as Pausan. lib. 3. this Iupiter. He addeth, the Lacedemonians had this Ammon in much request, and built to him diuers Temples, as at Gytheum one, which had no rooff: and the Aphyrians did him no lesse worship then the Libyans.

Orellius who hath bestowed a Description of this Temple, supposeth that his Image was painted with hornes; but that Umbilicus was accounted the Deitie it selfe, or the signe of his presence, which shapelesse shape hee samplere by many like in other Nations. The Shippe he coniectureth to signifie, that the Religion was brought from some other place. But if Ammon bee that sonne of Noah, it might rather bee a memoriall of the Arke, wherein Noah and his sonnes were preserved: as that also of Iesus, (who is imagined to bee Noah) may more fitly be interpreted, then according to the Poets Glosse:

Hospitis aduentum testificata Dei.*

Pub. Quidam.

So well-dispos'd Posteritie did frame

A ship, to shew which way their strange God came.

The ancient frugalitie of the Cyrenians is commended in Authors*. Sulpitius bringeth in Positumianus, in his Dialogues, telling, That landing there by force of weather, hee went with the Priest vnto the Church, which was verie homely, couered with base twiggess or boughes, not much better then the Priest (their hoste) his Tent, in which a man might not stand vp-right. Enquiring after the disposition of the people, they learned, that they were vtterly ignorant of buying and selling, of fraud and stealing. They neither had, nor cared to haue, Gold or Siluer; and when hee offered ten peeces of Gold to the Priest, he refused it: onely was content to accept a little payment.

The Hammientes are not much distant in place, or differing in name, from the Ammonians: which build their houses of Salt, digging the salt-stones out of the Mountaines, which they with morter applie to their buildings. Mela ioyneth to these aforesaid the Atlantes, which curse the Sunne at the setting and rising, as bringing damage to them and their fields. A practise not vnlike to the women of Angola at this day, who (as Andrew Battle, my friend, told me) salute the new Moone when they first see her, by holding vp their hinder-parts naked against her, as the cause of their troublesome menstruous purgation.

These Atlantes haue no proper names, nor feede of such things as haue life. Hee nameth of the Garamantes, that they had no wiues, but liued in a beastly community. The Augila acknowledge no other Gods but Ghosts, or Soules departed, by which they sweare; with which they consult as Oracles; to which they pray at their Tombes, receiuing answers by dreames. The women the first night of marriage are prostituted to all that will see them, the more the greater honour, but after, must obserue their owne husbands. The Troglodites dwell in Caves, and feede on Serpents, and rather make a sound or noyse, then humane voyce: they vsed Circumcision: they named not their children by their Parents names, but by the names of sheepe, or other beastes which yeeld them nourishment. Their wiues and children (saith Agatharchides) are common: onely the Kings wife is proper; yet if any had been with her, his punishment was but the losse of a sheepe. In their Winter they liue on ploud and milke which are mixed and heated together at the fire. In their

Summer

Summer they kill the scabbed and diseased of their Cattell. They entitle none with the name of Parents, but the Bull and Cow, the Ramme and Ewe, and the male and female of the Goates, because of these they receiue their nourishment, and not from their parents. They goe naked all but the buttockes. Such as want that skinn which others circuncise (καλοῦσι) they deprive of the whole flesh, so farre as the circuncision should haue extended. Their funerall rites were, to tye the necks of the dead to their legges, and couer them with heapes of stones, setting a Goats horne on the toppe, with laughter rather then mourning. Their old men which can follow the flockes no longer, they strangle with an Oxe-tail, which medicine they minister likewise to those that haue grievous diseases, or maimes. And vnto these doth Pliny adde the Blemmyes, with faces in their breasts; the Satyres, Egyptians, Himantopodes, and other monsters, scarce worthie relation or credit. These parts I haue thus ioyned in one Discourse, as liuing (for the most part) a wilde life, as the Arabians and Tartars doe at this day; and for Religion hauing nothing notable that I finde, but as you haue heard. Procopius writeth of the Blemmyes and Nobatz, that Iustinian placed them in Egypt, about Elephantina; that they before obserued the Greekes Deuotions, Isis also and Osiris, and Priapus, and sacrificed to the Sunne; which Rites the Emperour prohibited. But he mentions no such monsters as you haue heard. The Arabians which vnder Elcam about the foure hundredth yeare of their Hegera gaue a ducat a man to passe into Africke, are Lords and inhabitants of the deserts to this day, liuing (as wee say) a Dogges life, in hunger and ease, professing Mahumets Sects.

The Adrimachida lived neare to the Egyptians both in situation and custome. The Nasamones had many wiues, with which they had company publicly. The first night of the marriage, all the guests had dealing with the Bride, and rewarded her with some gift. The Gnidanes had a more beastly custome; whose women glorying in their shame, ware so many fringes of leather as they had sound Louers. The Marlyes ware the haire on the hinder part of their head, as the Iaponians now doe. The Ames vsed the contrarie: whose Virgins in the yearely Feast of Minerva, diuided themselves into two companies, and skirmished with stauces and stones. If any Virgins died of the wounds, they accounted them false maidens. The most martiall Vitrigo of the company, they arme and crowne, and place in a Chariot, with great solemnitie. They vsed not marriage, but had women in common: the childe being reckoned his with whom she chused to liue. To adde a word of the Cyrenians, they held it vnlawfull to smite a Cow, in honour of Isis, whose Fasts and Feasts they solemnely obserued: and in Barca they abstained both from Beefe and Hogges flesh. They feared the crownes or temples of their children, to prevent the distilling of the rheume.

In their sacrificing, they first cut off the eare of the beast, as first fruits, and hurled it ouer the house. Their gods were the Sunne and Moone. The Maxes shaued the left side of their heads, leauing the haire on the right side. The Zigantes feede on Apes, whereof they haue plentie.

The Megauares make no account of Sepulchres, in stead whereof they couer the corps with stones, and set vp a Goats horne on the stone-heape. They haue many skirmishes for their pastures, which are ended by the mediation of old women, who may safely interpose themselves, and end the fray (or battell, if you will so call it.) When men are so old that they can no longer follow the herds, they strangle him with a Cowes tayle, if hee will not preuent them by doing it himselfe. The like medicine they administer to such as are dangerously sicke. Of the Masa, Calim thinks the Romane Priests borrowed their shauen crownes. Other things which our Authors adde of these people and others adioyning, as seeming too fabulous, I list not to expresse.

CHAP. VIII.

Of that part of Barbarie, now called the Kingdomes of Tunis and Tripolis.

LL the Tract of Land, betweene Atlas and the Sea (stretching in length from Egypt to the Straits) is <sup>a</sup> called Barbaria, either of Barbar (which signifieth to murmur) because such seemed the speech of the Inhabitants to the Arabians, or of the word Bar, which signifieth a Desert doubled. It comprehendeth <sup>b</sup> both Mauritania's, Africa Minor, Libya Exterior, besides Cyreniaca and Marmarica, whereof we haue spoken. The Inhabitants some fetch from Palestina, some from Arabia. It was conquered by the Romans, and taken from the Greeke Emperours by the Vandals, and from them againe by the Saracens and Arabians, and is now partly subiect to the Turke, partly to the Xeriffe. It is vsually diuided into foure Kingdomes, Marocco, Fesse, Tremisen, and Tunis; for of Barca is said alreadie. The Cities of Barbarie (it is Ios. Scaliger * his testimonie) speake Arabike, but not pure, nor yet so degenerate as the Italian is from the Latine: but the Countrey-people vse the old African tongue, nothing like the other.

The Kingdome of Tunis containeth all that which the Ancients called Africa Propria, or Minor, and Numidia Antiqua. The Soyle is fertile, especially the West-part. The Inhabitants are sound and healthfull, seldome vexed with any sicknesse. Hereof are reckoned fise parts; Bugia, Constantina, Tunis, Tripolis and Ezzab. This Ezzab is the most Easterly part, hauing many Townes and Regions, amongst which, some account Mefraa. From these parts vnto Capes, is the Tripolitan Region. The chiefe Towne is Tripolis, wherein the Great Turke hath his Bassa, or Vice-roy, a receptacle of the Pyrates, which roue and rob in those Seas; in the year 1551. wonne from the Knights of Malta by Sinan Bassa. From Capes to Guadilbarbar is the Tunetan Territorie. From thence vnto the Mountaine of Constantina is that Region, hereof bearing name: and from thence <sup>c</sup> to the Riuer Maïor, about an hundred and fiftie miles space, doth Bugia curren it selfe, so called of Bugia <sup>d</sup> the principall Citie, sometime adorned with Temples, Hospitals, Monasteries, and Colledges of Students in the Mahumetan Law. Here is also Necaus, a very pleasant Citie; and Chollo, very rich. Constantina is an ancient Citie, containing eight thousand families, and many sumptuous buildings, a great Temple, two Colledges, and three or foure Monasteries, much resorted to by Merchants. Euery trade hath their peculiar streets. A little from the Citie is a hot Bath, hauing in it abundance of Crab-fishes, or little Tortoyfes, which the women take for euill spirits, and ascribe vnto them the cause of their sicknesse, or ague, if any befall: and therefore kill white Hennes, and set them on an earthen vessell, with their feathers, enuironing the same with little waxe-candles, and so leaue them neere to this Bath, or Fountaine. How euer it fare with their Feuer, their meat shall not stay long, but some or other that see the womens deuotion, will enuie the euill spirits so good cheare, and for that time will be the spirits themselues, to dresse and eat their prouision. Not farre hence is a Marble building, with Images grauen therein: the people haue a conceit, that it was sometime a Schoole, and those Statues the Schollers, by diuine iudgement so transformed for their wickednesse.

In this Region is situated Bona, sometime called Hippo, famous through our Christian World for the most famous of the Fathers, that since the Apostles dayes haue left vs their writings, Aurelius Augustinus; a name fitting to him, which indeed was Aureus and Augustissimus, Bishop of this Sea, while he liued; and yet liuing (in his Works) a Bishop, not of Hippo, but of the Westerne Church. Witty Learned, Wise, and Holy Father, that hath with thee carried these Titles from Hippo: where, after thee, the Arrian Vandals, and since, the Saracens, haue liued and Lorded, and at this day is possessed of such as haue no possession of Wit, Learning, Wisdome, or Holynesse: but haue testified their banishment of all these, by ascribing them to fooles and madde made men, whom they honour and admire as Saints. e This Bona (then brooking this name better) containeth now three hundred Herthes, and a sumptuous Mosque, to which is adioyned the house of the Cadi.

Tunis is now a great Citie, since the ruines of Carthage, neere vnto which it standeth. Carthage f (as the more ancient) deserueth first relation: of which, we may yet say with Salust*, Silere melius puto quam parum dicere: we may not say much, and a little will be too little for such greatnesse. It was built threescore and twelve yeares before Rome, as the common account goeth, by Dido and her 8 Phœnicians: an emulous competitor with Rome of the Empire of the World. It contained (saith O. rosus) in the circuit of the walles twentie miles; Limes Epitome saith, foute and twentie; all engirt with the Sea, except three miles space, which had a wall of squared Stone, thirtie foot broad, and fortie cubits high. The Tower Byrsa enuironed about two miles, and had in it the Temples of Iuno, Æsculapius, and Belus. Of the greatnesse of their name and power, those three Punike warres are witnesses; in the second of which, Annibal (whom his father Hamilcar, then Generall in Spaine, had caused to sweare at the Altar of Impiter, neuer to hold friendship with the Romans, he then being but nine yeares old, as Æmilius Probus, or as other will haue it, Cornelius Nepos reporteth;) he, I say, passed ouer the Pyrenean Mountaines, through France, and ouer the Alpes, into Italy, with an armie of an hundred thousand foot-men, and thirty thousand horse. The Riuer Ticinus and Trebia, the Lake Trasimennus (running with Roman blood, by three ouerthrowes of Scipio, Sempronius, and Flaminius the Roman Consuls) witnessed the Punike might k. But the victorie at Cannæ against Varr did pierce the breast, and had rent the heart of Rome, had Annibal knowne to haue vied the victorie as well, as to haue gotten it. There did Rome seeme to breath her last: the Sunne, the Winde, the Dust helping the Carthaginian with Natures forces; yea, the Riuer Gellus, against Nature, stayed it selfe, as congealed indeed, whether with wonder, feare, or necessitie, accepting a Bridge or Damme rather of Roman bodies for a passage to the African Armie. These were golden dayes to Carthage, when three l bishels of Gold-Rings, taken from the fingers of the slaine enemies, were sent hither as a present l. A swoone meane-while did Rome sustaine; and easily in five dayes might Hannibal haue dined in the Capitoll: and poore helpe could she finde when she requied, had not Capua, with feasting the Conquerour detained Rome from Conquest, when they despoiled the Temples for Armour, armed their slaues, and bestowed their priuate state on the publike Treasurie: all which could not make Fabius m fight with Annibal, but by not fighting he learned to overcome, knowing, that a shield was better weapon then a sword in that case. Scarce n in seuentene yeares could Italy shake off this burthen, till Scipio by new policie warred against Hannibal, not in l taly, where he was, but in Africke and Carthage, whence his force was; thereby procuring Annibals returne, as the outward members are forced to yeeld their blood, to succour any sudden oppression of the heart.

But how is my heart oppressed with sudden passion, thus to transport the Reader, with my selfe, from Africke into Spaine, France, Italy, there to behold this Tragedie? Let the matter it selfe answer: and now we are returned to Carthage, and finde the Tragedie heere. For in the third Punike warre the Romans (saith Florus) rather fought with the Citie it selfe then with men. And alas, what could that Hermaphrodite-armie doe, wherein were five and twentie thousand armed women q? Yet had women then the greater courage: Hasdrubal the King yeelded. His wife, with her two children, and much people, burned themselues in the Temple of Æsculapius, that could not cure this disease of his Citie and suppliants; the like fate befalling the first and last Queenes of Carthage. Seuentene dayes together did Carthage burne, seuent hundred yeares after the first building.

In this last warre, after they had deliuered vp their Nauie and weapons, being commanded to remoue tenne miles from thence, Anger kindled new forces, and taught them to supply the want of yron, with Siluer and Gold, in making weapons, with pulling downe their houses to build a Nauie, the Matrons giuing their haire (the feminine Ornament) to make bands for their manly and warlike Engins; their priuate glorie, for publike necessitie; all which serued but to augment the pompe of this funerall of Carthage. Cæsar did after restore it with a Roman Colonie, neuer attaining the Tyrian glorie, afflicted with Vandals and Gothes, and by the Saracens made desolate, vntill the time of Elmabdi, an hereticall Calipha who procured the reinhabiting hereof. But not aboue the twentieth part was inhabited: The rest remaineth as scattered ruines, dispersed bones of the carkasse of old Carthage. Master Pountesse, a friend of mine, told mee, That he hath bene rowed in his Boat ouer the wals of Carthage, or their ruines, the Sea hauing made the last conquest by eating into the Land. The Conduits are whole (saith Leo) which bring water from a Hill thirtie miles from Carthage, twelue miles vnder the Earth, the rest aboue. And now (saith he) are not aboue fise and twentie shops and fise hundred houses therein, one faire Temple, one College, but without scholars, the inhabitants poore, proud, and superstitious. Master Euesham saith, That this Citie is now ruinated and destroyed. He mentioneth these Arches wherein water was higher conueied, and one street three miles long.

As for the Sea-discoveries attempted by the Carthaginians, Hanno compassed all Africa from the Spanish to the Arabian Straits, and committed his discoveries to writing; Himilco at the same time was employed in the search of Europe. Diadorus Siculus writeth a whole Chapter of their discoverie of a pleasant and fertile Iland Westward, in the Ocean, which cannot fitly agree with any other Region then some part of the West-Indies. And some thinke, that the Indians of America were a Colonie of the Carthaginians. Aristotle hath also the like relation in his Booke De admirandis Auditionib. In the beginning of the Warre they had three hundred Cities in Libya, and seven hundred thousand persons in their Citie.

The Carthaginians (as all acknowledged and their very name Pæni doth prooue, were Phœnicians: which Countrey we haue before shewed to bee famous, as for many other things, so for the first letters and the first (that is, the Hebrew) language. The letters which the Hebrewes since the Babylonian Captiuitie haue vsed, Postellus would haue to be the first, but secret till those times, and then by Ezra made common: but others more probably hold the Phœnician or Samaritan the first: and that the present Hebrew were the Assyrian or Chaldean Characters, which the Iewes brought thence with them. Now for prooofe that their ancient language was Phœnician and consequently Hebrew: Dido is but the feminine saith Scaliger, to David: and Elisa is the Hebrew Elishab, Iosephus relateth out of Theophrastus that the Tyrians and Sidonians might not vse other but their owne Countrey oaths, of which hee reckoneth Corban, which the Scriptures also mention. And Scaliger saith that the Punike Scene in Plautus his Penulus (although they had then much declined from the Hebrew puritie) is nearer the Hebrew then the Syriake, and that hee coulde for the most part restore it to the right Punike. Of their Baalsamen and other notes of this language, wee haue spoken before in our first Booke.

Alleadging also the testimonie of Procopius for the Chanaanites fleeing before Iosua, and the Punikes saith Augustine called themselues (euen in his time) Chananis, ascribeth to the Phœnicians, Hippo, Hadrumentus, Leptis and other Cities on the Sea-Coast, besides Carthage, which they built eyther to enlarge their Empire, or to prevent a fulnesse at home.

Tunis<sup>k</sup> was a small Towne, til after the destruction of Carthage it grow in some reckoning (as before is said.) It hath in it about tenne thousand Households. Abdul Munim ioyned it to his Kingdome of Marocco. And when that Kingdome declined, the Vice-roy (which before was subiect to Marocco) now vsurped the State to himselfe, calling himselfe King of Africa. In our Fathers<sup>m</sup> dayes, Muleasses, sonne of Mahomer, King of Tunis (by murther of his elder brother Maimon, and eyther killing or putting

But Roger the only brother remaining, when with his Arabians he could not gaine the Kingdome, he went with Barbarossa to Solyman the Turke, who so vsed the matter, that Muleasses was chased out of his Kingdome, and Tunis subiected it selfe to Solyman. But Muleasses craued and obtained aide of Charles the fifth, who in the yeare 1535. passed with an Armie into Africke, and repossessed Muleasses of his Kingdome, who became the Emperours Vassall.

Our Histories tell of Edward the first his arriual at Tunis, and Henrie the fourth with English Archers; at both which times the Tunetanes were forced to composition. It was, before eyther of them were Kings, Froissart, for Henrie, hath his Sonne John de Beaufort.

Muleasses, about the yeare 1544. crossed over the Sea into Sicily, leauing his Sonne Amida in the gouernment<sup>b</sup>. The costlinesse of his dyet was admirable, and of his Perfumes, One Peacocke and two Pheasants, dressed after his order, were obserued to amount to a hundred Duckats and more. He was a superstitious obseruer of his Religion, and of the Starres which portended to him the losse of his Kingdome, and a miserable end. To auoid this, he departed out of Africa (for feare of Barbarossa) but so fell into the danger. A rumour was spread at Tunis, that hee was dead; whereupon Amida possessed himselfe of the Kingdome. Muleasses hasted home to recouer it, and lost himselfe: for he was taken Captiue, and after both his eyes put out with a burning knife, and of his two sonnes Nabassar and Abdalar hee was committed to prison. But Abdamelech his brother got the Kingdome from Amida, and soone after died, to whom succeeded Mahomet his sonne, a child: whose Tutors were so tyrannicall, that Amida was againe sent for by the Tunetans, and Muleasses is brought to Sanctuarie, whence by the Spaniards meanes hee was conueyed to Guletta, and thence to Sicilia, where hee was maintained at the Emperours charge<sup>c</sup>. He deriued his Pedigree from the Chorean Family, in right line from Homar, *Mahomet*s Disciple. Amida obtained the Kingdome, thus tossed betwixt Moores, Turkes, and Christians, but was after taken and sent prisoner to Sicilia. Mahomet (brother of Amida, now a slave in Sicilia) was made King of Tunes, vnder the Spaniard, 1573. by Don Iohn of Austria: but the next yeare after, Selym the Turke tooke Guletta, holden by the Spaniards almost fortie yeares; and at last tooke Tunes also: Mahomet the new King was sent to Constantinople prisoner.

It hath (saith<sup>d</sup> Leo) many Temples, especially one of singular beaurie and greatnesse, furnished with store of Priests and Reuenue: also, manie Colleges of Schollers, and Monasteries of Religious persons, to which the people yeeld liberall almes. They are so befooled, that they esteeme fooles Saints: and while I was at Tunis the King built a faire Monasterie for one Sidi el Dahi (which went vp and downe with his head and feet bare, hurling stones, and crying like a madde man) endowing the same with great reuenue for him and all his kindred.

He built therein an admirable Temple, on pillars of Marble. To Hueba in this gouernment succeeded<sup>f</sup> Muse, to whom Inlannus Earle of Cepta offered his seruice for the conquest of Spaine, and being found faithfully vnfaithfull with some few Souldiers lent him, was after employed with Tarif (of whom the hill was called Gebel Tarif, now Gibraltar) who with an Armie of twelue thousand tooke Seuill and after that ouerthrew King Rodericus, and being enriched with spoile, was dispossessed thereof by Muse who by this newes of his successe was moued to follow him into Spaine, as the Spanish writers<sup>h</sup> (though not altogether agreeing herein) declare, and subdued the same in thirtie moneths space. in the blood of three hundred Competitors. Iezul the sonne of Muza, and after him his brother, and nephew, succeeded each other in his government, which Elaglab (that folloved them) turned into an independent an free Seignorie, by occasion (as is said) of the Chalifa's leaving Damasco, and remouing the Seat Royall, or Popedome, to Bagdat. This House here ruled a hundred an seuentie yeares, at which time Mahdi an hereticall Chalifa deprived them. These Saratens wanne Sicilia in those times to the Cairaoan Dominion. About the foure hundred yeare of the Hegira, Elcain was Chalifa in Cairaoan, whose Captaine Gebor conquered vnto him Barbarie, Numidia, and as farre as Sus Westward: and after being employed in the East, subdued Egypt and Syria. He, for securing himselfe and his Armie, built Cairo. After this he sent to his Lord Elcain to come thither in person, assuring him, That the Calipha of Bagdat was not able to abide his presence and puissance. Elcain listning to Gebor, appointed a Lieutenant in Cairaoan, and went to Cairo. But his Lieutenant of Cairaoan rebelled and offered his obedience to the Chalifa of Bagdat who therefore gaue him large priuileges, and made him King of all Africa. Elcain in these straits knew not which way to turne him, till by counsell of his Secretarie he tooke this course. The Arabians at that time were exceedingly multiplied, insomuch, that the Country, otherwise barren, could not sustaine them and their Cattell. To these hee gaue leaue to passe into Africa, paying for euerie Poll a Duckaz, and taking an oath of them to bee enemies to his Rebell. These in short time sacked Tripolis and Cabis, and, after eight moethes siege, Caiaron, also and remained Lords of Africa till Iosaph the first, King of Marocco, who gaue aide to the kinsmen of that Rebell, wanne the Cities from the Arabians, which still kept possession of the fields. The Lord of Cairaoan fled Westward, and reigned in Bugia and the partes adioyning, and others of his kindred ruled in Tunis, till the Kings of Marocco swallowed all; that Citie being built presently after the Arabians had destroyed this, in the yeare 424. of their Hegira, as Leo<sup>a</sup> reckoneth. Cairaoan<sup>b</sup> hath in it an Ancient Temple, and College of Priests: a Leo l. 2. Hither the great men among the Moores and Numidians are brought to bee buried, b Sirius Comment. hoping by the prayers of those Priests to climé to Heauen. For this cause (Boetius saith) they enter into this Citie vnshod, with great reuerence.

The Arabians haue filled Africa with themselves, their Armes, Artes, and Language. Arabike letters as POSTELLVS affirmeth, were borrowed of the Chaldees, and first with MAHOMET and his Law beganne to bee called Arabike. Hee findeth in the same I know not what Cabalisticall Mysteries, yeelding more certaine predictions, then from the Heauens or Oracles; and is much studied (he saith) in Tunis, Marocco and Cairo. c Postel, de Orig.

Concerning the Religion of these Africans: in Ancient times, Leo saith, That they worshipped the Fire and the Sunne, as did the Persians (erecting in honour of each of these faire and Sumptuous Temples, in which the Fire was continually kept burning, as in the Temple of Vesta at Rome). The Numidians and Libyans sacrificed to the Planets. And some of the Negros worshiped Gughimo, which signifieth the L O R D of Heauen. These afterward (he saith) were of the Iewish Religion, and after that of the Christian, til the 268. yeare of the Hegira, that some Negro-Kingdomes became Mahumetan, although there remaine some Christians to this day: but those which were Iewish, both by the Christians and Mahumetans, were vtterly destroyed. But those of Barbarie (whereof we especially entreat) remained (sayth hee) Idolaters, till 350. yeares before Mahomet's birth, when they became Christians. This must bee interpreted of the vniuersal and publike profession about the time of Constantine: For otherwise Africke had in it Christians before. Dorotheus in Synopsi saith, That Epanetus, one of the 70. Disciples, was a Bishop of Carthage; and that Simon the Apostle preached in Mauritania, and among the Africans, as Matthias also in Ethiopia. But the Gothes soon corrupted Christian Religion with Arrianisme, the fore-runner of Mahumetanisme, both here and elsewhere. The Moores (saith<sup>d</sup> another) worshipped Iuba d Alex. ab. Alex. Gen. di. l. 6. 4. as a God; and the Pani, Vrauns; the Libyans, Psaphon. This Psaphon (otherwise a base fellow) had taught birds to sing, Psaphon is a great God, and then let them flie into the Woods, where chanting their lesson, they enchanted the rude people with this superstition, stitution. Ælian <sup>a</sup> telleth the like Historie of Annon a Carthaginian, whose birds, as h bertie in the Woods, forgot this their Masters Lesson. The Pœni <sup>b</sup> being (as is said) Phœni or Phœnicians, brought (in all likeli-hood) the Phœnician Religion with them from thence. Silius reckoneth one of their damnable Rites like to come thence, of humane Sacrifices.

To Saturne (saith <sup>c</sup> Sardus) were humane Sacrifices offered by the Rhodians, Phœnicians, Curetes, and Carthaginians: the Sardi their Colonie <sup>d</sup>, offered the fairest of their Captiues, and such as were about threescore and tenne yeares old, who to shew their courage, laughed; whence grew the Prouerbe, Sardonius risus: this was done also to Saturne. The Carthaginians, in time of plague, offered their children to Saturne, which Gelo caused them to leaue. Being overcome by Agathocles, they sacrificed 200 of the chiefe mens children to Saturne. Clitarchus and others write, cited by Suidas, That in their solemne supplications at Carthage they put a child into the armes of Saturnes Brazen Image, vnder which was set a Furnace, or Ouen: which being kindled, the childe being burned, seemed to laugh. This custome might happily bee the occasion of that desperate act before spoken of in the destruction of Carthage by the Romans, so many perishing in Æsculapius Temple. Other their Rites are likely to be the same with those which we haue reported of the Phœnicians, somewhat perhaps in time inclining also to the Greekish superstition. Their deuotion to Venus, the Phœnician Goddesse, Augustine <sup>e</sup> mentioneth in these words, Regnum Veneris quale erit Carthagini, ubi nunc est regnum Christi?

It was sacked this second time of Capellianus, President of Mauritania; thirdly, vnder Genserichus, of the Vandals; fourthly, of the Maurusians; fifthly, of the Persians; sixthly of the Egyptians; lastly, of the Mahumetans.

Tripolis of Barbarie (for there is another of that name in Syria, so called, because the Arcadians, Tyrians, and Sidonians inhabited it) was so named of three Cities, whose Colonies planted it, Abratonum, and Tophia: and Leptis magna: or as <sup>h</sup> others, Cesa, or Taphra, or Oea, Sabrada, and Leptis. It was built by the Romans, conquered by the Gothes, and after by the Saracens. And after the destruction thereof, the Africans built a new Tripolis, wherein were many faire Temples, Colledges for Students, and Hospitals. Corne is alway deere, because their Fields are Sand. <sup>i</sup> It was subiect vnto the King of Tunis, till the King of Fez carried away the King of Tunis prisoner. At which time the Genouese Fleet of twentie saile tooke Tripolis, and sold it to the Fezan for fiftie thousand Duckats. But the Kings of Tunis recovered it after. Zacharias being King played the Tyrant, and therefore was expelled; and a certaine Citizen was aduanced to the Throne; who at first gouerned modestly, but declining to Tyrannie was murdered: And a Courtier of Prince Abubacer, who had made himselfe an Heremite, was forced to be their King, who ruled Tripolis, till Ferdinando sent Peter Nauarre who came thither in the evening, and the next day tooke it: and the King remained captiue, till Charles the fifth freed him. Charles gaue the Citie to the Knights of Malta, whom the Turkes <sup>k</sup> dispossessed by force, Anno 1551. and there haue other Beglerbeg or Vice-roy to this day. This was one and fortie yeares after Nauarre had taken it.

The Kings of Tunis liued in great delicacie among their women, Musicians, Players, and such like, committing the government to the Munafid, or high Steward, and other Officers. When hee calls for a Musician, hee is brought in hood-winked like a Hawke.

Hawke. The inhabitants are exceeding prodigall in perfumes. They haue a compound called Lbasir, one ounce whereof being eaten, causeth laughing dalliance, and makes one as it were drunken; and maruellously prouoketh to lust. In the Kingdome of Tunisia is placed the Lake Tritonia, where Minerva is said to haue shewed her selfe the inuenter of Spinning and of Oyle and therefore worshipped.

Ezzab is the most Easterly parte of the Tunetan Kingdome, the chiefe Prouince whereof is Mesrata. The inhabitants are rich, and pay no tribute. There grow Dates and Oliues, and they traffique with the Numidians, to whom they carrie the wares which they buy of the Venerians. The Great Turke swayeth with his Ottoman Scepter, at this present, this Kingdome of Tunis, and all Africa, from Bellis de Gomer to the Redde Sea (except that little which the Spaniard hath.) At this day they<sup>b</sup> are Mahumetan, and haue bene about these nine hundred yeares past, from the time of Huc. The inhabitants of the Cities differ much from the Mountainers and ruder Rusticks. For they are studious, especially in matters of their law, as in times past they were also in Philosophie and the Mathematicks. But these last fivie hundred yeares their Princes & Doctors haue prohibited many sciences, as Astrologie & Philosophie: according to the Mahumetan custom they vse much washing and resorting to the Temples. They are very faithfull in their promises, and exceeding jealous. They go through the world as Merchants, and in many places are entertained as Readers & Masters in diuers sciences, & are well esteemed in Egypt, Ethiopia, Arabia, Persia, India, Turkey. The younger sort yeeld much reuerence to their Elders and Parents: and will not hold discourse of loue or sing loue-songs in their presence. But these Citizens are very proud and reuengefull. The Lords esteeme more of their beasts, then of the common people. The country-people in the fields and mountains liue hardly in labour and want. They are beastly, the euilish, ignorant, vnfaithfull. Their women, before they be married, may liue as wantonly, as they list: yea, the father maketh hatefull loue to the daughter, and the brother is vnlovely louing to the sister. The Numidians are traiterous, homicides, thieves, and for reward, will doe anything. Such also are the Libyans; without any kinde of Letters, Faith, or Law, without Heauen or Earth; liuing (if that may be called life) like wilde beasts, for ignorance; like Diuels, for wickednes; like Dogs, for poison. These things reporteth Leo of them, who liued among them: which may prouoke vs to thankfulness to that Great God, who hath giuen vs such abundance for body and soule, in things present and future, temporall and eternall.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Kingdomes of Tremisen, Alger, and other places, aunciently called Mauritania Casariensis.

THe Kingdome of Telenin or Tremisen, beginning Westward from the Riuer of Zha and Muluia; Eastward, it bordereth on the Great Riuer; Southward, vpon the desert of Numidia; and Northward, vpon the Mediterran Sea. It was by the Romans called Mauritania Casariensis: the name came of the Inhabitants called Mauri, & of the Greeks, Mavpdaioi: some say<sup>f</sup> of their colour, because it is obscure and darke.

They were supposed to come hither first with Hercules out of India. More likely it is that they descended of Phut, the sonne of Cham Gen. 10. 6. Plinie mentions a Riuer named Fut in these parts, descending from Atlas. Salust faith<sup>h</sup> they came with Hercules, who being dead in Spaine as the Africans report, his Armie being gathered of many Nations, was diuersly diuided. The Medes, Armenians and Persians of that number, sailed into Africa, of which the Persians dwelt neere the Sea, their Shippes with the Keeles turned vpwards seruing them for houses, and mixed themselves with the Getulj, entitling themselves Numidians. The Libyans adioyned themselves to the Armenians, and to the Medi, whome by corruption of language they called Mauri. These Getulians and Libyans, hee saith were before very rude, wandering vp and down without law or ciuility, liuing like beasts, lying and feeding on the ground: which

coines it is read Mauritania, and so Tacitus readeth. Ptolemy diuideth it into Mau- scribes this diuision to Caligula; Dion, to Claudius Caesar: ofwhom it was firnamed Casariensis of the mother Citie Cæsarea, where he planted a Romane Colonie, before called Iol, the Royall seate of Iuba, a man famous, for that hee first raigned ouer both these Mauritania's, but more famous for his learning, wherby he still liueth in the learned monuments of Pliny and others; author of much of our African reports. He in his childhood was led in triumph at Rome; his father Iuba, the successor of Bochar, had before slaine himselfe in the ciuill warres. Augustus restored him to his fathers Kingdome, to which he left his sonne Ptolemy, borne of the daughter of Antonius and Cleo- patra, whom Caligula slew, and then diuided Mauritania into two Prouinces, whereof this is called, as is said, Casariensis of the Colony of Claudius Caesar. That which Pro- copius f hath written of the originall of these Maurusij, as he termes them, although in our first booke mentioned, here also may seeme to deserue Relation. When Iesus or Iesus, the sonne of Nun or Nane, had invaded the land of Canaan, the people fledde into Egypt, and there multiplying, pierced into Africa, replenishing with people all that coast, vnto the Pillars of Hercules, vsing a semi-phœnician dialect. For all the Sea-coast from Sidon to Egypt, was aunciently called Phœnicia. They built the towne Tinge in Numidia, where they erected two pillars of white stone neere a great fountaine, wher-in was engrauen in Phœnician letters, We flee from the face of Iesus the Therse, the sonne of Nane. These are supposed the first Inhabitants of Africa, and for that cause Amau their King, which encountred in single combate with Hercules, was said to be the sonne of the earth. Afterwards, when the Phœnicians came hither with Dido, they were here receiued for kindreds sake, and permitted to build Carthage; which after grew so mightie, that it subdued and expelled the Maurusij themselves. The Romans made the Carthaginians, and other Africans Tributaries, and caused the Maurusij to inhabite the furthest parts of Africa: but in proceesse of time, they, obtaining many vi-stories against the Vandals, seated themselves in Mauritania, till Iustinian remooued them. Thus saith Procopius. Paulus Diaconus t recordeth also the same History, sauing that he saith the Egyptians would not receiue them, and therefore they passed into Africa. The Maurusij in the time of Iustinian were destroyed, and captiued in such multitudes, that a Maurusian slaue was valued but at the price of a sheepe. The author of this was Salomon, an Eunuch, according to a prophetic which they had amongst them, that one without a beard should destroy them. But captiuitie could not much empire their happinesse, whose very freedome was miserie. u For they liued in small base cottages, exposed to the Summer sunnes, and Winter snows, sleeping (except a few of the better sort) on the bare ground, alway wearing the same garment, howsoever the season differed, and that torne and ragged: wanting bread and all other necessaries, neither grinding nor boyling that corne they had. Thus miserable were their bodies, and their soules more. For they had neyther feare of God, nor reuerence of Men, nor respect of pledge, nor regard of oath, nor peace with any, but where feare constrained them.

They had their women Prophetesses, which diuined by their sacrifices; a thing valuafull for their men to attempt. Of the numbers of their wiues they bragged, that the Christians which had but one wife, might feare the losse of their children, they which might haue fiftie wiues need not misdoubt issue and posterity. And yet they were by many wars brought to small numbers, and a few tribes or families. y Leo saith, that after the Romans were expelled, the ancient gouernors called Beni Habdalgad of the family of Magrawa repossessed these partes; who were after dispossessed by Ghamraan, son of Zeyon, whose posteritie raigned heere almost 380. yeares. But they were much vexed by the Kings of Fesse and Tunis. It was in later times called the kingdom of Te- lenfin, or of Tremisen, stretching in length from East to West 380. miles, in bredth not about fise and twentie, The Kings could neuer satisfie the Numidians couetise, whose friend.

friendship they haue with great cost sought. It hath two frequented Hauen-Townes, Oran and Mersalcahir, both taken and holden by the Spaniards. They were taken in the time of Ferdinando King of Spaine; for which cause Abuchemmen the Telenin King was expelled by his owne subiects, and Abuzeijen placed in his roome, which hee could scarcely warme before he was slain by Barbarussa the Turke, who conquered this Kingdome. But Abuchemmen sought to Charles the fifth for ayde, by whose helpe he recovered his Kingdome, and payed a tribute to the Emperour. But Habdulla his successor detained the tribute, and submitted himselfe vnto Soliman the great Turke. Algier remained to Barbarussa.

This Barbarussa or Barbarossa was a meane fellow of base condition, who in his youth sold cheeses in Spaine for his liuing, and by his industrie attained to great mat-tern. There were of them two brethren, borne at Mytilene in Lesbos, their mother a Christian, their father a renegade Grecian, Horucius Barbarussa, and this Hariadenus Barbarussa. They first stole a Galliot, and so committing themselves to Sea, by Piracy vnder Cumales, a Turkish Pirate, they grew rich: and from one Gally, came to haue a Naue of their owne, with which they scoured the coasts of Barbarie. At the same time two brethren contended for the Kingdom of Algier, one of whom requested ayde of Horucius, who so helped him against his brother, that he helped himselfe to the Kingdome, by the murder of the King his Patron and allie, which he did not long enioy being taken and slaine of the Spaniards, and his head sent into Spaine. But his brother Hariadenus succeeding him, became mightie both by Sea and Land, to the great damage both of the Moors & Christians: and Soliman moued by his fame, sent for him, and made him Admirall of all the Turkish Seas, and Sea-forces, vnder whom he grew dreadfull, not to these parts of Barbary alone, which he subjected to the Turke, but to those countries of Christendom, which are washed with the Mediterranean, euen Rome it self quaking for feare of a second Hannibal, who after so many ages should by sea from Africa avenge the angry ghost of old Carthage. In the yeare 1538. the Pope, Emperour and Venetians, had with ioynt forces set forth a Nauy of about two hundred & fiftie sloopes against him, but by mutuall discords (the wonted aduantage of the Turks against the Christians, they made themselves both sport and spoile to this Turkish Pirate. The sea could no longer endure the successe of this Barbarian, but mad to see the Christians vnchristian madnes, & vnwilling to submit his proude waues to the base thralldom of this base Turke, swelling with indignation, conspired with the neighbour element, which pretended equall quarrell for so often darkening his light, and poysoning his breath with those hellish smokes, and for vsurping those thunders, which had wont to be the airy priuiledge of his middle Regions: these both agreed in their disagreeing with tempestuous fury to spoyle the spoilers: the winds from the Acroceraunian hills, and the seas on the Dalmatian shore, so girt in the Turkes, with their equall vnequall rage, that twentie thousand of them were captiued and shut vp in Neptunes prisons, to become food to his Family; and the new Conquerours on euery shore, made their markets of Turkish commodities, and by wrackes testified to the earth, that they had weakened themselves on her and their enemies. And yet did Barbarussa recover himselfe by new forces, and hauing wonne Rhegium, came to Ostia, where he rode three dayes; the Romanes trembling meane while, and ready to leaue Saint Peter alone to belye out the Turkes if they came. So much more fortunate were his proceedings, then of Hali Bassa, who in the fight at Lepanto, lost his life and Naue, whereof he eighthe fell to the Seas share, and an hundred and thirtie saile to Don Iohn and his partners; the greatest blow that euer the Turke at Sea received, and had the greatest Homero to sing it. But me thinks I feele some Cymbians pulling me by the eare, and asking if the Pirates haue robbed me of my Religion, the most proper subiect of my Discourse. True, by these irreligious crue, while they seeke to winne other things, care not to lose that. But this Algier hauing bene of olde, and still continuing a receptacle of Turkish Ro- uers, could not be passed ouer, especially in these Piraticall times, without some obseruation, being also the gate whereby the Turkish forces first entred into Barbary. Iohn Law writeth a little otherwise of Barbarussa and Algier.

The Moores call this Citie Gezeir; the Spaniards Algier: and of olde was called Mesgana Mefgans of that African family which founded it. It containeth about foure thousand families: the buildings very sumptuous: Innes, Bath-stones, and Temples very beautifull: euery occupation hath a severall place by it selfe. It hath adioyning Plaines very pleasant and fertile, one whereof is five and fortie miles long, and almost thirte broad. For many yeares it was subiect to the Kingdome of Telenfin: but hearing that Bugia was gouerned by a King, they submitted themselves to him, paying him a tribute, otherwise in maner free. Then did they build themselves Gallies, and molested with Piracies the Spanish Islands of Maiotica, Minorica, and Ieuiza. Ferdinando therefore provided an Armada against them, and built a Fort within shot of the Towne:

whereupon they requested peace, and promised tribute. But Barbarussa, when Ferdinando was dead, was sent for by the Citizens, and made Captaine ouer all their forces.
He soone after murdered Selim Ettemi an Arabian Prince, which had bene created Gouernour of Algier, when Bugia was taken by the Spaniards: and possessed himselfe of the Gouernement, and there coined money, calling himselfe King; the neighboring people yeelding him obedience and tribute. This was the beginning of Barbarussa's greatnesse: and at the most part hereof Leo was present, and lodged in his house which had bene Embassadour from Algier to Spaine, from whence he had brought three thousand bookes written in Arabike. And whiles I was at Tunis, I heard that Barba-russa was slaine at Telenfin, and his brother Cairadin succeeded. It was tolde me also that the Emperor Charles the fift had sent two armies to surprize Algier, the first wher-of was destroyed in the Plaine, the second slaine, and made slaues by Barbarussa, in the yeare of the Hegira 922. Thus farre Leo. In the yeare 1541. Charles himselfe with his Imperiall Nauie passed the Seas, to like both purpose and effect, more ouercom-assaille. He was moued to this Expedition by the complaints of his subiects, against the Turkish Pyrats, which vnder Afanago, Barbarussa's Lieutenant, infested al those Seas. But the tempestuous weather both at Land and Sea disappointed him, and after the losse of many, both Men and Ships, was forced to returne, and to make roome for his Souldiers, caused his Horses (their gallant breede notwithstanding) to bee cast

Thus doth Algier still continue a sinke of Pyrats; and now, saith Maginus, there are in it not many lesse then five and twentie thousand Christian slaues, which in like-hood at this time are encreased. Tripoli is also a seate of a Turkish Viceroy or Beglerbeg, and of Turkish Routers. In the Kingdome of Telenfin is the desert of Angad, wherein are store of Roes, Deere, and Ostriches, Arabian Theeues and Lions. The Castle of Izli was sometime stored with Inhabitants, and stately walled. Since, it was inhabited with religious persons, much reuerenced by the Kings of Telenfin, and the Arabians, which giue free entertainment for three dayes vnto all travellers. A little offunneth a Riuer, out of which they water their fields, which else would yeeld them no fruit. Guagida betwixt two Rooles had vnquiet sitting, paying tribute both to the Kings of Telenfin, and the Arabians. Ned Roma was built by the Romans, as the name testifieth, for Ned signifieth like; and like it was, if Historiographers faile not, vnto Rome. Here and at Tebecrit dwelt great store of Weauers. Haregol was sometime famous, but being destroyed by a King and Patriarch of Cairaoan, it bequeathed as it seemeth the greatnesse thereof to Telenfin, which after grew in renowne. This towne giues name to this Kingdome. When Abu Telenfin reigned, it had in it sixteene thousand families. Iosiph King of Fesse besieged it seven yeares together, and almost famished them: but he being slaine by treason, they found victuals enough in their enemies Campe (which they assailed and spoiled) for their reliefe. Fortie yeares after Abulbesen King of Fez, after thirte moneths siege tooke it, and beheaded their King.
Here are many and beautiful Temples, hauing their Mahumetan Priests and Preachers.
Likewise here are five Colledges most sumptuously built by the Kings of Telenfin and Fesse, curiously wrought with Musaike worke, for the Arabian Muses and Students, which haue their maintenance there. Their Bathes and Innes I omit. A great part of this Citie is inhabited with Iewes, distinguished by their yellow Turbants from the other Citizens, which being very rich, in the yeare of the Hegira 923. were robbed and brought

brought to beggery. The Turkes<sup>b</sup> are now Lords thereof, betweene whom and Charles the first, who had vndertaken their protection, the Citie is much impaired, as also by the warres betwixt the Seriffe and the Turke. Barbarossa subiected it. Batha is a great Citie, or rather was such: now ruined by warres. Not farre hence in Leo's time was a famous Heremit, much esteemed for his holines: who in short time grew so rich in horses and other cattell, that none in that Region were comparable to him. He paid nothing, nor any of his to the King, or to the Arabians, because they supposed him a Saint. I was told by his disciples (saith Leo) that the tenth of his corne is eight thousand bushels a yeare. <sup>c</sup> He hath five hundred Horses and Mares, ten thousand small cattell, and two thousand Oxen, besides that, he hath yearly sent him from diuers parts of the world, of almes and offering, betweene foure thousand and five thousand ducats. His fame is spread ouer Asia and Africa, his disciples are five hundred, which dwell with him, and liue at his charge, to whom he enioyneth neither penance nor labour, but to reade ordinary prayers: and giues them some names of God to obserue in their prayers; which they are to mumble so many times a day: for which cause multitudes resort to him to be his disciples, which after such instruction he sends home againe. He hath an hundred Tents, some for strangers, some for shepheards, and others for his family. This good and lusty Heremit hath foure wiues, and many slaues, and by them many sonnes and daughters gallantly attired. His children also haue wiues and children, in so much that the whole family of this Heremite and his sonnes excede five hundred. He is honoured of the Arabians, and the King of Telenfin is afraid of him. I, being desirous to know him, was entertained of him three dayes, and supped with him every night in secret roomes, where he shewed me among other things, books of Magicke and Alchimy: and would haue proued to me that Magicke was a true Science, whereby I thought him to be a Magician, because I saw him so much honoured, and yetted neyther sayings nor doings, but those inuocations of God by certaine names. Thus saith Leo lib. 4.

<sup>e</sup> Tegdemt. Tegdemt is as the Arabian name signifieth ancient. It sometime was famous & abounded with men of learning and Poets. But he which would further be informed of the Cities of this Kingdom, let him read Leo. The people of Bresch vie to paint a black crosse on their cheeke, and another vpon the palme of their hand. The same is obserued of diuers others, which yet know not the reason thereof, being Mahumerans. The story saith, that the Gothes inuading and ruling these parts, proclaimed freedome from tribute to all such as would become Christians, a badge of which Christianity was this crosse, still kept, now their Religion is lost.

Concerning their marriages in these parts, we reade<sup>f</sup> that the bride is carried not on her seete but in the armes of two young men, with her eyes closed, and being married, is in like sort without stirring her eyes or feet, to the bridegroomes house: where shee meets first with the right foote, in token of prosperity (the left foote first touching ground, would portend sinister successe, as proceeding from a certaine constellation and ineuitable destinie) with musicke she is entertained and conueyed to the bride-chamber, where she sits downe as taking possession of her house, all the other women standing about her: after which she is ledde with great pompe by women to the Hall, the men accompanying the bride-groomer to another roomer. The bride is set on a bedde couered with a white veyle, the women standing by, & many gifts and presents are offered to her: two women being her instructors in the rites and ceremonies which she is to obserue, called Magita, to whom the bride giueth the money which is offered. The men which offer, if they be of neere kinne, may vpon request see her face, her eyes still closed. Neyther may she speake, but by those Magita is shifted and gallantly adorned, and brought to banquet with the women. They haue a dinner and a supper, furnished with exceeding varietie of dishes, of honey and raisons diuersly compounded: their flesh is not tasted before oyle be powred on it. There are neere as many pots boyling, as guests, and much superstition is obserued in killing their flesh towards the sunne with pronouncing certaine wordes, or else all is cast on the dung-hill. The bride being conueyed to bedde, may not signifie any griefe for smart or losse there sustained. The next morning before day, the husband riseth, nor saluting his wife, and taking a pot for water, and a vessell for meate, at his returne beats vpon the dore with a stone many times, till she (then first) speakes to him, and ordering the said meate and water, begins to looke to her household-charge. The Magita presently come and congratulate her last nights dalliance, and desire issue therof: and then cut her haire hanging downe on her backe, euen with her necke, that it should not hinder her husbands embraces.

The government of these partes, is as is said, Turkish. The Beglerbeg hath chiefe title, but the Dinano hath chiefe power of iudgements and iurisdiction. The Corasan or Capitaine of the Ianizaries, being in many matters as great as the Beglerbeg. The Beglerbegs of Algier and Tunes make their principall profits of their places (which they hold three yeares, hauing first bought them at a deare rate) by their Piracies, which with ioynt consent they exercise on these Seas, all in manner being fish that comes to Net, if they meete them conueniently notwithstanding any league, or peace holden with the Grand Signor. They also giue entertainment to such Pirats of other places, as resort to them, eyther to sell their ill-gotten goods, or to ioyne their strength with them. As of late Dansker and Wards haue bene famous in this infamie; the first, after his seruice with them and for them, receiuing his reward, by them suddenly killed at Tunes (where he was knowne notwithstanding his disguising himselfe, with purpose to haue surprised their Fleet): the other (a shame to our countrey, of which he was) grew so rich by his Piracies, that he shewed at one time to (the Author of these reports) Iohn Pountesse, a bagge of Jewels, contayning almost halfe a bushell, besides his other purchases: And at last, that the end might manifest the wickednesse of these proceedings, he became an Apostata and Renegado from his faith; and soone after died at Tunes; leauing his goods (for his goodnesse he had left before) vnto the Turkes, his body vnto a forren sepulchre, and his soule; let Pirats and Robbers (if they thinke they haue any soule) say whither.

Algier was by Barbaruss a subiected to the Turke, about the yeare 1534. Tunes As, 1574, three and twentie yeares after that Tripoli, in Barbarie, another cage of like birds, and seat of a Beglerbeg, was taken from the Knights of Malta by Sinan Bassa. These Kingdomes the Turke hath in Africa, besides the great Kingdome of Egypt, and what he hath taken from Prester Iohn.

In Egypt are said to be an hundred thousand Timariots, or horse-mens fees, which for that tenure of their land, without any charge to the Great Turke, are to seme where it pleaseth him to employ them. In this Kingdome of Algier are some thousand.

g Pirats: of these two Pirats there is a speciall Treatise, set forth 1609.

h Many English Christians vnworthy either of these names, turne from that faith (which they neuer had, but in profession) to professe themselves (for hell) Turkish.

Of the Kingdome of Fesse, part of Mauritania Tingitana.

Mauritania Tingitana (so called of Tingis, now Tanger, at the mouth of the Streits) is by Ptolemy bounded on the West, with the Westerne or Atlantike; on the North, with the Meditterran seas; on the East, with the riuer <sup>l</sup> Muluia or Malua, which diuideth it from Casariensis; on the South, with the inner Nations of Libya. Niger <sup>m</sup> saith, it was after called Setimensis, of the Citie Setia: more truely, Sitiphenis, of Sitiphis, which Procopius saith was the mother Citie of Tingitana. In this Prouince are now the Famous Kingdomes of Fez and Marocco. The ancient Inhabitants besides the Maurusii (of which we haue spoken) were <sup>o</sup> the Massasuli, Antololes, Bannurri, and the Certulians which liued heere, and in other parts of Africa, as the Tartars do in Asia, and the Arabians in Africa, remouing their dwellings (if tent-wandrings may be so called) as their pastures faile them. So Silins writeth of them:

House they haue none; but wandering still in Waines,
They cart their household-gods about the Plaines.

The Westerly point of Mauritania Pomponia beginneth at the Promontory, called of their store of Vines, Ampelusia, now Cabo de Cantero, as Olinarius affirmeth. In it was a caue sacred to Hercules, and beyond the same, Tingi, supposed to be built by An- for prooffe whereof they shew his Target made of an Elephants hide, too huge and vncleane for any man of later times, and holden in great veneration. Next to this Tingi (which gaue name to the country, after by Claudius Caesar, who sent a Colony thither, called Traducta Iulia) was a high mountain called Abyla, to which on the Spanish coast was opposed Calpe, which two hills bare the name of Hercules pillars; Her- cules himselfe (if we beleue fabulous antiquity) making there a passage to the Ocean and Mediterranean seas, for mutuall view and entertainment. They are now called, Seuta on that side, and Gibraltar on this. A little hence was Iulia Constantia, a Colony of An- tolis, and Lixus, a Colonie of Claudius. In this <sup>b</sup> was Anteus his Pallace, and his commune with Hercules, and the Gardens of the Hesperides, which some (as is said) place neere Bernice. Anteus, if his Legend be true, was <sup>i</sup> threescore and foure cubits long, a cruel and inhospitall tyrant, who in his encountering with Hercules, was three times hurled dead to the earth, and so many times by his mother (the earth) reuiued: which Hercules perceiuing, held him vp in the ayre till he had strangled him. Whereby they intend, that the Sunne reuiue the earth, signified by Anteus and Hercules, but with his excessive heat doth kill it. The Hesperides were the daughters of Hesperus, brother of Atlas; Egle, Arcthusa, Hesperusa. In their gardens grew those golden apples (the domic of Iuno to Iupiter) kept by a Dragon, engendred of Typhon and Echidna, which had an hundred heads, & many voyces, attended by the Priest of the Hesperides: these Hercules fetched away. This was the Poeticall tale; the truth whereof is said to be, that the daughters of Atlas were by Pirats and theeues, sent from Bustris King of Egypt, holde; and redeemed by Hercules, who slew those theeues. These were borne to At- las, of Hesperia, daughter of Hesperus his brother, called therefore Atlantides and Hesperides, sixe in number. Atlas had an excellent kinde of sheepe, with yellow fleeces, which for this exploit he bestowed on Hercules; and taught him also the knowledge of Astronomie: in regard of which Science, Atlas is said to haue borne vp the Hea-uens with his shoulders, and Hercules to haue vndertaken his burthen. Whereas Na- talis <sup>k</sup> Comes placeth these Gardens with Pliny, neere to Lixus, and yet nigh to Me- ric and the Redde sea, betwixt which places is such a world of distance, it argueth how great errors great Schollers may fall into by want of that so-much-neglected studie of Geographie, without which, Historie that delectable studie is sicke of a halfe-dead palse: one cause that hath moued me to ioyne in my studies and in this worke, the History of Tunis,<sup>a</sup> with her manifold changes and chances, and of Places together. Besides the Altar of Hercules, and wilde Oliues, there remained nothing in Plinies dayes of that Hesperian garden. Niger <sup>l</sup> findes there a tree Mallow, twentie foote high, and about a fathom about. Of Mount Atlas they tell wonderfull tales, of the selfe-fertility thereof, the inhabitants neuer scene by day, the desert-like silence; the fires therein flaming by night, the musicke and mis rule of the Egyptians and Satyres, and the labours of Hercules and Perseus there. John Leo shall better acquaint vs with the truth, then those fables of credulous antiquitie. Out of him therefore and other later Writers we will take view of the present face of Africa, there being little that can be said of their ancient Rites, more then is already obserued. The Romans brought hither their language and Religion. The Vandals vnder Genserius passing out of Spain, made conquest of all in manner which the Romans had in Africa, of whose crueltie Victor
terations of estate betwixt them, the Romans, Maurusians, and others, Præpicius <sup>a</sup> hath diligently recorded. It would be harsh and tedious heere to relate. The soyle, saith Atlas, is more noble then the people: of the miraculous fertility whereof, Dionysius us o Halicarnassensis, Munſter, Boemus, and others haue written, I know not how true-ly, That their corne yeelds an hundred fold encrease, and in some places an hundred and fiftie; That there are seene Vines as great as two men can fathom, and grape-clusters a cubite long, &c. It is thought that Christian Religion was here preached in the Apostles time.

Leauing those things of more age and vncertainty, we will come now to the King-domes of Fez and Marocco, which haue bin of Saracenicall erection in this Province of Tingitana. That of Fez stretcheth from Azamor to Tanger, and from the Atlantike Ocean to Muluia. This Riuer is the Easterne border, on the North it is washed with the Sea, on the South is the Kingdome of Marocco, on the West, the Riuer Ommirabih.
The riuers Subu, Luccus, and others water it. Therein are numbred seuen Provinces, Temefna, the territorie of Fez, Azgar, Elhabet or Habat, Errif, Garer, and Chaus or Elchautz: euery of which, saith Leo, had in olde times a seuerall Gouvernour. Neither was the Citie of Fez the royall seat, but was built by a Schismaticall Rebell, in whose family the gouernement continued 150. yeares. And then the Marin family preuailing, gaue it first the title of a Kingdome, setting their abode and strength therein.

Temefna beginneth at Ominiradih, thence stretching Eastward to Buragrag, betweene Atlas and the Ocean. It is a plaine countrey, eighty miles in length, contayning in it forty great townes, besides three hundred Castles. In the yeare of the Hijra 333.
Chehim the sonne of Menal, an Heremiticall Preacher, perswaded them to pay no tribute, nor yeelde subiection to Fez, because the Lords thereof were vniust, bearing himselfe for a Prophet, and in small time gate into his hand the spirituall and temporall sword, holding the same by force and armes. But after that Ioseph had built Marocco, he sought by Catholike Doctors of the Mahumetan Religion, to reduce them from their Heresie, but they slew them, & with an Armie of fiftie thousand marched towards Ma-rocco to expell thence the house of Lunima, but by this meanes brought destruction to themselves; Ioseph getting the better, and spoiling their countrey, ten moneths together, with great crueltie. It is thought that a million of people by famine, sword, rockes and riuers, were consumed: and Temefna was left to be inhabited of Wolves, Lions, and Ciuit-Cats, a hundred and fiftie yeares: at which time King Manſur gaue the possession of Temefna to certaine Arabians, who fiftie yeares after were expelled by the Luntunefamily, recovering the Kingdome from the house of Manſur; and after, the Marin Familie preuailing, gaue it to the people of Zenete and Haora, in merke of their seruice, which they had done to the Marins against the King and Patriarch of Marocco. From which time they haue enjoyed the same almost two hundred yeares.
Anfa was a Towne of great trade with the English and Portugals, and by these vnto raised: and so the Arabians serued the next Citie Mansora. Nuchaila, sometimes famous for their plentie of corne, of which it is recorded, that they would giue a Camels burthen for a paire of shoos, hath now but a few bones left of her carkasse, namely a peece of the wall, and one high steeple, where the Arabians after they haue ended their till, lay vp their instruments of husbandry, none daring to steale his neighbours tooles, in reuerence of a Saint of theirs, there buried. Rebat is a towne furnished with Colledge, and Temples, the model of Marocco. At Sella was King Manſur buried, where hee had built a stately Hospitall, and Pallace, a beautifull Temple, and a Hall of Marble cur in Mosaicke worke, with glasse windowes of diuers colours, wherein he and his posteritie were buried. I saw, saith Leo, the Sepulchre, and copied out the Epiraphs of thirtie of them.

Madur Anvan, by the ruines testifieth her sometime proud buildings, hospitals, Innes and Temples. In Thagia is visited the Sepulchre of a holy man, which liued in the time of Habdul Mumen the Calif or Patriarch, who wrought great miracles against the Lyons, wherewith the Towne is much molested. Ettedle, a Mahumetan Doctor, wrote a Legend of his miracles, which Leo saith he had read, and supposed that they were done eyther by naturall or diuellish Magike. The Fessians after their Easter, yearly resort to his Tombe, with such numbers of men, women, and children, and their Tent, that they seeme an Armie. It standeth from Fesse a hundred and twentie miles, so that their going and returning in this Pilgrimage lasteth fiftene dayes. My father carried me yearly thither when I was a childe, and since, I haue beene there many times, by reason of many vowes which I made, being in danger of Lyons. Where Zarfa stood, the Arabians now a sow corne.

The Territorie of Fez hath on the West the Riuer Buragard; on the East, Inaven; on the North, Subu; and Atlas on the South. Sella was built by the Romans, sacked by the Gothes, subiect since to Fesse. The buildings are of Mosaike worke supported with marble pillars: euen the shops are vnder faire and large porches and there are arches to part occupations. All the Temples are beautifull. In this Towne the Genowies, English, Flemings, and Venetians, vsed to trade. The Spaniards tooke it in the 670. of the Heg. but lost it againe within tenne dayes. Fanzara was destroyed by Sarrac. who with certaine Arabians besieged Fez seuen yeares together, and destroyed all the Villages in the Countrie about. Mahmora was made famous by the slaughter of the Portugals, whose blood dyed the Sea three dayes together, blushing to see the barbarous Barbarian spill so much Christian blood. Leo was there present, and numbred the slaine Christians at ten thousand, besides the losse of their shippes and Ordinance, whereof the Moores tooke vp foure hundred great brasse peeces out of the Sea, in the yeare of the Heg. 921.

Fez, or Fesse was built in the time of Aron the Calif, in the one hundred eightie first yeare of the Heg. or Mahumeticall computation. It had this<sup>b</sup> golden title, because on the first day of the foundation there was found some quantie of Gold. The Founder was named Idris, Arons neare Kinsman, to whom the Calisanship was more due. For he was Nephew of Hali, Mahumets Cosen, who married Falterna, Daughter of Mahumet, and therefore, both by Father and Mother of that kindred: whereas Aron was but in the halfe blood, being Nephew to Habbu, the Vncle of Mahumet. Howbeit both these Families were deprived of the Calisate: and Aron by deceit vsurped<sup>d</sup>. For Arons grandfather fained himselfe willing to transerre that dignitie to Hali, and caused the house of Vmene to loose it, and Habdulla Sefec became the first Caliph, who persecuted the House of Hali openly, chasing some into Asia, and some into India. But one of them remained in Elmadina, of whom (because he was old and religious) he had no great feare. His two Sonnes grew in such fauour, with the people, that they were forced to flee, and one being taken and strangled, the other, which was this Idris, escaped into Mauritania, where he grew in such reputation, that in short time hee got both swordes into his hand, and dwelt in the Hill Zaron, thirtie miles from Fez, and all Mauritania payed him Tribute. Hee dyed without issue, only hee left his slaue with childe; she was a Goth become Mahumetan, and had a Son, which after his Father was called Idris. He succeeded in the Principalitie, and was brought vp vnder the discipline of a valiant Captaine, named Rasid: and began to shew great prowesse at fiftene yeares. He afterwards, increasing in power, built on the East-side of the Riuer a small Citie of three thousand Families. After his death, one of his Sonnes built on other Citie on the West-side: both which Cities so encreased, that there was small distance betweene them. An. 180. yeares after, there arose Ciuill warres betwixt these two Cities, which continued a hundred yeares. And as Aesops Kite serued the Mouse and Frog, so Ioseph of the Luntune Family, apprehending this aduantage tooke both their Lords, and slew them, and thirtie thousand of the Citizens. He brake downe the wals which parted the two Cities, and caused many Bridges to be made, and brought them both to be one Citie, which he diuided into twelue Wards.

The Citie is now both great and strong. It seemes that Nature and Art haue played the wantons, and haue brought forth this Citie the fruit of their dalliance: Or else, they seeme corriuals, both, by all kind offices seeking to winne her loue: So doth the earth seeme to dance, in little Hillocks and pretie Vallies, diuersifying the soile: so doth the Riuer disperse it selfe into manifold channels, no sooner entering the Citie, but it is diuided into two Armes, wherewith it embraceth this louely Nymph: and these subdiuided, as it were into many fingers, in varietie of water-courses, insinuating it selfe vnto every street and member thereof: and not contented thus in publike to testifie affection finds meanes of secret intelligence with his loue by Conduit-pipes, closely visiting euery Temple, College, Inne, Hospitall (the speciall chambers of his Spouse.) and almost euery priuate house: from whence with an officious seruice hee carryeth the filth that might offend eyther sight or sent of his Bride, which still enioying, hee wooeth, <sup>a</sup> and euer wooing enioyeth. Neyther is Art behind in his proffered courtesies, but still presents her with Mosaike workes, as chaines and Jewels to adorne her: with fine bricke and stones framed into most artificiall Fabrickes, both louely for delight, and stately for admiration. The roofes of their houses are adorned with Golde, Azure, and other excellent coulours, which are made flat for the Inhabitants vse and pleasure: whose houses are richly furnished, euery chamber with a presse curiously painted and varnished. And who can tell the exquisitenesse of the portalls, pillars, coisterns, and other parts of this Cities furniture? Once, let the Temples therein a while detain your eyes, whereof there are in Fez, together with smaller Chappels or Moschees, about seuen hundred, fiftie of which are great and faire adorned with marble pillars, and other ornaments, the chapters thereof wrought with Mosaike and carved workes. Euery one hath his Fountaines of marble, or other stones not knowne in Italy. The floores are couered with mats, closely ioyned, and so are the wals a mans height lined therewith. Euery Temple hath his steeple after the Mahumetan maner, whereon they, whose office it is, ascend and call the people at the appointed houres to prayer: there is but one Priest thereunto, who saith their seruice there, and hath charge of the reuenue of his Church, taking accounts thereof, to bestow it on the Ministers of the said Temple, namely those which keepe the Lampes light in the night, the Porters, and them which crie in the night-time, to call them to Church. For hee which cryeth in the day-time, is only freed from tenths, and other payments, otherwise hath no salarie or stipend. There is one principall and (if we may so terme it) Cathedral Church, called the Temple of Caruven, so great, that it containeth in circuit about a mile and halfe. It hath one and thirtie Gates, great and high. The Roofe is an hundred and fiftie Tuscan <sup>e</sup> yardes long, and little lesse then eightie broad. The steeple is exceeding high. The roote hereof is supported with eight and thirtie arches in length, and twentie in breadth. Round about are certaine Porches on the East, West, and North, euery one in length fortie yardes, and in breadth thirtie. Vnder which Porches or Galleries are Magazines or Store-Houses, wherein are kept Lampes, Oyle, Mats, and other necessaries. Euery night are lighted nine hundred Lampes; for euery arch hath his Lampe, especially that row of arches which extends through the mid-quire, which alone hath an hundred and fiftie Lampes, in which ranke are some great lights made of Brasse, euery of which hath sockets for fifteene hundred Lampes. And these were Bels <sup>d</sup> of certaine Cities of Christians conquered by Fessan Kings. About the wals of the said Temple within are pulpits of diuers sorts; wherein many learned Masters read to the people such things as <sup>a</sup> pertaine to their faith and spirituall law. They beginne a little after breake off day, and end at <sup>e</sup> one houre of the day. In Sommer they read not but after foure and twentie houres or Sunne-set, and continue till an houre and halfe within night. They teach aswell morall Philosophie, as the Law of Mahomet. Priuate men reade the Sommer-Lectures, only great Clarke may read the other, which haue therefore a large stipend, and Bookes, and Candles, are giuen them. The Priest of this Temple is tyed to nothing but his Mumfimum, or Seruice. Also he taketh charge of the monie and goods, which are offered in the Temple for Orphans: and dispenseth the reuenues that are left for the poore: euery Holy day he dealeth to the poore of the Citie monie and Corne, according as their necessitie is more or lesse. The Treasurer of this Church is allowed a Duckat a daie. He hath vnder him eight Notaries, each of which haue sixe Duckats a moneth: other fixe Clarke gather the Rents of Houses and Shops, which belong to the Church, retayning the twentieth part thereof for their wages. Moreouer, there are twentie Bayiffs of the Husbandrie, that ouer-see the labourers. Not farre from the Citie are twentie Lyme kilns, and as many Brick-kilns, seruing for the reparations of the Temple, and the houses thereto belonging. The reuennues of the Temple are <sup>f</sup> two hundred Duckats a day. The better halfe is laid out on the premisses. And if any Temple of the Citie or Moschee be without reuennue, they are hence furnished with many things, That which remains goeth to the common good of the Citie.

In the Citie are two principall and most stately Colleges of Schollars, adorned with Mosaikes and carued workes, paved with marble and stones of Maiorica. In each of them are many chambers; in some Colleges are a hundred, in some more, and in some lesse. They were all built by diuers Kings of the Marin Family. One is most beautifull, founded by King Abu Henon. It is adorned with a goodly Fountaine of Marble, and a streame continually running: there are three Cloysters, or Galleries, of incredible beautie, supported with eight square Pillars of diuers colours, the arches adorned with Mosaike of Gold and fine Azure. The Roofe is of carued worke. About the wals are inscriptions in Verse, expressing the yeare of the foundation, and prayses of the Founder. The gates of the College are of Brasse, fairely wrought, and the doores of the chambers carued. In the great Hall where they say their prayers is a Pulpit, that hath 9 staires to it, all of Iuorie and Ebonie. This College cost the founder 480000 Duckats. All the other Colleges in Fesse hold some resemblance with this, and in euery of them are Readers or Professors in diuers Sciences prohibited by the Founders. In old time the Students were wont to haue their dyet and raiment allowed for seuen yeares, but now they are allowed only their chamber: for the warres of Satrid consumed their possessions. So that now there remains but little wherewith they maintaine their Readers, and of them some haue two hundred Duckats, some a hundred yearly, and some lesse. And there abide in the said Colleges, only a few strangers, maintained by the almes of the Citizens; When they will reade, one of the auditors readeth a Text, and the Reader then readeth his Comments, and brings some exposition of his owne, and explaineth the difficulties. And some times in his presence the Students dispute of that argument which he handleth.

There are many Hospitalls in Fesse, not inferiour in building to the Colleges afore-said. In them strangers were entertained three dayes at the common charge. But in the time of Satrids warre the King sold their reuennues. Now, only learned men and Gentlemen receiue entertainment, and poore persons reliefe. There is an other Hospitall for diseased strangers, which haue their dyet, but no phisick allowed them. Here also mad men are provided for. In this Hospitall Leo in his youth had beene a Notarie. There are in Fez a hundred bath-stoues well built, with foure Hals in each, and certayne Galleries without, in which they put off their clothes. The most part of them pertaine to the Temples and Colleges, yeelding them a great rent. They haue a yearly festiuall wherein all the seruants of the Bathes with trumpets and great solemnitie goe forth of the Towne, and gather a wilde On: on, which they put in a brassen Vessell, and bring it solemnly to the hot-house doore, and there hang it vp in token of good luck. This Leo thinks to be some sacrifice, obserued by the ancient Mores, yet remaining. E-very African Towne had sometimes their peculiar feast, which the Christians abolished.

Innes here are almost two hundred, built three stories high, and haue a hundred and twentie chambers a peece, with Galleries afore all the doores. But here is no prouision of bed or board for strangers. The Inne-keepers of Fez are all of one family, called Elebena and are attired like women, shauē their bearded, become womanish in their speech, yea degenerate euen to the wheele and spindle. They are so<sup>b</sup> odious (except to base villaines that resort thither) that the better sort of people will not speake to them: and may not enter the Temple, Burse, or Bath, nor into those Innes next the great Temple, where Marchants are entertained. There are thousands of Mills, all almost pertainyng to the Temples, and Colleges reuennue. Each trade in Fesse hath a peculiar place allotted thereto, the principall whereof are next the great Temple: as Scriveners, Book-sellers, &c. euery trade by themselves.

The Christian captiues rest only vpon Fridayes, and eight other daies in the yeare festiuall to the Mores. There are six hundred fountains walled about, the waters whereof are conueyed by Conduicts to the Temples, or other places because the Riuer is sometimes drie. They haue in Fez a Iudge for criminall causes, and an other for questions of Religion. A third that deales in Matrimoniall cases. From these there lieth an appeale to the high Aduocate. The Iudges of Mahomets law in matters of conscience haue no allowance for the same. Their marriages are thus. When the Father of the Maid hath espoused her to her<sup>c</sup> loue, They goe with their friendes to Church, and a Bellona, enemie to the Muses.

b Infamous Inne keepers.

c The man neuer seeth his Bride before marriage: but sends his Mother, or some other Woman to see her: and vpon that report agreeth with the Father.

and haue with them two Notaries which draw the Couenant: agreed betwixt them into writing. The Father bestowes a Dowrie or Portion of inonie, apparell, and such like; seldome, of Land. When the Bridegrome fetcheth her home, she is set in a Cabinet, couered with Silke, and carried by Porters, accompanied with her Kins-folke, and much minstrelsie: and the Bridegromes friendes goe before with Torches, and her Kinsmen after, toward the great Church. Then hee hasteth home, expecting his Bride in his Chamber, whom her father, Brother, and Vncle, bring and deliuer to his Mother: and he setting his foot on hers, shuts the Chamber doore. At which a woman standeth and receiueth of him a Napkin stained, which she sheweth to the Assembly as a testimonie of the Brides virginities: but if shee bee not found a Maide, shee is returned to her friends with shame, and the guests goe home without their feast. They hold great feasting also at the circumcision of their male-children, which is the seventh day after they are borne. The Barber or Circumciser is presented with gifts of all the inuited guests. Then followeth mirth and iollitie. They vse dancing, but the women a-part by themselves without men.

There is a remainder of Holy dayes instituted by the Christians which themselves vnderstand not. On Christ-masse Euen they eate a Sallet made of diuers Hearbs, and seeth all kindes of Pulse which they feed vpon. On New-yeares day the children goe with maskes on their faces to the houses of Gentlemen, and haue fruits giuen them for singing certaine songs. On the feast of S. Iohn Baptist they vse to make bone-fires. They make a feast called Dentilla, (when their childrens teeth begin to grow) vnto other children. When a man dies, the women put on sack-cloth, and defile their faces with dirt. They call to them those wicked men in womens attire, which haue foure square Drums, to the sound whereof they sing mournfull ditties, in prayse of the dead partie. At the end of euery verse the women vtter most hideous shrieks and outcries, tearing their haire and beating their breastes and cheekes, till they be all embrued with blood. And thus they continue seuen dayes, and then intermit their mourning forrie dayes, after which space they resume the same for 3. dayes, as before. But the better sort behaue themselves more modestly. At this time all the widowes friends come about her to comfort her, and send her diuers kinds of meats: for in the mourning house they may dresse no meat at all, till the dead be carried out. The woman which looeth her Father, Brother, or Husband, neuer goes forth with the Funerall. At some festiuals, the Youths of one Streete will fight with Clubs against the boyes of another Streete, and sometimes betake them to other Weapons, and kill one another. Sometimes they vse these bloudie fraies without the citie, the officers forcing them to better order. There are many Poets which pen amorous Sonnets: and on Mahomets birth-day make verses in his commendation, resorting early to the Palace, and there ascending the Tribunall, reade their verses to the people: and hee whose verses are best is pronounced that yeare Prince of Poets. The Marin King on that day vsed to entertaine the learned men, and to reward the best Poet with a hundred Duckats, a Horse, a woman-slaue, and the Kings Robes which he ware that day.

* These tables are bords like horne-bookes, when one lesson is learned, that is wiped out, and another written & so throughout the Alcoran, till all be learned.

In Fez are two hundred Grammer Schooles, built like great Halls. Euery day they learne one lesson of the Alcoran. They read and write not in Bookes, but in great * tables. In seuen yeares they learne the whole Alcoran by heart. And then the Father inuitheth his Sonnes Schoole-fellowes to a banquet: and his Sonne rides through the street in costly apparrell, both which are lent by the Gouvernour. The other Boyes ride and sing songs in prayse of God & Mahomet. On Mahomets birth-day euery boy must carrie a Torch to Schoole curiously wrought, some weighing 30. pound, which they light before daie and let them burne till Sun-rising, singing all the while the prayes of Mahomet. The Schoolemasters haue the remnant of the waxe which sometimes they sell for a hundred Duckets. They are free Schooles Anciently built. In the Schooles, and also in the Colleges, they haue two dayes of recreation euery weeke, wherein they neyther teach nor studie.

There be three kindes of Fortune-tellers, or Diuiners. One of which vseth Geomanticall figures, others powre a drop of Oyle into a glasse of Water, which becommeth cleare as a seing glasse, in which they say they see strange sights, rankes of Devils, like like Armies, some travelling, some passing ouer a Riuer, &c. When the Diuiner seeth them quiet he demaundeth such questions of them as he will, and the Devils with gestures returne answers. The third sort are Women-witches, which make the people beleue that they are acquainted with Devils of diuers sorts, red, white, blacke: and when they will tell any mans fortune they perfume themselves with certaine odours, whereby (as they say) the Deuill entreteth into them, and their voyce is presently altered, as if the Deuill spake within them. And then they that come to enquire aske their questions, and so hauing left their present for the Deuill, depart.

These f women vse vnlawfull lusts betweene themselves in mutuall filthinesse: and if faire women come to them they will demand the Devils fee, that they may haue such dealing with them. Yea some addicting themselves to these abhominable practises will faime themselves sicke, and send to one of these witches which will affirme, that shee is possessed with a Deuill, and cannot be cured, except shee become one of their societie. The foolish Husband beleeueth, consents and makes a sumptuous feast at that her deuillish admission. Others will coniure this Deuill with a cudgell out of their wiues: others faiming themselves to be possessed with a Deuill, will deceiue the Witches, as they haue deceiued their wiues. There are Exorcists or Diuiners, called Muhummi, which cast out Devils, or, if they cannot, they excuse themselves, and say it is an Aerie spirit. They write characters, and frame circles on an ash-heape or some other place: then they make certaine signes on the hands or foreheads of the possessed partie, and perfume him after a strange manner.

Then they make their enchantment, and demand of the spirit, which way he entered, what he is, and his name: and then commaund him to come forth. Others ther are that worke by a Cabalistical rule, called Zairagia, and is very hard: for hee that doth this must be a perfect Astrologer and Cabalist. My selfe (it is Leo's report) haue bene an whole day spent in describing one figure only. It is too tedious here to expresse the manner, Howbeit, Mahomet's law forbids all diuination, and therefore the Mahumetan Inquisitors imprison the Professors thereof.

There are also in Fez some learned men which giue themselves the surnames of Wissam and morall Philosophers, which obserue Lawes not prescribed by Mahomet: some account them Catholike, others not, but the vulgar hold them for Saints. The Law forbiddeth loue-songs, which they say may bee vsed. They haue many rules and orders, all which haue their Defenders and Doctors. This Sect sprang vp fourescore yeares after Mahomet, The first Author thereof was Elbesen Ibnu Abilbasen, who gaue rules to his Disciples, but left nothing in writing. About an hundred yeares after came Elbaris Ibnu Esed, from Bagader, who left volumes of writings vnto his Disciples: But by the Lawyers was condemned. Fourescore yeares after, vnder another famous Professor, that Law reuiued, who had many Disciples and preached openly. But by the Patriarke and Lawyers, they were all condemned to lose their heads (the giddie treceptacles of such phantastical deuotions). But hee obtained leaue of their Chaliph or Patriarch, that he might trie his assertions by disputations, with the Lawyers whom hee put to silence. And therefore the sentence was reuoked, and many Colledges built for his followers. An hundred yeares after, Maliesach the Turke destroyed all the maintainers thereof, some fleeing into Cairo, some into Arabia. Not long after, Elgazzuli a learned man compounded the controuersie; so reconciling these and the Lawyers, that the one should be called Conservers, the other Reformers of the Law. After the Tartars had sacked Bagdat in the yeare of the Hegira 656. these Sectaries swarmed all ouer Asia and Africa. They would admit none into their Societie, but such as were learned, and could defend their opinions: but now they admit all, affirming & learning to bee needlesse, for the Holy teacheth them that haue a cleane heart. Therefore they addit themselves to nothing, but pleasure, feasting, and singing. Sometimes they will rend their garments, saying, They are then rauished with a fit of diuine loue. I thinke rather superfluitie of belly-cheare is the cause: for one of them will eat as much as will serue three, or else it is through wicked lust. For sometimes one of the principals with all his Disciples is inuited to some marriage feast, at the beginning whereof they will rehearse their deuout Orizons and Songs: but but after they are risen from table, the elder begin a dance, and teare their garments, and if through immoderate drinking any catch a fall, one of the youths presently take him vp, and warronly kisse him. Whereupon ariseth the proverbe, The Heremites kisse, signifying, that the scholler becomes his masters Minion. For none of them stay marrie, and they are called Heremites.

Among these Sects in Fez are some rules esteemed Hereticall, of both sorts of Doctors: Some hold that a man by good Workes, Fasting, and Abstinence, may attaine to the Nature of an Angell, the vnderstanding and heart being thereby so purified, say they, that a man cannot sinne, though he would. But to this height is ascended by fiftie steps of discipline. And though they fall into sinne before they come into the fiftieth degree, yet will not God impute it. They vse strange and incredible fastings, in the beginning, but after, take all the pleasures of the world. They haue a seuerer forme of liuing set downe in foure bookes, by a certaine learned man, called Esselwaner de Sebranard in Corasan. Likewise another of their Authors, called Ibnul Farid, wrote all his learning in wittie Verses, full of Allegories, seeming to treat of Love. Wherefore one Elfaragane commented on the same, and thence gathered the rule and the degrees aforesaid. In three hundred yeares none hath written more elegant Verses, which therefore they vsed in all their bankets. They hold that the Heauens, Elements, Planets and Startes, are one God, and that no Religion is erroneous, because euery one takes that which he worships, for God. They thinke that all knowledge of God is contained in one man, called Elcorb, elect by God, and wise as he. Forrie, among them are called Elanted, which signifieth Blacks. Of these is Elcorb or Elcorb elected, when the former is dead: threescore and ten Electors make the choice. There are seven hundred threescore and fife others, out of whom those threescore and ten Electors are chosen. The rule of their Order binds them to range vnkowne through the world, either in manner of fooles, or of great sinners, or of the vilest man that is. Thus some wicked persons of them goe vp and downe naked; shamefully shewing their shame, and like brute beasts will sometimes haue carnall dealings with women in the open streets; reputed neuertheless by the common people for Saints, <sup>b</sup> as we haue shewed elsewhere. There is another sort called Caballists, which fast strangely, eat not the flesh of any liuing creature: but haue certaine meates and habites appointed for euery houre of the day, and of the night, and certaine set prayers according to the daies and months, strictly obseruing the numbers of them, and cary square tables with characters and numbers engrauen in them. They say that good spirits appeare to them, and talke with them, instructing them in the knowledge of all things. There was amongst them a famous Doctor, called Boni, which composed their Rule and Orders, whose booke I haue seene, seeming more to fauour of Magicke then the Cabala. Their notablest workes are eight. The first, called Demonstration of light, containeth fastings and prayers. The second, their square Tables. The third, fourescore and nineteene vertues in the name of God contained, &c.

They haue another rule among these Sects, called Suash, the rule of Heremites; the Professors whereof inhabit woods, and solitarie places, without any other sustenance then those deserts afford. None can describe their life, because they are estranged from all humane societie.

He that would see more of these things, let him reade the booke of one Elfasani, who writeth at large of the Mahumetan Sects, whereof are threescore and twelue principall, each maintaining his owne for truth, and the way to saluation. Two are most predominant in these dayes; that of Leftari in Africa, Egypt, Syria, Arabia, and Turkie; and the other of Imamia in Persia, and Corasan, more lately broched. Although I haue spoken before of the Saracen Sects, yet could I not but follow Le in his reports of them heere. As for those Coniurers, which by Art Magicke profess to finde gold, which indeed lose gold to finde it; and the Alchymists, which seeking to turne other metalls into gold, turne their gold into other metalls, and the bookes that both these haue of their Sciences: likewise the Snake-charmers, and other baser people, I passe ouer.

In the Suburbs of Fez are an hundred and fiftie Caues, hewen out of excellent marble, ble, the least of which will hold a thousand measures of corne. This is the sinke of Fez, where every one may be a Vintner and a Bawde. Another Suburbe hath two hundred families of Lepers, which are there prouided for: and all of that qualitie forced to keep there.

In new Fez the Iewes haue a street, wherein they haue their houses, shoppes, and Synagogues: and are meruailously encreased since they were driuen out of Spaine. They are Gold-smithes: for the Mahumetans may not bee of that trade, because they say it is Vsurie to sell things made of Gold or Siluer for more then their weight, which yet is permitted to the Iewes. They liue in exceeding contempt, not being permitted to weare shodes, but in stead thereof vse sockes made of Rushes. They weare a blacke Turbant, and if any will weare a Cap, he must fasten a red cloth thereunto. They payed to the King of Fez monethly in Leo's time one thousand and foure hundred Duckats.

The Mahumetan temporall Lords are not by their Law to hold any other reuenue, then of euery subiect which possesseth an hundred Duckats, two and a halfe for Tribute, and of corne the tenth measure yearly. Yea, this is to be paid into the Patriarch or Califs hand, who should bestow that which remaineth ouer and about the Princes necessitie, on the common profit; as, for the poore, and maintenance of warres. But now the Princes haue tyrannized further, especially in Africa, where they haue not left the people sufficient for their needments. And therefore Courtiers are odious (no lesse then the Publicans sometimes among the Iewes) no man of credit vouchsafing to iunice them to their tables, or receiue gifts from them; esteeming all their goods theft and bribery. Nor may any Mahumetan Prince weare a Diademe, which yet it seemes is now broken.

In Gualili a Towne of Mount Zarbon is Idris, of whom before is spoken, buried; all Barbarie religiously visiteth his Sepulchre. Pharao is the name of a Towne, by the vulgar supposed the worke of Pharao, which fond conceit grew from a booke, entitled, The booke of the words of Mahomet, taken out of an Author, called Elcalbi, which saith with Mahomet's testimonie, that there were foure Kings which ruled all the world; Two faithfull, and two vnfaithfull: the two former, Salomon and Alexander Magnus: the two later, Nimrod and Pharao. The Latine inscriptions there seene, shew it was the worke of the Romans. In Pietra Rossa, a Towne by the Lyons are so tame that they will gather vp bones in the streets, the people not fearing them. The like Lions are in Guraigra, where one may driue them away with a staffe. At Agla the Lions are so fearefull, that they will flec at the voice of a childe; whence a coward braggart is prouerbiably called a Lion of Agla. Shame is the name of a Castle, so called of their shamefull couetousnesse; which, when they once requested the King (then entertained amongst them) to change, hee consented. But the next morning, when they had brought him vessels of milke, halfe filled vp with water, hoping the King would not perceiue it, he said that none could alter nature, and so left them, and their name to them.

We haue now passed two Prouices of the Kingdome of Fez: the third is named Agar, which hath the Riuer Buragrag, on the West; Bunasar, on the South; the Ocean, on the North; and Eastward, the Mountaines. Heere standeth Casar Elcabir, which King Mansur gaue to a poore Fisher, who had giuen him kinde entertainment in his Cottage one night when he had lost his company in hunting. In it are many Temples, one Colledge of Students, and a stately Hospitall. Habar, the fourth prouince or Shire of this Kingdome, is next hereunto, and containeth almost an hundred miles in length, and fourescore in breadth. Ezaggen, a Towne of Fez, are permitted by an ancient priuiledge of the Kings of Fez to drinke wine, notwithstanding Mahomet's prohibition. Arzilla, saith Leo, was taken by the English, then worshippers of Idols, about nine hundred yeares after Christ. The Religion, I thinke, deceiues him. He addes, that the Towne remained without habitation thirtie yeares, and then one of the Mahumetan Patriarches of Cordoua, then Lord of Mauritania, reedified it. Of the acts of the English it is not vnworthy the rehearsing. That Seut of Ceura (there written Sunt) was taken by the Portugals, through the assistance of English Merchants,

An. 1415. Julian, the Earle of Seur, brought the Moores first into Spaine, in the year of the Hegire 92. In it were many Temples, Colledges, and learned men. Errit begin at the Straits of Gibraltar, and stretcheth Eastward to the Riuer Nacor an hundred and fortie miles. The Inhabitants are valiant, but are excessiue drinkers. Mecanin and Bedis, or Uelles de Gamera, are chiefe Townes in it. On Mount Beni Ierso was built a faire Colledge, and the Mahumetan Law publickely taught therein: the Inhabitants therefore freed from all exactions. A tyrant destroyed this Colledge, and slew the learned men. The bookes therein were valued worth foure thousand ducats. This was Anno 1509. In Mount Beni Guazeul is a hole, that perpetually casteth vp fire; wood cast in, is suddenly consumed to ashes: some thinke it Hell-mouth. In Mount Beni Mesgalda, were maintained many Mahumetan Doctors, and Students, which would perswade the people to drinke no Wine, which themselues will not abstaine from.

Garet the sixt Shire of this Kingdome, lieth betweene the Riuers Melulo and Multia. The seuenth is Chauz, reputed the third part of the Kingdome, betweene the Riuer Zha and Guruigara. Herein standeth Tezza, adorned with Colledges, Temples, and Pallaces. A little Riuer springing out of Ailau runnes thorow the chiefe Temple, which is greater then that at Fez. There are three Colledges, and many Bathes and Hospitalls. Each Trade dwelleth by themselues, as at Fez. I was acquainted (saith Leo) with an Aged sire in this Citie, reputed a Saint, and enriched exceedingly with the peoples offerings. From Fez did the people resort to visit him with their offerings, which is fiftie miles: he seemed to me to be a deceiuer. In Mount Beni Iessen are many iron mines, and the women in great brauerie weare iron rings on their fingers and eares. Ham Lisnan was built by the Africans, and borrowed the name from the Fountaine of an Idoll, whose Temple was neere the Towne: to which at certaintimes in the yeare resorted men and women in the night: where, after Sacrifices, the candles were put out, and each man lay with the woman he first touched. Those women were forbidden to lye with any other for a yeare after. The children begotten in this adulterie, were brought vp by Priests of the Temple. The Moores destroyed this Holy-Stewes, and the Towne, not leauing any mention thereof. In Mount Centopozzi are ancient buildings, and neare thereto a spacious Hole, or drye Pit, with many roomes therein: they let men downe into the same by Ropes with lights, which if they get out, they perish in the pit. Therein are many Bats which strike out their lights. In the Mountaines of Ziz there are Serpents so tame, that at dinner time they will come like Dogs and Cats, and gather vp the crums, not offering to hurt any.

Thus much of the Kingdome of Fez out of Leo, a learned Citizen of Fez, and great Traueller, both in the places and Authors of Africke: whom Ortelius, Magnum, Boterm follow, commended by <sup>m</sup> Bodinus, Possennius, and others, as the most exact Writer of those parts, and translated into English by Master Porie, from whom if I swaue from diuers things, impure it to the Italian Copie of Ramusius, which differeth not a little, especially in these things I haue heere set downe, from the English.

I thought good here also to adde out of others some such customes and rites as they obserue in Fez, and other parts of this Kingdome. Their Circumcision is vsed in their priuate houses. Women may not enter the Moschee for their often vncleannesse, and because Eue first sinned. The eight day after a childe is borne, the Parents send for a Talby or Priest, and some old men and women, where after a few prayers said, the women wash the childe all ouer with water, and giue the name, making a banquet. But sometimes the circumcision is deferred diuers yeares after this ceremonie, as the Fathers thinke meete.

Their Fasts they obserue very strictly, not so much as tasting water till the Stars appeare. Yea, diuers haue beene scene, by their rigour, in this superstition to faint, and some to die. A certaine Moore in the time of their Lent (which continueth thre dayes) in the company of an English Gentleman, being thirstie with heat and crauell, went to a conduit in Marocco (where the same religion is professed as in Fez) and there drinking, was so reuiled of the people, that in a desperare anguish he slew himselfe

with his dagger. Yet doth their Law allow an exchange some dayes of this Lent, with other dayes in the yeare following, if trauell then hinder. Their Feasts and Fasts are at the same times, and in the same manner that the Turkes obserue, of which is before spoken. Their Easter they call Rumedan: their Whitsonide, Lidlaher: their Michaelmasse, Lasbour: their Candlemasse, Lidsheman: (if it be lawfull thus to parallell those vaine superstitions with Christian obseruations.) In this last Feast, which seemeth to be the time which Leo calls Mahomets birth-day, euery one must haue a candle for himselfe, and for euery sonne in his house: The King hath that day candles carried to him, some like May-poles, other like Castles, six or eight men carrying one of them: so artificially composed, that some are in making six months. That night the King doth heare all the Law read: the like is done in all other Churches. The Tally that cannot read all their Law in a night, is held insufficient for his place. They go (saith my Author) six times in foure and twenty houres, (which is once oftner then is written of the Turkes, except on their Sabbath) so their prayers, first washing themselves; as they doe also after the offices of Nature, and after company with their wiues, thinking thereby to be washed from their sinnes. Their times of prayer are, two houres afore day, the first: when the Mouden, or Sexten crieth in the steeple (as you may reade in our Turkish relations) and then may no man touch his wife, but prepare himselfe to pray (with washing or other deuotions) either in his owne house or at Church. After their publike prayer the Tally sits downe, and spends halfe an houre in resolving the doubts of such small moue any questions in matters of their Law. The second time of prayer is two houres after, when it is day. The third at poone. The fourth at foure of the clock in the afternoone. The fifth at the twilight. The last, two houres after. In the first of these they pray for the day; in the second they giue thanks for it; in the third time they giue thanks for that it is halfe passed; in the fourth they desire the Supper may well set on them; at twilight they giue thanks after their daily labour; the last time, they desire a good night. They thinke it vnseemely to eat meate with their left hands, and hold it vncleane, and doe all with their right hand. Their Sabbath or Friday is not exempted from worke: Onely they are then more deuout in going to Church.

Their Churches are not so faire generally as in Christendome, nor haue seats in them, ornaments, or bells: (only the floores are matted) they are also poore for the most part, save their Church-men. Their Lyturgie is very short, not so long as the Pater noster and Credo: other set forme they haue not, but euery one prayes after his owne pleasure. Although the Moore may haue foure wiues, and as many Concubines as he can purchase, yet few marry foure, because the wiues friends will haue a sufficient bill of Dower for her maintenance, which none but rich men can performe: and againe, the wiues chafe his nights company, and that in course: if any be neglected, she complains to the Magistrate, and he forceth the husband to his dutie, or els to send her home with her Dower, and a bill of diuorce. The Concubines are embraced with more stolne pleasures. That bill of Dower holdeth the husband in awe, which else would make a losse of his wife, or still change for yonger flesh. The Bride is bedded before her husband see her: and if hee finde her not a Virgin, he may turne her home and keepe her portion by law. For their funerall Rites: when one is dead they presently wash him, and speedily put him into ground (the heat so requiring) and after that, the women at convenient times haue a custome to meete, and make memorials of their deceased friends with remembrance of their vertues, which they thinke caused men to haue more respect to their good name. Their other obsequies are before declared. The King sitteth to sit in Iudgement on Fridayes in the afternoone: and the Musfrisitteth with him in other times in Iudgement: but on the Friday he sits alone by himselfe. Of these Musfrises are three: one at Marocco; another, at Fez; the third, at Taradant in Sus, another part of this Seriffian Kingdome. Other Iudges sit all the yeare long two houres before poone, and as many after. Before these euery one pleads his owne cause: and if the witnesses can be proued to be infamous of life, or not to say their prayers sixe times a day, their testimony is disabled. The Scriuanos are Talbies, which assist the Iudge, and in his absence supply his place. The Fokers or Saints (Leo before calls them Heremites) dwell in the best places of the Countrey, keep great hospitality for all traouellers,

They give good example of morall living, and almes to the needie, comprising matters of difference betwix parties, and repressing disorders. His Kingdome is situate <sup>a</sup> betweene Atlas and the Atlantike Ocean, bearing name of the chiefe Citie thereof: fruitful of corne, oile, grapes, sugar, hony, and cattrell. They make fine cloth of Goats haire, and of their hides that lether <sup>b</sup> which hence is called Marocchine. This Kingdome is diuided into seuen Prouinces, through which we intend our next Perambulation, taking Leo <sup>c</sup> for our guide: beginning at Hea, which on the North and West bath the Ocean, Atlas on the South, and the Riuus Alf nual on the East. The people feed on cakes of Barley, and on a pappe or hasty-pudding of Barley-meale, which being set in a platter, all the Family compass about, and notably with Natures spoones claw forth those dainties. Napety they vse none, a mat laid on the ground serueth for table and cloth, and stooles too. Caps are the priuiledges of age and Learning. Linnen shirts are almost banished their Countrey: and so are Arts Liberal and Mechanicall, except some simple Lawyer which can make some suit to reade, and a Surgeon to circumsise their children: Their physicke is cauterising as men deale with beasts. They are alway in mutuall wars one with another, yet will not they iniury a stranger, who if hee would trauell amongst them, must take some haire or wife, or religious man, of the aduerser part with him. At Tednest, one of their Cities, such respect is had to strangers, That if a Merchant come thither and hath no acquaintance, the Gentlemen of the Citie cast lots who shall bee his Host, and they vse him kindly, looking only for some present at his departure, in token of thankfulness. And if he be a meaner person, he may chuse his Host without any recompence at all. In the midst of the Citie was a great and ancient Temple, with many Priests attending their deuotions; besides other meaner Oratories. This Citie hath since been ruined and desolue. In Tecaleth were a thousand households, foure Hospitals, one beautiful Temple, and a house of Religious persons: destroyed it was by the Portugals, An. 1514. in Haderobis had beene the yeare before. Ileusugaghen is another Towne of Hea, or of Hell rather, so full is it of confusion, bloud, and murders, besides the want of learning, ciuilitie, Iudges, Priests, or whatsoever else may detaine those men from a beastly or diuellish Metamorphosis. The Seriff, being made a Prince of Hea, brought me thither to bea Iudge, but for feare of Treason amongst them, we were glad to leave them. How far off in manners is their neere neighbour Tefegeld? Where a guard is set at the gates not so much to keepe out enemies, as to entertaine strangers, whom at his first coming they aske if he haue any friends in the Citie: if not, they must prouide him entertainment at free-cost. They haue a most beautiful Temple, furnished with Priests. Taglessse, the next Towne, is a den of theeues and murderers. When I was there, such a swarme of Locusts ouer-spread the Countrey, that scarce might a man see the earth, eating vp their fruits.

Coleihat was built of a certaine Sectary in our time, first a Preacher, attended with troupes of Disciples, after, a cruell and mercilesse Tyrant, murdered at last by one of his wiues, for lying with her Daughter: and then his villanies being manifested, the people put all his followers to the sword. Oncely a Nephew of his fortified himselfe in a Castle, which hee held maugre all their might, and burying his Grand-father, caused him to be adored as a Saint. Flomar Seijf was the name of that Rebelle, The-other

ther parts of Hea are like the former, some exceeding Hospitall and courteous, some brutish without diuine or humane learning or liuing. Great store of Iewes liue heere, and in Mount Demensera are of those Iewes which are called <sup>d</sup> Carraum, of the rest accounted Sectaries. These reiect the Traditions, and hold them onely to the written Scriptures (as in our Iewish relation yee haue read.) In Mount Gebelehadih are many Heremites, which liue on fruits of trees, and water, so reputed of the simple people, that all their doings are accounted miracles.

Sus is the second Region of this Kingdome, lying Southward from hence on the other side of Atlas, so called of that Riuer which is the Easterne border thereof, otherwise bounded with the Sea and the Deserts. At Messa neere the Sea side is a Temple holden in great veneration. Many Historians affirme, that from this Temple shall come that iust Califa, of whom Mahumet prophesied. There also they say the Whale vomited up Ianus. The rafters and beames of the Temple are of Whales bones, which vsually are left there dead on the shore. This the common people esteeme to proceed from some Diuinitie of that Temple: but the true cause is certaine sharpe Rockes a little off in the Sea. I my selfe was inuited by a Gentleman, who shewed me a Whales ribbe, so huge, that lying on the ground in manner of an arch, vnder it, as it were thorow a gate, we rode on our Camels, our heads not reaching to touch it. It had bene there kept an hundred yeares for a wonder. Amber is there found in abundance, which some thinke proceeds from the Whales, as either the ordure, or the sperme, and seed thereof. Teijent is a City of Sus, wherein is a great Temple, and an arme of a Riuer passeth thorow the same. There are many Iudges and Priests, whom in their Ecclesiasticall affaires they obey. Tarodant hath three thousand Families: sometimes the place where the Kings Lieutenant or Deputy resideth. Tedsi is much greater, adorned also with a Temple, and furnished with Priests and Ministers: Iudges and Lecturers payed at the common charge. In mount Hanchisa it snowes in all seasons of the yeare, and yet the Inhabitants goe thinly clothed in the sharpest Winter.

The Region of Marocco is three-square: confined with the mountaines Nefis, on the West; and Hadimeus, on the East; betweene the Riuers Tensift, and Eshinuall. The Countrey in fertilitie of soile resembleth Lombardie, Marocco (which some thinke to be Bocanus Hemerus of Ptolemy) was built (saith Leo) by Ioseph sonne of Tessu, King of the people of Lontuna. It was built by the aduice of excellent Architects, and cunning worke-men. In the time of Hali sonne of Ioseph, there were in it ten thousand fires or Families, and more. It had foure and twentie gates: was strongly walled: furnished with Temples, Bathes, Colledges, Innes, after the African manner. One most stately Temple was built by Hali, and called by his name. But a successor of that Kingdome, called Abdul Mumen, caused to be razed, and built againe, and called after his owne name, howbeit the name of Hali is still continued in the Title, all that his cost notwithstanding. This Abdul Mumen, who was the second that by rebellion succeeded in the Kingdome, built another Temple, which Mansor enlarged fiftie yards or ells on every side, adorning it with many Pillars fetcht out of Spaine. He made a cisterne or vault built vnder it, as large as the Temple it selfe; and covered the Temple with lead, with leaden pipes from the roose, to conuey the raine-water that fell thereon, into the cisterne. He built thereon a steeple like the Coliseo or Amphitheatre at Rome, of great hewen stone. The compasse of this steeple or tower is an hundred Tuscan yards or ells, higher then the steeple of Afenelli at Bononia. There are squen lofts one above another, very faire and lightsome. Vpon the top of this tower is built a little turret, the top whereof is as a needle or spire: and it containeth fise and twentie yards in compasse, and is as high as two great launces, with three lofts therein, one higer then the other. On the top of this spire is a broch with three globes of siluer one vnder another, the greatest below, and the least highest. From the top hereof the mountaines of Azazi may be easily scene, an hundred and thirtie miles off: and a tall man on the ground seemes as little as a childe of a yeare old. The plaine Countrey fiftie miles about is hence discerned. It is one of the greatest temples in the world; & yet not frequented; the people assembling thither to their deuotions, but on fridaies: the city it selfe neere this temple is ruinar, so that the passage is difficult by the ruines of houses. Vnder the porch or gallerie of this Temple were sometimes an hundred shoppes of Booke-sellers, and as many ouer-against them, but now <sup>f</sup> there is not one in all Marocco: Scarcely is the third part of the Citie inhabited: the rest being planted with Vines and trees, the Arabians not suffering them to exercise any husbandrie without their walles. It was built Anno 424. of the Hegira. After Ioseph the Founder, and Hali his sonne, Abraham succeeded, in whose time, a rebellious Preacher called Elmabeli, borne and brought vp in the mountaines, rebelled: and with an armie encountred King Abraham, and ouerthrew him. The King fled, and was so hardly pursued by Abdul Mumen, whom Elmabeli had sent after him, whiles himselfe besieged Marocco, that the poore King in danger to be surprized at Oram, mounting on his horse, and taking his wife behinde him, set spurres to his horse, and so came all three downe together on the mercilesse rockes. Abdul Mumen returning victorious, found this addition to his happinesse, that Elmabeli was dead, and himselfe was chosen King and Prelate (or Chalipha) by the fortie Disciples, and ten Secretaries of Elmabeli, a new custome in the Mahometan Law. He maintained the siege, and at the yeares end, entred by force, and tooke Isaac, the little and onely sonne of Abraham, and stabbed him with his owne hands, killing most of the souldiers he there found, and many of the Citizens. His posteritie reigned after him, from Anno 516. of the Hegira, to the 668. at which time the Family of Marin depriued them, in which the Kingdome continued till the 785. yeare. Then the same decreasing in power, Marocco became subiect to certaine Lords of the old hill, neere to the Citie. But of none receiued they so much damage, as of the Marin Family, which held their court in Fez, and had a Lieutenant onely in Marocco; Fez being made chiefe Citie of Mauritania.

h Leo reckons them in this Order. Abdul Joseph Mansor, Jacob Mansor, and this Mahomet Enafir: whereas Curio seemes to innuuate a longer line of Posteritie: these being all, directly and immediately succeeding.

i Curio faulte arising from confounding the Histories of Abed Ramon and Abdul Mumen, which liued some Centuries of years after the former.

k Rod. Tol. de reb. Hispan. lib. 8. cap. 10. & f. 1 Lib. 7. cap. 6.

Let me borrow of Cal. Sec. 8 Curio in his Historie of the Kingdome of Marocco, which (for the most part) is taken out of Leo. He saith, that Abdul Mumen subiected to his Empire all Barbary, from Messa to Tripolis; his Empire in Africa comprehending fourescore and ten dayes iorney in length, and fiftene in breadth. He also possessed the Kingdom of Granada in Spaine, sometime called Betica, and from Tariffa to Tarracon, and a great part of Castilia & Portugall. Neither had he alone this large Empire, but his <sup>h</sup> sonne Iosippus, after him, Iacobus Mansor his Nephew, and their posteritie, till Mahomet Enafir, who, Anno 1212. in the Kingdome of Valencia was ouerthrowne of Alphonso (as I take it) the ninth King of Castile, in that place which is called Lanauus di Tolosa; losing in the battell threescore thousand men. In memory of which battell and victory, that Alphonso adorned his Scutchion with a Castle Or, in a field purple: which custome his successors doe still obserue, because that day that golden Kingdome, as a strong Castle, confirmed to him by the blood of his enemies, was deliuered from those miscreants. And thereupon that Kingdome of the Bastitanes (so it was before that time stiled) was intituled Castile. Moreover, he instituted that Knightly Order of Saint Iames, who haue in their habite purtrayed a purple sword, in token of blood. This Mahomet our Historians call Miramulinus. For Abdul Mumen intituled himselfe Miramumin, the name signifying, The Prince of beleeuers, which others computing, call Miramulin, as they did him Abed Ramon. Howsoeuer it standeth for the name and armes of Castile; certainly Curio was not curious, nor carefull enough in adding, that this Abdul Mumen was in the time of Rodericus the Gottish King, about seuen hundred yeares after Christ, as also in his Saracenicall Historie he relateth, and we before haue obserued, seeing that Marocco was long after built, and diuers hundred yeares were interposed betwixt Rodericus, and this Abdul Mumen; Curio herein differing not only from Leo, his best guide in the rest of his History, but from himselfe, as will easily appeare to any that list to compare his Saracenicall History with the Marochian. And for that notable victory against the Moores, Rodericus Archbishop of Toledo was there present <sup>k</sup> in the field, and saith that the King wore a blacke Cap, which had belonged to Abdul Mumen, the first of the Almohades, and had by him the Alcaron. This Abdelmon or Abdel Mumen was (he writeth) the sonne of a Potter, to whom Auentumeth, a great Astronomer, foretold his Royaltie. To this Auentumeth <sup>l</sup> did one Almohadi ioyne himselfe, who interpreted the Alcaron coptrarie to the Bagdat Catholocisme, and the interpretations of the *Almoravid*s which then ruled in Africa; whole whose helpe Abdel vsed to obtaine the Kingdome both of Africa and Spaine. He buried Almohadi being dead, very Royally, not farre from Marocco, where hee is had in great veneration, and prayers made to him: and the followers of his sect called of him Almohadi. To Abdel Mumen succeeded his Sonne Auen Iacob, who being slaine in Portugall, his Brother Aueniuseph succeeded; and then his Sonne, this Auen Mabomath; with whom<sup>a</sup>, hee saith were slaine two hundred thousand Moores, the carcases lying so thicke, that they could scarce ride ouer them; and yet in all the field no signe of blond to bee seene. For two dayes space the Spanish Armie burnt no wood for any vse but the Arrowes, Launces and Pikes of the Moores, burning of purpose, and not only for necessitie; and yet scarcely consumed halfe. With him perished the Almohades. Thus farre Rodericus an eye-witnesse, not much differing from Leo.

a Lib. 3. Cap. 10

I cannot omit that which Mathew Paris<sup>b</sup> hath written of John King of England about these times, and in his owne dayes. He sent, saith hee, Thomas Herdinton and Ralph Fitz Nicolas Knights, and Robert of London Clarke, to Admirall Murmelius, King of Marocco, Africa, and Spaine, whom they commonly call Miramamelius, to make offer vnto him of his Vassallage, and that hee would not onely holde the Land of him with payment of Tribute, but would also change his Religion, and accept the Mahumetan. The Embassadours hauing declared their message, the King (or Emire Elmumenin to call him rightly) shut vp the Booke whereon they found him reading, and after a little deliberation thus answered. I was now reading a Greeke Booke of a certaine wise man, and a Christan, called Paul, whose words and deedes well please mee; this onely I like not, that hee forsooke the Religion wherein he was borne, and vnconstantly embraced another: and the same I say of your Master. GOD Almighty knowes that if I were without the Law and now to chuse, this about all other should be my choise. And then, by diuers questions enforming himselfe better of the state of the Kingdome and of the King, he grew into great passion and indignation against the King protesting that he thought him vnworthie to bee his confederate, and commaunded the Embassadours neuer more to see his face. The Authour heard Robert of London, one of those which were sent, relate these things.

b Mat. Par in Iohan. p. 233.

But to returne to our Marocchian buildings. In it is a great Castle, in the middes whereof is a faire Temple, and thereon a goodly Tower, and on the toppe of the same an iron brooch, with three Golden Globes weighing a hundred and thirtie thousand Barbarie Duckats, in forme like those before mentioned. Diuers Kings haue gone about to take downe the same, but alway some strange misfortune hath besalne them, whereby they haue beene forced to leaue their attempt. Infomuch that it is holden a signe of ill lucke to take them from thence. The vulgar conceit is, that some influence of the Planets is cause hercof. And also that shee that set them there, by Art Magicke enchanted certaine spirits to a perpetuall Station there for to guard them. The people indeed are the spirits which in our time kept the Kings fingers from them, who else would haue aduentured all those phantased dangers to haue possessed himselfe of the Golde for his Warres against the Portugales. The Wife of King Manfor is reported to haue set them there as a Monument of her memorie, hauing sold her Jewels to purchase them. Adrianus Romanus sayth, that the Talosi Numidians, and al Barbarie come to Marocco, to studie and learne Grammer, Poetry, Astrologie, and the Lawes. There is also in the said Castle a College for the receit of Students, which hath thirtie Chambers, and beneath, a spacious Hall, where in old times Lectures were read: and all the Students had their expences allowed them, and rayment once a yeare; and the Readers for their stipend had, some a hundred Duckats, some two hundred, according to the qualitie of their profession. No man might bee admitted into that College which was not wel instructed in the principles of Arts. The excellencie of the matter and workmanship might well detaine vs longer in the view thereof, but that it is now rather become a Sepulcher of Sciences, then a Theater, there being not above fise Students vnder a senselesse Professour, left in Leo's time, as the ghosts of those sometimes renowned numbers of Schollars. There were built also by Manfor twelue stately Pallades in the said Castle, for his Guard, Officers, Armories, and other purposes fitting both Mars and Venus. There were also goodly and spacious Gar-

c In Theatr. urbium.

dens, and a Parke with many kinds of wilde beasts, as Giraffas, Lyons, Elephants, &c. There was a Leopard made of Marble, the spots not borrowed, but Natures handiworke. But alas, Deuouring Time, that swalloweth his owne off-spring, was not content to haue inglutted his insatiable paunch with the flesh of those beasts, and men, branded with Natures stampe of mortalitie; but euen those curious and costly stones are now become grane-stones to themselves prouoking the beholders at once to compassion and amazement; the Reliques of laborious Art still contending with Time, to testifie what greater excellence hath been. The Garden is now become the Citie dung-hill, the Librarie in steed of Bookes is furnished with nests of Doves, and other fowles.
 That ouerthrow which Mahomet the King of Marocco receiued in Spaine, was the occasion of the ruine of that Family, which was furthered by his death, leauing behinde him ten sones which contended amongst themselves for the Kingdome, and slew one another. Hereupon the people of Marin, entred into Fez, and possessed themselves of that Kingdome: the Habdulad Nation seized on the Kingdome of Telenin, and remouing the Gouvernour of Tunis made whom they pleased King. After the ruine of Mansors progenie, the Kingdome was translated to Iacob, sonne to Habdulach, first King of the Marin Family. Lastly this Kingdome declining, the Arabians by continuall outrages haue further distressed it, forcing the people to what pleased them.
 Thus far Leo: who saw not the influence of a Starre, euen in his dayes, in his eyes, and of his acquaintance, arising, which after in his exaltation brought a new alteration to Marocco, (restoring it to the former splendour) and all those parts of Barbarie. I meane the Seriffo, a name vsually giuen vnto such as profess themselves descended of Mahomets kindred, from whence also this we speake of deriued his Pedegree. The Histo-rie I thinke heere worthie to be inserted: the rather because this Westerne starre is now declining, and by his fierie gleames, seemes to bee neere his setting. And thus in effect doth Boterus<sup>a</sup> relate the same.

 l. 2. out of whō
 M. Pory and the Description of the world hath translated the same,

About the yeare 1508 began to grow in name, through Numidia, a certain Alfaique, borne in Tigumedet in the Prouince of Dara, being a subtile man, & no lesse ambitious in mind, then learned in those Sciences, whereunto the Mahumetans are most addicted.
 He, by confidence of his bloud (descended of their Prophet) and of the diuisions of the States of Africa, and the exploits there daily atchieued by the Portugales attempted to make himselfe Lord of Mauritania Tingitana. For this cause hee sent his three sonnes Abdel, Abnet, and Mah, to visit the Sepulchre of Mahomet. Much was the reue-rence and reputation of holinesse, which they hereby acquired amongst that superstitious people, which now beheld them as Saints, and kissed their garments as most holy reliques. These failed not in their parts of the play to act as much deuotion, as high contemplatiue lookes, deep-fetched sighs, and other passionate interiections of holi-nesse could expresse. Ala, Ala, was their yernfull note, their foode was the peoples almes. The old Father ioying to see his proiects thus far proceed, and minding to strike whiles the Iron was hot, sent two of them to Fez; Amet, and Mahomet where one of them was made Reader in the Amodoraccia, the most famous Colledge of Fez, and the yonger was made Tutor to the Kings yong sonnes. Aduanced thus in fauour of the king and People, by their fathers aduise, they apprehended the present occasion of the harms sustained by the Arabians and Mores vnder the Portugales Ensignes: they demanded licence of the King to display a Banner against the Christians, putting him in hope easily to draw those Mores to him, and so to secure the Prouinces of Marocco. In vaine were Mulley Nazer the Kings brother his allegations, not to arme this Name of San-ctitie, which being once victorious might grow insolent, and forget dutie in minding a Kingdome. They obtaine their desires, and with a Drum and Banner, with letters of commendations to the Arabians, and people of Barbary, they are so attended with forces and fortunes, that Ducala, and all as far as Cape de Guer stoupes to their command:
 the people willingly yeelding their Tenths to this Holy warre against the Portugales enemies of their faith. Hereunto was added the ouerthrow which they gaue to Lopes Barriga, a famous Portugal Captaine, the brightnes of that sun-shine being somewhat eclipsed with the losse of their elder brother, if rather a Monarchie were not hereby furthered. By faire words they entered into Marocco, and there poisoned the King cau-

ling Amet Seriff to be proclaimed in his stead, King of Marocco. The Arabians of Ducala and Xarquia, about this time trying their quarrels by dint of sword in mutuall conflicts, presented a fit occasion to the Seriffs, to prey vpon them both; their strength hauing made them weake, and their weaknes making the other strong. And now did they begin to vsurpe soueraignie, presenting their Fessan King, with six Horses, and six Camels, and those but simple, whom before they had acknowledged their Soueraigne, with payment of the fifts of their spoile. The King of Fez before applauding his own victories in theirs, began now to distast, and to distrust: he sends to them to demand his fifts, and the tribute also formerly paid him by the King of Marocco. Death, the common enimie of Mankind, here interposed her selfe on the Seriffian part, and tooke the King of Fez out of the world; the scepter descending to his Son Amet, the scholar of the yong Seriff: who not onely proceeded not in his fathers demands, but confirmed Amet in the Signiorie of Marocco, so that in some small matters hee would acknowledge the soueraignie of Fez. But now the Seriffs, whose heartes continually encreased with their fortunes, sent him word; that being lawfull successors to Mahomet, they owed no man tribute, and had more right in Africa then he: if hee would respect them as his friends and Allies, so it were, if otherwise, they which had power to offend the Christian, should not be destitute in defending themselves. The sword, the vnequallest arbiter of equity, is now made vmpire; the Fessan proclaimeth wars, besiegeth Marocco, is dislodged, and in his returne vanquished. Thus haue the Seriffs acquired themselves of that yoke, and now intend new conquests on the other side of Atlas, and in Numidia, and in the mountaines, which happily they archieued. Yea, the Portugales wearied with the wars, which they were forced to maintaine in defence of those places they held in Africa (the expences so much surmounting the reuennue) abandoned them to the Seriffs. And now the want of enemies procured enmities betwixt the brethren, who trying that valor against each other, which before they had exercised jointly against their enemies, the issue was, that the yonger, in two battels hauing ouercome the elder, & at the second, which was An. 1544. hauing taken him prisoner, confined him to Tafilete. He now sole Monarch of Marocco, conuerts his forces against the King of Fez, to try if he could be his Mr. in the field, as he sometimes had bin in the schoole, & failed not of his attempt, but hauing once taken and freed him, the 2. time because hee had broken promise, he deprived him and his sonnes of estate and life. He also by meanes of his sons took Tremizen, which soone after was recovered from them by Sal Arar: Vice-roy of Algier, and Fez also added, by an ouerthrow of the Seriff, to the Turks conquest, who gaue the gouernment of Fez to Buasson, Prince of Veles. But he in an vnfortunate battle with the Seriff, lost his life and state. Mahomet going after to Taradant was by the way slaine in his Pavilion, by the Treason of some Turkes suborned thereunto by the King of Algier, of whom all (but fiew) in their returne were slaine by the people: Anno 1559. Mulley Abdala, the Seriffs sonne, was proclaimed King.

Some write that by occasion of a rebellion in Sus, he sent to the bording Turks for aide, who first helped, after murdered him, and hauing sacked Taradant, and ouerrun the Countrey 2. monethes together, were in their returne by the Mountainers cut off. Mulley Abdala hauing raigned fiftene yeares died, leauing behinde him thirteene sonnes; the eldest, Abdala, commanded the rest to be killed: but Abdelmelech the second brother escaped into Turkie, and Muley Hamet, the third brother, esteemed of a simple and quiet spirit, not any way dangerous to the state, was spared. The other ten were put to death in one day at Taradant, where they had beene brought vp. This Abdala dying, left behind him three sonnes; Muley Mahomet, Muley Sheck, Muley Nassar: the 2. yonger escaped into Spaine, where Sheck is yet liuing and turned Christian. Nassar returned in the fourteenth yeare of Muley Hamets Raigne, and had almost driven Muley Sheck, then Gouernour of Fez vnder his Father, to his heeles, had not superstition more preuailed with Nassars followers, then Allegiance. For when Lent came, his Souldiours would needs home to keepe their Easter at their own houses: for feare wherof Nassar hastily giuing battel, was there slaine. Abdelmelech before fled into Turky, now came back with Turkish forces, and got the kingdome from Mahomet who fleeing, or as others write, sending for succour to Sebastian king of Portugal obtained obtained it. In the yeare<sup>a</sup> a thousand five hundred seuentie eight. Five thousand Germans were entertained in the Portugall pay for the expedition, and great forces were leued, the Pope sending Stukely, that English Traytor (falsely termed Marquess of Ireland) with sixe hundred Italians, to Sebastian, <sup>b</sup> who the foure and twentieth of June, tooke Sea, and the next day with a Fleet of one thousand and three hundred saile; or as Dogliani<sup>c</sup> hath it, setting in order his Armada of five hundred saile, and blessing his Royall Standard with thirtie sixe thousand footmen, and foure thousand Horse, set forth towards Africa: Where Abdelmelech being sickly, had assembled an Armie of fifteene thousand footmen, and foure and fortie thousand Horsemen. On the fourth day of August, they ioyned battel, and the Duke of Auero, with his Portugals, made a great impression into the Moors host which Abdelmelech labouring beyond his natural force to withstand, saued his people, but lost his life, not by the sword of the enemy, but by the weaknesse of his bodie deliuered vp to death. His brother Hamet<sup>d</sup> ruled the Armie (as yet ignorant of what had befallen) and made such slaughter of the Portu-gales that the Duke of Auero, the King of Portugal, and other great Personages there fell, and Mahomet himselfe was drowned, in fleeing ouer a Riuer. Thus remained Hamet victorious, and at one time had the dead corps of three Kings in his Tent. Such is the furie of war, the force of death trampling vnder foot the meanest, and triumphing ouer the greatest. Stukely among the rest receiued due wages for his treacherie, and di-loyaltie to his Countrey, slaine out of his Countrey by the barbarous Barbarians. To Abdelmelech<sup>e</sup> was Master Edmund Hogan employed in Embassage, by the Maiesty of our late Soueraignes, Anno a thousand five hundred seuentie seuen and withall good offices entertained. To Hamet his successour, was from the same Sacred Maiesty, sent Ambassadour, <sup>f</sup> Master Henry Roberts, Anno a thousand five hundred eightie five who was there Lyger three yeares. This Muley Hamet in a Letter to the Earle of Leicester, thus begins. In the name of the mercifull and pitifull God. The blessing of God, light vpon our Lord & Prophet Mahomet, & those that are obedient vnto him. The seruant of God both mightie in warre, and mightily exalted by the grace of God, Myra Momany, the sonne of Myra Momany, the Iarif, the Hozeni, whose Kingdome God maintaine. Vnto the right famous, &c. In an edict published in behalfe of the English, he stileth himselfe, The seruant of the Supreme God, the Conquerour in his cause, the successour aduanced by God, &c. He slayed off the skinne from the carcasse of Ma-humet, drowned in the battell, as is said, and filled it full of Straw, and sent it through all Prouinces of his Kingdome for a spectacle. Hee raigned seuen and twentie yeares.

He sent an Embassage into England, <sup>g</sup> Anno a thousand six hundred and one performed by Abdala Wahad Anowne.

His people did so feare him, that Abdala<sup>h</sup> Creme his Customer, hauing one only Sonne, (who in an idle businesse and busie idleness, would needs feed his curious eyes with the sight of the pallace where the Kings Concubines were) caused him to bee strangled before his face.

Hee gouerned the Alarbes (which are inhabitants of the plaine and Champaine Countries of Marroco, Fez, and Sus) in peace and subiection receiuing their rent duely paid. The Brebers or Mountainers, a people of another language and disposition, hee could not so easily tame, and therefore in policie hee drew them into forraigne expeditions, especially against the Negroes, thereby extending his Empire so farre that way, as by Camell it was sixe moneths iourney from Marocco, to the extreamest bounds. Likewise he vsed them to goe with the<sup>i</sup> Carauans to Gago to fetch home his yearely Tribute. He conquered Tombuto and Gago, about the yeare 1594. as appeareth by the letters of <sup>k</sup> Lawrence Madoc, who saw thirtie Mules laden with gold come from thence to Marocco, and saith that Tombuto rented threescore quintals of Golde.
Hee was much delighted in Astronomie; as Master Thomas Bernher hath written in a letter<sup>l</sup> to Master Edward Wright, to whom hee sent for Mathematicall instruments to be vsed in that yearely voyage to Gago ouer the sandie Sea, where they vsed Needle and Compasse.

His prouisions for his Ingenewes or Sugar-gardens, for his buildings, maintenance of his women (rather for the pomp then the sin) I let passe. For passed they are now, and gone, together with himselfe, his three sonnes, by ciuill warres, leauing scarce hope of good, or place for worfe state then is now in Barbary, and hath been these many years. He died of the plague, which was so violent in these partes, that by Wilkins' report there died about foure thousand and seauen hundred in one day and night thereof in Marocco, and in one yeare seuen hundred thousand Moores, and seuen thousand seuen hundred Iewes. In the Citie of Far (I thinke he meaneth Fesse) died the same yeare five hundred thousand, besides those which perished in the countrie and other places: so many (saith he) as if Barbarie had bene the common buriall-place of the world; and the living were not able to burie the dead, neither did the earth couer and burie them, but they buried and covered the earth, the high-waies being strowed with dead, infected, and infectious carcasses. A plentifull Haruest found not labourers to inueit, but shed it selfe on the ground; and the cattell mourned for want of milkers. Here was no want of store, and soone after (the plague ceasing) no store but of want: Famine succeeding in place, and exceeding the others cruelties. And left a third furie should be wanting, the warres betwene the late Hamets sonnes, followed the former at the heeles, that as with a threefold cord, Barbarie is welnigh strangled and dead.

His sonnes were Mahomet, commonly called Sheck, a title proper to the Kings eldest sonne. Boferes was his brother by the whole blood: Sidan, by another woman; as were Nassar and Abdela. Muley is a title of honour, giuen to the Kings children, and all of the blood royall. Muley Sheck was made gouernour of Fez in his fathers life time; Boferes of Sus; and Sidan, of Tedula, in the mid-way betwene Fez and Marocco. Muley Sheck so displeased his father by his vnbridled courses, that he went with an Armie to Fez to displace him, and to set things there in order, leauing Boferes (late-ly returned from Sus, because of the plague) in the gouernement of Marocco. Sheck tooke Sanctuarie with five hundred of his best souldiers, from whence his father caused him to be brought by force, and sent him prisoner to Mickanes: but before hee could finish his purposes, the fourteenth of August 1603, he died. Sidan had followed his Father in this Expedition, and taking aduantage of his presence, seised on the treasures, and proclaimed himselfe King of Barbary, and heire to his father. What Sidan had done at Fez, the like did Boferes at Marocco, and at Taradant. Nassar made some stirres, but soone after died of the plague. Boferes sendeth Basha Indar to encounter with Sidan, who was now come with his forces against him, and because himselfe had not the heart, to hazard his person in battell, knowing that it would be no small discouragement, if there were none his equal in blood, he on certaine conditions, freed his elder brother Muley Sheck, who the sixt of January 1604, chased Sidan out of the field. Hence all olde quarrels, and feuds, and robberies, and a world of other mischiefs now began to fill all the parts of Barbary. Muley Sheck in Fez proclaimes himselfe King. Thus is all inuerted, many Kings, and few subiects: none now in this vncertainty paying their accustomed tenths, intending rather mutuall feuds and battels, betwixt their severall Tribes and kindreds then common fidelitie and allegiance. Sidan by ayde of the great Foquere, or Heremite, obtaineth Sus, the people yeelding obedience to none but whom that Religious person shall appoint them: by means of him also, a peace was concluded betwixt Boferes and Sidan in August, 1604. Thus was the warre continued betwene Sheck and Boferes, Abdela, Sheck's sonne, driueth Boferes out of Marocco, in the latter end of the yeare 1606. vsing his victorie with bloudie crueltie, besides the rifling and pillage of the goods in the Citie. Blood is a slippery foundation, and pillage a pill'd wall: so sell it out to Abdela, who soone lost the Citie to Sidan, which he had taken from Boferes, after a bloudy field fought betwixt them in Aprill after. Here Sidan puts to the sword three thousand Fessians, which had taken Sanctuarie, and came forth disarmed, vpon promise of pardon, which Boferes after with like perfidiousnes, and breach of promise, requited on three thousand Marochians. The Shracies (which are mountainers, neere to Algier, but no more respecting the Turks there, then the Prebers doe the Serif) fell at variance, and began to mutiny in the Armie of Sidan, whom they serued and cut off the Bashas head, who was their Generall, which caused Sidan to execute vniust cruelties against all of that Tribe in Marocco, giuing the Shracies goods to the murtherer whomsoever. On the twentieth sixt of November, 1607.

Abdela

Abdela ioyneth in battell with Sidan, prouoked by those Shracies who thirsted for reuenge of Sidans tyrannies, where many English, vnder Captaine Giffard, and other Capitaines were slaine, Sidan chased, and Marocco recovered.

But whiles these brethren contend, Muley Hamet Bosonne their Cousin, rich in treasure, richer in hopes, thought it fit time to take vp that Kingdome, which these with warring for it, lost. He gathered together whatsoeuer forces he could make, came towards Marocco: Abdela heard and feared, and hauing spied a man vpon a Hill with a speare in his hand, with white linnen like a flagge vpon it: his feare (an vntrusty messenger, tolde him, that all Bosonnes Armie was behinde the Hill (although it were then a full dayes march from thence) and lent him wings to flie to Fez. The man was but a silly Moore, which had washed his linnen, and dried it on his Speare point, Bosonne entred Marocco, and proclaimes himselfe King, but looeth both Citie and Kingdome in April following, 1608, and after a second ouerthrow receiued by Sidan now Master of Marocco, he was by Alkeid Azu his meanes poysoned, Muley Sheck loth to leaue Marocco to Sidan, sendeth Erina an Italian Merchant into Spain, with promise, to the Catholike King, of Allaroche, Saly, Alcasar, and other townes to turne Spanisht, if hee would helpe him to his right in Afrike. This Negotiation was well entertained, and the Spaniard (they say) now hath Allaroche; the cause that he which now hath obtained the State will not be called King, till he hath regained it. For the opening of this (I suppose you are weary of those vnnaturall and bloody spectacles which this Historie presents vnto you, and therefore I haſt) you must now conceiue that according to the report of such as came lately from thence, Bosonis is dead, Muley Sheck shifts for himselfe where he can, Abdela rules in Fez, and Sidan hath lately lost Marocco. The Historie, or (if you will) the Moores report of the present state, as by a friend of mine lately come from thence I am giuen to vnderstand, is this: A certaine Foquere, Heremite, or Saint (names giuen by diuers to the same) called Habet Ben Abdela, liued in the mountaines of Atlas, where sometime he entertained Sidan to his great content, fleeing then to his p borne or defence in time of distresse. This man the Moores report to be a great Magician, that he could feede three hundred Horſe at one pit of Barley, and the same no whit diminished, that he foretold of plentie the last yeare, which came accordingly to passe, that hee could by his Art secure men from the danger of Gunshot. If any belecue not these things, yet let him belecue that the credulous and superstitious Moore (which easily conceiue and receiue any thing but truth) beleueeth it, and then it belongeth to our Discourse, who rather attend what they doe beleue, then what they should. This is that they tell, that Hamet Ben Abdela, being in great reputation for wealth, learning, and holinesse, gathered a band of men, and conducted them this last Spring to Marocco.

Sidan with a Armie of sixteene thousand, giues him battell at Marocco, the fift of Iune, this present yeare, 1612, and was ouerthrowne. For he went himselfe, and led his company on the mouth of the Ordnance without harme; he causing (as the Moores report) that the bullets should still remaine in the Pieces when they were discharged, as he had often for the confirmation of his people made tryall before, setting forthie Gunners to shoot at as many others without harme, by the like Art. Thus he lost none of his owne, and many of the other were slaine. Sidan fled to Sali, and imbarques his two hundred women in a Flemming: his riches, in a Marſilian: this was taken by Don Luys the Spanisht Admirall, wherein were thirteene chests of golde: the other at Santa Cruz, met Sidan, and deliuered him his women. Men were more necessary, which he wanted, and yet (worſe then their want) some offered their seruice for pay, and receiuing it, forsooke him, whereby he was forced to flee into the mountaines, where he is said yet to remaine. Hamet, now called Mully Side Hamet Ben Abdela, placed a Gouvernour in Marocco, another at Taradant, the chiefe Citie of Sus. His march was in great hypocrisie (I may rather call it then simplicitie) in a straw hat, and a patched garment, while crowne and robes imperiall are the markes he shoots at.

Since I last published these Relations, certaine Letters haue bene printed, and entitled Newes from Barbary, which more largely Discourse of this Saint. That he is about thirtie sixe yeares, very ciuill and plaine in habite, his Turban of course Callico, p The Moors call their protection or defence, a borne, as is visuall in the scriptures.

his Alheik or loose gowne of Lile Gream, a plaine sword by his side, hanged with a plaine leather thong, a man of great wisdom and learning, an Astrologer and Politician. He hath drawne to him Alcaid Anas aforesaid, the principall Counsellor of the land, and many other Saints and principall men, and since his coming hath married the widdow of Muley Bafra. He alledgeth certaine prophecies which foretoll these his proceedings in reuiuing their law, rooting out the Kariffes, and establishing peace in his raigne, which shall continue forty yeares, after which Christ (as hee saith) shall come to iudgement. The Talbies and learned men doe confesse that they find these prophecies of him in their books: to wit, both his name, his beginning at Missa, his course, & certain bodily characters, as a wart aboue his right eye, a black tooth before, a bunch of haire betweene his shoulders, and others to the number of seuen; all which agree to him. At his beginning he put forth onely one Tent and a Kitchen, and then referred to him the Shrookies; a Saintish people in their law, but otherwise in behaviour very fustigious, of which a hundred and fiftie or two hundred serued him without pay, with whom he brake Albidge Lemiere his forces (seruants to Sidan) being five hundred strong. His Shrookies increased to five hundred, with whom and others that adde themselves by the way, he ouerthrew Sidan's forces three times before the battell. Then did he subdu certain mountaineers, which Sidan, nor his father could neuer bring vnder. By the way to Marocco he was to passe a Riuer, and warned his people that none should take vp water in their hand to drinke, which some doing, anon after died. Coming to Dets, where he found a great power to withstand him, he comforted his furefull followers, with promise, that to morrow they should see more with him then against him: and removing his Tents that night, there seemed another Armie greater then theirs, till they came at Dets, and then vanished, the enemies first with sight thereof hauing fled, and left all to the spoyle. This, saith our Author; our countryman M. M. with diuers others sweare they haue scene adding, that he himselfe went to see him, and received kinde entertainment; with promise of fauour to the English, willing them to take knowledge that he was sent by Gods appointment to relieue all sorts, & to aduertise what they had seen, saying, they should see yet more strange matters come to passe: meaning, as they ghesse, the conquest of Spaine, Fraunce and Italy, with which opinion he possesseth the foolish Moors. For when he hath set peace in those parts, he tells them of a bridge (recorded in their writings to haue bene in former times) which shall appeare in the mouth of the Streits, to carrie them ouer. But what will be the issue is vncertaine, the people soone after beginning to disobey, the Subenites and Brebers robbing to the gates of Marocco. Another reporteth that euery day they flee from him more and more, and Muley Sidan is expected againe. And so we leaue him, and these Relations to your censure. We must forward on our Pilgrimage, we haue sufficiently filled our eyes with bloud in this Barbarian Tragedie. Now let vs take more quiet view of the other parts of this Kingdome.

Agmet was sometimes called a second Marocco; from whence it standeth foure and twentie miles. The hills and valley about it, adorned with Gardens and Vineyards, situate Riuer, and fertile fields, yeelding fiftie-folde increase, haue assembled Natures forces to ioyne with Art (if Magicke may be so termed, and the Histories write true) for the common good of Agmet, and Marocco. The Riuer runneth (as is thought) to Marocco vnder the ground; which secret passage is attributed to the wizards of Isa, founder of Marocco, lest the water-courfe should be cut off from the Citie. This fruitfull Agmet in Leo's time was peopled onely with Foxes and wilde beasts, sauing that a certaine Heremite held the Castle, with a hundred of his Disciples.

The mountaineers are very rude, according to their rough and colde places of habitation, many of them covered continually with snow. In Niffita they gaze and wonder at strangers: in Semede they forced Leo to play the Iudge and Notarie (accepting no excuse) eight dayes; and then set him in a Church-porch, and after a certaine prayer, presented themselves with their presents before him, Cockes, Hennes, Nuts, Garlike; and some of the better sort, a Goate, which all hee gaue to his Host: money they had none for him. In Secfina there is at all times of the yeare, snow. There are many great Cues, wherein they winter their beasts, in Nouember, Ianuarie, and Februarie. They were no shoes, but certaine sandals, and are lustie men at ninety or a hundred years olde. Fennella is an hereticall hill and towne, which hath a faire Temple. They are of Elwabeli his sect, and challenge any stranger which comes amongst them to dispute. In Hantera are many Iewes of the Carraim sect.

The fourth Region of this Kingdom is Guzula, confining with the hill Ilda on the West, Atlas on the North, Hea on the East. They have no walled townes, but great villages: neyther haue they King or gouernor; the cause of ciuill wars amongst them, yet do they obserue three dayes in a weeke truce, when every man may trauell or buyter safely. A certaine Heremite, who was reputed a Saint, was author of this three dayes truce in each weeke. He had but one eye. I my selfe, saith Leo, saw him and found him to be trusty, courteous, and liberrall.

Duccala the fifth Region lyeth betweene Tensift and the Ocean, Habib and Ommirabih. Az Azaphi the Prince was (in Leo's time) murdered at Church, while he was in his deuotions, by a subiect, who was chosen gouernour; but the Portugals obtained the place. Azamur, a Citie exceedingly addicted to Sodomic, was also punished with Portugall slavery, and most of the countrey thereabouts. In the hill called Greene-hill liue many Heremites, of the fruits onely there growing. Heere are many Altars and Saines after the Mahumetan fashion.

Mahumet King of Fez, in the year of our Lord one thousand five hundred and twelue, passed this way with his Armie, & at every Altar made a stand, and there kneeling, would thus say; My God, thou knowest that my intent of coming to this wilde place is only to helpe and free the people of Duccala from the wicked and rebellious Arabians, and from our cruell enemies the Christians: and if thou doost not approve it, let thy scourge light onely on my person; for these people that follow me deserve not to be punished. Hence he sent me Ambassador to Marocco.

Hascora the sixt Region of Marocco, is situate betweene the River Tensift and Quadelhabid. Alamdin in Hascora was conquered to the king of Fez by a merchant, whose Paramour the Prince had taken away; for which adultery he was by the Iudges condemned to be stoned. The Prince of Tencenes was so addicted to Arabian Poetry, that he gaue Leo, then a youth of fixteene years olde, fiftie ducats for certain verses he had made in his praise, and twice as much he sent to his Vncle for the same, with a Horse and three slaues.

Tedles is the seuenth Prouince of this Kingdom, lying betweene Guadelhabid and Ommirabih. Tefza the chiefe towne is beautified with many Temples, and hath a host of Priests. The towne-walls are built of a kinde of marble called Tefza, which gaue name to the towne. Mount Dedes is in this Prouince, where the people (for the most part) dwell in Caues vnder the ground: they haue neyther Iudges nor Priests, nor honest men among them. For other places, if any thinke vs not more than tedious already, let them resort to Leo, whom all follow in their relations of these parts. When by Christian will turne Moore, it is their custome to signifie it to the Christians in those partes: and in place and time appointed an equall number of both sorts, being assembled, and sitting the one ouer against the other, the partie in the middle and presence of both is demanded of which he will be, and the Christians may vse what arguments they can to dissuade him: which is done three severall times. Thus did one of our Nation, who hauing thus killed his owne soule, after murdered anothers body, and was therefore adiudged to wander like Cain, none relieuing him, in which state he pined and died.

CHAP. XII.

Of the Arabians and naturall Africans; and of the beginnings and proceedings of the Mahumetan superstition in Africa: of the Portugals forces and exploits therein.

Hauing often mentioned the Arabians in our former Chapters, it seemes fit to speake somewhat of the coming of that Nation, and their religion into Africa from the East, as also of the armes of the Portugals (before often spoken of) which from the West haue made some impressions in these parts.

parts. The Arabian Mahumetisme, even almost in the infancie thereof, pierced into Africa, in the yeare of our Lord 637. Omar invaded Egypt, and Odman in the yeare 640. passed further with fourescore thousand fighting men, and defeated Gregorius Patricius, and imposing a tribute on the Africans departed. In Leontius time, in the yeare 698. they invaied and possesse Africa, and appoint Gouvernors of their own: in the yeare 710. they pitered into Numidia and Libya, and overthrew the Azanaghl, and the people of Galara, Oden and Tombuto. In 973. having passed Gamben, they infected the Negros, and the first that dranke of their poyson, were those of Melli. In the yeare 1067 Iania sonne of Abakequer, entred into the lower Ethiopia, and by little and little infected those people which confine vpon the desarts of Libya and the rest, and pitered into Nubia and Guinea.

Constantinus the Emperour<sup>b</sup> among the Prouinces or great Amera-ships, subiect to the Saracens, numbred Africa for one: the number and order whereof hee hath transcribed from Theophanes, and I heere from him. The first of these was Persia or Chorsassan; the second, Egypt; the third, Africa; the fourth, Philistiem or Rhamble; the fift Damascus; the sixt, Chemps or Emessa; the seuenth, Chalep; the eight, Antiochia; the ninth, Charan; the tenth, Emet; the eleuenth, Esipe; the twelfth, Musel; the thirteenth, Ticrit. But when as Africa shooke off the yoke of the Ameras of Bagdad, and had an Amera of her owne, afterwards by occasion of the weakenesse of the Amera of Bagdad, the Amera of Persia or Chorasán freed himselfe also, and called himselfe Amerumnes, wearing the Alcoran hanging downe his necke in Tables like a chaine, and saith he is of the kindred of Alem: and the Amera of Egypt (to whom the Amera of Arabia salix, had alway bin subiect) became also his owne man, calling himselfe Amerumnes, and deriuing his pedigree from Alem. This as it giues light to the Saracen Historie in generall, so it sheweth the greatnesse of the Arabian or Saracenicall power in Africa, where first they made head against their masters, in the time as is said before of Elagab then Deputy or Amera in Cairaoan, whose example became a President to the Ameras of Persia and Egypt: and (which is more to our present purpose) was occasion of further spreading their superstition through Africa; the fountaine or sinke thereof being now not farre off in Damasco or Bagdad, but in the hart of Africa, Satan there chusing his Throne for these his Vicars or Chalipha's (for so the word, saith <sup>c</sup> Scaliger signifieth) which as you have heard, were too faithfull in that their infidelitie. And because I haue mentioned Scaliger's interpretation of the word Chalipha, it should not be omisse to adde out of the same place, that the first Governours or Generals after Mahumet (or as he calls him Muhammed) were called Emirelmumenin, that is, Captains of the Orthodox or right beleeuers. Afterwards, because vnder colour of Religion, they sought, not onely a Priestly Primacie, but a tyrannicall Monarchie, they chose rather to be called Chalipha. The first Emirelmumenin was Abubecher. When his successors sent their Lieutenants into Africa and Spaine, they gouerned a while vnder them, doing all in the name of the Emirelmumenin, although nothing in a manner but a Title was wanting of the fulnesse of power to themselves. But after, they entituled themselves Elmir Elmumenin, and of Deputies became Kings: which was done by the petition Kings of Spaine, and the Gouvernours of Africa. And now the King of Marocco and Fesse vseth it. For it is not a proper name, but as the French King is called Christianissimus, and the Spanish Catholicus. Thus farre Scaliger: which serueth as a glosse for those former names of Amera, Amerumnes, Chalipha, Miramulduinu, and many o-ther hence corrupted.

The meanes of these and other Saracens enlarging their Sect haue beene principally by Armes: and where they were not of force, by traffique and preaching, as on the other side of Ethiopia, even to Cabo de los Corrientes in the kingdoms of Megadazo, Melinde, Mombazza, Quiloa, and Mosambique, besides the Islands of Saint Lawrence, and others. But the greatest mischiefe that hapned to Africa, by the Arabians, was about the foure hundredth yeare of the Hegaira. For before that time, the Mahumetan Chalipha's, or Amera's, had forbidden the Arabians to passe ouer Nilus with their tents and families, that so the Countrey was still peopled by the auncient Inhabitants, howsoever it was gouerned by them. For such multitudes of vnbridled and barbarous nations were not likely to proue dutifull subiects to the Empire. About that time, one Elcain the schismaticall Califa of Cairaoan, as is before in part shewed, hauing by his General Gehor conquered all the westerne parts, as farre as Sus, employed the same mans valour for the conquest of the East. And Egypt being now together with Syria subdued; Elcain himselfe seeing the Calipha of Bagdet, made no preparation to withstand him, by the aduice of Gehor (which at that time founded Cairo) passed into Egypt, thinking to inuest himselfe with the Saracenickall soueraigntie; committing the gouernment of Barbary to a Prince of the Tribe Zambagia, who in this absence of his Lords compacted with the Chalipha of Bagdet, and acknowledged his Title in Barbarie, receiuing in reward of his treason from that Bagdet Prelate the Kingdome of Africa. Elcain hauing lost his morfell, to snatch at a shadow, was in great perplexity what course to take, till a Counsellor of his perswaded him that he might gather great summes of golde, if hee would let the Arabians haue free liberty to passe through Egypt into Africa: which, though hee knew, that they would so wast it by their spoyles as it should remaine vnprofitable, both to himselfe, and his enemies, yet incited by two vehement Orators, Couetousnes and Reuenge, at last he granted, And permitted all Arabians which would pay him ducats a peece, freely to passe, receiuing their promise, that they would become deadly enemies to the Rebel of Cairaoan. Whereupon ten Tribes or kindreds of the Arabians (halfe the people of Arabia deserta) and a multitude also out of Arabia felix (as writeth Ibnu Rachu, a famous Historian, out of whom Leo hath drawne a great part of his African Historie) accepted the condition, and passing the desarts, they tooke Tripolis, sacked Capes, and after eight moneths siege, entred into Cairaoan, filling with blood, and emptying with spoyle, all the places where they preuailed. Thus did these kindreds of Arabians settle themselves in these parts, and forced the Prouinces adiacent to tribute: and remained Lords of Africa till Ioseph founded Marocco, who ayded the posteritie of the rebel against them, and brake their yoke from the Cities tributarie.

But Manfor the fourth King and Calipha of the Sect of Muachbedin, begunne, as is said, by Elmabeli and Abdul Mumen, preferred the Arabians, and induced them to make warre vpon those their enemies, whom easily they conquered. He also brought all the chiefe and principall of the Arabians into the Westerne Kingdoms, and assigned them more noble places for habitation, to wit, the Prouinces of Duccala and Azgar: to those of meane condition he appointed Numidia, which at first were, as it were, slaues to the Numidians, but after recovered their liberty, and obtained the dominion of that part of Numidia assigned them, euery day encreasing in power: those which inhabited Azgara and other places in Mauritania, were all brought into seruitude. For the Arabians out of the desarts, are as Fishes out of the water. Atlas on the one side, and the other Arabians on the other side, suffered them not to passe into the desarts, and therefore they layed downe their pride, and applyed themselves to husbandrie, dwelling in their Tents, and paying yearely tributes to the Kings of Mauritania, from which those of Duccala, by reason of their multitudes were free. Many Arabians remayned still in Tunis, which, after Manfors death, they tooke and made themselves Lords of the Regions adioyning; where some of them bare great sway till Leo's time: the other deprived of their wonted pay at Tunis, committed great robberies & slaughters of Merchants and trauellers.

The Arabians, which inhabited Africa, are diuided into three peoples, Hilell, and Chachin, which are said to descend of Ismael, therefore by the Mahumetans esteemed more noble: the third is termed Machill, deriued from Saba, and came thither out of Arabia Felix. The diuisions and subdiuisions of these into their seuerall Tribes and Families, which Leo hath done, would perhaps to our nicer Readers seeme but an harsh heape of strange names, and for their sakes I will referre the studious hereof to that our Author.

The Tribe Etheg, which Manfor placed in Duccala, and in the Plaines of Tedles, in later times suffered much damage by the Portugalls on the one side, and the Kings of Fez on the other: they are about one hundred thousand men of warre, halfe horsemen. The Sumaites in the desarts neere Tripolis can arme fourescore thousand men:

Sabul

Sabid in the Desarts of Libya, can bring into the field almost an hundred and fiftie thousand of their Tribe. The Ruche are not rich, but in agilitie of body miraculous, and account it a shame if one of their footmen be vanquished of two horsemen: nor is any amongst them so slow that he will not outgoe any the swiftest horse, be the iourney neuer so long. The Vode dwell betweene Gualata and Guadin, and are esteemed about threescore thousand Warriours. The other kindreds of them are exceeding many, dispersed through Africa, some where commaunding, other where subiect. And as they liue in diuers places, so doe they obserue differing customes. Those which doe dwell betweene Numidia and Libya liue miserably: they make merchandise of their Camels with the Negros, and haue many Horses in Europe, termed Horses of Barbary. They are much addicted to Poetrie, and make long Poems of their warres, huntings, and loues, with great elegance, and that in rithme, like the vulgar Italian Sonnets. They are (the destiny of Poets) curteous, but poore. The Arabian inhabitants between Atlas and the Sea, are more rich in corne and cattell, but more base and barbarous in conditions. Amongst the Arabians neere Tunis, a good Poet is highly esteemed, and amply rewarded of their great men, neither can the neatnes and grace of their verse easily be expressed. When they go to warre they carry their wiues with them on camels, and that (to make vp the wonder) to incourage them. The Arabians between Barbary and Egypt leade a wretched life in those barren desarts, forced, not onely to exchange their cattell for corne, but to pawne their sons in great numbers to the Sicilians, who if they breake day, make slaues of them: and therefore they exercise all robberies, and sell any stranger (they can lay holde on) to the Sicilians for corne.

Now for the naturall and natiue Inhabitants of Africa, the white men (so they are in comparison of the Negros) are diuided into fise peoples, Sanhagia, Musmuda, Zeneta, Haoara, and Gumera. The Musmuda inhabite the regions of Hea, Sus, Guzula, and Marocco. Gumera inhabiteth the Mountaines alongst the Mediterranean, from the Straits to Tremizen. These two dwell seuered from the others, and maintaine continual warres one with another. As Authors say, they were wont to haue tents, and the wide fields for their habitation, and those that were conquered, were sent to inhabite Cities, the Conquerers were Lords of the fields. The Tribes or Peoples Zeneta, Haoara, and Sanhagia, inhabite Temesne. The Zeneta chased the family of Idris from the dominion of Africa and Fez: and were againe themselves, after that, depriued by the Zanhagian families of Luntana, and of Abdul Munen. The Benemarin a Zeneran family recouered the Empire long after.

They are in these times<sup>f</sup> diuided into Brebers and Alarbies. The Brebers inhabite the Mountaines: the Alarbies, the Plaines. Both of them maintaine deadly feuds, and will fight forer battels in such quarrels, then in seruice of their King. In somuch, that vpon losse of any great man, cruell battels haue bin fought, and ten thousand men slaine at a time.

f Ro.C.historie
of Barbary.

The Alarbies haue their fairest Virgine riding on a Camell, with a flagge in her hand, decked in all pompe to sollicite her kindred to reuenge, and goeth formost in the field incouraging them to follow. The kindred spareth no bloud to saue their Virgine, which the other side striueth to win, holding that a continuall glory to the seuenth generation. When a man is killed, his Tribe seeketh not reuenge on the murderer onely, but on the first man of the Tribe he meets with. The Brebers do likewise. Their women follow them in their battels, with a certaine colour in their hand called Hanna, which will staine, and therefore they throw it vpon such as offer to run out of the field; the basest ignominie that can befall them.

The Larbie and Breber doe differ as much in language, as Welch and English; the one is giuen to Husbandry, the other very much to Robbery. Mully Sidan in these late warres (seeing the Larbies also become robbers, caused the next Dwarre (a Towne of tents) belonging to that Tribe which herein had faulted, to be destroyed, man, woman, childe, kine, sheepe, and whatsoeuer belonged to them, by his souldiers. But after he had lost the field in the battell with Mully Shuck, they foraged vp to Marocco gates, trusting to the strength which that Tribe could make, being fiftene thousand Horse. This Tribe or kindred was called Weled Entid.

In Africa they are much subiect to the cough: in so much that on the Fridayes when they are in their Mahumetan Sermons, if one fall a coughing, another followes, and so from hand to hand all take it vp, and hold on in that sort, till the end of their Sermon, no man hearing what hath beene said.

h The general vices of the Africans, chap. 8.

For their morall<sup>h</sup> conditions, Leo thus describeth them, as we haue somewhat mentioned before; The inhabitants of the Cities in Barbary are poore and proude, irefull, and writing all iniuries in marble: vntractable and vnfriendly to strangers: simple, and credulous of impossibilities. The vulgar is ignorant of nature, & esteeme all works thereof diuine and miraculous. They are irregular in their life and actions, exceedingly subiect to choler, speake aloft and proudly, and are often at buffets in the streets. Thus base is their disposition, and no lesse is their estimation with their Lords, who make better account of their beasts. They haue no chiefe men or officers to rule or counsaile them. They are ignorant of merchandise, being destitute of bankers and money-changers, and euery Merchant is constrained to attend his wares himselfe. No people vnder heauen more couetous; few amongst them, which for loue of God or man will entertaine a stranger, or requite a good turne: alwaies encombrd with melancholy, they addict themselves to no pleasures; the reason wherof is, their great pouertie and small gaires.

The shepheards, both in the mountaines and fields, liue a labourforn and miserable life; a beastly, theeuish, ignorant kinde of people, neuer repaying any thing committed to them. The yong women before they marry may haue their louers in all filthinesse, none of them bestowing her virginie on her husband: if they be once married, their louers do no more follow after them, but betake them to some others. The brutish father makes this odious loue to his daughter, & the beastly brother to his whoorish sister. The most of them are neyther Mahumetans, Iewes, nor Christians, but without faith, and without so much as a shadow of Religion, neyther making any prayers, nor hauing any Churches, but liue like beasts. And if any hath any smacke of deuotion, yet hauing no law, Priest, nor any rule to follow, he is forced to liue like the other. Many of them, both in Cities and fields, are found fauoring of better things, both for Arts, Merchandise, and deuotion, as the same Leo sheweth: but thus are the most inclined.

k Some will haue this Qualid or Vlit, to be the Miral-muminis of Africa a Marauinian, whom Leo maketh the Easterne Chalipha.

Now, to adde somewhat further of the Mahumetan Religion in Africa, Ann. 714. (as some<sup>i</sup> doe reckon) the Saracens, by the incitement of Isalm Earle of Scuta, as in our third booke is related, inuaded and conquered Spaine. Leo in his fift booke attributeth this to Muse Gouvernor of Africa, vnder<sup>k</sup> Qualid the Calipha of Damasco, whose next successor deuiued Muse, and sent Iezul to Cairaoan to succede in his roome, whose posteritie there governed till that house was deuiued of the Caliphship, and the seate thereof remoued from Damasco to Bagder. Then was Elagleb made Lieutenant of Africa; and held it with his posterity after him 170. yeares. After which time El Mahdi an hereticall Calipha dispossessed them. Of this El Mahdi and Elcain, and their supposed heresies, I haue no certaine Historie. Certaine it is, that the Mahumetans from the beginning were diuided, as appeareth of Idris in our Historie of Fez: and more fully in the Catalogue of Mahomets next successors, which were the next, not in bloud, but in power. So did Bubac or Abubacer challenge it, and after him Homar and Ottoman: contrary to the Testament of Mahomet, who appointed Hali his heire. Muanis also murdered Hali and his sonne, to obtaine the souerainaty. Thus were they diuided about the true successor of their false Prophet; which fire is not yet extinct. Another diuision was about the interpretation of their law.<sup>l</sup> Abubacer gaue foundation to the Sect Melchia or Melici, embraced by the Africans: Homar was author of the sect Anesia, which the Turks and Zaharans in Africke receiue. Odman or Ottoman left behinde him the Banesia, which hath also his followers. Hali was head of the Imenia, which is followed by the Persians, Indians, many Arabians, and Gelbines of Africa.

1 G. B. B. biff. Sav. lib. 1.

Curio calleth these sects Melici, embraced of the Africans, and as he affirmeth, Afasij of the Syrians and Arabians, Alambels of the Persians, & Buanisi of the Alexandrians and Assyrians. Forren names can scarcely be translated, but withall are traduced, and of diuers diuersly called. Of these foure grew threescore & eight sects of name besides other more obscure. Amongst the rest were the Morabites, who led their liues (for the most part) in Hermitages, and make profession of morall Philosophie, with certain principles principles differing from the Alcoran. One of these was that Morabite, which certaine yeares past shewing Mahomets name imprinted in his brest, being done with aqua fortis, or some such thing, raysed vp a great number of Arabians in Africa, and laid siege to Tripolis, where being betrayed by his Captaine, hee remained the Turkes prisoner, who sent his skin to the grand Seignior. These Morabits affirme that when Ale or Hali fought, he killed ten thousand Christians with one blow of his Sword, which they say was an hundred Cubits long. The Cobitini is as foolish a Sect, one of which shewed himselfe, not many yeares since, at Algier, mounted on a reed, with a bridle and reines of leather, affirming that he had ridden an hundred miles on that horse in one night, and was therefore highly reuerenced. Somewhat also is said before of these African Sects in our Chapter of Fez.

An other occasion diuided Africa from other of the Mahumetane superstition. For when Mnansa and Iezid his sonne were dead, one Marnan seized on the Pontificallie, but Abdalam the sonne of Iezid, expelled him. Hee also had slaine Holem the sonne of Hale a little before, whom the Arabians had proclaimed Caliph, and therefore made the Maraunian stocke of which he descended, odious to the Arabians. They therefore at Cusa chose Abdimely for the Saracenicall soueraigne who was of Hali's posteritie, which they call the Abazian stocke or family. Hee sent Ciasa against Abdalam who fled and was slaine; Ciasa exercised all cruelties against all that Maraunian kindred, drew Iezid out of his Sepulchre, & burnt his carkasse, and slaying all of that house cast their bodies to the beasts and foules to be deuoured. Whereupon one Abed Ramon of that family, (some suppose him the sonne of Mnansius) fled into Africa, with great troups of followers and partakers, where the Saracens received him very honourably. Barinus tells that Ciasa himselfe was Caliph, & that hee descended of Abaz, of whom that stocke was called Abazian; and that he took an oath at his election, to destroy the Maraunians, which he executed in manner as aforesaid by Abidela his kinsman and generall. To Abed Ramon resorted the Mahumetans in Africke, who equalling his heart to his fortunes, called himselfe Miralmuminin, which is mis-pronounced Miramulim, & significth the Prince of the Beleuers; which he did in disgrace of the Abazians. Some attribute the building of Marocco to him, which others ascribe to Ioseph, as before is said, and some to some other Prince, built (as they say) in emulation of Bagder, which the Easterne Calipha builded for the Metropolitan Citie of their Law and Empire. Barinus addeth, that he became a Nabuchodonosor, to whip and scourge Spaine, which Vin his sonne, by Musa his Captaine wholly conquered in the time of Rhodericus. But Palagius soone after with his Spanish forces began to make head against the Moores, and recovered from them some Townes: which warre was continued with diuersitie of chance and change; three hundred yeares and more, till Alphonssus the sixth took Toledo from them: and for diuers good seruices which Don Henrie had done him in these warres, gaue him his daughter in marriage, and for her portion, those parts which he had taken from the Moores in Lusitania, since called the Kingdome of Portugall with all that he or his could conquer from them. Thus was the Kingdome of Portugall planted in the blood of the Moores whereby it hath been so fatned, and hath so batned euersince, that all their greatnesse hath risen from the others losse. For they not only cleared those parts of that Kingdome, of them by an hereditary warre, but pursued them also into Africa, where Iohn the first tooke Seuta from them, so making way to his posteritie, to pierce further, which happily they performed.

Alphonssus the fifth Portugall, took from them many Cities, and Alcafare, and others: especially Emanuel wanne from them many Cities and a great part of Mauritania; the Arabians not refusing the Portugals seruice, till the Seriff arose in Africa, as men now was shewed, and chased the Portugals thence.

Thus Spaine hath reuenged herselfe of the Mahumetan iniuries by her two Armes; of Castile (which at last draue them out of Granada, and tooke diuers Townes in the Main of Africa from them, and in our dayes hath expelled the remainders of that Race quite out of Spaine;) and Portugall, which thus freed it selfe, and burthened them, and by another course did yet more harme to the Mahumetan profession. For Henry sonne of Iohn the first, set forth Fleetes to discover the Coasts of Africa, and

CHAP. XIII.

Of Biledulgerid and Sarra, otherwise called Numidia and Libya.

E haue now, I suppose, wearied you with so long discourse of that part of Africa on this side Atlas, but such is the difference of the mindes wearinesse, from that of the bodie, that this being wearied with one long journey, if the same be continued with a second, it is more then tired: the other after a tedious and iikesome way, when another of another nature presents it selfe, is thereby refreshed, and the former wearinesse is with this varietie abated, yea although it bee, as this is from a better to a worse. Euen the mounting vp this colde hill, and thence to view the Atlantike Ocean on the West, Southward and Eastward the deserts, will neyther make the soule breathlesse with the steepe ascent, nor faint with so wilde prospect of manifold Wilderesses; this of barren Earth, and that of bare Waters; a third seeming to be mixt of both, a Sea without waters, an Earth without soliditie, a land not to hazard shippes with her prime ambushments, but with open violence swallowing men, and disdayning to hold a foot-print as a testimonie of subiection; a wind not breathing ayre, but sometimes the higher Element in fierie heates, and sometimes the lower in sandie showers: once, a Nature mocking Nature, an order without order, a constant inconstancie; where it is Natures pastime to doe and vndoe; to make Mountaines and Valleyes, and Mountaines of Valleyes at pleasure. Strange is the composition of these places, but stranger is that of the minde, which feedes it selfe with the cruell hunger, and fatiars thirst with the insatiable thirstinesse of these deserts. And whereas the bodie seareth to bee drowned, euen there, where it as much seareth to want water, in this sandie journey: the Soule (modell of Diuinitie, life of Humanitie) feares no such accidents to it selfe, but in a sweetnesse of varietie delights to suruey all that her first and Auncient inheritance (howsoeuer since by sinne morrgaged and confiscated) and beeing sequestred from all societies of men, can heere discourse with GOD and Nature in the Desert. Hither now, after so long a preamble, we bring you, and at first present vnto your view Numidia, where you shall bee feasted with Dates which haue given the name Biledulgerid (that is Date-Region) thereunto, and before is made one entire part of seuen, in our <sup>b</sup> diuision of Africa. Ludonius <sup>c</sup> Marmolus writes it Biledulgerid.

The Easterne Border is Eloacar, a Citie distant one hundred myles from Egypt; the Westerne is the Atlantike Ocean; the Northerne, Atlas; the Southerne, Libya. This is the basest part of Africa <sup>d</sup>; the Cosmographers not deigning it the name of a Kingdome, the inhabitants thereof are in many places so farre distant from any other. As for example, Tesset a Citie of foure hundred households is separated from all other habitation three hundred myles. Some places thereof are better peopled. The Numidia described by <sup>e</sup> Ptolomey, Mela, and Plinie, is of farre lesse bounds, and is rather a part of Barbarie, then of this which we heere describe: called (saith Plinie) Metaganis and famous for nothing but Marble and wilde beastes: the Numidæ called Nomades of their pastorall life, and change of pastures, carrying their houses on their Carts. The Cities whereof were Cyrrha, called now Constantina, and Iol, now as some write Bugia. The Numidians are notorious for excessiue Venery. For the Religion of these, whom whom Leo termeth Numidians; hee saith, That in old time they worshipped certaine Planets, and sacrificed to them: and were like to the Persians in worship of the Sunne, and the Fire, to both which they built Temples, & like the Vestals in Rome, kept the fire continually burning. Christian Religion began to quench this fire (as is thought) in the Apostles dayes, which after was peruered by Arianisme, subuerted by Mahometisme. Iewish Religion had heere some footing also, before that Christianitie was preached to them.

a Mermannij Theatrum.

The Numidians liue long, but lose their teeth betimes (sowre sauce for their sweet Dates) and their eyes also pay vntimely tributes to the sandes, which the windes very busily and often send as their searchers and customers, till at last they can see to paie them no more. In all Numidia the French disease (as wee terme it) is vnkowne, and in Libya. I haue knowne, sayth Leo, an hundred persons that haue bene cured of that maladie, onely by passing ouer Atlas and breathing this ayre. This disease was not heard of in Africa, till King Ferdinand expelled the Iewes out of Spaine, and the Moors by lying with the Iewes wiues got the same; and generally infected Barbary, calling it therefore the Spanish disease. The Plague also infecteth Barbary once in ten, fifteen, or five and twentie yeares, and destroyeth great multitudes, because they haue little regard or remedie for it. In Numidia it is scarce knowne once to happen in an hundred yeares, and in the Land of Negros neuer. Worse diseases then Pox or Plague possesse the Numidians namely ignorance of Diuine, Morall, and Naturall knowledge, Treason, Murther, Robberie, without all respect of any thing. If any of them are hired in Barbary, they are employed in base offices Scullians, Dungfarmers, and what not? Neither are the Lybians or Negros much better.

Of the Numidians and Libyans, are five peoples, Zenaga, Guenzaga, Terga, Lema, and Berdeua, and liue all after the same manner, and order, that is, without manners or order at all. Their garments of base cloath, scarce couer halfe their bodie. The Gentlemen (Gentlemen must pardon me the abasing of the name) to bee distinguished from the rest, weare a iacket of blew cotton with wide sleues. Their Steeds are Camels, on which they ride without stirrups or Saddles, and vse a goad in stead of spurs and a leather fastened in a hole bored thorow the gristles of the Camels nose, serues them for a bridle. Mats made of Rushes are their beds, and Wooll growing on their Date-trees yeeldes matter for their Tents. Their food is often-times patience with an emptie belly: which when they fill, bread or meate after any sort is absent: Onely they haue their Camels milke, whereof they drinke a dish-full next their heart: and certaine dry flesh sodde in butter and milke, every one with his hands raking out his share of these dainties after, drinking the broth; and then drink vp a cup of Milke, and supper is done. Whiles Milke lasteth they care not for water, especially in the Spring-time, all which season, some neuer wash hands or face, because they neuer goe to the places where they may haue water. And the Camels haue ioyned with their masters in this neatnesse, not regarding water, whiles they may feed on grasse.

All their life (or that space rather, before they die, not worthie the name of life) is spent in hunting, and robbing their enemies; not staying about three or foure dayes in a place, as long as the grasse will serue their Camels. They haue ouer euery Tribe one, in manner of a King whom they honour and obey. Very rarely is a Iudge found amongst them, and to him such as are litigious ride sometimes five or six dayes iourney. Him will they amply reward with a thousand duckats more or lesse by the yeare. As for Letters, Arts, Vertue, they dwell not in these Deserts. They are very iealous, which is the death of many. Yet are they liberall after their manner to strangers, as I my selfe (it is Leo's report) can testifie. For going ouer the deserts with a Carauan of Merchants the Prince of Zanaga encountered vs with five hundred men on Camels, and caused vs to pay our customes: and then inuited vs to his tents. There did hee kill many Camels to feast vs, both yong and old, and as many gelded, and Ostriches, which they had taken in the way. And when the Merchants shewed themselues loath that hee should make such slaughters of them, he said that it were shame to entertaine them with small cattell only, being strangers. So wee had roast, and boiled: and bread of Panike, very fine; and

Dates great plentie. He honored our company with his presence; but hee ate together with his Nobles separate from vs: and had with him certaine Religious and Learned men, to sit with him, which all the meale-time touched no bread, but only flesh and milke. The reason the Prince gaue vs, because they were borne in the Deserts where no Corne grew. Only they ate bread on certaine solempne Feastes, as at their Easter, and day of Sacrifices. Thus did this liberall Prince spend on vs tenne times the value of his customes. After this manner also liue the Africans called Soaua.

The Tracts of Numidia<sup>a</sup> most in name, are these: Dara, which extendeth it selfe two hundred and fifty miles in length, where are great store of Date-trees; whereof some are male, and some female; the first brings forth only flowers, the other, fruit. And they take a flowred bough of the male, and engraft it in the fem ale: otherwise, the Dates proue nought, and almost all stone. They feed their Goats with the stones of the Dates beaten and therewith they grow fat, and yeeld store of Milke. Segelmese was built (if any list to beleuee <sup>b</sup> Bicri, an African Cosmographer) by Alexander the Great. Heere were certaine Colleges and Temples. The people of the Countrey liued on Dates. They haue no Fleas; a small priuiledge, for they haue infinite store of Scorpions.

b Bicri an African Cosmographer his error.

Figbig, hath industrious and wittie people, whereof some become Merchants, others Students, and goe to Fesse, where hauing obtained the degree of Doctors they returne into Numidia, and are made Priests and Preachers, and so become rich. Tegararin hath traffique with the Negros. They water their Corne-fields with Wel-water, and therefore are forced to lay on much soile. In which respect they will let strangers haue their houses rent-free, onely the Dung of themselves and their beastes excepted. They will expostulate with that stranger, which shall in some nicer humour goe out of doores to that businesse, and aske him, if he know not the place appointed thereunto. Heere were many rich Jewes, which by meanes of a Preacher of Telenfin, were spoiled, and most of them slaine, at the same time that Ferdinand chased them out of Spaine. Techort is a Numidian Towne, exceeding courteous to strangers, whom they entertaine at free-cost, and marry their daughter to them rather, then to the natives. Pecara is exceedingly infested with Scorpions, whose sting is present death, wherefore the Inhabitants in Sommer time forsake their Citie, and stay in their Countrey-possessions till November.

Libya extendeth it selfe from the confines of Eloachat vnto the Atlantike, betwixt the Numidians and Negros. It is one other of the seuen parts, into which wee haue diuided Africa. The Arabians call it Sarra, that is, a Desert. Plinie c in the beginning of his fifth Booke, saith that all Africa by the Græcians was called Libya. Taken in a more proper sense, it is diuersly <sup>d</sup> bounded by the Ancients, and therefore we will heere hold vs to Leo's description. The name Libya is deriued from Libi, a Mauritanian King, as some <sup>d</sup> affirme. Herodorus e sayth, of a woman named Libya. Among the Libyans are reckoned f the Libyarcha, Libyophanices, Libyegyptij, and diuers other Nations, euen of the s Ancients accused for want of inward and outward good things, cunning only in spoile and robbery. The Libyans worshipped one Psaphon h for their god, induced thereunto by his subtiltie. For hee had taught Birdes to sing, Psaphon is a great god; which being set at libertie, chaunted this note in the woods, and easily perswaded the wilde people to this deuotion which Ælian saith, Annon had endeouored in vaine. It was the custome of women to howle in their Temples i whence some of the Bacchanal Rites were borrowed by the Græcians. Vnto the Libyans are reckoned those Nations, whose barbarous Rites are before related in the seuenth Chapter of this Booke. Wee will now come to later obseruations. l Men may trauell eight dayes or more in the Libyan deserts ordinarily without finding any water. The Deserts are of diuers shapes, some couered with grauell, others with sand, both without water: heere and there is a lake, sometime a shrub, or a little grasse. Their water is drawne out of deep pits, and is brackish, and sometimes the sands couer those pits, and then the traellers perish for thirst. The Merchants that trauell to Tombuto, or other places this way, carry water with them on Camels; and if water faile them, m they kill their Camels, and drinke water which they wring out of their guts. Their Camels are of great abilitie to sustaine thirst, sometimes traueilling without drink twelue dayes or more. Otherwise they were neuer able to trauell thorow those deserts.

In the desert of Azaoad there are two Sepulchres of stone, wherein certaine letters ingrauen testifie, that two men were there buried; one a very rich Merchant, who tormented with thirst, bought of the other, which was a carier or transporter of wares, a cup of water, for ten thousand duckats, and died neuertheless; both buyer and seller, with thirst.

Their liues for lewdnesse resemble the Numidians before mentioned, but for length come much short of them, few attaining to threescore yeares. The are (as little need as they haue thereof) often plagued with those clouds of Grasshoppers, which couer the aire, and destroy the earth.

The Libyan desert of Zanhaga beginning at the Westerne Ocean, extendeth it selfe farre and wide betweene the Negros and the Numidians, to the Salt-pits of Tegaza. From the Well of Azaoad, to the Well of Araoan, an hundred and fiftie miles space, is no water; for lacke whereof, many both men and beasts there perissh. Likewise in the desert Gogdem, for nine dayes iourney no drop of water is found. In the desert of Targaz is Manna found, which the Inhabitants gather in little vessels, and carrie to Agadez to sell. They mingle it with their drinke, and with their pottage: It is very holosome. Tegaza is an inhabited place, where are many veines of Salt, which resemble Marble, they digge it out of pits, and sell it to Merchants of Tombuto, who bring them victuals. For they are twentie dayes iourney from any habitation, the cause that sometimes they all die of famine. They are much molested with the South-East winde, which maketh many of them to lose their sight. Bardeoa was found out lately by one Hamar, a guide vnto a Carauan of Merchants, who lost his way by reason of a maladie that fell into his eyes; yet blinde as he was he rode on a Camel; none else being able to guide them: and at euery miles end caused some sand to be giuen vnto him, whereon he smelled, and thereby at last told them of an inhabited place, fortie miles before he came at it: where, when they came, they were denied water, and were forced by force to obtaine it. The Rivers that arise out of Atlas, and by the vnkindnesse of their Kinde, fall this way, finding these thirtie wildernesses to yeeld them the readiest chanel, are trained alongst by the allurements of the sands, stouping and crouching to them, till being further from witnesses, they are either swallowed vp of great Lakes, or else whiles they hold on their pursuit for the Ocean, lose themselves in the search, and whiles they are liberrall to the thirstie sands in the way, at last die themselves (I cannot say, diue themselves, as elswhere in the world) for thirst in the deserts. And yet through these way-lesse wayes, doth couetousnesse carrie, both the Arabians in their roauings, and Merchants with their Carauans to the Negros for wealth: whither, I thinke, at last you expect the comming of this our Carauan also.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the Land of NEGROS.

Nigritarum terra, or the Land of Negros, is either so called of the Riuer Niger, or of the black colour of the Inhabitants: some thinke the Riuer is named Niger of the people: it hath on the North those deserts which we last left; on the South, the Ethiopike Ocean, and the Kingdome of Congo; on the East, Nilus; on the West, the Atlantike. Leo makes Gaogo in the East, and Gualata in the West, the limits thereof. On the side of the Riuer Canaga it is sandie and desert, beyond, it is plentifull; being watered with Niger, which runnes thorow the middest of it. There are no hills neere the banks of Niger, but wooddie places diuers, receptacles of Elephants. Raines doe neither good nor harme: onely Niger ministers them plentie, as Nilus in Egypt: Their encrease is likewise alike; fortie dayes together after the middest of Iune doth Niger encrease, at which time the Negro Townes are flands, and the way to them by boats; and as many it decreaseth. The Merchants in Iuly, August and September, trade in boats made of a hollowed tree (like the Indian Canoas) <sup>b</sup> this Riuer, some thinke, <sup>e</sup> Ortelius and others in their Mappes, make Senaga and Gambia to be armes or mouthes of Niger. <sup>f</sup> Sanutus thinks it to be Rio Grande, Leo alledgeth the opinion of some which thinke it to come from Nilus by some vnder-earth passage. The truth is vncertaine, the angrie deserts nor admitting due search, <sup>f</sup> Leo, lib. 7.

arise out of a Desert called Sau, from a great Lake: some with lesse likelihood, thinke it an arme of Nilus: <sup>c</sup> and some with no truth, thinke it to be deriued from Paradise. It is by Geographers <sup>d</sup> brought from a Lake, which they call Niger, within two degrees of the Equinoctiall, and running thence Northwards, hides himselfe from the violence of the Sunnes fury, vnder a mantle of earth, sixtie miles together; and then the Earth discouering him, he runnes not farre, but in reuenge he couereth a great part of the Earth, and drowneth the same in a Lake called Borneo, till the Earth againe with her strong armes claspes him in streiter bankes, and forceth him to turne his streame Westward, in which way hauing gotten fresh helpe of some other streames, that send in their succours; he againe preuaileth, and ouerthrowes the Earth in the Lake Guber: but she getting vp againe, makes him flee to the Ocean for aide, with whose tide-forces assisted, he rends the Earth into many Ilands, which he holds as captiues betwene his waterie <sup>e</sup> Armes of Senaga, Gambia, and diuers others, which euer let slippe their hold, and yet euer hold them in euerlasting captiuitie. In this combate whiles both parts sweare in contention, a fatter excrement is left behinde, which all this way heates the Earth with admirable fertilitie: especially then when the clouds in the Summer time take Nigers part, and daily marshall their mightie showers to the Rivers aid, shooting off continually in their march their airy Ordinance, with dreadful lightnings, whereat the amazed Earth shrinks in her selfe, and the insulting waters for three moneths space trample ouer all, and send colonies of fishes to inhabit the soile, engirting meane while all the Townes with a strait siege. But when the Sunne, in his Autumne progresse, sends forth the windes to summon the clouds to attend on his fiery Chariot; The Earth by degrees lookes vp with her dirtie face, bemired with washing, and makes vse of the slime, which cannot runne away with the fleeting waters to serue her all the yeare after, as treasurer of her plentie and abundance.

<sup>f</sup> Bichri and Mesludi, ancient African Writers, knew little of these parts: <sup>f</sup> but a Mahometan Preacher in the 380. yeare of the Hegira, made the people of Luntuna, and Libya, of his faithlesse faith: and after that, they were discouered. They liued, saith Leo, like beasts, without King, Lord, Common-wealth, or any gouernment, scarce knowing to sow their grounds: clad in skins of beasts: not hauing any peculiar wife; but lie ten or twelue men and women together, each man chusing which he best liked, Warre they wage with no other Nation, nor are desirous to trauell out of their country. Some worship the Sun at the rising: Others, as the people of Gualata, the Fire: and those of Gaoga are Christians like the Egyptians: Ioseph King of Marocco subdued them: and after that the five peoples of Libya, of whom they learned the Mahometan Law, and other Arts, and the Merchants of Barbary frequented those parts, The Libyans diuided them into fifteen parts, each third part of those five peoples possessing one.

But the <sup>g</sup> present King of Tombuto, Abuaci Izchia, being made Generall of the Forces of Soni Heli the former King, which was a Libyan, after his death slew his sons, and brought the Kingdome to the Negros, conquering many Prouinces. After which he went to Mecca on Pilgrimage, and thereby set himselfe in debt an hundred and fiftie thousand dukats. A great part of those parts by their difference of Language and Religion, is yet vnknowne to vs.

Gualata was subdued by the King of Tombuto, a beggerly Countrey. This Region adioyneth to Cape Blanco. The Portugals, when they discouered these Coasts for Henry the Infanta, traded heere for slaues as farre as Canaga, or Senaga (to which our Nation <sup>h</sup> hath since traded) and is an arme, as is said, of Niger. These people inhabiting on this River, Aloise i di Cadamosto, a Venetian, calls Azanaghi, and saith, that when first the Portugals sailed thither, their simplicitie was such, hauing neuer before seene a shippe, they tooke the shippes for great birds with white wings, out of some strange place comming thither: but when they saw them strike faile, they changed their opinion, and thought them to bee fishes, seeing them a farre off: but when they saw them the next day so far off from that place, they tooke them for night-goblins or spirits.

This did he learne of diuers of the Azanaghi, slaues in Portugal. They hid their faces no lesse then the priuities, esteeming the mouth vnmeet to be seene, whence they belched belched such fowre breath. They had a kinde of Muffler to hide it, and part of the nose, only discouering the same at meat. Other Gouvernours they then had not, only more reuerence was done to the most rich. A beggerly, theeuish, lying, trecherous Nation, as any in the world. They annoint their haire euery day with fatte of fish for great gallentry, whereof they stinke exceedingly. And lest you should thinke better of their eyes then of their nose, their women esteeme it the greatest part of goodly feature, to haue large breasts, which by Art and industrious stretching of them, they enlarge, and some of them haue them hanging to their Nauell.

Neere vnto those are certaine Negros, which suffer not themselves to be seene of any, nor to be heard speake: but haue excellent gold which they exchange with other Negros, which bring vnto them Salt, such as the minerall Salt of Tagazza, and leauing the same, they goe away from thence halfe a dayes iourney: the Negros come downe in certaine Barkes, and lay at euery heape of Salt a quantity of gold, and goe their wayes. When the Salt-Merchants returne, if they like the summe, they take it; if not, they leaue the gold still with the Salt, and goe their wayes: and then the other returne, and what heapes of Salt they finde without gold, they take for their owne: the other, either they leaue more gold for, or else leaue altogether. This seemeth hard to beleue, but many of the Arabians and Azanagi testified it to our Author for truth: The Merchants of Melli affirmed to me, that their Prince had once by a plot taken one of them, thinking to haue learned the condition of that people, but either of sullenesse, or because he could not, he neither eat nor spake, and within three dayes died. Their stature, they which had taken him, affirmed to be a hand higher then themselves: and that their nether lippe was thicke and red, and so great that it hung downe to their breast, and it together with their gummies bloudie: their teeth great, and on each side one very large: their eyes standing out: terrible they were to looke vpon. And because they had apprehended this man by their ambushment, they returned not in three yeares: but after forced by the need of Salt to cure their diseases (whence happily that epidemicke proceeded) they renewed that traffique.

To leaue these farre within Land, and come to the <sup>k</sup> Riuer Senaga, Cadamofo iustly marvelled at the partition which that Riuer caused: for on the one side the Inhabitants were well proportioned, very blacke, and the soile very fertile: on the other side, the Inhabitants meagre, small, swart, and the ground barren. The people, that dwell on the bankes of Niger, are called Gilofi. The Kings name in my time (which was almost an hundred and threescore yeares since) was Zuchali. Hee had thirtie wiues. When Richard<sup>o</sup> Rainolds was there 1591. the Kings name was Amar Melik. All that Region betwixt Senaga and Gambea is called by one general name, Gia Lof: of which Mosim<sup>o</sup> and Barrius write; That in an accident of ciuill wars Bemoiu came to the King of Portugall for ayde, and was there royally entertained and baptised with his followers; of which, some were of such admirable dexteritie and nimblenesse of body, that they would leape vpon a horse as he galloped, and would stand vp right in the saddle, when he ranne fastest, and turne themselves about, and suddenly sit downe; and in the same race would take vp stones laid in order on the ground, and leap downe and vp at pleasure. This Bemoiu was shamefully murdered by Peter Vaz, the Portugall Generall, and the hope of Christianitie in those parts disappointed. This was Anno 1489.

From thence Cadamofo went to Budomel; the Prince whereof was had in great respect by his people: which when they come into his presence, kneele on both their knees, and bowing their heads to the ground, cast sand ouer their shoulders, and on their heads, with both hands, and then go towards him on their knees; and when they speake to him, cast sand ouer their shoulders still, with their head bowed downe, the Prince scarcely deigning them a looke, or word. For euery light offence he would sell their wiues and children. He suffered our Author to goe into his Moschee, where his Arabian Chaplaines, after their manner, mumbled their Mattens ten or twelue times in halfe an houre; all the company rising and falling againe to the earth, and kissing it. He also heard him willingly confute the Mahumetan, and proue the Christian Faith: but said, he thought it was harder for a Christian to be saued then a Negro, because God was a iust God and Lord, who had giuen to vs many good things in this world; to them nothing in comparison, who should therefore in the other world haue their Paradise, which heere they wanted. Easily might he haue beene turned to Christianitie, but for feare of losing his State. His wiues provide him his diet, as it is vsuall among the Negros, and none but his Priests and some princiall men eat with him; which is after a beastly sort lying on the ground, the dish set in the midst, and all taking out the meat with their hands. They eat little at once, but eate often, foure or five times a day. From October to June it raines not there. They haue great Serpents, and many, which they vse to charme: and the Prince when he would Poyson his weapons, did (as was reported) make a great Circle, and enchanted by his Charmes all the Serpents therabouts therinto, and then killed that which seemed to him most venomous, letting the rest go: with the bloud thereof, and the seed of a certaine Tree, he tempered a poyson for that purpose, with which a weapon infected, drawing neuer so little bloud, did kill in a quarter of an houre. They haue great store of Parrats, which are instructed by a maruellous naturall cunning to preuent the Serpents, which would else destroy their neasts. They builde therefore on high Trees, and on the end of some tender bough thereof they fasten a Bull-rish, which hangs downe two spannes, thereunto weauing and working their neast in such sort, that the Serpents for feare of falling, dare not aduenture to deale therewith. The Negros came about Cadamofo, with wonder to see his apparell, and the whitenes of his colour (neuer before had they seene any Christian) and some of them with spittle rupp'd his skin, to see whether his whitenesse were naturall, or no: which perceiuing it to be no tincture, they were out of measure astonished. They would then giue nine, or sometimes fourteene slaues, for a horse furnished. And when they buy a horse, they will bring some of their Enchanters, which make a fire of herbes, and set the horse ouer the smoake, vttering certaine words; and after that annoint him with a thin oyntment, and shut him vp twentie dayes, that none may see him, hanging certaine trumperie about his neck, thinking that hereby they are more secure in battell. Gunnes seemed to them, for their hideous noise, to be of the Diuell. Bag-pipes they thought to be a liuing creature, that thus sang in variable accents. But when they were suffered to handle them, they thought them to be some heauenly thing, that God had made with his owne hands, to sound so sweetly. They beheld the Shippe with great curiositie; and Eyes that were earued in the Prow of the Shippe, they tooke to bee eyes indeede, by which it saw how to direct the course at Sea. They said, the Christians that could thus make voyages by Sea, were great Enchanters, and comparable to the Diuell; themselves had enough to doe to trauell by Land. Seeing a Candle burne in the night, they which knew not to make any light but their fires, esteemed it wonderfull. Honey they haue, which they sucke out of the combes, but the Waxe they hurled away, till they were instructed how to make Candles thereof.

Senega (Boterus saith) comes from the Lakes Chelonidi. An hundred and fiftie Leagues from the mouth it hath certaine Falls, or Cataracts (as Nilus hath) that men may passe vnder the fall of the streame, without wetting. Sannus affirmeth that Senega is the same which Ptolemy calls Darandus, Gambea or Gambia that which he calls Stachir, and Rio Granne is Niger.

Cadamofo doubled the Promotorie, called Cape Verde, or the greene Cape, because of the greene Trees which the Portugalls (which had first discovered it in the yeare before) found there growing in abundance; as Cape Blanca, or the White Cape, was so called of the White Sands theré. The Inhabitants they found were of two sorts, Barbaciis, and Sereri. They haue no Prince. They are great Idolaters, and haue no Law: but are very cruell. They poyson their Arrowes; with which and the situation of their Countrey, they haue preserved themselves from the Kings of Senega.

In Gambia they were, some Idolaters of diuers sorts, some Mahumetans. They were also great Enchanters. Their liuing as at Senega, saue that they eat Dogs-flesh. Heere the Prince hunted an Elephant, and gaue them to eate: the flesh is strong and vsuall. The Elephants delight in myre like Swine. They hunt them in the woods: for in the the Plaines an Elephant would, without running, soone take and kill the swiftest man; whom yet they hurt not, except they be first prouoked.

Heere was a kinde of Fish (Cadamofo p calleth it Cauallø, and his Latine Interpreter, Piscis Caballinus; I take it for the Hippopotamus, or Riuer-Horse) which is (saith he) as bigge as a Cow; his legges short, with tuskes like to a Bores, but so great, that I haue seene one of two spannes, and longer, clouen-footed, and headed like a Horse: he liueth on both Elements, sometimes in the Water, other-whiles on the Land. The women vpon their breasts, neckes, and armes, had certaine workes, done with a Needles point, heated in the fire, in manner as with vs they worke hand-kerchiefs. This being done in their youth, would neuer out. The like flesh-branded vvorkes they vse at Cape Sagres, as Pietro q di Sintra, a Portugall, obserued vpon their bodies and faces. The Inhabitants there are Idolaters, and worshippe Images of wood, to whom they offer some of their meate and drinke, when they goe to their meales. They goe naked, couering their priuie parts with the barks of Trees. This is r in Guinea.

A little from thence they found men who vsed as great brauery in their eares, which they bored full of holes, and ware therein rings of gold in rowes or rankes. They ware one great ring in another hole bored thorow their nose, like to Buffles in Italy: which when they eat their meate, they tooke away. The men and women of sort ware such rings also in their lippes, in like sort as in their eares, an Ensigne of their Nobilitie and greatnesse, which they put in and out at pleasure. Beyond the Riuer of Palmes they found others thus beringed, and for greater gallantrie ware about their necks certaine chaines of teeth, seeming to be the teeth of men. They tooke a Negro, whom they carried into Portugall, who affirmed, if a woman which onely could vnderstand him, did interpret him rightly, that in his Countrey were Vnicornes. On this Coast the Portugals erected a Castle, called Mina, for their better trading. And these Countries haue since beene sought to by French, Flemish, and many of our English Merchants. In the year 1553. * Thomas Windam and Antony Pintado, a Portugall, in two English ships traded alongst those Coasts, as far as Benin, where they presented themselves to the King, who sate in a great Hall, the walls whereof were made of earth without windowes, the roofo of thin boards, open in diuers places. His Nobles about him neuer looke him in the face, but sit cowering vpon their buttockes, with their elbowes vpon their knees, and their hands before their faces, not looking vp till the King command them. And when they depart out of his presence, they turne not their backs vpon him. Such reuerend regard doth that Negro-King receiue of them.

The next year 11 Master John Lock went for Captaine into those parts, to trade for Gold, Graines, and Elephants teeth. And after that, diuers Voyages were thither made by William x Towerjon, who obserued at the Riuer of Saint Vincent, strange Trees, with great leaues like great Dockes, longer then that a man could reach the toppe of them; and a kinde of Pease by the Sea-side growing on the Sands like Trees, with stalkes seuen and twentie paces long. Diuers of the women had breasts exceeding long. At the Cape Tres puntas they made him sweare, By the Water of the Sea, that he would not hurt them, before they would trade with him. King Abaan a Negro, entertained our men kindly; he caused to be brought a pot of Wine of Palme, or Co, which they draw forth of Trees, as wee haue elsewhere obserued; but their ceremonies in drinking are thus: First, they bring forth their pot of drinke, and then make a hole in the ground, and put some of the drinke into it, and after that cast in the earth againe, and thereon set their pot, and with a little thing made of a Gourd, take out of the same drinke, and put it vpon the ground in three places: and in diuers places they haue certaine bunches of the pills of Palme-trees set in the ground before them, and there they put in some drinke, doing great reuerence in all places to the same Palme-trees. All these ceremonies done, the King tooke a Cup of Gold, in which they put Wine, and whiles he dranke, all the people cried Abaan, Abaan, with certaine other words; and then they gaue drinke to euery one. The like ceremonies they vse in all the Countrey.

In Benine 7 the people goe naked till they be married; and then are clothed from

They haue heere great spouts of water falling out of the Ayre, which if they light on a Shippe, doe endanger the same. They fall like the pillars of Churches. As for those voyages to these parts, made by <sup>a</sup> Rutter, Fenner, Ingram, or others, I referre them to Master Hackluyts Collections. One writeth, <sup>a</sup> That the King of Benin hath six hundred wiues, with all which twice a yeare he goeth in pompe. The Gentlemen haue, some of them fourescore, some fourescore and ten. The meanest ten or twelue. At Cape de Lopo Gonsalues, some pray to the Sunne, others to the Moone, or to certaine Trees, or to the Earth, esteeming it a great sinne to spit vpon it, from whence they receiue their food. Men and women pinke their bodies, putting thereon grease mixed with colour. They will not drinke before they put out some, and drinke not when they eate. They offer their wiues to strangers. The King keepeth his daughters when they are growne, for wiues, and the Queenes with like incestuous abomination vse their sonnes. They paint their bodies red: vse Bananas dried in stead of bread, and lay all their meats in a dish together.

 These wormes come out of their legges, or some flithie part.

These Coasts are vsually called Guinea, by a more generall appellation, although that be properly one Region only. About the Castle of Mina they are subiect to such Wormes, as Master Tenkinson <sup>b</sup> hath obserued to grow vpon men at Boghar in Bactria, by drinking the water of the Riuer there: which are an ell long, and must be pulled out by degrees, euery day a little, if they breake by the way it is very dangerous. The torture they cause is vnspeakable: they breed in the armes and legs, yea sometimes in the yard and cod: one man hath had ten of them at one time.

The Inhabitants of Benin <sup>c</sup> obserue Circumcision, and some other Superstitions, which may seeme Mahumetan, but are more likely to be ancient Ethnike Rites. For many Countries of Africa admit Circumcision, and yet know not, or acknowledge not Mahometisme, but are either Christians (as the Cophi and Abassines) or Gentiles: they cut or rase the skinn, with three lines drawne to their Nauell, esteeming it necessary to saluation. They will not easily doe iniurie to any, especially a stranger. They haue Birds in such respect, that it is deadly to any that shall hurt them. And some are appointed to haue a peculiar care of them, and to provide them food; which they doe in high Mountaines, where they lay meat for them: which they come and eate.

Guinea <sup>d</sup>, which the Alarabes call Genea, and the Inhabitants Genij, consisteth with Gualata: a Prouince of such estimation to the Portugals, that their King stiled himselfe, 1482. Lord of Guinea, although the Castle of Mina <sup>e</sup> were the cheefe peece he there possessed; which King Iohn in the yeare 1486. ennobled with the title of a Citie, and granted Priuiledges to such as would there inhabite. But of the Portugalls actions heere, and of the description of these and other parts of Ethiopia, Marmelin hath largely written. Some in later Discoveries haue obserued, That the Inhabitants of Guinea <sup>f</sup> giue Religious respect vnto certaine Trees. And in the yeare 1598 certaine Hollanders cutting them, and not ceasing at the perswasion of the Negros, whose Superstitions in that case they derided, it passed from words to blowes betwixt them, and the Dutchmen were forced to get them to their shippes; one of their company being slaine in the chase. But the murderer was offered to the Hollanders to be punished: which they refusing, his countrey-men cut off his head, and quartered his bodie, bestowed the one as a monument of reuenge, ouer the slaine parties graue, the other on the Fowles, vnburied. Their Trees <sup>g</sup> are alway greene: some haue leaues twice a yeare. They seldome see the Sunne, either rising or going downe, by the space of halfe an houre. Their Winter beginneth in Aprill, which yet is their time of Haruest. Mays was brought thither out of America. In Aprill, May, and Iune, they haue much raine, and the same very dangerous to the bodie, and rotting the cloths, if it be not presently dried. It is often as warme as if it were sodden. They haue some Snakes thirtie foote long, as much as sixe men can carrie: they haue also a beast like a Crocodile, called Langhadi (we haue spoken of the like about Pegu and Bengala) which neuer goeth into the water: Spiders as big as the palme of ones hand, which do not spin; store of Cameleons; Dogs woolly, with sharp snouts, of diuers colours, which cannot barke, driuen to the Market as sheepe, tied one to another; blew Parrets; many sorts of Apes; black Flies which seeme to burne: In Senega some Snakes haue mouths so wide, that they swallow a whole sheep without tearing; they haue winged Dragons, with tailes, long mouths with many teeth, being blew and greene, which some Negros worship. They boare a hole in the Palme-wine tree, whence issueth a white iuice, first sweet, and after by standing it becomes sowre. It is somewhat like the Coco tree. The Palma is without branches, the fruit growes on the top, which within is like Pomegranats, full of grains, without of a golden colour. They buy gentility with gifts, a Dog, a Sheepe, a Cow. In their creation is obserued much solemnity. They know not how to number their yeares, but seeme to liue long. In their Winter they haue much sicknesse and mortality. The goods of the deceased descend not to his children, but to the brethren, if he haue any: otherwise, to his father. If it be a woman, her husband deliuereth her marriage goods to her brethren. When the King dies, the Sepulchre is made like a house, and as well furnished as if they were aliue, being guarded night and day by armed men, to bring him any thing which he shall need.

Their noses are flat, not naturally, but by pressing them downe in their infancie, esteeming it a great part of beautie. Their hot stomackes can digest raw flesh; and therefore <sup>d</sup> Alexander Aphrodisiens, and Celsus Rhodiginus, that thinke their naturall heat, extracted to the outward parts, to be the cause of their blacknesse, are deceived. They eat their enemies which are slaine in the wars (which are very rife amongst those Nations) and those which are taken, are euermore prisoners. And in some more important warres which they vndertake, they will burne their dwellings before they go, lest either the enemy might possesse them by conquest, or themselves become too mindefull of a returne. In these warres they prouide themselves of some light armor, wearing at such times no other apparrell. Their women are vnfaithfull Secretaries in Natures most hidden secrets, vsing in the sight of men, women, boyes, and girles, to be deliuered of their children, whom after they circumsise, whether they be of the male- or female sexe.

CHAP. XV.

And if we may haue leaue to follow a Dutch guide, well acquainted in these parts, whereof he hath written a very large <sup>a</sup> Treatise, you may feast with them at their spousals, and againe, after a view of their liues, at their funerals. At the mariages of their daughters they giue halfe an ounce of gold, to buy wine for the Bridale; the King himselfe giueth no other portion. The Bride in the presence of her friends sweareth to be true to her husband, which the man doth not. For adultery he may diuorce her, and the adulterer payeth to the King foure and twentie Pesos of gold, and the husband also may driue him out of Towne: but the Dutch men paid no fine therefore, the women onely were blamed, and paid foure pesos. If the husband suspects his wife, hee makes triall of her honestie, by causing her to eat salt with diuers Fetisso <sup>b</sup> ceremonies hereafter mentioned, the feare whereof makes her confesse. They haue many wiues, if they can buy and keepe them: each dwelleth in a house by her selfe, though there be ten of them: they eat and lodge asunder: sometimes they will bring their cheere together. The husband closely takes which he will haue lye with him to his roome, where their bed is a matre. The women after trauell wash themselves, and accompany not with their husbands for three months after. The childe newly borne hath a cleane cloth wrapped about the middle, and is laid down on a mat. The mothers vse to beare their children at their backs, and so traue with them, none prouing lame, notwithstanding that shaking of their bodies: they giue them the brest ouer their shoulders. When it is a month old, they hang a net about the body, like a shirt, made of the bark of a tree, hanged full of fetissos, to secure it from the Diuel, who otherwise would (they think) carry it away. They hang the haire full of shells; and corals about the neck, armes and legs, applying diuers fetissos or wreaths with superstitious fancies, that one is good against vomiting, a second for falling, a third for bleeding, a fourth to make it sleep, a fifth against wild beasts, and so on in the rest, giuing to each Fetisso a seuerall name. They quickly learne them to eat, and then leaue them about the house like dogs: they soone learne to go, to speak, to swim. When they are first borne they are not black, but reddish as the Brasilians. Each woman brings vp her own: they teach them no ciuilitie, and beat them sometimes cruelly with stauers. When they are eight, or ten, or twelue yeares old, they learne them to spin bark-threed and make nets: after that they go with their fathers to fish. At eigheteene yeares old they begin to set vp for themselves, two or three of them together hiring a house & Canoa: and then they couer their priuities, grow amorous, and their fathers look out wiues for them. They haue little haire on their face at thirty: they weare nailles as long as the ioynt of a mans finger, as a token of gentility: which is also obserued by Merchants: they keepe them very cleane, and as white as Iuory. They are great in flesh beyond men of these parts. At threescore and ten, or fourescore, their blacknes decays, and they grow yellow. They haue smal bellies, long legs, broad feet, long toes, sharp sight, quick wit, Estridge mawes; are spiteful, curiously neat, drunkards, theues, lecherous, and subiect to the Pocks, whereof they are not ashamed, as neither of shewing their nakednes. Yet is it holden shame with them to let a fart, which they wodered at in the Hollanders, esteeming it a contempt.

Their women in Guinea.

Their ornaments.

The women go long naked, are libidinous, and would boast of their filthines, if they could haue their pleasure with the Dutch, decking themselves of purpose. They weare beads about their neckes, and straw-fetissos about their feet. (The Mulato women in Mina cut their haire short for brauery.) They cut three gashes on their forehead an inch long, and likewise on their cheekes neere their eares, which they suffer to swell, and colour it with painting. They make also white strakes vnder their eies. They curl and fold the haire of their head, making a hill in the midst like a hat, with frizzles round about. They vse long combs with two teeth only, each a finger length: these they vse also for salutation, plucking them out and in, as heere, men put off or on their hats: they make also white spots on their faces, which asfarre off shew like pearles. They raise their armes and breast with diuers cuts, on which euery morning they lay colours, which cause them to shew like black silke doublets cut and pinked. They haue earings and bracelets of copper: the vnmarried mayds weare thirtie or sortie on each arme of yron: the common queanes weare copper rings with bells on their legs.

These women are strong, nimble, wel proportioned, good house-wiues, home-keepers and cookes: not very fruitfull. The riches of the Guineans are store of wiues and children. They take great pride of white teeth, which therefore they rub with a certaine wood: they shew like Iuorie. Their garment is a fadom or more of linnen cloth, which they weare about their bodies, from beneath the breasts to the knees: vpon which they girt a peece of blew or yellow cloth, whereon hang their kniues and keyes, and diuers wispes of straw, or fetissos. When they go to market, they wash them from top to toe, and put on other cloths. They buy no more but for that day, or meale.

Their bread.

Their diet.

They stamp their milia as we do spice, fan it in a wooden dish, steepe it ouer-night with a little mais, and in the morning lay it on a stone, and (as Painters their colour) grinde it with another stone, till it be dowe, which they temper with fresh water and salt, and make rolls thereof twice as big as a mans fist, and bake it a little on the hearth. This is their bread. Their diet is strange: as raw flesh, handfuls of graine, large draughts of Aqua-vita, Dogs, Cats, Buffles, Elephants, though stinking like carrion, and a thousand magots creeping in them. There are little birds like Bullfinches, which make their nests on small ends of twigs for feare of snakes: these they eat aliue with their feathers. The Moors say that within land they eat dried snakes: and these wil eat dogs guts raw, which our Author hath seene: and a Boy left in pawne on shipbord for debt, which had meat enough, yet would secretly kill the hens, that he might eat their raw guts. They will eat old stinking fish dried in the Sunne: yet can they be dainty if they may haue it. Some make a kind of Ale of Mays and water sodden together, called Poiton. Sometimes foure or fiue together will buy a pot of Palme-wine, which they powre into a great Caba, which groweth on trees, and some of them are halfe as big as a kilderkin, round about which they sit to drink, each sending a little pot-full to his best wife. When they first drinke, they take it out with a smal cabas, and laying their handes on the head of him which first drinketh, cry aloud Tantosi, Tantosi: he drinks not all off, but leaues a little to throw on the ground to the Fetisso, saying I. ou. spouting out some on their Fetisso's on their armes, & legs, otherwise thinking they could not drink in quiet. They are great drinkers, and feed as vnmanly as Swine, sitting on the ground and cramming, not staying till the morsell in the mouth bee swallowed, but tearing their meat in peeces, with the three mid-fingers cast it into their mouthes ready gaping to receiue it. They are alway hungrie and would eat all day long: yea the Dutchmen had great stomakes whilst they were there. He that gets most, must be most liberal, industrious to get and as prodigall in spending vpon their lickour.

Before the Portugals trade they had no Merchandise, but went naked: and the people within Land were afraid of them, because they were white and apparelled. They come to trade in the ships in the morning: for about noone the winde (before blowing from land comes from Sea, and they are not able to endure the roughnesse thereof. They beleue, that men, when they die, goe into another world, where they shal haue like need of many things, as here they haue, and therefore vse to put with the dead Corpes some parts of household. And if they loose any thing, they thinke that some of their friends, which in the other world had need thereof, came thence and stole it. Of a God being asked, they said he was blacke and euil, and did them much harme; their good, they had by their owne labour, and not by his goodnesse. Circumcision they vse, and some other Turkish Rites. They hold it vnmeet and irreligious to spit on the ground. They haue no Letters, nor Bookes. They obserue a Sabbath, herein agreeing, and yet disagreeing, with Turke, Iew, and Christian, for they obserue Tuesdaies rest, from their Fishing and Husbandrie. The Wine (of the Palme-tree) which is that daie gathered, may not be sold, but is offered to the King, who bestoweth it on his Courtiers to drinke at night. In the midst of the Market-place they had a Table standing on foure Pillars, two elnes high, whose flat couer was made of Straw and Reedes woven together. Hereon were set many strawen Rings, called Fetissos or Gods, and therein Wheat, with Water and Oyle, for their God, which they thinke eates the same. Their Priest they call Fetissero, who euery festiuall day placeth a Seat on that Table, and sitting thereon, preacheth to the people, the contents whereof I could neuer learne: which done, the women offer him their infants, and hee sprinkleth them with water, in which a Newt or Snake doth swimme, and then besprinkleth the Table aforesaid with the same water, and so uttering certaine wordes very loud, and stroking the children with certaine colour, as giuing them his blessing: he drinketh of that water, the people clapping their hands and crying I. ou, I. ou, and so hee dismisseth his deuout assembly.

Many weare such Ringes of Straw next their bodies, as preseruatiues from those dangers, which else their angrie God might inflict on them. In honour of the same Deitie (or Deuill, as it seemes they conceiue him to bee) they bechalke themselves with a kind of Chalkey Earth, and this is vnto them instead of their Morning Matrons. The first bit at meales, and first draught, is consecrate to their Idoll, and therefore they besprinkle therewith those Rings, which I said they weare on their bodies: If Fishers cannot speed at Sea, they giue a peece of Gold to the Fetissero, to reconcile their frowning Saint. Hee therefore, with his wiues, walkes a kinde of procession through the Citie, smiting his breast, and clapping his hands with a mightie noyse, till he come at the shore: And there they cut downe certaine boughes from the Trees, and hang them on their neckes and play on a Tymbrell.

Then doth the Fetissero turne to his wiues and expostulates with them, and withall hurleth into the Sea Wheat and other thinges as an offering to Fetisso, to appease his displeasure towards the Fishermen. When the King will sacrifice to Fetisso, hee commands the Fetissero to enquire of a Tree, whereto he ascribeth Diuinitie, what hee will demand. He with his wiues, come to the Tree, and in a heape of ashes, there prouided, prickes in a branch, plucked off the Tree, and drinking water out of a Bason, spouts it out on the branch, and then daubeth his face with the ashes: which done he declareth the Kings question, and the Deuill out of the Tree makes answer. The Nobles also adore certaine Trees, and esteeme them Oracles: and the Deuill sometimes appeareth vnto them in the same in forme of a blacke Dogge, and otherwhiles answereth without any visible apparition. There are which worshipp a certaine Bird, * which is spotted and painted (as it were) with starres and resembleth the lowing of a Bull in her voyce. To heare this Bird lowing in their iourney, is to them a luckie boding, saying, Fetisso makes them good promises, and therefore set him, in that place where they heare it, a Vessell of Water and Wheat. And as the Earth and Ayre yeeld them Deities, so the Sea is not behide in this liberalitie, but yeelds certaine Fishes to their canonization. In this respect they take not the Tunie at all, and the Sword-fish they take, but eat not till his sword be cut off, which is dried, and holden in great veneration. The mountaines would bend their fullen browes, if they should not haue some red letters in their Kalendar, to which their tops aspire, threatening to scale Heauen, or ouerwhelme the Earth, if this Fetissan portion did not pacifie their angrie moode, by daily presents of meat and drinke set thereon. Neyther can Nature alone vsurpe this Prauilege but Art, in other things her emulous corriuall, and farre vnequal competitor, in this matter of God-making, commonly gets the vpper hand. And therefore they with their ceremonious Art can make them Fetisso's, or Gods, at pleasure. Principally in their Funerals they obserue it: for when one is dead, they make a new Fetisso or Ring of Straw, and pray it to beare the dead partie companie, and protect him in his iourney into the other World. They lay the dead bodie on a Matte on the ground, wind it in a woollen cloth, set a stoole vnder the head, which is covered with a Goats skin, the bodie is strawed ouer with ashes, his armes laid by his sides, his eyes open: and so continueth halfe a day, his best-beloued wife sitting by (as the Husband doth also at the death of his wife) crying Ary, and wiping her face with a wisp of straw. Women goe round about the house singing and beasing on Basons, and about the corpse likewise, and then againe about the house. The eldest Mormi or Gentlemen, goe about from house to house with a Bason, wherein each puts the value of twelue pence in Gold, with which they buy a Cow, with whose bloud the Fetisso appeaseth the Fetisso. The friends and kinsfolkes assembling, prepare a Henne, and then setting themselves in a corner of the dead mans house, they place all his Fetisso's on a row, the greatest in the midst, adorning the same with Garlands of Pease & Beans, like to the Popish praying-Beads. Then they sprinkle the same with the bloud of the Hen and hang a chaine or Garland of hearbes about their necks. After this, the women set the Hen, now sodden, in the midst of the Fetisso's, and the Fetissero takes water in his mouth, which amiddest his Exorcismes and Charmes he spouts on those Fetisso's, & taking two or three hearbes from his necke, hee rols the same in forme of a ball, which after certaine ceremonies he layeth downe, and so doth, till all his Hearb-garland be spent; and then makes them all into one great ball, and therewith besmeareth his face, and thus is it made a Fetisso; and the partie deceased is now at rest. In the meane time the dearest of his wiues filleth all the house with mourning, the neighbours and friends with Songs and Musicke (such as they haue) and Dances. And at last they take vp the Corps, and carrie it to the Graue, which is digged foure foote deepe, and couer it with stakes, that nothing may fall therein. The women creeping about the Sepulchre, ex-postulate with him, Why he would leaue them? Then doe they hurle on earth, so that none can get into the Corps; for he hath with his Household, Armour, and whatsoever he vsed in his life time; Wine also (if before he loued it) to drinke in the other World. Lastly, they couer the Sepulchre with a Roofe, to defend all from Raine. If the King dies, not onely greater solemnitie is vsed: but the Nobles thinking it necessarie for so great a Personage to haue attendants, they offer vnto him, one, a seruant; another, a wife; a third his sonne or daughter, till there be many of both sexes in that other life to attend him. All which are suddenly slaine at vnawares, and their bloudie carcasses, buried together with the King. Yea, the Kings wiues which loued him best, refuse not this last and euerlasting service, as they suppose; but yeeld themselves to die, that they may liue with him. The heads of all these, thus slaine, are set vpon poles round about the Sepulchre: Meate, Drinke, Rayment, Armes, and other Vtenils are added for their vse, and and buried with them. After the buriall they goe to the Sea, or Riuer, and their obserue other Rites: some washing, while others play on Basons and Instruments. The Widow or widower is laid backward on the water with diuers wordes of complaint. At last they cloth them, returne to the dead-mans house, make great cheere, and drinke themselves drunke. They, in vncertaintie of criminall accusations, as of Adulterie, Murther, and such like, haue a certaine water<sup>a</sup> offered them to drinke by the Fetisso, made of those hearbes whereof their Bal-Fetisso is made, and in effect like the cursed water, Numb. 5. none daring to drinke, for feare of sudden death thereby, if he be guiltie.

They dare not come out of their houses in thunder: for then, they say, many of them are carried away by the Deuill and throwne dead on the ground. When they pray for Raine, they wash themselves and cast Water ouer their heads with diuers words, and spitting in the water. Their Kings are electiue, and must bee liberall, or else are expelled. Once a yeare he makes a great feast for the common people, buying: to that end all the Palme-wine, and many Kine, the heads of which are painted and hanged in the Kings chamber in testimonie of his bountie. Hee inuirteth also his neighbour-Kings, Captaines and Gentlemen, and then prayeth and sacrificeth to his Fetisso, which is the highest tree in the Towne. The men with Fencing, Drumming, Singing, Leaping; the Women with Daunces, honour this feast. Euery King holdeth his feast apart, one soone after another, in the Sommer-time. The King comes litle abroad. In the Morning and Eueing, his Slaues blow or sound certaine Trumpets made of Elephants teeth: his wiues do then wash and annoint his bodie. He hath also his Gard. He sits<sup>b</sup> (in state) on a stoole, holding in his handes the taile of a Horse or Elephant to drine away flies: gallantly adorned, with Rings of Gold on his Armes and legges and necke, with coral Beads also, wherewith likewise he maketh diuers knots on his beard. His children<sup>c</sup> (if they will haue any thing) when they are of age, must get it: the common people would not like that he should maintaine them idle. Only he bestowes on them their marriage gift, and a slave. They chuse by most voyces<sup>d</sup> a successour in another kindred, who inheriteth the treasure of the dead King, and not his own children. Controuersies are tried<sup>e</sup> by the Fetissos Pot, as is said: if it be for murther, he may redeeme his life with monie, one moiety to the King, the other to the Courtiers: if he cannot, the Executioner<sup>f</sup> binds his hands behind him, couers his face, leades him to a place alone, and causing him to kneele downe, thrusts him through, and then (for before they thinke him not dead) cuts off his head: and quartering the bodie, leaues it to the foules and beastes. His head is boiled by his friends and the broth eaten, and then they hang it by the Fetisso. They make solemnne oathes and promises on this manner: they wipe their faces, shoulders, breasts, and all their bodie, on the soles of your feet, thrice saying Ian, Ian, Ian, stamping, kissing the Fetisso's, on their armes, & legs. The land is all the Kings, & therefore they first till his land, & then by composition for themselves. They begin on a Tuesday, and when the Kings worke is done, haue a feast in honour of their Fetisso, to prosper their husbandrie. And now leaving the Coasts of Guinea, Benin, Melegete, and other Regions of the Negros adioyning to the Sea, we will look back againe into the in-land contries: whereof Gualata is 100. miles distant from the Ocean, and hath already bin mentioned. The next therunto, in Leos Relations, is Gheneoa, which is not the same with Guinea before mentioned, if Leo had true Intelligencé, but is situate betwixt Gualata, Tombuto, and Melli, and in one place bordereth on the Ocean, where Niger falleth into the Sea. They had great Traffique with the Merchants of Barbarie. They haue Gold vncoynded, and vse also yron monie. There is neyther Towne nor Castle, but one. where the Prince, with Priests, Doctours, and Merchants reside. Those Priests and Doctours goe apparrelled in white, the rest in blacke or blew Cotton. In July, August, and September, Niger ouerfloweth it. Iachia, the King of Tombuto, conquered it, and kept the King Prisoner at Gago, till his death. Melli is the head Citie of a Kingdome, which hence taketh name, and hath in it great store of Temples, Priests, and Readers or Professors, which read in the Temples, because they haue no Colledges. They are more ingenious then other Negros, and were the first that embraced the Mahometan Law, Iachia also subdued them.

Tombuto

Tombuto was founded in the yeare of the Hegeira 610. And it is situate within twelue miles of a branch of Niger. There are many Wels, to receive the ouerflowing waters of Niger. Salt is brought them fūe hundred myles from Tagazza, and is very deere. I, at my being there (sayth Leo) saw a Camels burthen solde for fourescore Duckats. The King had many Plates and Scepters of Gold, some whereof weighed thirteene hundred pounds. They which speake to him, cast Sand ouer their heades, as Cadamofo obserued at Budomel. The King would admit no Iewes into his Citie, and hateth them so extremely, that hee would confiscate the goods of such Merchants, as held traffique with them. He greatly honoured men of Learning, and no merchandize yeilded more gaine then Bookes. There were many Iudges, Doctors, and Priests, to whom he allowed their stipends. The people vsed much dancing in the streets, from ten to one a clocke at night. They mingle Fish, Milke, Butter, and Fleish together in their Gallimaufey kind of diet, neither toothsome nor holsome. Hamet, King of Marocco, conquered the same Kingdome 1589. and also Gago, and other Countreies of the Negros, extending his Empire six months iourney from Marocco, by Camels; whose riches thereby acquired, appeare in the letters of Lawrence Madoc and we before haue touched.

Gago is much frequented by Merchants and thinges solde at excessiue rates. In an hundred myles space you shall scarce find one in those partes that can read, or write: and the King accordingly oppresseth them with taxations.

In Guber they sow their Corne on the waters, which Niger, with his ouerflowings brings vpon the Countrey, and haue abundant recompence. Izchia, King of Tombuto, conquered the King of Guber; of Agadez also, and of Cano, which haue great store of Merchants: Likewise of Casena, and Zegzeg, and Zansara; in which I finde little worth the remembrance. Cano hath some Relikes of Christianitie, and they are named by the Apostles names. Guangara was not onely oppressed by the said Izchia of Tombuto, but by Abraham King of Borno.

Borno confineth with Guangara on the West, and extendeth Eastwardes fūe hundred miles. The people haue no Religion, neither Christian, Iewish, nor Mahometan; but like Beasts liue with their wiues and children in common: and as a Merchant which liued long amongst them, and learned their Language, told Leo, they haue no proper names, as in other Nations, but as they giue him some name of distinction by his height, farnesse, or other peculiar accidents. The King warreth with his neighbours: he is descended of the Libyan people Bardoa. For maintenance of his Warres hee will giue great prices for Horses, exchanging fūteene or twentie slaues for one, which slaues he tooke from his enemies. When I was in this Kingdome, I found there many Merchants that were wearie of this traffique, because they staid for their slaues till the King returned from his Warres. Yet the King seemes to be rich: all his Horse-furniture, Stirrups, Spurres, Bridles, Bt., were of Gold; and his Dishes, Platters, or whatsoever he did eat or drinke in: yea, his chaines for his Dogges were for the most part of most fine gold. He hath many both white and blacke people, subiect to him.

Gaoga bordereth Westward on Borno, and thence trendeth to Nubia, betwene the Deserts of Serta on the North, and another Desert confining on a winding crooke of Nilus, about fūe hundred miles square. It hath neither Ciuitie, Letters, nor Government. The inhabitants haue no vnderstanding, especially they which dwell in the mountaines, who goe naked in the Sommer-time, their priuities excepted. Their houses are made of boughes which easily take fire. They haue store of cattell. A hundred yeares before Leo's time they were brought in subiection by a Negro slaue, who first slew his Master, and by helpe of his goods made preyes in the next Regions, exchanging his Captiues for Horses of Egypt: and so became King of Gaoga. His Nephewes sonne Homara then reigned, and was much respected by the Soldan of Cairo. Leo was at his Court, and found him a man passing liberall. He much honored all that were of the linage of Mahomet.

The Nubæ in old times were many Kingdomes, as Strabo affirmeth, not subiect to the Ethiopians: and were then Nomades, or Wanderers, and Robbers. As it is now taken (John Leo being our author) Nubia stretcheth from Gaoga vnto Nilus, hauing the Egyptian confines on the North; and the desarts of Goran on the South. They cannot faile out of this Kingdom into Egypt. For ther iuer Nilus, whiles it is couertous of largeness, loofeth his deepenes, and couering certaine Plaines, becommeth so shal- low, that both men and beafts may wade ouer. Dangala is their chiefe towne, and hath ten thousand Families, but ill built, their houses being chalke and straw. The inha- bitants with their trafficke to Cairo become rich.

There is in this Kingdome great store of Corne and Sugar, Ciuit, Sandall, and Iuo- rie. They haue a strong poison, one graine whereof giuen to ten persons, will kill them all in a quarter of an houre; and one man, if he alone take it, presently. An ounce here- of is folde for a hundred ducats. It is not solde but to strangers, which first take their oath that they will not vse it in their countrey. And if any sell thereof secretly, it costs him his life: for the King hath as much for custome as the Merchant for price.

Some Portugals traouelling through Nubia saw many Churches ruined by the A- rabians, and some Images. The Iewish and Mahumetan superstition haue there almost preuailed. In old time they had Bishops sent them from Rome, which by meanes of the Arabians was after hindered.

The Nubian King warrèth with the inhabitants of Goran, called Zingani; who speake a language that none else vnderstand; and with others in the desarts, on the o- ther side of Nilus, towards the Redde Sea, whose language seemes to be mixt with the Chaldean, and resembles the speech of Suachen, in the countrey of Prester Iohn. They are called Bugiba, and liue very miserably. They had once a towne on the Red Sea, cal- led Zibid, whose Port answereth directly to that of Zidem, which is fortie miles from Mecca. This Zibid for their robberies was destroyed by the Sultan. Ortelius p faith, that in Nubia they were sometimes Christian, and now are scarcely of any Religion at all. They sent into Prester Iohns countrey for Priests, when Aluarez was there to re- paire their almost ruined Christianitie, but without effect.

Sannus reckons here other Kingdomes, Gothan, Medra, Dauma, whereof because we haue little but the names, I can write nothing.

Now if any would look that we should here in our Discourse of the Negro's assigne some cause of that their black colour: I answer, that I cannot well answer this que- stion, as being in it selfe difficult, and made more, by the varietie of answers, that o- thers giue hereunto. Some alledge the heate of this Torrid Region, proceeding from the direct beames of the Sunne; and why then should all the west Indies which stretch from the one Tropike to the other, haue no blacke people, except a few in Quareca, which happily were not naturalls of the place? And if this were the cause; why should Africa yeeld white people in Melinde, and neare the Line? blacker at the Cape of Good Hope in 35. then in Brasile vnder the Line? Some leauing the hot impressions in the Aire, attribute it to the driness of the earth: as though the Libyan desarts are not more drie, (and yet the people no Negro's) and as though Niger were here dried vp. Some, to the hidden qualitie of the soile; and why then are the Portugals children and gene- rations white, or Mulatos at most, that is tawnie, in S. Thomez & other places amongst them, and the inhabitants of Melinde, Madagascar, and other places, in the same height, in and adioyning to Africa? Some ascribe it (as Herodotus) to the blackenesse of the Parents sperme or seed; and how made they the search to know the colour thereof, which if it hath (a thing by others denied) by what reason should it imprint this co- lour on the skinne? And how comes it that they are reddish at their birth, yellowish in age? Some ascend about the Moone, to call some heavenly constellation and influence into this Consistorie of Nature; and there will I leave them: yea, I will send them further to him that hath reserved many secrets of nature to himselfe, and hath willed vs to con- tent our selues with things reueiled. As for secrets things, both in heauen and earth, they belong to the Lord our God, whose holy Name be blessed for ever, for that he hath reueiled to vs things most necessary, both for body and soule, in the things of this life; and that which is to come. His incomprehensible vnitie, which the Angels with couered people to the differing site of places, as of mountaines, low, wet, drie, &c. Some tell a tale of Chus wile in the Arke, whereupon by diuine curse his sonne Chus was blacke, with all his posteritie.

former in language, and their curled haire. Eusebius<sup>f</sup> mentioneth Ethiopia neere the Riuer Indus. And to let passe Pausanias<sup>g</sup> his search among the Seres, or Philistinae<sup>h</sup> at Ganges, for some Asian *Ethiopia*s; the Scriptures seeme to mention an Ethiopia in Asia. For Cush, the sonne of Cham, (of whom Iosephus<sup>i</sup> saith the *Ethiopia*ans called themselves, and were called by others, Chusai) was Author, not onely of the *Ethiopia*ans in Africa, but of many peoples of Arabia also in Asia, as Moses<sup>k</sup> relateth. And hence perhaps it was that Miriam<sup>l</sup> and Aaron contended with Moses for his wife Zippora, because she was an *Ethiopia*an. And yet was she an Midianite: but called an *Ethiopia*an, in respect of the neighbour-hood which Midian had to Aethiopia Orientalis, as Vatablus<sup>m</sup> obserueth out of the Iewish writers, or for that Midian is also assigned to Ethiopia, taken in a larger sense, as saith<sup>n</sup> Genebrard. Iunius<sup>n</sup> saith, because the Midianites dwelt in that Region which was assigned to Cush. Aethiopia in his Cosmography<sup>o</sup> affirmeth, that Tygris burieth it selfe, and runneth vnder ground in Ethiopia; which Simlerus interpreteth of Arabia: for otherwise Tygris walketh no part of Africa.

S. Augustine<sup>n</sup> affirmeth, that the Region Northwards from the redde Sea, and so euen to India, was called Aethiopia Orientalis. This distinction is still acknowledged by later<sup>o</sup> Writers. And therefore it is needlesse to fetch Moses a wife out of Ethiopia beneath Egypt, to interpret that place: For so Iosephus as we shall after see, telleth of a wife which Moses in his prosperitie, before his flight, married from thence.

This obseruation is very necessary, because the Scriptures often mention Ethiopia, when no part of Africa can be vnderstood, as Genes. 2. 13. where one of the Rivers of Paradise is said to compass the whole land of Cush, or Ethiopia. And so in other places, Cush, or Aethiopia. Learned Iunius<sup>r</sup> obserueth, that Cush is eyther a proper name, as Genes. 10. or common to the people that came of him: it is also a name attributed to the three Arabia's, to the two (African) Ethiopia's, and to all the Southerne tract by the Persian Gulfe.

Leauing that Asian Ethiopia, which already we haue handled vnder other names, we will now proceede in our African iourney, where we finde in Ptolemie not so exact description thereof, as in later Geographers, being then in the greatest part vnkowne. Maginus maketh Ethiopia, to containe two of those seuen parts, whereinto he diuideth Africa: one of which he calleth Aethiopia Superior, and Interior, which for the most part is subiect vnto the Christian Prince, called in Europe Priest or Prestor laba: the other, Inferior and Exterior, is all that Southerly part of Africa, which was not knowne to the Auncientes. This doth not altogether agree with Homerus<sup>u</sup> diuision, (whose Geographie<sup>x</sup> Strabo hath so largely trauerfed and admired.) For how could Homer, or any in his time attaine to the knowledge of those remote partes? Neyther yet may we reiect that renowned Poet, seeing this partition may serue vs now in the better discouerie of places, where we may reckon all that to the Westerly Ethiopia, which from Guinea stretcheth to the Cape of Good hope; and thence to the Red Sea Northwards, to the Easterly; Nilus, and a line from the head thereof vnto the aforesaid Cape, being the Arbitr in this diuision. But to let passe this curiositie in caruing, when all is like to be eaten, we will begin at Ethiopia vnder Egypt, and so take the countries in our way, going from the Red Sea, till hauing doubled the Cape, we come from the Abassine Christians, to those of Congo on the *Ethiopia*an Ocean.

Aethiopia sub Aegypto (so the Geographers<sup>y</sup> call this part) hath on the North, Egypt; on the West, Libya Interior; on the South, Aethiopia Agisimba; on the East, the Redde and Barbarian Seas, to the Promontory Rapsum, which Ortelius<sup>z</sup> placeth about Quiloa; Porre<sup>a</sup> calls it Quilimanci: Mercator interprets Magala. The Abissine Empire is by our late Writers entended further, receiuing for the Southerne limits, the Mountaines of the Moone; and for the Westerne, the Kingdome of Congo, the Riuer Niger, and Nubia: and therefore containeth Aethiopia sub Aegypto, and besides Trogolimes, Cinnamomifera Regio, and part of the inner Libya. True it is, that the Great Neguz his titles comprehend thus much, yet rather (say some) as a monument of what he hath had, then an euidence of what he hath: The Turkes in the North, the Moores on the West, and others otherwhere circumscribing this circumscribed Abissine: and now according ding to <sup>m</sup> Baterius and Barrius, the Lake Barcena is the Center of his Dominion. But even still Friar <sup>n</sup> Luis de Urreta, giues him both all before named and more. The name Abassine or Abassine, which is giuen to this Region, Niger <sup>o</sup> deriueth from the Egyptian word Abases, which (Strabo <sup>p</sup> reporteth) they gaue to all inhabited places, compassed with great deserts, and situate therein, in manner as the Ilands in the Sea: three of which Abases, he saith, were subiect to the Egyptians. Scaliger <sup>q</sup> saith, that the Arabi-ans call these Ethiopians Elhabaschi, whence they are vsually named Abassines; & this with him is an argument, that they are not natives of the place, but thither deriued out of Arabia. For the Abaseni are by Uranus in Stephanus placed in Arabia-Thurifera: whose words are these; Ἡ Ἀβασηνὸν ἐστὶν Ἀραβίας Οὐρανίος ἐν Ἀραβικῶν τρίτῃ, μετὰ τὴν Σαβαίην χατράμωται καὶ Ἀβασσινὸν, καὶ πάλιν, ἡ χώρα τῶν Ἀβασσινῶν συνήντιον φέρεται καὶ ὄνομα, &c.

 This I haue inserted out of Stephanus for satisfying the more iudicious. Scaliger addeth that the language in which their Ecclesiasticall and sacred bookes are written, is as far from the true Ethiopike, as the Dutch or Italian. The tongue is most elegant, if care and diligence be added: and is called Libertie, because the Arabian Conquerors (therfore only free) did vse it. The Ethiopians themselves call it Chaldee; yet is it neerer the Hebrew then the Chaldee: it is onely learned by booke, and of their Priests. They indeed haue other Histories of themselves, from the flood downewards, but whereto a man must not rashly giue credit. They call themselves Ethiopians.

To take now some exacter view of these parts; leauing those <sup>f</sup> Jewish monstrous fables of monsters of threescore and ten cubits, and their great lies of the little Pigmy-Christians, with such other stuffe, fit for them to write, who are iustly credulous of <sup>g</sup> lies because they beleueed not Truth: let vs see what others haue written, both of the people and place; and first of the first, and most ancient Relations.

The Cataracts or falls of Nilus, which separate Ethiopia from Egypt, are by the most Authors reckoned two, the greater & the lesse: Stephanus addeth a third at Bon- chis, an Ethiopian Citie. These are Mountaines which inroch vpon the Riuer, and with their loslie lookes and vndermining trecherie, hauing drawne vp the earth, which should afford him a channell, into their swelling and ioynt conspiracie, as with a mixt passion of feare and disdainé, make the waters in their hast and strife ouerthrow themselves downe those steepe passages: the billowes bellowing and roaring so terribly with the fall, that the inhabitants (as some <sup>h</sup> affirme) which dwell neare, are thereby made deafe: and the Riuer amazed and dizzie, whirles it selfe about, forgetting his tribute to Nephtus, till forced by his owne following waters, he sets, or rather is set forward on his iourney.

They are <sup>i</sup> now called Catadbi, which signifieth Noyse, of those dreadfull and hideous out-cries, which there are caused. Thus saith Bermudeus of those falls in the Kingdome of Goiame, which rush down from a rock almost halfe a league high, and steep, sounding like thunder.

Betwixt these falls and Meroe, Strabo <sup>j</sup> placeth the Troglodyta, of which we haue smallie spoken: and the Blemmyes, Nuba, and Megabari. They are Nomades, without Towne or habitation, and addicted to robberie. Procopius <sup>k</sup> testifieth, that these were accustomed to doe much damage on the Romane confines: and therefore Dio- clesius brought them out of their barren Territories, and gaue them Elephantina, and the Region adioyning for habitation, communicating to them the Roman rites and superstitions, and built the Citie Philas, in hope of future friendship. Calvus non animus; they changed the soile not the soule, but were no lesse iniurious to Oasis, and other the Roman subiects. They worshipped some Gods, borrowed of the Græcians; Isis, and Osiris, of the Egyptians; and Priapus. The Blemmyes also offered humane sacrifices, with cruell inhumanity, to the Sunne, till Iustinians time, who tooke away those bloudie deuotions. As for the tale that those Blemmyes wanted heads, and had their eyes and mouthes in their breasts, the Authors had eyther no eyes to see the truth, or more head then they should to deuise lies: as we may say of other shapelesse and monstrous shapes of people, which <sup>l</sup> Plinius and Solinus, out of other Authors report, to inhabit these vnknown parts: some wanting lips, some nostrils, some tongues, or mouthes, &c. indeed all wanting truth. Rather would I counsell the studious of Geographic, to learn the names of the Peoples and Nations of these Regions, of Plinie and Solinus: which because we have but names of them, I forbear to name.

Meroe doth inuite me to a longer entertainment, being an Iland which Nilus with louely embraces claspeth about, according to Iosephus and Cedrenus, sometimes called Saba, as now also the Abissines name it; the Egyptians call it Nante Babe; the inhabitants, Neube; our Maps, Guegere; to which Theuet addeth more, <sup>b</sup> if not more then truth. The Iland, after <sup>c</sup> Heliodorus (the Bishop of Tricca) his Description, is three square, each of which triangle limits are made by three Riuer, Astaboras, and Afasoba; (Strabo calls it Astapus, and Astosabus) this from the South, that from the East drowning their names and waters with Nilus: it is in length 3000. furlongs, in bredth 1000. plentiful of Elephants, Lions, Rhinocerotes, Corne, and trees, besides her hidden treasures, and mines of yron, brasle, siluer, gold, and salt. It hath also Heben wood, as Lucan <sup>d</sup> singeth, Lai-a-comie Hebeni. It receiued that name <sup>e</sup> of Meroe, sister of Cambyfes, or after <sup>f</sup> Eusebius, of Merida, the mother of Chenephris, King of Egypt. They worshipped a Barbarian God, and besides, Pan, Hercules, and Isis. <sup>g</sup> They cast their dead into the Riuer, others reserued them at home in glasse shrines, others in earthen receptacles buried them neere to their Temples. They esteemed them for Gods, and sware by them. They ordained him King, who excelled in strength, or in person, or in husbandrie of cattell, or in wealth. Their Priests enioyed the chiefe ranke of honour, who sending their Herald or Messenger, enioyned the King his death, and set vpon other in his roome. At length a certaine King abolished this custome, and rushing with his armed Souldiers into their Temple, where was a golden Chappell, slew all those Priests. This was at Meroe the head Citie of the Iland, where <sup>h</sup> Pausanias <sup>i</sup> saith they shewed the Table of the Sunne, and that they were the iustest men of all the Ethiopians.

Concerning that Table, and the expedition of Cambyfes into these partes, Herodotus i relateth: he affirmeth, that Cambyfes designed at once three inuasions; against the Carthaginians, the Ammonians, and Macrobian (all in Africa.) These last haue their names of their long liues, which they draw forth farre beyond the vsuall course. Hee placeth them on the South shores of Africa, but Mela <sup>k</sup> in Meroe: Seneca, Plinie, and Solinus beyond. That Table of the Sunne, Herodotus and Mela, thus describe. Neere to the Citie was a place alwayes furnished with varietie of roasted meates, there set in the night by the Magistrates, and eaten on the day by such as listed, and therefore of this open feasting, called the Sunnes table: whom the ignorant people also thought to be the Cater of these dainties. Cambyfes sent an Embassage vnto the King with presents, but principally to espie the Countrey; whom the Ethiopian requited with a Bow, and bade that the Persians should then inuade the Macrobian, when they were able to shoote in such bowes: thanking God that he was contented with his owne. And because he had sent him golden chaines, he asked to what vse they were; they said, for ornaments: he answered with siniling, thinking them to be chaines for punishment, That he had stronger fetters then those. The like account he made of his Purple Robes, Oyntments, and Wine: and asked further what the Persians care, and when they tolde him bread made of Wheate, (the nature whereof they declared) and withall, that the oldest Persians exceeded not fourescore yeares: hee said, that it was no manuell of their short life, that fed vpon dung: neither could they liue so long, were it not for that drinke of wine which they vsed; it was not extraordinarie there to attaine to a hundred and twentie yeares, their meat was boyled flesh, and their drinke milke. He brought them to a Fountaine, wherein being bathed, they smelled as of Violets, it was so subtile that nothing could swimme thereon, not wood, or other lighter matter: this water was supposed to lengthen their liues. He brought them also to the Prisons, where they saw many manacled and bound with chaines of gold. Lastly, he shewed them their Sepulchres made of glasse, in this manner: After they haue embalmed the dead corps, they annoint it with a kinde of pargetting mortar, and then put it in a case or coffin of glasse, through which it shineth, and is apparant without any ill sauour. This they keepe one yeare in the house, offering thereto sacrifices, and the first fruits of all things: and then carrie it out of the Citie. Thus farre Herodotus.

The Macrobi (Mela addeth) vsed brasse for honour, gold for punishments.

Of the table of the Sun before mentioned, thus writeth Friar Luis de Vrreta,<sup>a</sup> in that his large Historie, which he hath composed in Spanish, of Ethiopia: that the King in a curious brauerie and sumptuous vanitie, caused there to be set by night in a certaine field store of white bread, and the choicest wines, hanged also on the trees; great varietie of fowles, roost and boyled, and set on the ground, Mutton, Lamb, Veale, Beeffe, with many other dainties ready dressed. Trauellers and hungry persons which came hither and found this abundance, seeing no body which prepared, or which kept the same, ascribed it to Iupiter Hospitalis his bountie & hospitality, shewing himselfe a Protector of poore trauellers, and called this field the Table of the Sunne. The report hereof passed through the world, and brought many Pilgrims from farre Countries, to visit the same. King Cambyses sent his Embassadors to see it. Plato the Prince of Philosophers hauing travelled through Asia as farre as Caucasus, and gone also to the Brachmanes, to see and heare Hierarchus in a Throne of gold, amongst a few Disciples, disputing of Natures mytheries, and discoursing of the Starres and Planets, returned by the Persians, Babylonians, Arabians, and other Nations, and entred into Ethiopia, ledde with desire to see this renowned Table, and to eate of those delicacies. The Ethiopians, since their Christianitie, in zealous detestation of Idolatrie, will not so much as name this field, and these auncient rites, and giue in charge to the Priests at this day, that they handle not or treat of the like vanities, because they were inventions of idolaters. Calinus<sup>b</sup> Rhodiensis affirmeth, that this Table of the Sunne grew into a Prouerbe, to signifie a house well furnished and prouided. Thus farre Friar Luis.

Of the Pillar of Semiramis is before spoken out of the relation of Xenophon de Acquis: concerning which, and his other companions and brethren, howsoeuer Possennius, Geopius, and others doe reprove Annus for abusing the world with those glorious Titles<sup>c</sup> and ancient names, and proue them to be counterfeit: yet in my mind that of Xenophon seemeth to fauor of some truth (whether of antiquitie or no, I meddle not) and that more then others of the same edition. In that Pillar consecrated to the memorie of Ninus, the inscription testifieth, that Cush or Cuz was the Ethiopian Saturne; as Cham, the Egyptian; and Nimrod, the Babylonian. When Cush<sup>d</sup> was dead, they say, Regma his sonne succeeded in the Ethiopian Kingdome, and after him Dodan; after whose time is no record of certaine succession. Diodorus saith, they chose him which was most comely of personage for their King. Memnon is chanted by Homer and the Poets, which lost his life at Troy in defence of Priamus, and was (some say) King of Ethiopia. Of the speaking Image of Memnon, ye haue scene in our Egyptian relations. As for the wife of Moses, whereof Iosephus<sup>e</sup> sayth, That the Ethiopians hauing overrunne, and almost subdued Egypt, and none daring to make head against them, Moses (whom Thermutis Pharaohs daughter, had brought vp) was chosen Generall of the Egyptian Armie, which he conducted into Ethiopia, and comming to the siege of Saba, Tbarbis the Ethiopian Kings daughter fell in loue with him, and sent her seruants to entreate of a marriage with him: which he accepted, vpon condition of deliuering the Towne vnto him; and that being done, married her: all this seemeth rather to be a Iewish fable, thinking thereby to credite their Law-giuer, then agreeing to Moses, the Truth, and Scripture; and might happily arise from that speech, That Moses' his wife was an Ethiopian; of which wee haue spoken aheadie. Neither is it likely that Moses would accept of Treason for the dowrie with his Wife, sealed with the blood and ouerthrowe of her countrey and Citizens. And yet from hence do some deriue the originall of their Nation. After the father of this supposed Tbarbis, Derianus is said to raigne, who valiantly withstood Bacchus (which is thought to be Osiris, the Egyptian King, and after, their God) when hee inuaded Egypt with an Armie. Diodorus mentioneth Aetisanes, a King of Ethiopia. Cephens also is numbred in that royall Catalogue: but of all, <sup>h</sup> Ganges was almost famous, who with his Ethiopian Armie passed into Asia, and conquered all as farre as the Riuer Ganges, to which he left that name, being before<sup>f</sup> called Chliaros. He conquered as farre also to the West, vnto the Atlantike Ocean, and gaue name to the countrey of Guines; which name, some<sup>g</sup> say, is corrupted of Gangina, the name it had receiued of Ganges. These things are written by some, and I will not sweare for the truth, as safely we may doe for that which the Scripture mentioneth of some of their Kings, in the dayes of Afa & Hezekiab, Kings of Iuda; whose puissance then was such, that<sup>h</sup> Zerab brought into the field a million of men: and Tirrhaca was corruall vnto proude and<sup>i</sup> blasphemous Sennacherib, in sute for the Monarchie of the world. Before that time the Ethiopians had warred vnder Shishak King of Egypt, whom some take<sup>k</sup> for Sesestru. The Babylonians in Nabuchodonosors time conquered Egypt and Ethiopia, as<sup>l</sup> some expound the prophetic of Ezechiel. And the Persian Empire extended from India to Ethiopia. <sup>m</sup> Agatharehides writeth, that the Inhabitants on both sides the Riuer Assabara, liue on rootes dried in the Sunne: they are much infested with Lions, and not lesse with a lesse creature, but greater enemy, the Gnats, which driue them to hide themselves in the waters from their furie, when the Dogge-starre ariseth; which, with these his Armies of Gnats bayteth those Lions also, whom their buzzing and humming noyse chase out of the countrey. He speaketh of other their neighbours which feede on the tops of twigges, running and leaping on the trees, and from bough to bough with incredible agilitie: others dwell on trees for feare of wilde beasts, on whose flesh, and in want thereof, on their hides, they liue; as Ostriches, Elephants, Grashoppers are the daily dyet to others: to which he addes the Cynamolgi, which are nourished with the milke of Bitches, of which they haue great heards; which perhaps our Reader will not beleue, neither can I force him.

Of the Historie of the Queene of Saba, wee shall haue more cause to speake afterwards. Some thinke<sup>n</sup> that she came from Arabia where the Sabeans inhabite. Others<sup>o</sup> bring her from hence, and say, that she was an Ethiopian. The mention of her, and of Candace (which name Plinie saith<sup>p</sup> continued to the Ethiopian Queenes in many successions) hath made some<sup>q</sup> thinke (as it seemeth) that Ethiopia was gouerned only by Queenes. But let vs obserue further concerning their rites and ancient customes, as diuers Authors haue related the same.

HELIODORVS in his Historie (which although for the substance it be fained, as a loue discourse, yet must holde resemblance with things done) and for the variety and conceit thereof, commended by that learned<sup>a</sup> German Philop; and by our English<sup>b</sup> Philop (the soule of Poetic) imitated in his Arcadia; telleth of Hydaspes his Ethiopian King, that after his victorie at Syene, and hauing there performed his deuotions, and seene their Niloscopium (like to that at Memphis, and now at Cairo) and enquired the originals of their feasts, and holy rites done in honour of that Riuer: when<sup>c</sup> he came to the Cataracts, he sacrificed to Nilus, and the Gods of the Borders. He then sent messengers to the Wise-men, whom he calleth Gymnosophistes, which are the Kings Counsellors, at Meroe, to certifie them of his victorie, and to call a publique assembly wherein to gratifie the Gods for the same, with sacrifices and solemne pompes, in the felds consecrated to the Sunne, the Moone, and Bacchus. Persina, the Queene, deliuered those Letters to the Gymnosophistes, who dwelt by themselves in a Groue, consecrated to Pan; and before they would giue answer, consulted with the Gods by prayer, and then Sisimithes the chiefe of them promised all should be fulfilled. The Sacrifices were to be done to the Sunne and Moone, and therefore, except Persina the Queene, which was Luna's Priest, no woman for feare of contaminating the Holies of those those Pure and Bright Deities, might bee present. Hydaspes was Priest of the Sunne. Much preparation was made of Beasts for their Hecatombes, and much concourse of people crossing the Riuer in those Boates of Canes or Reedes. There was presented the Images of their Gods, Memnon, Perseus, and Andromeda: and nigh to them sat the Gymnosophists. Three Altars were erected; two ioyntly to the Sunne and Moone; a third to Bacchus by himselfe, to him they offered all sorts of Beastes; to Sol, white Chariot-horses; to the Moone, a yoke of Oxen. And when all things were ready, the people with shouts demanded the Sacrifice, which vsually was accustomed for the health of their Nation. That was some of the strangers taken in the warres, to bee offered: First, triall<sup>a</sup> was made by spits of Gold, heated with fire, brought out of the Temple, whether the Captiues had euer knowne carnal copulation for treading on the same with their bare feete, such as were pure Virgins receiued no harme, others were scorched. These were offered in Sacrifice to Bacchus; the other, to those purer Deities. These things haue I here inserted, not as done, but as like to such things, which among the Meroites vsed to be done, and agreeing with the generall deuotions of those Ethiopians. Philostratus<sup>b</sup> reporteth like matters of their Gymnosophists, and of the Groue where they kept their generall consultations: otherwise, each of them by themselves a-part, obseruing their studies and holies. They worshipped Nilus intending in their mysticall interpretation the Earth and the Water. They entertained strangers in the open Ayre. THE SPESION was then (in Apollonius his time) chiefe of their societie. At his command, an Elme did speake. They helde the immortalitie of the soule. The Ethiopians sacrificed to Memnon and to the Sunne.

Lucian, after his scoffing manner gratulates the Ethiopians that fauour, which Iupiter vouchsafed them, in going on feasting, accompanied with the rest of the Gods, and that twelue dayes together, if Homer<sup>c</sup> reckoned truly. But more<sup>d</sup> seriously elsewhere he vnfoldeth that mysterie, shewing that the Ethiopians were inuencers of Astrologie, helped therein by the clearnesse of the Skie in that Region, and like temperare of the seasons, Of them the Egyptians learned, and furthered that science. In his Treatise<sup>e</sup> of Dancing, hee affirmeth, that the Ethiopians vsed their haire in steede of a Quiver, and neuer drew Arrow from thence to shoote in battell, but with a dancing iecture.

Diodorus<sup>f</sup> & Siculus telleth, that the Ethiopians were accounted most ancient of all other men: and that not only Humanitie, but Diuinitie, was borne and bred amongst them: solemnities, pompes, holies, and religious rites, were their inuention. And therefore (sayth hee) Homer brings in Iupiter feasting with the Ethiopians. The reward of their pietie, was the immunitie of their Region from forraigne Conquests. & Macrobius interpreteth *Iupiter*s banquet with the Ethiopians of that Ocean, which Antiquitie imagined to be vnder all the Torrid Zone, that the fierie bodies of the stars, supposed to be nourished with moisture, might there quench their thirst. So would those good men drowne a great part of the African and American World, in hospitalitie to the Starres, by their imagined middle-earth Ocean: which experience hath now sufficiently confuted.

Cambyses attempted and lost his Armie; and Semiramis entered, but soone returned: Hercules and Dionysius ouer-ranne the rest of the World, the Ethiopians eyther for their deuotion they would not, or, for their strength, could not conquer. The Egyptians, some say, were Colonies from hence; yea, Egypt it selfe the dregges of that soile, which Nilus carryeth out of Ethiopia.

The Egyptians borrowed of the Ethiopians, to esteeme their Kings as Gods, and to haue such care of their Funerals, the vse of Statues, and their Hieroglyphicall letters: Petrus<sup>h</sup> and others, haue written thereof at large. Their best men they chose for their Priests: and hee among them, who, when the God is carried about, shall bee possessed with some Bacchanal furie, is chosen King as by diuine appointment, and is of them worshipped as a God. His gouernment is gouerned by Lawes. They doe not put a Malefactor to death, but an Officer is sent to him with the signe of death, whereupon hee goeth home and slayeth himselfe. One would haue fledde out of his Country; but the mother of the malefactor killed him, because hee would not after his Country manner kill himselfe.

The Priests in Meroe exercised this authoritie (as is before said) over their Kings, and would send them word that the Oracles of the Gods commaunded them to die, neither might they reiect the diuine dispensation: and thus with arguments, not with armes, they perswaded them to a voluntarie death. But in the time of Ptolomei Secundus, King of Egypt, King Ergamenes well skilled in the Greeke sciences, and Philosophie, reiected that superstition. They say, that the custome yet (till Diodorus time) remaineth, that if the King bee maimed, or by some accident want any member, his Courtiers also will depriue themselves of the same. Yea, when the King died, his friends thought it good fellowship to die with him, esteeming that death glorious, and the surest testimonie of friendship.

Strabo l. 17.

The Ethiopians<sup>a</sup> dwelling nearer to Arabia, armed their women in their warres, till they attained to a certaine age: the most of which ware a Ring of Brasse in their lip. They wch dwell further vp into the Countrie, were diuersly conceited of the Gods. For some they thinke immortall, as the Sunne, Moone, and the World: some mortall, as Pan, Hercules, Insipiter, for their vertues exalted to that dignitie. Strabo tells it in the singular number, that they thought that God to bee immortall, which is the cause of all things. Their mortall God was vncertaine, and wanted name: but they most commonly esteemed their Kings and Benefactors, for Gods. Some that inhabite nearer the Line worshipped no Gods: and were much offended with the Sunne, and hiding themselves in the Fennes cursed him when he did rise. These things you may reade gathered out of Diodorus, and Strabo,<sup>b</sup> in Cornelius, Boemus, Draudius, and Thamara, with some other additions. Sardus saith<sup>c</sup> that the Ethiopians were circumcised: as were also (besides the Iewes, Egyptians, and Arabians,) the Troglodites, Macrones, Creophagi, and inhabitants of Thermoodon.

As wee haue shewed of the Macrobij, or long-liued Ethiopians, so there were others called Brachobij of their shorter liues, whereof were reckoned two sorts: the Sidonij nere to the Red-sea, and the Erembi, which some take for the Troglodyte. They liue not about fortie yeares. Plutarch<sup>e</sup> out of Aselepiades reporteth the like, saying that they were old men at thirtie yeares. The same Authour<sup>f</sup> telleth that they and the Arabians could not endure Myce: and that the Persian Magi did likewise, esteeming them Creatures odious to God. Alexander<sup>g</sup> & ab Alexandro writeth, concerning the education of their Children, that, the Æthiopians feared their new-borne Infants in the foreheads, to preuent the distillations of Rheumes from the braine. And when they are somewhat growne, they make triall of their forwardnesse, by setting them on the backs of certaine Foules, on which if they sit in their flying, without feare, they bring them vp very carefully: but if they shrink and quake with feare, they expose them as a degenerate issue, vnworthie education. Their Letters they wrote not side-ways, after the Greeke or Hebrew manner, but after the present Chinian custome, downwards. They had seuen Characters, euery of which had foure significations. What manner of writing they now vse appeareth in<sup>h</sup> Damianus a Goez or of Zaga Zabo rather, an Æthiopian Bishop, in his Treatise of their Religion, done into Latine by Damianus; but more fully in Iosephus<sup>i</sup> Scaliger de Emendatione Temporum, who hath lent vs a long Tractate in that language and writing, with the same wordes expressed in Hebrew and Latine Characters, and the interpretation of them also into Latine, in foure seuerall Columnes. He that listeth to reade some Philosophicall speculations of Nature in these Æthiopians, wherein they differ, and wherefore, from others: let him reade Celius<sup>k</sup> Rhodiginus of that Argument: hee saith that they were expert in Naturall Magike. Nicephorus<sup>l</sup> writes, that Alexander the Great sent Assyrian Colonies into Ethiopia, which many ages after kept their owne language, and, like enough their Religion. The Nations of Ethiopia, which are farre distant from Nilus, are<sup>m</sup> said to liue a miserable life. Their life is beastly, not discerning in their lust, Mother, Daughter, or anie other name of kindred. Of their Ancient exploites, wee haue no continued Historie.

About the time of Christ, it appeareth, that Candace was Queene of Ethiopia. She was was a manly Virago, as Strabo testifieth, who liued at the same time, and followed Æliu Gallus in this expedition. He forced Candace to send her Embassadours to Augustus for peace, which she obtained. Sextus a Victor mentioneth this Æthiopian Embassage. Dioclesian relinquished that part of Ethiopia, which the Romans helde beyond Egypt, as not able to beare the charges, Iustinian <sup>b</sup> sent his Embassadours vnto Heliophant the Ethiopian King, and to Esimiphant King of the Homerites, his Arabian neighbour, to aide him against the Persian. This Heliophant had warred against the Homerites for quarrell of Religion, because they were many of them Iewes, and others Gentiles, himselfe being a Christian: and because they made many forrages into the Christian Countries. He so farre preuailed, as hee made that Esimiphant, a Christian, their King: whose yoke they shooke off soone after: and Abram, a slave, vsurped the State. He had beene seruant to a Roman at Adulis, a Citie of Ethiopia, worthe mention especially in this matter for the ominous prosperitie of seruants. For the Citie it selfe was built by fugitiue seruants, which ranne from their Egyptian Masters: and this Abram, a seruant there, obtained to bee a King: neyther could the Ethiopian with all his might depose him. The like c Embassage to Archeras King of Ethiopia was sent by Iustinus for aid against the Persian: both which I mention, to shew the greatnesse at that time of his state nothing comparable notwithstanding to that which after befell them. Among the Ethiopian Antiquities, Plato testifies, as Orosius <sup>d</sup> cites him, that many plagues and vncouth diseases infested, and almost altogether destroyed Ethiopia, about that time that Bacchus invaded India. If any delight himselfe in such Legendarie drasse as the counterfeit Abdias <sup>e</sup>, set forth by Wolfgangus Lazius, hath in it, touching the Magicians and Enchantments, and some other Ceremonies of Ethiopia, I am loth to blot my paper with them: not because we are not certaine of the truth (for in others wee may bee deceiued) but because wee are certaine of the errors, so grosse that they may bee seene and felt. Maruell that f Lazius an Historian, would with his Notes illustrate such a hotchpotch of darkenesse. And yet our Countreiman Harding leauing the cleare waters of truth, hath swallowed the same swill, as the Iewell of our Church hath taught him. The Eunuch of Candace was the first Ethiopian Christian, as Luke Act. 8. and Ensebius <sup>h</sup> doe shew.

But before we come to their Christian conuersion, we are first to declare their conuersion to Iudaisme (if it bee true the Ethiopians write) in the time of Salomon. The Ethiopians hauing liued before a vagrant life, like the Nomades of olde; and the Arabians, and other Libyan Nations, not farre from them in Asia and Africa at this day; Arac the Ethiopian King first fixed a settled abode at Axuma, and made it the Royall Citie: after whom followed Agab and in the third place, Ghedur or Sabannur, which subdued all Ethiopia, and left the Kingdome to his Daughter Makeda that reigned eightie yeares. Anno 50. of her Raigne she visited Salomon. After her they reckon these Kings till Christs time, Melic, Andedo Anda, Gigasio, Zangua, Gnasio, Anter, Tabora, Canada Chanze, Endur, Guaza, Endrath, Chaalet, Setija, Aglaba, Anscua, Treguas, Gnas, Beseclugna, Baazena, in whose time they say Christ was borne. Gendrad set downe the times of their Raigne, which he confesseth, and it selfe conuinceth to be false. This Queene of Saba before mentioned in our discourse of Arabia (of which Countreie I thinke shee then was, and these Abassens since that time thence descended) is by k Iosephus called Nicaule, the Queene (sayth hee) of Ethiopia and Egypt. But Zaga Zabo <sup>l</sup> in the Ethiopian Historie which he writ, and caused to be done into Latine by Damianus a Goes calls her Magneda, whose Historie the Ethiopians haue written in a Booke as bigge as all Pauls Epistles. The summe of his report is this; She was a worshipper of Idols as her Ancestors had beene, when as Fame filled her eares with the renowne of Salomons name: and then sent a messenger to Ierusalem, to learne the truth, who at his returne confirming those former reports, she went her selfe to visit him. Of him, besides many other things, shee learned the Law, and the Prophets. By him shee conceiued also a sonne, of whom shee was deliuered in her iournie homewards, and named him Melech. After twentie yeares education in Ethiopia, she sent him to Salomon his father, to be instructed of him in wisdome, desiring him to consecrate her Son King of Ethiopia, before the Arke of the Couenant; shee ordained also that women should not henceforth inherit, as before had been accustomed. Salomon did this & changed his name to David: and after long instruction, sent him back to his mother, attended with many noble companions, among whom was Azarias the Son of Zadock, the priest. This Azarias caused tables to be made like to those in the Arke; and pretending to sacrifice for the good successe of his iourney, went in & stole the tables of the Law, leauing in their room these later counterfeites, which he reuealed not to any, til he came to the borders of Ethiopia. The David being made acquainted with the fact danced for ioy, as his grandfather David had done before the Arke wherein the Tables were inclosed, his people making great ioy. His mother resigned to him the Empire, & from that time to this, the Kingdome hath passed in a right line, from male to male: circumcision also with the law of Moses hath beene obserued. The Officers which Salomon appointed his Son, are still continued in the same families & order; nor may the Emperor chuse them out of any other stocke then these of the Iewes. This long Legend I report, not for the truth, but for that Religious conceit wherewith it is accepted in Ethiopia, for who knowes not, that none but the high Priest, and that but once a yeare, entred into that holy place, where the Arke was, that I speake not of Nadabs and Abihis fire, with other diuine iudgments? Vezabs touching; and the Bethshemites viewing the Arke at so deare a rate; could not but make dreadfull so damnable an attempt. Besides, we should haue looked for our blessed Sauour out of Ethiopia, where Salomon heires still Raigne (if these say true) and not goe to Salathiel and Zorobabel, descended of another brother, and therefore further off from the throne of their father David, on which Christ was to sit, and to which he was borne, next and apparant heire, euen according to the flesh. And yet doth Genebrad credit these reports, and Baronius also in part as Luis de Vvreta reporteth. This Luis hath written 3. large bookes in Spanish collected (as he saith) out of Don Iuan de Baltasar an Ethiopian of great accompt, who had beene Embassador from his Master Alexander 3. the great Negus, into Persia and other places, and came into Spain with his licence to imprint his Ethiopian Historie. Out of him Luis reporteth that the former booke whence Zaga Zabo the Bishop, Embassador to the King of Portugall, had taken those things, is Apocrypha: yet so, as that it is true concerning that report of Maquedas conception, and the Royall descent from thence till these times. The stealing of the tables he denieth; and affirmeth, that the truth was, that Salomon had bestowed on the Queene of Saba a fragment of the tables, which Moses brake in his zeale for the Israelites idolatrie with the golden Calfs. For that conception by Salomon, hee prooueth it by the Ethiopian Records, the title of their King, and his armes; which are the same, which the tribe of Iuda gaue, viz. a Lyon rampant, crowned, in a field Or, with this inscription. The Lyon of the tribe of Iuda hath overcome. Since they were Christians they haue added to these Armes a crosse, which the Lyon holdeth in his right foot. And in this right they lay challenge to Ierusalem for their inheritance. Now for the fragment of the table which Moses brak, it is receiued for a truth throughout Ethiopia, & it is still preserued in the hill Amara as the greatest Iewell in the world. Baltasar had often seene and handled it. It seemeth to be of the Chalcedonie stone, shining, and transparent; and is a corner of a square table, the broken edges yet being manifest, with the letters, some broken, some whole, much differing from the common Hebrew (which Genebrad saith the Iewes inuented, thereby to differ from the schismatical Kingdome of the Israelites, of the ten tribes; the Samaritans still retaining the former, as both he and Scaliger affirme.) But these letters cannot be read; for hee brought a learned Iew, skilfull in all the Easterne languages, Persian, Arabike, Indian, Chinois, &c. yet knew them not. This relike is with such deuotion admired of the Iewes, that when they passe but within sight of that Hill Amara, they prostrate themselves on the ground with much reuerence, and for this cause make much of the Ethiopians (wherefoeuer they meete them) as a people beloued of God, to whome hee hath imparted such a Relique. They tell also a tale (I thinke) of the Queene of Saba, that in her iourney homewardesthree had a reuelation concerning a peece of Wood which shee saw, that it should bee the same whereon Christ should after die for Mankind: wherefore adoring the same with much deuotion and teares, she writ to Salomon thereof, who hid it in the earth of

As for that succession of Iewish officers; Luis denieth it, and saith the Iewes are no where more hated then in Ethiopia: and Alexander the third, late Emperour among them, banished all Iewes and Moores out of all his Dominions. The Officers of the Emperour are the sonnes of the Tributarie Kings, his Vassals, and the noblest of his Subjects. And for the Iewes which came with Meilech, or Melelec, (after called David) his next successour Iosuf, (so he calleth him) becoming an Apostata, reduced Idolatrie: and whereas David his father had giuen them one of the Temples dedicated to the Sunne in Mount Amara, to make it an house of Prayer to the God of Israel, casting forth the Idols therein; now in this Iosues dayes, some of them returned to Ierusalem, or to other Prouinces of Africa, and some inhabited the vtmost parts of Africa, neere the Cape of Good Hope, and Deserts not before inhabited. And the said Don Iuan de Balsafr, being sent by the Emperour into the Lands of Monopopata (so hee calleth it) and of Galeses, of Barbizin, of Mandinga, and of Zape, which are inhabited of Idolatrous Gentiles, he found among them some of these Iewes descended of that exiled stocke (as themselves also hold) which had forgotten their Iudaisme, and all knowledge of the Scriptures, onely had retained some reliques of it, and abstinence from Swines flesh, differing also from those Gentiles, in worshipping one God, whereas the other acknowledge One great God, whom they call Caramus, but worship also Tigers, Lions, Flies, Spiders, Snakes, Lizards, and whatsoever first meet them in the morning. These Gentiles call the Iewes Tabayqueros, and will not admit them to purchase houses, or inheritance, but either vse them as Interpreters, or Factors for Merchants (which is the highest steppe they can attaine to) or else employ them in base drudgeries, to be their Porters, slaughter-men, and such like, that they seeme rather slaves to those barbarous Nations, then to enioy any libertie of free-men. Rightly may those Nations be called Barbarous, which seeme rather to barke then to speake, and yet they scorne that any should abase them, with the basest of titles in their opinion, to call them Tabayquero, and reuenge it with the death of the wrong q doer.

CHAP. III.

Of Presbiter Iohn: and of the Priest-Iohns in Asia: whether that descended of these.

Having now declared the Antiquities of Ethiopia, drawn out of ancient Authors, let vs neerer hand behold, what neerer our times, Authors haue reported thereof. Wherein first we will heere insert out of a Scalligers Annotations, vpon the Ethiopian Ecclesiasticall Calendar or Computation of times, somewhat remarkable, and fitting to our present purpose. The name (saith he) of the Christian Ethiopians is not now first made knowne to vs. For their Church not onely at Ierusalem and Constantinople, but at Rome also and Venice, hath had libertie a good while to vse their owne rites. The Portugalls, and Francis Aluarez haue further discovered them: Before we onely heard the name of Ethiopia. A wonder it is, that some ages since, <sup>b</sup> their Emperours name was made knowne to vs out of Asia, rather then out of Ethiopia it selfe. Three hundred yeares agoe, the Ethiopian Kings reigned in Asia, especially in Drangiana, the borders of Sufiana, India, and China, vntill the Tartars dispossessed them of the Asian Empire. For Cingis first, the first Tartar King, slew Uncam, the Ethiopian Emperour: and his posteritie chased the Abissines out of Moine and China, and forced them to flee into Africa. Often haue I marvelled that a people of no knowledge in these times of Sea-affaires, could archieue so mightie exploits, as to propagate their Empire, from Ethiopia to China. Since that time the knowledge of that Emperour hath come to vs in the name of Preslegiano: which in the Persian tongue (as much now of reckoning in Asia, as the Latine in the West) signifieth, c Apostolike, inferring thereby that he is a Christian King of the right faith. For Presstegan signifieth Apostles, and Presstegani Apostolicall; Padescha prestigiani, the King Apostolicall, in Arabian Melich ressul, in Ethiopian Neguseh Chawariawi. Of this greatnesse of their Empire, in Asia are witnesses those Ethiopian crosses, which are seene in Giapan, China, and other places. Yea, the Temple of Thomas the Apostle in the Region of d Malabar, hath nothing in it but is Ethiopian, the crosses, building, and name it selfe. It is called: e Hanarya, which in Ethiopian is as much to say, as, Apostle: which Marcus Paulus falsely expoundeth, a Holy-man. (This name in the Author seemeth to be giuen not to the Church, but to the Apostle himselfe) Paulus addeth that the remainder of the Christians subiect to Presstegan abode in Tenduch. The neighbouring Arabians call them now Habassi, and were from thence Abissines, or Abassones: they call themselves Chaldzans: for their ancient and elegant language, in which their bookes are written, is neere to the Chaldean and Assyrian. Moreover, the Ecclesiasticall Historie testifieth, and out of the same Nicephorus, lib. 9. c. 18. that many Colonies were sent out of Assyria into Ethiopia. They are there called Axumite, of their chiefe Citie, but by themselves, as Almuari affirmeth, Chaschumo. More may we say hereafter of their Rites, and other things worthy of knowledge, in the Institutions f of that tongue which we haue diligently, and Methodically written. These words of Scaliger haue made mee take some paines in the search of the premisses; for he differeth from the opinion of others, which haue written any thing of Presbyter, or Priest Iohn (as they terme him) in Asia, whom the Tartars subdued. Ortelius maketh a Presbyter Iohn in Asia, and another in Africa, if I vnderstand him. As for that Vncam, William de Rubruquis, which trauelled those parts in the morning of the Tartar-greatnesse, Anno 1253. reporteth that one Can reigned in Kara-Catay, or blacke Catay, after whose death a certaine Nestorian Shepheard (a mightie Gouernour of the people called Tayman, which were Nestorian Christians) exalted himselfe to the Kingdome, and they called him King Iohn, reporting of him ten times more then was true, as is the Nestorians wont. h For notwithstanding all their great boasts of this man, when I trauelled along by his Territories, there was none that knew any thing of him, but onely a few Nestorians. This Iohn had a brother, a mightie shepheard called Vur, which inhabited three weeks iourney beyond him, he was Lord of a Village called Cara Carum, his subiects, called Crit or Merkits, were also Nestorians. But their Lord abandoning Christianitie, embraced Idols, and retained with him Priests of the said Idols. Ten or fifteene daies iourney beyond his Pastures, were the Pasture of Moal, a beggerly Nation, and neere them the Tartars. Iohn dying, this Vur became his Heire, and was called Vur Can (whom others call Vnc Can) and his droues and flockes ranged vnto the Pastures of Moal. About the same time one Cyngis a Black-Smith in Moal, stole many of Vur i Cans Cattell: who in reuenge with his forces spoiled the Moals and Tartars. They agreed, made Cyngis their Capaine, who suddenly brake in vpon Vur, and chased him into Cataya; took his daughter and married her, and had by her Mangu, that was then the Great Can when our Author wrote this. These Relations fauour not of any such Monarchie as should extend from Ethiopia, to those parts of Asia.

Marcus k Paulus telleth that the Tartars were Tributaries to this Vncam (so he calleth him) which saith he, after some mens opinion signifieth in our language Priest Iohn, but through his tyrannie Prouoked to rebellion, they vnder the conduct of Cingis, slew Vncam. And afterward he saith, that l Tenduch was vnder the subiection of Priest Iohn: but all the Priests Iohns that there raigned after Vncam, were tributarie to the Great Can: and in his time raigned one George, who was a Priest and a Christian, as were the Inhabitants. But he held not so much as the m Priests Iohns had done: and the Great Cans did still ioyne in affinitie with this Familie, marrying their daughters vnto these Kings. This George was the fourth after Priest Iohn, and was holden a great Signior. He ruled over two Nations, called by some Gog and Magog, by the Inhabitants, Vng n and Mongul, where some were Mahumetans; some Heathens, other Christians. It appeareth by their Histories, that Scaliger was deceiued, to thinke that this Priest Iohn had so large an Empire, seeing Rubruquis in the same Age, or soone afner could in his owne countrey heare so little of him: and his posteritie in Marcus Paulus his time, continued tributarie Kings vnder the Tartar. The name Priest was giuen them of that function, which hee testifieth, George receiued, and Iohn perhaps of that first Shepheard that vsurped Con Cans estate. To let passe therefore that Presbyter Iohn in the North East, we stumble on another mid-way betwixt that and Ethiopia. For so Ioannes de Plano Carpini (sent Embassadour to the great Can, from Pope Innocent, Anno 1246.) and Vincentius P in his Speculum, tell of the King of India Maior, called Presbyter Iohn, being inuaded by the Tartars vnder the leading of Tossus Can, sonne of Cingis, who before had subdued India Minor: He by a Stratageme acquired his Realme of them. For making mens Images of Copper, he set each of them vpon a saddle on horse-backe, and put fire within them, placing a man with a paire of bellows on the horse-backe behinde euery Image. And so with many Images and horses in such sort furnished, they marched against the Tartars: and when they were ready to ioyne, by kindling a fire in each Image, they made such a smoke that the Indians wounded and slew many Tartars, who could not see to requite them thorow the smoke: but were forced to leaue that Countrey, and neuer after returned. Heere now we meet with a new Presbyter Iohn in India Maior, which whether he were the same with the Ethiopian, let vs a little examine.

India is by Marcus Paulus diuided into three parts, the Lesser, Greater, and Middle; the first of them he boundeth from Ciamba to Murfili, and saith, it had in it eight Kingdomes; the Middle called Abascia, had in it seven Kingdomes, three whereof were Saracens, the rest Christians. Six of them were subiect to the seventh. It was told me, saith hee, that after their Baptisme with water, they vsed another Baptisme with fire, branding three markes on their forehead and both their cheekes. The Saracens vsed one brand from the forehead to the middle of their nose: They war with the Solden of Aden, and with the Inhabitants of Nubia, and are reputed the best warriours in India. The greater India extendeth from Malabar, to the Kindome of Cheshmacorn, and had in it thirteene Kingdomes. This Abascia by the bordering enemies of Nubia and Aden is apparant to be this Ethiopia where we now are: euen by their Brands we may know them: And this the Ancients called India. For Sidonius calleth the Ethiopian Memonnes, Indians: and Alianus placeth Indians at Astaboras, one of the Riuers of Meroe: Virgil also bringeth Nilus out of India. Vsq. Coloratis amnis de nexu ab India: which must needs be meant of Ethiopia. Nicephorus reckoneth the Sabaeans and Homerites people of Arabia vnto India. Sabellius complaineth of the confounding of these names India, and Ethiopia, saying, that most men did thinke Ethiopia next to Egypt, to be that India, where Alexander overthrew Porus. This confusion of names, I thinke, did first grow from confusion of Nations, For as is before obserued out of Eusebius, the Ethiopians arose from the River Indus, and settled their habitation neere to Egypt. Perhaps they brought the Indian name also to these parts. Or else the ignorance of these remote countries might do it: in which respect, not onely a third part of the old world, but another new-found world, is named India. Therefore Acofta and Adrianus Turnebus esteeme India to be a generall name to all Countreies which are farre off, and strange to vs, although it be properly attributed to the East Indies.

Now if any wonder at such an extravagant discourse of India heere, let him know that in our search for Presbyter Iohn, which then was knowne to withstand the Tartars in Asia, I cannot see how he can be the Abissine or Ethiopian: but rather thinke that when a mightie Christian Prince was found in Ethiopia, they did imagine him to be that Presbyter Iohn, of which they had heard in Asia; being furthered in this error by the name, India, which, as is said, did generally comprehend both the true India, and this, more truly called Ethiopia. Now for that Presbyter Iohn in India, I take him for some Christian King: for at that time there were many Christians, as appeareth by Venetis, in manner dispersed throughout Asia: and some, called Saint Thomas Christians, remaine in India to this day. Why I thinke it not to agree to the Abissine, my reasons besides the former, are, the distance of place: all that huge tract of Arabia, with the wide Seas on each side, separating India from Ethiopia: the vnpassable Deserts by Land: No mention in History who should dispossesse them of that India *Maio*r, where the Tartar had neuer any great power: the Histories <sup>a</sup> which we haue of those Indian Princes, the Kings of Malabar, of Decamo, the Samorin, &c. are against it: the difference of Religion; for those Indian Christians of S. Thomas, are not branded with hot * irons, nor circumcised, nor agree in other Rites with the Ethiopian: the Ethiopian Historie challengeth no such large extents to their Empire, except in Africa, where they seate them in a continuall descent, from the time of Salomon, till now, whereas those Presbyter-Iohns had their dwelling and abode in Asia, as their Stories signifie. And further, the name <sup>b</sup> Priest-Iohn is a name vnknowne in Ethiopia, and by ignorant mistaking of the Europeans, applied to that Ethiopian Emperour when first they heard of him, as saith Zago <sup>c</sup> Zabo his Embassadour to the King of Portugall, who reprooueth the men of these parts; saying that he is named of them Belul, which signifieth Excellent, or precious, and in the Chaldzan tongue, Ioannes Encos, which signifieth the same. Sabellicus saith, the Ethiopians called him Gyan; Linschoten affirmeth, Bel Gyan: (Bel signifieth the highest, and Gyan, Lord. But Frier <sup>d</sup> Lays out of Baltasar the Ethiopian, sheweth that in the hill Amara are ancient records, which testify that from the time of that Queene that came to Salomon, the Emperours haue bin called Beldigian, the signification whereof is, a precious stone, or a thing of great value; which title hath continued to those Emperours, as Pharao to the Egyptians, and Cesar to the Romans. Some also of the Royall blood (which are vsually kept, as after shall appeare, in the hill Amara) when they are elected to the Empire, if there be many of that Imperiall issue take Orders, and become Priests, not procreating any Children. Such saith he in our times haue been Daniel the second, Paphnutyus, that succeeded to Nannum, and Alexander the third his successour, all which were both Priests and Kings; and therefore by the Ethiopians which resort to the Holy Sepulchre at Ierusalem, and vsed to speake Greeke, were called Priest Beldigian. This by corruption of the name by Merchants, and such as knew not the signification, and also for breuities sake, was pronounced Priest Gian or Iohn.

Now for the Priest Iohn in Asia, he tels that when S. Thomas was martyred in India, the three <sup>e</sup> Magi, who had visited Christ, by the leading of a Starre, in his Infancie, and had after beene consecrated Bishops ouer their severall Kingdomes (you must not deny their royalty) by the Apostle; chose one amongst themselves to be Priest and King, who was called Priest Iohn. If you beleue not Peter de Natalibus, out of whom the Frier cites this, I should be too much troubled in perswading you. He telleth also out of Otho Frisingensis, that about the yeare 1145. one Iohn a Christian, both King and Priest, reigning in the furthest parts of the East, warred vpon, and overcame the Medes, Assyrians, and Persians, and had intended to free Ierusalem out of Saracenicall seruitude, but not finding passage ouer Tigris, was forced to returne. This is like to be that Presbyter Iohn, whose posterity vsed that Stratagem before mentioned against the Tartars. And to him I thinke might fitly agree that Title of Prestegian (easily deflected and altered to Priest Iohn) whereof you haue heard out of Ioseph Scaliger. I haue seene a Manuscript <sup>f</sup> in old French, pretended to be a Letter from Prester Iohn, to the Emperour Frederike, wherein is discoursed of the site, greatnes, puissance, wealth, and other rarities of his estate: but finding so many monsters, and vncouth relations therein, I could not be so prodigall of faith, or penurious of iudgement, as to value his authority at any high rate: wherein Sir Iohn Mandeuill seemes to haue bin a lender or borrower, so iustly doe they agree, in disagreeing from both probability and possibility of truth: yet both in the one and the other, we may obserue the like situation of Prester Iohn dwelling in these parts of Asia, neere Persia: and that such a multitude of Fables could not but haue some truth for their ground. My conclusion is, that for that name of Prestegian, I like well Scaligers interpretation, and thinke that it may agree either to this, or some other Christian Prince at those times in India, which is far neerer to Persia, and from whence the Indians borrowed their royall titles, both in those times and since, as Garcias ab Horto <sup>g</sup> and Linschoten shew. Idalham or Adelham, the Title of the King of <sup>h</sup> Goa, and the Countries about, commonly called Idalcun, is not a proper name, but a Title of honor, signifying (as Adonizadek Iosh. 10. 1. Lord) or King of Iustice: Nisamalao, maluco, the speare of the Kingdome; and such like: Ismael the Sophi (which name also is by some interpreted Elef, because they pretended to be or doe so, and others, the reprobate followers of a reprobate Religion) added the Title of Xa or Sba, to such as embraced his new Sect, as Nisomoxa, &c. If the borrowing of names from the Persian language (so generall in those parts) be still obserued: no maruell if some Christian King in those times might stile himselfe Prestegian, or Apostolicall, (which others not vnderstanding, called Priest Iohn, or Prete Ianni) as being compassed with so many Saracens, the enemies of the Apostles, besides Heretikes and Heathens. At Mosul is yet a Patriarke, who in Paulus's time was of farre greater iurisdiction, and as an Easterne Pope ordained Archbishops and Bishops, through all the parts of India, besides Cairo, and Baldach: and therefore no maruell if in India there were some great Christian Prince, able to make head against the Tartars in those times: For euen in Cranganor<sup>k</sup> are yet supposed to be threecore and ten thousand Christians: besides a great number in Negapatan, and in Maripur: and very many in Angamale, and fiftene thousand on the North of Cochin, where the Archbishop that dependeth on the Patriarke of Babylon, or Mosul, resideth: All which haue no communion with the Greeke, Roman, or Ethiopian Churches. And for the Ethiopian names or crosses, either their Merchants when their state was great, or slaues, which taken from them are euen in these times sold deereft of any other, and mount to great preferments of warre, vnder these Lords, might leaue such impressions: or, some other, which as they professed one Christ, so might haue some words and ceremonies common with the Ethiopian: although I must needs acknowledge, that many of those crosses haue not crossed my way, nor any other Ethiopian foot-prints.

Pardon me, gentle Reader, if I seeme tedious in this dispute, seeing it is necessarie both for the vnderstanding of the extent of the power and Religion of this Precious or Priest Iohn: and Scaliger hauing ascribed such large bounds to his Empire, I could not but examine the same, otherwise professing my selfe (si non magis amica veritas) euen willing, if I must needs erre, to erre with him, who hath in many tongues, and Arts, shewed himselfe perhaps the worthiest Generall, and generallest Worthy, against Error, that euer we haue had, the Alpha of learned men in our Age, as our learned Morton testifieth of him, and a great light of learning, acknowledged by Royall testimonie. His authoritie I would not seeme to contemne, and therefore haue entred this long search: contented, if any like better to follow the opinion of Scaliger in this, as I haue done in many things else, that he take his choice.

AN ADMONITION TO THE READER.

Since the former Edition of my Booke, I haue met with a later and larger Edition of Scaliger's Emendation (often by vs in this Edition cited) not easily to be scene: for I could in any where in London procure it: only of my good friend Master Crashaw did I borrow the use of this and other Authors, in his well furnished Library. And therein hath Scaliger altered his former opinion, so that this long dispute might now haue bene left out, but that it doth further illustrate both this and other Histories: for which cause I haue still suffered it to continue. Master Brerewood in his late Enquire of Religions and Languages, hath taxed Scaliger also, for the same fault.

k Aluarez speaketh as it was in his time: it is now otherwise, as you shall after read.

of the Pillar of Sion, Sonne of the seede of Iacob, Sonne of the hand of Mary, Sonne of Nahu according to the flesh, Emperour of the Greater and Higher Æthiopia, and of most large Kingdomes, Territories, and Iurisdickions, the King of Xoa, Caffare, Fatigar, Angote, Baru, Baaliganze, Adea, Vangue, and Goiame, where Nilus springeth; Of Damaraa, Vaguemedri, Ambeaa, Vagne, Tigri-Mahon; Of Sabaym, the Countrey of the Queene of Saba, of Barnagasso, and Lord as farre as Nubia, which confineth vpon Egypt. Heere are names enough to skarre a weake braine, a great part whereof are now his (as some say) in Title onely. For at this present, if Barros and Botero bee beleueed, his Neighbours haue much encroched vpon him: as a little before wee haue shewed; (a thing wholly denied by the later Relations of Frier d Luy de Vrrata) Yet seeing we are to trauell through all these Countreies, we will leaue the question of dominion to him and his neighbours, to trie it with the sword: Our pen shall peaceably point out the places, and after that, the conditions. Barnagasso is the nighest to vs, at least, by the neere situation to the red Sea, nighest to our knowledge. It stretcheth from Suachen almost to the mouth of the Streyt, and hath Abagni, or Astapus, on the South. It hath no other Port on the red Sea, but Ercocco. Neither hath the Prete any other Port but this in all his Dominion, being Land-locked on all sides. Anno 1558. The Turkes committed heere great spoile: They haue since taken from the Prete, all on the Sea side, and specially that Port of Ercocco, and the other of Suachen or Suaquem, and forced the Gouvernour or vnder-King of this Prouince, to compound for a yearely summe of a thousand ounces of Gold; besides his Tribute to the Ethiopian. To him are also subiect the Governements of Dasila, and Canfila. And the Turke hath a Bassa at Suaquem, called by Ptolemy, Sebasticum, Tigri-Mahon lieth betweene Nilus, Marabo, two Rivers, Angote, and the Sea, Tigrai hath in it Cazumo, which is supposed the Seat-Royall of that great Queene, which visited Salomon. Angote is betweene Tigre-Mahon and Amara. Heere in Amara is a steepe Hill, dilating it selfe in a round forme, many dayes iourney in compasse, enuironing with the steepe sides, and impassible tops thereof, many fruitfull and pleasant Vallies, wherein the kindred of the Prete are surely kept, for the auoiding of all tumults and seditions. Xoa hath store of corne and cattell: Goiame hath plentie of gold: as Baguamedri hath siluer. In Fatigar is a Lake on the top of a high mountaine, twelue miles compasse, abounding with great varietie of fish; and thence runneth many Rivers, stored with the same fish.

Damut is ennobled with slauerie. For the slaues that are hence carried captiues, in Arabia, Persia, and Egypt, proue good souldiers. The greater part of this Kingdome are Gentiles, and the residue Christians. The Oxen (as Bermudez relateth) are almost as great as Elephants, their hornes very great, and serue for vessels to carry and keepe wine and water, as Barrels or Tankerds. There is found also a kinde of Vnicorne, wilde and fierce, fashioned like a horse, of the bignesse of an Ass. Neere hereunto he addeth a Prouince of Amazons, whose Queen knoweth no man, and is honored as a goddess: these say, they were first instituted by the Queen of Saba: both like true, as that which followeth of Griffons, the Phœnix, and fowles so big, that they make a shadow like a cloud. Couche is subiect to Damut: they are Gentiles: The Prince called Axugui, that is, Lord of riches: he shewed vs (saith Bermudez) a Mountaine glistering in some places like the Sunne, saying, all that was gold. More gold is said there to be, then in Peru, or in these parts iron. The head of the Monasteries of Amara Christned him, Graden the Emperour being his God-father, and named him Andrew. Gueguere was sometimes called Meroe: the Inhabitants are confederate with the Turkes and Moores, against the Abissines. Dancali and Dobas, are neere the Red Sea, inhabited with Moores.

Many of these Countreies are diuersly placed by diuers: through ignorance of the exact situations: which Aluarez in his so many yeares trauell in those parts, might well haue acquainted vs with, if he had first acquainted himselfe with rules of Art; so haue obserued by Instruments the true site and distances.

Let vs now come vnto the Court of their Emperour, which was alway mouing, and yet the greatest Towne that his whole Empire containes. For there are few which haue in them one thousand and fixe hundred Families, whereas this moueable Citie hath fise five thousand, or six thousand Tents, and Mules for cariage about fiftie thousand. In his march from one place to another, if they passe by a Church, he and all his companie night, and walke on foot, till they be past. There is also carried before him a consecrated stone or Altar, vpon the shoulders of certaine Priests appointed to that office. They call him Aergue, which signifieth Emperour, and Negus, that is, King.

By commandement of the Queene Maqueda, which visited Salomon, women (say they) Circumcised: both Sexes are Circumcised at eight dayes old: and the males forty daies after; the females fourescore; (vnlesse sicknes hasten the same) are Baptised. As for the rites of their Christianitie, it belongeth not to this place to expresse. Their Circumcision Zabo saith, is not obserued, as if it made them more worthy then other Christians, for they thinke to be saued only by Faith. They vse this and distinctions of meats, and Mosaicall rites, yet so as he that eateth, should not despise him that eateth not, and not condemning others that refuse them: but yet thinking that neither Christ, nor the Apostles, nor the Primitiue Church had disannulled them, interpreting also the Scriptures to their purpose. Of their agreeing with other Churches in the most points of substance, the Author of the Catholike Traditions hath written: and when I make a Christian Visitation of these parts, it shall be further discovered.

The succession is not tied to the eldest, but to him whom the father appointeth. For David which sent his Ambassage to Portugall, was the third sonne in order, and for modestie in refusing to sit in his fathers Throne, which in the same triall his other brethren had accepted, was preferred to that which he had refused: the other reiected for their forward acceptation. The King offered the King of Portugall an hundred thousand drammes of Gold, and as many Souldiours towards the subduing of the Moores, besides other things meet for the warre. It seemes the difference of the Ethiopian, and Popish Superstition was the chiefe hinderance in this businesse: neither partie being able (if willing) to reconcile their long-receiued differences from each other, and the to each other: and Aluarez yeelded obedience to the Pope, in the name of the Prete, at Bologna, in the presence of Pope Clement the seuenth, and Charles the fift. But all this sorted to none effect. For Pope Paul the fourth sent an Embassage to Claudianus, then the Abassine Emperour, employing in the same thirteene Iesuites, one of which was made Patriarke, and two Bishops, in their hopefull Ethiopian Hierarchie. Ignatius, the Founder of the Iesuits, wrote a long Letter also, which Maffaus hath inserted at large. Thus in the year 1555. Iohn the third, King of Portugall, vnderooke the charges to conuey them thither: and sent Consaluuus Roterigiuz, to prepare them way by a former Embassage to Claudianus, whose cares he found fast closed to such motions: Whereupon the new Patriarke stayed at Goa, and one of the Bishops with a Priest or two went thither, where when they came, they found Claudianus slaine, and his brother Adamus, a cruell man, and an Apostata sometimes from his Faith, in the Throne. He cast the new Bishop into bands, and drew him into the warres with him, where the Emperour was discomfited, and he taken and stripped of all, and at last miserably died, and with him the hope of Roman Abassia. Iohn Nounius Barretus, the designed Patriarke, refused (as Maffaus saith) the Archbishoprike of Goa, where his brother was Viceroy, and remained subiect to the Iesuiticall Societie to his death. In the year 1559. Ioannes Bermudezius returned to Lisbon. He wrote a Discourse of his Embassage from the Ethiopian Emperour to Iohn the third, King of Portugall, and of his aduentures in those parts befalling him. In which he relateth, that Abunna Marcos being at the point of death, An. 1535. the Emperour willed him to nominate his Successor, whereupon he appointed this Bermudez, and ordered him with all sacred Orders: which he accepted vpon condition of the Popes confirmation, whereto the Emperour consented, desiring him to go to Rome to giue obedience to the Pope, and from thence to Portugall to conclude Tagazano (so he calleth him) his Embassage. Paul 3. confirmed him Patriarke of Alexandria. He apprehended Tagazano, as Onadinguel enioyned, and clapt irons on him. His Emperours request was a marriage to be had with the Kings son of Portugal, the Ethiopian successio to remaine his dowry: also to send men against Zeila; and Pioners to cut thorow a hill, thereby to bring Nilus to annoy Egypt. hundred and fiftie were sent accordingly by Garcia of Noronya. But Onadimga was dead, and Gradius was Emperour, who ouerthrew the Moores, and slew the Kings of Zeila and of Aden. This Emperour fell out with the Portugals, and sent to Alexandria for another Abuna, whose name was Ioseph, so that none acknowledged Bernadez but the Portugals. Sabellicus * saith hee had conference with some Ethiopian, which said that their Lord ruled ouer threescore and two Kings. They called him Gyam, which signifieth Mightie. They wondered why the Italians called him a Priest, seeing he neuer receiued Orders, onely he bestowed Benefices: and is neither called John or Ianes, but Gyam. Some report of him things incredible, as one Webb * an English man in his Tales of his Trauels. He hath Gold enough shut vp in a Cane, to buy the moitie of the world, as L. y Regius affirmeth, and can raise an Armie of ten hundred thousand, (saith Sabellicus.) Yet the Peasants are not employed in militarie seruice: but onely the Cauas, which are men brought vp thereto. They warre not in the Lent, * except against themselues with extremitie of fasting, so weakening their bodies, that the Moores * make that their Haruest of Abissine captiues. Of this their fasting Aluarez saith, That they beginne their Lent ten dayes before vs: and after Candlemasse, fast three dayes, in remembrance of Niniuehs repentance; many Priests in that space eating nothing: and some women refusing to suckle their children aboue once a day. Their generall fast is bread and water, for fish is not easily had, they being ignorant to take it. Some Friars eate no bread all Lent long for deuotion; some, not in a whole yeare, or in their whole life, but feed on herbs, without Oyle or Salt: that I speake not of their girdles of yron, and other their hardships, which my pen would willingly expresse, if my Method forbade me not. This fasting (as exposing their States to hostile inuasions and insolencies) they finde place and mention heere. Their Priests and Priests in Lent eat but once in two dayes, and that in the night. Queene Helena, that sent her Ambassadour to King Emanuel, was reported to eate but three times a weeke, on Tuesday, Thursday, Saturday. On Sundayes they fast not. In Tigray and Tigremahon they fast neither Saturday nor Sunday: and they marry (because they haue two moneths priuiledge from fasting) one Thursday before our Shrouetide. They that are rich, may there marry three wiues, and the Iustice forbids them not; onely * they are excommunicated from entring the Church.

In the Kingdome of Angole, yron, and salt is currant money. The Moores of Dobas haue a Law, prohibiting marriage to any, that hath nor first slaine twelue Christians. The diuorees <sup>d</sup> and marrying the wiues of their brethren deceased, is beere in vse much like as with the Iewes.

In Bernagasso, Aluarez and his company, in their trauell were encountred with many great Apes as bigge as Weathers, their fore-parts hairie like Lions, which went not lesse then two or three hundred in a company: they would climbe any rock: they digged the earth, that it seemed as it had beene tilled.

In the Countrey of the Giannamori, * as they travelled, they crossed a certaine brooke or Riuer, that came downe from the Mountaines, and finding a pleasant place, shaded with the Sallowes, there they reposed themselues at noone: the water of the brooke was not sufficient to driue a Mill. And whiles the company stood, some on one side the brooke, some on the other, they heard a thunder, which seemed a faine off but saw no likelihood of raine or winde; when the thunder was done, they put their stufte in order to be gone, and had taken vp the Tent, in which they dined, when one of the company going by the brooke about his businesse, suddenly cried out, Looke to your selues: whereupon turning about, they saw the water come downe a speeres depth with great furie, which carried away part of their stufte: and had they not (by good happe) taken vp their Tent, they together with it had beene carried away with the streame. Many of them were forced to climbe vp the Sallowes. Such was the noise of the water, and the ratling of the stones, which came tumbling downe the Mountaines together, that the earth trembled, and the skie seemed to threaten a downe-fall. Suddenly it came, and suddenly it passed. For the same day they passed ouer, and saw very many and great stones ioyned to those which they had seene there before.

In the Kingdome of Goyame,<sup>f</sup> the Riuer Nilus springeth, it is there called Gion, and comes from two Lakes, which for their greatnesse may seeme to bee Seas, in which report goeth that Mermaydes, Tritons, or Men-fishes are scene, and some haue tolde mee (sayth Alvarez) that they haue scene it. Peter Conilian a Portugall, which had liued a great part of his life in those partes, tolde mee, that hee had bene in that Kingdome by order from Queene Helena, to build there an Altar in a Church built by her, where shee was buried. Beyond that Kingdome, I was tolde, there were Iewes.

Don Iohn de Castro mentions a high Hill inhabited of Iewes, in these partes, which came, no man knowes from whence: but they defended the Prete against the Moores. Of the fals in Goyame, before is related out of Berumdez, that they make a noyse like thunder. Hee sayth that in Dembia Nilus runneth within thirtie or fortie leagues, of the Red-Sea, to which the Emperour purposed to cut a passage, as his Predecessour had begunne. There is a great Lake thirtie leagues long and twentie broad, with many Islands, inhabited only of Religious men. Agao is possessed of Mores and Gentles mixed. Hee speakes of the Kingdome of Oghy, seuen or eight dayes iourne from Doaro, vnder which is a Prouince of Gentles called Gorague, bordering with Quiloa and Mongalo, which are great Witches, and obserue entralls, of sacrificed Beastes. They kill an Oxe with certaine Ceremonies, and anointing themselves with the tallow thereof, make a great fire, seeming to goe into it, and to sit downe in a chaire therein; thence giuing Diuinations and answeres without burning. Their Tribute is two Lyons, three Whelpes, an Ounce of Golde molten, with certaine Herbes and Chickens of the same mettall. Sixe Buffes laden with Siluer, a thousand Bees, and the skines of Lyons, Ounces and Elkes. The Goffates are vulgarly reported to haue bene Iewes: they are hated in other Prouinces

The houses of the Ethiopians are round, all of Earth, flat roofed, couered with sharch, compassed with yards. They sleep vpon Oxe-hides. They haue neyther Tables nor Table-clothes, but haue their meate serued in on plaine wooden Platters. Some eat flesh raw; others broyle it. Artillery they had not vntill they bought some of the Turkes. Writing is little (and scarce a little) vsed amongst them: the Officers dispatch matters of Iustice by Messengers, and word of mouth. There is no wine made of the Grape (but by stealth) except at the Pretes and <sup>h</sup> Abunas: others vse Wine made of Rasins, steeped tenne dayes in water, and strained, which is cordiall and strong. They haue plentie and want of mettals; Gold, Siluer, &c. the soile yeeldeth, but they haue not Art to take it. They haue no coine of Gold or Siluer; salt is the most currant monie. Sugar canes they haue, but want skill to vse them. The mountaines and woods are full of Basill and other odoriferous plants. They haue store of Bees and honie: but their hives are placed in Chambers, where making a little hole in the wall the Bees goe in and out. There are some places very cold. The Commons are miserably oppressed by their superiours. No man may kill an Oxe though it be his owne, without licence from the Gouernours: there were no Shambles but at the Court. The common people seldome speake truth, no not vpon an oath, except they are compelled to sweare by the head of the King: they exceedingly feare excommunication. Their oathes are in this sort: The partie to bee deposed goeth with two Priests, carrying with them fire and incense to the Church-dore, whereon he layeth his hand.

Then the Priest adiores him, saying: If thou shalt swear falsly, as the lyon deuoureth the beasts of the Forrest, so let the Deuill deuoure thy soule: and as corne is grounded vnder the Mil-stone, so let him grinde thy bones: and as the fire burneth vp the wood, so let thy soule burne in Hell: (the partie answereth to euery of these clauses, Amen. But if thou speake truth, let thy life be prolonged with honour, and let thy soule enter into Paradise with the Blessed, Amen. Then doth hee giue his testimonie. They haue Bookes written in Parchment.

Some<sup>i</sup> affirme that the Princes of Egypt haue time out of minde payed to Prester Iohn a great tribute, (continued by the Turkes, which Lays saith is three hundred thousand Zequis, euery Zequis being sixtene ryals, and wick vs eight shillings (for that by him the furious spirit of Nilus is slacked and cooled, being detained in the way by mannie sluces for that purpose made. The great Turk denying this the Abissine caused those dammes to be broken, and by drowning Egypt in vncouth manner, forced that great Monarch to composition. Aluarez denies both the mountaines of Luna, and the melting of Snow, which is suposed the cause of this Riuer's hastinesse and ascribeth the ouerflowing of Nilus to the extreme raines in Ethiopia, whose Fountaines diuers Portugals haue seene (he sayth) in Goyame. The Turke notwithstanding hath (by warring vpon him) erected a new Beglerbeg-ship in his Dominions. Aluarez liued there five yeares, and was once within thirtie myles of Nilus; but in all his trauels neuer saw that riuer. So little accessse haue the Ethiopians (barred out by vnpassable passages) usually to the same.

Andrea<sup>b</sup> Corsali reporteth that the Prete David, was of Oliue color, but shewed his face but once in the yeare, hauing at other times his face couered for greater state, and therefore also spake to none, but by an interpreter. The Inhabitants are branded with fire, which they vse, not for Baptisme, but in obseruation of a Custome of Salomon, who so marked his slaues, as they affirme. Frier Luy giueth a more probable reason thereof, saying that when the World groned vnder Arrianisme: the Abissine Emperour caused his subiects to brand themselues with a three-fold marke or stampe in the forehead, to testifie their faith of and in the Trinitie: which now since their commerce with the Roman Christians is in manner wholly left, except in the ruder and more vnciuill parts of Barnagasso, the borders of the Empire. The same Author * faich, that in Ethiopia are Elephants, the Rhinoceros, and (besides other beasts) the Vnicorne in the Kingdome of Goyame, and in the hilles of the Moone, but seldome seene, onely the horne is found, which hee casteth in maner as the Hart. There are also (hee saich) birds of Paradise: and such store and varietie of flowers all the yeare long, that their Eunuches are alwaie decked with them. There is one Flower not any where else knowne, called Ghoyahula, much resembling a Mary-gold, but exceeding faire in varietie and excellencie of colours, fragrant smell, abundance of leaues in the Flower, and with a more rare qualitie; beginning to open at noone, and so by little and little opening more and more till midnight, alway the felt encreasing with the opening: after midnight it shuts by little and little, till noone: denying by the same degrees her pleasing offices to both senses, of sent, and sight. Hee mentioneth also a bird, called the Rhinoceros of the Ayre, much bigger then an Eagle, and hauing a bow-fashioned bil or beak foure foot long, and a horne between the eies, with a blacke line alongst it. It is a cruel fowle, and attends on battels and camps. The Portugals had fight of one at the Red-Sea, when Solyman the Eunuch had his Nauie in the Red-Sea. The horne is of the same propertie with that of the Vnicorne and Rhinoceros. There are fishes also called Rhinoceros of the Sea; many of which are paid the Prete for Tribute.

Of the Hill Amara: and the rarities therein.

E. Aluarez
C. 58. ad 62.

The hill Amara hath alreadye beene often mentioned, and nothing indeed in all Ethiopia more deserueth mention, whether wee respect the naturall site, or the employment thereof. Somewhat is written thereof by Geographers, and Historians, especially by Aluarez whom wee haue chiefly followed in the former relations of this Countrey, as an eyewitnesse of the most things reported; but neither they, nor he haue any thing but by relation, sauing that he passed two dayes iournie along by the sayd hill, and that also had almost cost him his life. But Iohn de Balsafer liued in the same a long time, and therein serued Alexander which was afterwards Emperour, and was often by commandement of the same man, when he was Emperour, sent thither: out of his relations, Frier<sup>d</sup> Luy sayth he hath borrowed that which here we offer you. And here we offer you no small fauour to conduct you into; and about this place, where none may come but an Ethiopian, and that by expresse licence, vnder paine of leauing his his hands, feet, and eyes behind, in price for his curiositie; and not much lesse is the danger of such as offer to escape from thence; Aluaret himself being an eye-witnes of some such cruell executions inflicted for that offence. This hill is situate as the nauil of that Ethiopian bodie, and centre of their Empire, vnder the Equinoctial line, where the Sun may take his best view thereof, as not encountering in all his long iourney with the like Theatre; wherein the Graces and Muses are Actors (no place more graced with Natures store, or furnished with such a Store-house of Bookes, the Sun himselfe so in loue with the sight; that the first and last thing he vieweth in all those parts, is this hill, and where Antiquitie consecrated vnto him a stately Temple: the Gods (if ye beleue Homer, that they feasted in Ethiopia) could not there, nor in the world find a fitter place for entertainment, all of them contributing their best store (if I may so speake) to the banquet. Bacchus, Iuno, Venus, Pomona, Ceres, and the rest, with store of fruits, wholesome aire, pleasant aspect and prospect; secured by Mars, lest any sinister accident should interrupt their delights, if his Garrisons of Souldiers were needfull, where Nature had so strongly fortified before; onely Neptune with his ruder Sea-Deities, and Pluto with his blacke-Guard of barking Cerberus, and the rest of that dreadfull traine (whose vnnelcome presence would trouble all that are present) are all, saue Charon, who attends on euery feast, yea now hath ferried away those supposed Deities with himselfe perpetually exiled from this place. Once, Heauen and Earth, Nature and Industry, haue all bene corruials to it, all presenting their best presents, to make it of this so louely presence, some taking this for the place of our Fore-fathers Paradise. And yet though thus admired of others, as a Paradise, it is made a Prison to some, on whom Nature had bestowed the greatestt freedome, if their freedome had not bene eclipsed<sup>b</sup> with greatnessse, and though goodly starres, yet by the Suns brightnesse are forced to hide their light, when grosse and earthly bodies are seene) their noblenesse making them prisoners, that one Sun onely may shine in that Ethiopian throne.

It is situate in a great Plaine, largely extending it selfe euery way, without other hill in the same for the space of 30 leagues, the forme thereof round and circular, the height such, that it is a daies worke to ascend from the foot to the top; round about, the rock is so smooth & euen, without any vnequal swellings, that it seemeth to him that stands beneath, like a high wal, whereon the Heauen is as it were propped; & at the top it is over-hanged with rocks, iutting forth of the sides the space of a mile, bearing out like mushrooms, so that it is impossible to ascend it, or by ramming with earth, battering with Canon, scaling or otherwise to winne it. It is about 20 leagues in circuit compassed with a wall on the top, well wrought, that neyther man nor beast in chase may fall downe. The top is a plaine field, only toward the South is a rising hil, beautifying this plaine; as it were with a watch-tower, not seruing alone to the eye, but yeelding also a pleasant spring which passeth through all that Plaine, paying his tributes to euery garden that will exact it, and making a Lake, whence issueth a River, which hauing from these tops espied Nilus, neuer leaues seeking to find him, whom hee cannot leaue both to seeke and find, that by his direction and conueiance he may together with him present himselfe before the Father and great King of waters, the Sea. The way vp to it is cut out within the rocke, not with staires, but ascending by little and little, that one may ride vp with ease; it hath also hols cut to let in light, & at the foot of this ascending place, a faire gate, with a Corpus du Garde. Halfe way vp is a faire and spacious Hall out of the same rock, with 3 windowes very large vpwards; the ascent is about the length of a lanee and a halfe; and at the top is a gate with another gard. The aire about is wholesome and delectable; and they liue there very long, and without sicknes. There are no Cities on the toppel, but palaces, standing by themselves, in number foure and thirtie, spacious, sumptuous, and beautifull, where the Princes of the Royall bloud haue their abode with their families. The Souldiers that gard the place dwell in Tents.

There are two Temples, built before the Raigne of the Queene of Saba, one in honour of the Sunne, the other of the Moone, the most magnificent in all Ethiopia, which by Candace, when shee was conuerted to the Christian Faith, were consecrated in the name of the Holy Ghost, and of the Crosse. At that time, (they tell) Candace ascending ding with the Eunuch (whose proper name was Indica) to baptize all of the Royall bloud, which were there kept, Zacharie the eldest of them, was in his baptizme named Philip, in remembrance of Philips conuerting the Eunuch, which caused all the Emperours to be called by that name, till Iohn the Saint, who would bee called Iohn, because he was crowned on Saint Iohns day: and while they were busie in that Holy worke of baptizing the Princes, a Doue in fierie forme came flying with beames of light, and lighted on the highest Temple dedicated to the Sunne, whereupon it was afterwards consecrated to the Holy Ghost by Saint Mathew the Apostle, when he preached in Ethiopia. Those two Temples were after that giuen to the Monasticall Knights of the Militarie Order of Saint Anthonie, by Philip the seuenth, with two great and spacious Couents built for them. I should loose both you and my selfe, if I should lead you into their sweet, flourishing and fruitfull Gardens, whereof there are store in this Plaine, curiously made, and plentifully furnished with fruites both of Europe plants there, as Peares, Pippins, and such like; and of their owne, as Oranges, Citrons, Limons, and the rest; with Cedars, Palme-trees, with other trees, and varietie of herbes and flowers, to satisfie the sight, tast and sent. But I would intertaine you, only with rarities, no where else to bee found; and such is the Cubayo tree, pleasant, beyond all comparifon, in tast, and whereunto for the vertue is imputed the health and long life of the Inhabitants; and the Balme tree, whereof there is great store here: and hence it is thought <sup>a</sup> the Queene of Saba caried and gaue to Salomon, who planted them in Iudæa, from whence they were transplanted at Cairo long after. The plentie of Graines and Corne there growing, the charmes of birds alluring the eares with their warbling Notes, and fixing the eyes on their colours, ioyntly agreeing in beautie, by their disagreeing varietie, and other Creatures that adorne this Paradise, might make mee glur you (as sweet meates vsually doe) with too much store. Let vs therefore take view of some other things worthie our admiration in this admired hill, taking the Frier for our guide, whose credit I leaue to your Censure.

Such is the stately building of the two Churches aforesaid, with their Monasteries, the pillars and roofes of stone, richly and cunningly wrought, the matter and the workmanship conspiring magnificence; that of Iaspas, Alabaster, Marble, Porphyrie; this with painting, gilding, and much curiositie; with the two Monasteries, containing each of them 1500. Religious Knights and Monks: each monasterie hath two Abbats; one of the militarie Knights; the other spirituall, of the Monkes, inferior to the former. In the Monasterie of the Holy Crosse are two rare peeeces, whereon Wonder may iustly fasten both her eyes: the Treasury and Library <sup>b</sup> of the Emperor, neyther of which is thought to be matchable in the world. That Library of Constantinople <sup>c</sup> wherein were 130000 Bookes, nor the Alexandrian Library wherein Gellius <sup>d</sup> numbred 700000, had the fire not bin admitted (too hastie a Student) to consume them; yet had they come short, if report ouer-reach not, of this whereof we speake; their number is in a manner innumerable, their price inestimable. The Queen of Saba (they say) procured Books hither from all parts, besides many which Salomon gaue her, and from that time to this, their Emperors haue succeded in like care and diligence. There are 3. great Hals, each about two hundred paces large, with Books of all Sciences, written in fine Parchment, with much curiositie of golden Letters and other workes, and cost in the writing, binding, and couers: some on the floore, some on shelues about the sides, there are few of Paper: which is but a new thing in Ethiopia. There are the writings of Enoch copied out of the stones wherein they were engrauen, which intreate of Philosophie, of the Heauens and Elements. Others goe vnder the name of Noe, the subiect whereof is Cosmographie, Mathematices, Ceremonies and prayers: some of Abraham, which he composed when he dwelt in the Valley of Mamre, and there read publicly Philosophie and the Mathematices. There is very much of Salomon, a great number passing vnder his name: many ascribed to Iob, which hee writ after the recouerie of his Prosperitie: manie of Esdras the Prophets, and High Priests. And besides the foure Canonical Gospels, many others ascribed to Bartholomew, Thomas, Andrew, and others: much of the Sibilles, in verse, and prose: the workes of the Queene of Saba: the Greeke Fathers all that haue written, of which, many are not extant with vs; the Writers <sup>e</sup> of Syria, Egypt, Africa, and

and the Latine Fathers translated, with other innumerable in the Greeke, Hebrew, Arabike, Abissine, Egyptian, Syrian, Chaldee, farre more Authors, and more of them then we haue; few in Latin; yet T. Linius is there whole, which with vs is imperfect; and some of the workes of Thomas Aquinas; Saint Augustines workes are in Arabike: Poets, Philosophers, Physicians, Rabbines, Talmudists, Cabalists, Hieroglyphikes, and others would be too tedious to relate. When Ierusalem was destroyed by Titus; when the Saracens ouer-ranne the Christian world; many bookes were conueyed out of the Easterne parts into Ethiopia; when Ferdinand and Isabella expelled the Iewes out of Spaine, many of them entred into Ethiopia, and for doing this without licence, enriched the Pretes Librarie with their bookes: when Charles the first restored Mulaffes to his Kingdome, the Prete hearing that there was at Tunis a great Librarie, sent and bought more then three thousand bookes of diuers Artes. There are about two hundred Monkes, whose office is to looke to the Librarie, to keep them cleane and sound; each appointed to the bookes of that language which hee vnderstandeth: the Abbot hath streight charge from the Emperour, to haue care thereof; he esteeming this Librarie more then his treasure.

And yet his treasure is such,<sup>k</sup> as leaues all others of all Princes in the world behinde, quite out of sight: it is a Sea, that euery yeare receiueh new Riuers, neuer running out: the Emperours, euen from the time of the Queene of Saba, paying vp part of their reuenue here. And therefore <sup>l</sup> Dauid the Prete, in Letters to King Iohn the second of Portugall, said, that he had golde as the sands of the Sea, and the starres in the skie. The first that coyned money, was Alexander the third, which died in the yeare of our Lord 1603, stamping in the one side, the figure of St. Mathew the Ethiopian Patron, and on the other, the Lion and Crosse, which is the armes of Ethiopia. His jewels, here kept, are incomparable: Topazes, Amethists, Saphires, Diamonds, and others. He hath one jewell which was found in the Riuer Niger (that brings forth more gemmes then any Riuer in the world) which is one peece of stone or rocke, diuersified with a thousand varieties of stone: it is square, about two palmes* and a halfe, and thicke withall: there are in it a hundred and sixtie Diamonds, one as large as the palme of ones hand, others of one, two or three fingers, and some lesse: it hath about three hundred Emeralds, Rubies the greatest in the world: about fiftie Saphires, Turqueses, Balazes, Amethists, Iopels, Topazes, Iacincths, Chrysolites, and all other kinds. Nature here playing the leweller, and representing a Map of the worlds gemmes in one jewell, without, and infinitely beyond, all Art of man. Being set in the Sunne, it seemes a combined marriage of heauenly and earthly Excellence, that no mortall eye hath seene the like, nor is able to endure the sight of this. When Bernardo Veceti, a Jeweller, was sent thither by Franco de Medicis Duke of Florence, he accounted it beyond all estimation or value. The Emperour keepes it in a Boxe of Golde. By the perswasion of that Bernardo hee hath made him Tables set with thousands of stones in them. Corral is more esteemed in Ethiopia then gold, and therefore Frier Lays denies that Corralls in the bottome of the redde Sea, make it redde, as some affirme: and that which Barros<sup>m</sup> saith hath been found there, is vnperfect.

But greater Jewels then those are kept in Amara, the Princes of the bloud royall, which are sent to this hill at eight yeares old, and neuer returne thence, except they be chosen Emperours. The first Author of this custome was Iosue the nephew of Salomon, and sonne of Meilee or Melilee, to remone all occasions of ciuill warres about succession. And their continued succession in one line, without alienation, is imputed to this. Some Emperours for a time had left it, till Abraham being Emperour had, or pretended to haue a reuelation, to renew that custome, if he would continue the Scepter in the lineage of Dauid. The Princes which liue there, are sixe, eight, twelue, and sometimes more. An. 1608. they were six; euery of which liues by himselfe, and that in great estate and majestic in royall palaces, with spacious halls richly hanged, remoouing to another palace at pleasure: they meet all together when they will play, hunt, walke, and on holy-dayes to diuine seruice: they take place according to their age; each hath his ten seruants for ordinarie attendance, which are the sonnes, or descended of the Tributary Kings: for baser offices, the great Master or militarie Abbot employeth the Souldiers that that guard at the foote of the Hill, which without license may not ascend. They haue other graue persons to instruct them in vertue and learning. Euery Citie, that is, euery habitation of a thousand houses, is at their owne charge to send thither three men, a Gentleman, a Citizen, and a Plebeian, for the guard of the hill, which make vp the number of seuen thousand five hundred, there being two thousand and five hundred Cities in the Empire. The military Abbats order them in their seuerall wards, the baser at the foot of the hill, the Citizens at the middle, and the Gentlemen at the top; their Captaines changed at euery two moneths end. Besides the souldiers Tents, are many other of Merchants and Officers. No woman may ascend, nor hath done since Queen Canace was here baptized by her Eunuch: the Princes liue single, and marrie not, as Almares hath vntreuely affirmed of them.

CHAP. VI.

When the Emperour is dead, many solemne ceremonies are obserued, both religious and ciuill about the election of another, which is in the authoritie of the two militarie Abbots of St. Anthonies order in the mount. Oathes are taken both of the Electors and elected, the first to vse sinceritie, the other to reigne iustly, obseruing, and causing in his Empire to be obserued, the lawes of God, Christian Religion, the foure first Councils, of Nice, Ephesus, Chalcedon, and Constantinople: and (if the Frier reach not, for in their holy Fathers case I relie not much on their holinesse) to acknowledge the Florentine Council, and the Popes supremacie, and lastly, the Constitutions of Iohn the Saint, and Philip the seventh, auncient Emperours: which done, in solemne Procession of all estates they goe to the Church, and hauing set the Emperour in his Throne, the Princes of the blood are brought out of the Pallace, where in the time of the election they had beene enclosed, to kisse his hand, and sweare fidelitie, clothed in the habite of the Knights of St. Anthonys: the same oath is giuen also by the Kings, his vassals (foure of which are present at the election) the Counsellors, Prelates, and others, according to their place. After this, fires are made on the Towers of the Mount, to giue notice of this election, which being seene by the neerer Cities, they also by the like fires (as it were) proclaime the same in a moment through all the Empire: which is confirmed by Posts sent thence on Dromedaries, by the Abbot of the Abbey of the Holy-Ghost, one of the Electors, and the Councell vnto the Citie of Saba, and the mother of the New-Elect, if she be liuing, and to his neere kindred, to come and reioyce with him. The next day the Emperour goeth in blacke habite to the Pallace where the Princes are, and saluteth them with kinde embracements, one by one, with his bonnet in his hand: which is done in the next place by the Prelats, whom in honour of their Ecclesiasticall dignities the Princes re-salute standing, with their heads vncouered. The tributarie Kings follow, not with embracements, but kissing their hands, rendring their salutations, and after them the Embassadors. The Emperour, hauing remained some time in priuat talke with them, goeth to the Abbey of the Holy-Ghost, and putting off his blacke habite, is clothed in Scarlet; and being on horse-back, attended with his familie, the Abbots and Counsellors, passeth to the Abbot of the Holy-Crosse, where the two Abbots of that Abbey meet him; and after oath giuen to preserue the auncient customes, present him with the keyes of the treasure and Librarie: the Emperour bestowing as much of the said Treasure as he pleaseth. After all other ceremonies, the Counsellors of the Court come to the hill with twelue thousand Knights of St. Anthonies Order (which are the Emperours guard) and the eldest sonnes of the King, to conuey him solemnly to Zambra the Citie, where Court and Councell reside, where with all solemnitie and magnificence he is likewise receiued, & conducted into the Pallace, and placed on his Throne of twelue steps, with acclamations of long life and happines on all hands. Five dayes Festiuall being here passed in all publike reioycings, he goeth to Saba to take the oathes of all his subiect Kings in person (whereof onely foure had bene present at the Election) and one holding the Crowne, another the Scutchion of the Arms of that tributarie King, he sweareth on the Scepter (which is a golden crosse) true fidelitie and obedience, and the Emperor puts on the Crowne againe on his head; and the said Scutchion, with his Armes, he giueth into his hand, and licenceth him to depart to his Pauillion without the Citie. These Kings are truely Kings, and succeede in the inheritance of their fathers, receiuing the tribute of the subiects of their seuerall Kingdomes, and are not Deputies, or Vice-royes, at the meere pleasure of the Emperour: but if one be vpon iust cause displaced, his sonne succeedeth: and therefore the Prætor is called King of Kings. The eldest sonne of euery of these Kings attend alwayes on the Emperor, and haue attending on them ten seruants of the sonnes of the Nobles of their Kingdomes.

The Emperor is bound by ancient custome to take a wife of the posteritie of those three Magi which adored Christ in his infancie, whom the Ethiopian and Romane Tradition calleth Kings by the names of Cassiar, Melchior, Balthasar; of which, the Ethiopians say, that Melchior was of Arabia, and Balthasar of Persia, which being forced by persecution of Arians, came into Ethiopia, in the time of Iohn the Saint, which reigned after Philip the seventh, and receiued of his hands the Kingdomes of Fatigar and Soa, the former giuen to the posterity of Balthasar, the other to the linage of Melchior. The Frier addeth, That all the legitimate descendents of these three Families are borne with a starre on one of their sides; and that at the Iubilee, in the time of Gregorie the thirteenth, 1575. there were three of those three families at Rome, with that naturall ensigne of the supernaturall and miraculous starre. Yea, the legitimate Mahumetanes in Arabia and Persia, remayning of those kindreds, haue the same signe, as Don Iohn sware to him, that he had seene. The Councell gouerneth according to the hundred twentie seuen statutes, made by the first Philips, and Iohn the Saint. Nothing is punished with death but treason, vnder which name they also comprehend murder and adulterie: of this mortall sentence the Lions are the executioners, which in euerie Citie are kept for that purpose. Some Italians had bene found guiltie of the sinne against Nature, a thing for which the Ethiopians (as some of the Auncients for Parricide) had no lawe, as not thinking any would so farre degenerate; and therefore knew not how to punish them: but it was committed to the Latin Councell, which adiudged them to be burned; a punishment not knowne before in those parts, yet fitting to those vnnaturall burnings. The fault and punishment being of equall strangeness, the Emperour would not haue it executed there, but sent them to Goa to the Portugall Viceroy for that purpose. Heresie and Apostasie are likewise punished with death. That Latine Councell was instituted by Alexander the third, for causes and persons of Europe to be tryed, and iudged by Iudges of their owne, resident at the Court (as the Grand Councell is) and chosen of each Nation two, of the Venetians, Florentines, and Portugalls: the two former come thither by the way of Cayro. Andrew Oniedo a Iesuite, sent thither by the Pope with the title of Bishop of Hierapolis, was Author and Counsellor to the Emperor of this Institution, and by him made President of the same. This man (d Botero, Maffau, and others say) had miserable entertainment, with the residue of his Societie: but Frier Luis (from the relation of Don Iohn) tells, That he liued and died in great honour amongst them, as he doth elsewhere magnifie exceedingly their respect to the Roman Papacie and Religion (Credat Iudæus Apella. Cui bono is the rule of my Faith to Friars and Iesuites in their Relations: in Naturall and Morall Histories, which serue not to the building of Babels Tower, I receiue them with attention, with thanks, and if neede be, with admiration in some things: but when they comewith Slime in stead of Mortar, and would get Rome a Name, I remember their Vowes and Profession, and yeelde no further attendance. That Claudius which was then Emperour, and his successor Adamas, were of Schismaticall and Tyrannicall qualities, as other Historians affirme, Frier Luis not onely denies, but extolleth their good partes.

He which now is Emperour, was elected Ann. 1606. and called himselfe Zaragchauerat;

reast, a sprout or budde of the image of David, assister of S. Peter and S. Paul. He is a man haughtie and valorous, and was therefore chosen, because the Turkish Empire was so full of seditions, and the Sophi had sent his Embassador to them, to chuse a fit warrior, that they might with ioynt forces assault the Ottoman.

There are in all the Cities of Ethiopia two Schooles or Colledges, for the instruction of youth; one for the male sexe, the other for the female; each diuided into three parts; the first for the Gentlemens children, the second for Citizens, the third for the baser vulgar, with their seuerall Instructors, and without communion, meddling, or conuersing of the one with the other. The Seminarie or Colledge of boyes is a quarter of a league without the Citie, the other within. There are they taught Letters and Religion. All, euen the Kings themselves, are bound to send their children thither to be instructed: and the Priests resort thither for Confession, and ministring the Sacrament to them. They may resort home at festiuall times: otherwise they are there detayned. The Virgins, from ten to twentie; the other, from ten to sixteene yeares of their age. They haue not onely this order in their well-ordered Schooles, but in their disordered misorderly Stewes, the Diuels work-houses, and suburbs of Hell, which yet in Rome, and places of that Religion, are permitted and admitted the Cities, and his Holinesse selfe is not a little enriched with (that which God prohibited) f the price of the Doggs, and of the Whore. The Ethiopians permit not any to be strange women, but strangers of other Countries, which may not enter into their Cities: nor may the Nobles enter into the common houses which belong to the Citizens, or these to those of the Plebians, nor any but to those peculiarly designed their state, vnder paine of death, as adulterers, to be cast to the Lions. These women are hired by certain Officers at a common price, and are not to take any thing of particular men: they goe in pale-coloured garments, and if they distaste and forsake that beastly trade, they send them to some places subiect vnto the Portugalls, not admitting them to conuerse with their women for feare of infection.

g Making of Mummie.

But to leaue these Beasts, the Ethiopians giue great respect to their Physicians, which are onely of their Gentry, and that not all that will, but onely such as certaine Officers shall chuse, of euery Citie to be sent to their generall Vniuersities (of which there are seuen in Ethiopia) there to be taught Naturall Philosophie (Logicke, and other Arts they know not) together with Physicke, and the Arts of the Apothecarie and Chirurgian. They are there maintained at the publique charge of the Cities that send them. When the Doctors and Instructors see them fit to be Graduates, they goe with them to the Monkes of Allemya, and of Plurimanos, who with a Monkes Cowle, or Hood, and other Doctorall Ensignes, doe inuest and inaugurate them in that Degree. They are great Herbarists. They make g Mummie otherwise then in other partes, where it is cyther made of bodies buried in the Sands, or taken out of auncient Sepulchres, where they had beene laide, being embalmed with Spices. For they take a captiue Moore, of the best complexion, and after long dieting and medicining of him, cut off his head in his sleepe, and gashing his bodie full of wounds, put therein all the best Spices, and then wrap him vp in Hay, being before couered with a Seare-cloth; after which, they burie him in a moyst place, couering the bodie with earth. Fiue dayes being passed, they take him vp againe, and remouing the Seare-cloth and Hay, hang him vp in the Sunne, wherby the bodie resolueth and droppeth a substance like pure Balme, which liquor is of great price. The fragrant sent is such, while it hangeth in the Sunne, that it may be smelt (he saith) a league off. The priuiledges of Physicians are, that they are freed from the common custome of giuing one in three of their sons for the Emperors wars, that they may ride on Elephants in the Cities, which is allowed only to the Emperors, Prelats, and Priests, that are Virgins. They may also weare Miniuer-hoods, and are free from Subsidies and Payments. Theologic and the Chaldee tong is taught onely among their Priests and Ecclesiasticall persons in their Churches and Monasteries. They read Diuinitie in their natiue tongue: the Text is the foure first generall Councils: the Scripture they reade in Chaldee, h which is with them as Latine with vs. They handle not questions as the Schoolemen, in Logickall Disputations and Arguments, but copiously and eloquently interpret the Scriptures.

Because

Because we haue mentioned their Cities Saba and Zambra, let vs take some briefe view of them, and so leaue this Spaniard, whose Discourse hath (I hope, not without some delight and profit) thus long holden you. Besides these two Cities, none haue above three thousand houses in them. But these are populous and magnificent, with Towers, Temples, triumphant Arches, Obeliskes, Pyramides, and the like tokens of indistinct antiquitie, and maiestie. Saba was founded by that Queene which visited Salmone, and was the mother-Citie of the Empire. It hath fiftie thousand houses, great and sumptuous, the streets spacious, with Portalls or Penthouses, that men may walke safe from the Suns violence. It hath foure chiefe gates, all of Alabafter and Iaspur, wrought with Antique-workes; the gate-doores of Cedar curiously carued. The wayes that leade to these Gates, for the space of two leagues, are set with Palmes, Planes, Oranges, Cedars, Cypresses, and other trees on both sides, for shade and fruit: the foure high streets goe through the Citie acrosse, and where they meet, is an Arch or Vault erected on high Pillars, fairely wrought and gilded, with the brazen Image of S. Mathew, their supposed Patron, as bigge as a Giant, gilded also; the work of Architects sent by Francis Duke of Florence. Neere to this Citie are Mines of Gold, Gardens, and other places of pleasure and profit.

Zambra is greater, containyng thirtie thousand houses, and innumerable concourse of people. It stands in the Kingdome of Cafates, and nigh that great Lake, which hereof is called Zambra: where the Emperor, leauing his wonted manner of removing vp and downe in Tents, hath fixed his Court royall: and yet without the Citie are many Tents that belong to the Court. Here the Prete liueth, with two and fortie sonnes of Kings, and with his great Councell, and the Latine. Alexander the third built the Palace here 1570. with the Duke of Florence his workemen.

Touching Saba before mentioned, for the present State we will not contend with the Priest, but hold it nothing so auncient. Nay, as we haue elsewhere shewed, we rather beleue that this Queene (the supposed founder) was of the Sabzans in Arabia, whose neighbours the Abasenes were, and both, as it is very probable, her subiects. These after many ages (it is the coniecture of great Clerkes) passed into these partes of Africa, and seated themselues here by conquest, retayning their olde language in their Liturgie to this day. This Liturgie (or Canon of their Masse, which with other their formes and rites of Baptisme, Confirmation, Purification, &c. is extant in Bibliotheca Patrum) doth call their Church, the Church of Secua, or Sheba: and Stephanus placeth the Sabzans and Abasenes together, as before in the first Chapter of this book is shewed.

Tradition might well continue the memorie of this Queene amongst them, and Superstition might easily adde (where diuine and humane learning wanted) abundance of errors: which is not the Ethiopian case alone, but almost all Ecclesiasticall Histories written of things done long before, and deliuered onely by Tradition, rolled like a Snow-ball by superstition of succeeding times, haue yeelded such Legendarie lumps, that neede much licking before any forme of Truth can appeare. As therefore I reiect not the Ethiopian Historie wholly, nor denie it a meere changeling in this challenge of the Sabaean inheritance: so yet, I holde it needes iudicious examination and censure; the most whereof hath bene obruded on that simple credulous Nation in later times, as our Monkes dealt in these parts many ages. Ptolemy calls the chiefe Citie of Ethiopia Auxume, which Stephanus calls Æquitis, Arianus & Axomite, Procopius & Auzomide, all of them giue it the Metropolitan honour: it is supposed to bee the same which now is called Charumo, whereof Barbosa, Corfali, and Aluarez haue written: in witnesse whereof are many auncient buildings there yet remaining, and Pillars (somewhat resembling the Egyptian Obeliskes) admirable for their height: and workmanship, some about threescore yardes high, full of Letters.

These Letters (of which are many there scene in many ruines) not one of all the Abassens can vnderstand, which argueth a greater antiquitie then the Abassens, and that these are more lately planted or ingrafted into the Ethiopian stocke or stem. Yea for their Christianitie also, howsoever the Eunuch of Candace was converted, and the Apostolicall labours in Ecclesiasticall Histories mentioned, might sort to good effect in this Ethiopian Harvest, yet it seemeth the conversion of this Nation was not general till the dayes of Iustinian. For so Nicephorus Callistus writeth, that David the King of the Axumite Indians (why hee calls them Indians you have heard) warring vpon the Homerites which professed the Jewish Religion, vowed to the God of the Christians to become one of his followers, if he obtained the victorie; which accordingly he did. For taking Dannus the Homerite King aliue, hee sent to Iustinian to further him in the performance of his vow, who sent thither a holy Bishoppe, which baptised the whole Nation. It might be that the Ethiopians had before received the Gospell, after which time the Abassens out of Arabia might conquer them, and retaying their heathenish superstitions, vpon occasion of this warre might be converted: as we read of Clodouens the first Christned King of France, and of the French, notwithstanding the Galli had long before received Christianitie: which might also be paralleled in the Britains and Saxons inhabitants of this land, Howsoever; it is likely that euer since, this Nation hath continued Christian. Of Hellesthaus, you have seene before Procopius his testimonie. As for their owne reports of themselves Zaga Zabu tells one tale, Almaras another, Frier Luy a third: that we neede none other testimonie against them. Their exceeding store of zeale, and defect of learning, with the good intents of pia fraudes, (to what deuotion by any means) and that selfe-loue, which each both person and nation beares to it selfe: haue made, no doubt, readie inuenters and receiueurs of fables, ascribing to themselves the stories of both the Queenes, mentioned in the Olde and New Testament, the Sabaean and Ethiopian antiquities, and a world of other fancies, which neuer in the world were done: whereto the names of later Workes, Cities, Temples, Orders, and other occurrents haue bene applied. But it is time for our Pilgrim to passe further, where yet, he is like to speed worse, and to finde little truth of Ciuilitie or Religion.

CHAP. VII.

Of other Countries betweene the Redde Sea and Benomotapa.

Ethiopia Exterior or Inferior, is that Southerly Tract of Africa, which to Ptolemy and the Auncients was vnknowne. It comprehendeth all that great wedge of Land (such is the forme) which beginning in the West, at the Countries about Zaire, stretcheth to fife and thirtie degrees of Southerly latitude, and from thence, Northwards, to the entrance or mouth of the Arabian Gulfe; all this way besieged and enuironed with the Ocean. Maginus diuideth it into fife partes, Aian, Zanguebar, Benomoptapa, Casraria, and Congo: but Congo is here taken in a very large sense. Aian, after the Arabians account, containeth all that Region which lyeth betweene the mouth of the Redde Sea, and Quilimanci; being, for the most part, on the Sea-Coast inhabited by the said Arabians: but in the in-land parts thereof are people with a blacke Heathenish Nation. It comprehendeth two Kingdomes, Adel, and Ades; the former of which extendeth from that mouth of the Sea before mentioned, to the Cape Guardafu, by Ptolemy called Aromata. South and West it bordereth vpon the dominions of Prete Ianis, about the Kingdome of Fatigar. The chiefe Citie is Arar. Zeila also and Barbora pertaine to this Kingdome, Cities without the Streite, on the Sea, much frequented with Merchants. Zeila is situate in eleuen degrees, where Ptolemy placeth the Aualites. It is stored with varietie of Merchandise, and yeeldeth some representation of Antiquitie in the buildings thereof, consisting of Lime and Stone. The King is a Moore, and esteemed a Saint among the superstitious Mahometans, for his continuall Warres with the Christian Abassines, whence he transporteth with innumerable slaues to the Arabians and Turkes, receiuing in exchange Armour and other helpes for his Warres. Anno 1541. Guadanmeth the King hauing before done much harme, by the helpe of some Portugalls, which Claudianus the Abassine had in his warres, was slaine, and his Arnie ouerthrowne: but his successor, Anno 1559. slew Claudianus in battaile, and got (as Iohn de Castro affirmeth) the greatest treasure of the world: the Moore acknowledging diuine assistance in this victorie, triumphed on an Ass. Zeila was burnt and sacked by the Portugals; Anno 1516. as Andrea Corsali, who was then present in the Action, testifieth.

Adia is situate betweene Adel, Abassia, and the Sea. The inhabitants are Moores, descended of the Arabians, who many hundred yeares agoe, partly by their rich Traffique, and especially by force of Armes, became Lords, not onely of Aian, but of all the Sea-Coast, to Cape dos Corrientes, which is somewhat to the South of the Southern Tropicke. In all which space, before the Portugall Discoueries, that part of the Cities which lay open to the Sea, was open and vntorified, but toward the Land were walled, for feare of the in-land people. Adia payeth tribute to the Abassian. In this Kingdome is Magadazzo, being it selfe a petite Kingdome of the Moores, which are of an Oliue colour. Braua was a free towne, which, with Pate and Gogia, were taken by the Portugals, vnder Tristão de Cugna. All the countries adioyning to Presler Iohn, as Dauid the Emperour in his letter to K Emmanuel relateth, are eyther Moores or Gentiles, of which some worshippe Wood and Fire, some the Sunne, others Serpents, &c.

Zanzibar, or Zanguebar, is a name by the Arabians and Persians giuen to that Tract, extending from the Riuer Qualimanci, which Ptolemy calls Raptus, to the borders of Benomotapa. Some in a larger extent, include Benomotapa and Casraria. Samus affirmeth, That it is a low, fennie, and woodie countrie, with many riuers, which by extremitie of moysture cause the ayre to be intemperate. From the waste vpwards they goe naked. Herein are contained the Territories of Melinde, Mombaza, Quiloa, Mosambique, and others. Melinde is the name of a Kingdome, and of the chiefe Citie thereof: the Inhabitants, especially neere to the Sea, are Moores, and build their houses after the manner of Europe. The women are white, and the men of colour inclining to white, notwithstanding the situation vnder the Line. They haue blacke people also, which are Heathens for the most part. Of like condition is Mombaza, (which is said to haue some resemblance with Rhodes) but enemie to the Christians, and was ruined by Thomas Corigno, in the yeare 1589. for receiuing Alebeck the Turke; as Ampaza in the same Coast, by Alphonso Mello in the yeare before. They which haue desire to acquaint themselues with what Antiquitie hath deliuered of these parts, may resort to Arrianus his Periplus of the Erythrean Sea, and the labours of Struckius and Ortelius. For vs, to name you the towns of ancient trading (as Aualites, Malao, Mundi, Mosyllum, Apocopon Opone. Rhapta) which he reckons on the African shore, with other Riuers and Promontories, would not much further vs in this our Pilgrimage-Mart of Religions.

Quiloa stands nine degrees to the South of the Line: the name of a Citie and Iland, which is a Kingdome of the Moores, and extendeth her Dominion farre in the Coast. It was built (as Marmolus affirmeth) about the foure hundredth yeare of the Hirara (so he nameth it) by one Ali, sonne of Sultan Hoseen, who not agreeing with his other brethren, by reason their mothers were Persian, and his an Abissine, sought new adventures in these parts, and bought this Iland: the Historie of whom, and of his successors you may finde in that Author.

The King grew mightie by the trade of Sofala; but it was made tributarie to Portugall by Vascon Gamma, Anno 1500. In the yeare 1505. the Portugalls for deniall of that tribute, deprived Abraham, the Arabian King, of his Scepter, and built a Fort there; which the Moores soone after destroyed, together with the new King, made by the Portugals. The people are whitish, their women comely, rich in attire: their houses faire built, and richly furnished.

them the Promontorie Prassum. Here is Mosambique<sup>h</sup>, by which name is signified a Kingdome in the Continent, and an Island also, with a safe Harbour, which with two other Islands are in the mouth of the River Moghincats, in fiftene degrees South. Mosambique is inhabited by Portugals, which haue there a strong Castle: here the Portugalls ships winter. In this Island are sheepe, with tayles of five and twentie pound weight (a beast common in Africa:) hennes blacke both in feathers, flesh, and bone, and foddren, looke like Inke, yet sweeter then other in taste: Porke very good, but for the deere sawce. There are some Mahumetans, as they were all, before the Portugalls arriuall there. They haue trade in the Continent, in Sena, Macurua, Sofala, Cuama, a people for the most part differing in speech and behauiour, each Village fighting with her neighbour, captiuing them: and some (as at Macurua) eate them. Their chiefeft liuing is by Hunting, and by flesh of Elephants. In euery village is a new King. The Capitaine of Mosambique, in his three yeares gouernement, maketh three hundred thousand duckats gaine, especially by Gold, from Sofala.

Vp further within Land the people goe almost naked, and were so simple when first the Portugalls traded thither, that Ludomico Bartherma, or Vertomannus, for his shirt; and another for a Rasor, and a little Bell, bought fiftene Cowes of them; and then were readie to fall together by the eares among themselves for the Bell, who should haue it. But they could not enioy their purchase, being driuen to their heeles by three female Elephants, which hauing young ones, were very fierce; and made them leave their Kine to saue themselves. In these Seas the Moores saile in vessels sowed with Leather, the sayles of Palme-tree leaues, calked with Guinne, gathered off the trees in the woods.

Sofala lieth betweene Cuama and Magnice, two Rivers. Heere the Portugals haue on a little Island (whence the whole Kingdome hath his name) a Fort and Factorie of very rich Trade, the people bringing great quantitie of Golde (whereof they haue plentifull Mines) for their Cloth and other commodities: it is supposed that it amounteth to two millions yearly. Ortelius<sup>k</sup> is of opinion, That this Cephala, or Sephala, is that which in Salomons time<sup>l</sup> was called Ophir, from whence so great quantitie of Golde was brought by his Nauie. Iosephus<sup>m</sup> seekes for it in India: Eupolemus<sup>n</sup> in the Redde Sea, imagining it to be an Island there placed: Dom. Niger, Tremelius, and Iunius, in Aurea Chersonesus, where Malacca standeth (although we reade not of a nic great quantitie of Golde found in that soile.) P. Gaspar Varerius is of the same minde, but reckoneth to the Chersonesus both Pegu and Samottra, with all that lieth betweene them. Vatablus<sup>o</sup> with lesse reason, applieth it to Spagniola, discovered by Columbus, and by Columbus himselfe so called. Arias Montanus, Philip Muray, Postellus, Goropius, would by their authoritie much moue vs to thinke with them, that Ophir is Peru, if the ignorance of the Load-stone, and those huge Seas, esteemed by Antiquitie vnnauigable, did not detain vs from consent: and where should Peru yeeld him Iuorie, where neuer was yet seene an Elephant? Doctor Dee that famous Mathematician hath written a very large Discourse of that argument, which I haue seene with Master Hakluyt, much illustrating what the Auncients haue written of those Seas and coasts, and concludeth that Hauila is the Kingdome of Aua (subiect to Pegu) and Ophir is Chryse, or Aurea before mentioned, first possessed by Ophir, mentioned Gen. 10. that golden name eating vp the former of Ophir.

f Ios. Acoſta,
l. 1. c. 14.

Iosephus<sup>f</sup> Acoſta taketh Ophir and Tharſis to signifie no certaine places, but commonly to be taken in a generall sense, as the word India is now with vs; a name given to all remote Countries, East and West. He thinketh, that Salomons Golde, Iuorie, &c. came from the East Indies.

t Io. di Barros
Dec. 1. l. 10. c. 1.

But some reasons doe yeelde great cause of coniecture for Sofala, both because of the plentie of the commodities which Salomons seruants are said to bring with them, and because of auncient buildings of stone worke, which the Inhabitants call, the worke of Dimels; supposing it impossible for men (gessing of others by their owne ignorance) to haue built: Which also haue strange Letters, that the Moores (though learned) could not reade: (and why might they not be the old Hebrew Letters, which the Phcenicians of olde, and Samaritans to this day obserue, as else where we haue shewed?)

wed. And further, Thomas Lopez telleth, that certaine Moores related vnto them of the riches of those Mines; that Ships from Mecca and Zidem vsed to trade there; and that yearly there were taken forth of the Mines two millions of Mittigals, euery Mittigall being a Duckat of Gold, and a third part: That the Warres in those Countries at that time had ceased the Traffique: and that they had Bookes and Ancient writings, which testified, That these were the Mines whence Salomon in his three Voyages fetched his Gold, and that the Queene of Saba was naturall of the parts of India. As for India yee haue<sup>b</sup> euen now read, that it was a name giuen to many Nations, and among the rest to Ethiopia. And if a man consider the small skill which that Age of the World had in marine affaires, still as much as might be holding their course within sight of Land, he can scarce thinke, that long Navigations could then bee performed. Barrim accounteth all Sofala to the Empire of Benomotapa, of which we shall speake anon; wee haue now mentioned the same, by reason of the Isle which is subiect to the Portugals. These, besides Golde, here haue great Trade for Iuorie of which Barrim sayth, that in Benomotapa are yearly slaine foure or fife thousands, and of Water-horses (whose teeth are accounted Iuorie also) at the great Rivers in Africa are full. These feed sometimes on the Medowes, where the Mariners haue chased them, as Lopez<sup>c</sup> reporteth: and after long chasing by Land, they haue taken the water; where, in reuenge, they haue assaulted the Mariners in their Boats, and bitten chips off the same, being, by the thickeesse of their Hides armed against their Pikes, and haue made them afraid, that they would ouerwhelme the Boat.

Within the Land, behinde these partes, is the Kingdome of Monoemugi, which is rich in Golde: their vnfortunate Warres with Monomotapa haue made them knowne. Nilus is their VVesterne border, and Abassia on the North. They haue little redde Balles made of a kinde of Clay in Cambaya, and resembling Glasse, which they weare for ornament, and vse for monie. This King warreth with the Benomotapa, and hath terrible Souldiours, called Giacqui, or Agab, or Agog, who inhabit betweene the Lakes whence Nilus and Zaire take their beginnings; which liue a wandering life, like the Nomades in Cottages, which they make in the Fields. They are of stature tall, and of countenance terrible, making lines vpon their cheekes with certaine Iron Instruments, and turning their eye-liddes backward, eating their Enemies.

These nor long since (as<sup>d</sup> some say) inuaded the Kingdome of Congo, and forced the King to keep in a small Isle, where himselfe was taken with a Dropsie, and his people famished, as after shall follow in due place. The Amazones of Monomotapa are euery way equall vnto them in prowesse. Little is knowne of the Religion of these Heathenish Nations nor of other Kingdomes, whereof wee haue little but the names to relate, Goroua, Colta, Anzuga, Moneulo, Badijs.

Now for those Moores which inhabited the Sea-Coasts, as wee haue sayd, they are not all Catholike Mahumerans, especially such of them as haue conuerfed, and taken their habitations further within Land. And the first Moores or Arabians that came to inhabit those Coasts, were banished persons, called as in the Chronicles of Quiloa is reported, Emozaidin, of Zaide, the Nephew of Hocem, the sonne of Hali, whose Doctrine they followed in some opinions, contrary to the Alcoran, and therefore esteemed Heretikes.

Long after them came three ships with great multitudes of Arabians, that fled from the King of Laza their enemy, vnder the conduct of seuen brethren, which built Magadazzo, and after that, Braua; which in manner of a Common-wealth, was till the Portugals time gouerned by twelue Aldermen, or chiefe Gouvernours, that descended of the seuen brethren.

These Moores and the former differing from each other in their superstitions, could not agree, and therefore the Emozaidin were forced vp higher into the Countrey, and there by mariages mixed themselues with the Casers (so the Arabians call all Heathen people) and became Mungrels in a galli-maufrey of deuotions, whom therefore the Sea-coast-Moores, called by a general name, Baduini: which in Arabia and Egypt, is the title of the people that liue in the Champaine, and Inland Countries: and those that liue neere the Sea-coast are called Arabians.

They make no differēce of meats. Don Iohn of Castro<sup>a</sup> writeth that Badoil signifieth a man that liueth only by cattel: and that the Troglodites, and Nations from Melinde and Magadoxa to Cape Guardafu, and on both sides of the straits, and on the Arabike Sea to Ormuz (occupying rather then inhabiting the soile) are called Badoies. They are (sayth hee) sauage without truth or ciuilitie, they are Mahumetans, but accounted bad Mores; Theeues and Robbers, eating raw flesh, drinking Milke, their habite filthie; very swift, holding warre with all men; (as was prophesied of Ismael their progenitor) from Zeila to Suacen with the Abexijs, from thence to Alcocer with the Nobijs, from thence to Soez with the Egyptians, from Soez to Ormuz with the Arabians. They haue no King nor great Lord, but liue in troupes and factions; permit no Towne in their fields, haue no certaine habitation, but wander from place to place with their Cattell. Their Xequē determineth sutes as hee lusteth. Their lodging is in Caves and holes, of the most in Tents, their colour very blacke, their Language Arabike.

The Heathens in those partes are giuen to Auguries and Witcheries: and in their highest attempts and greatest resolutions. yet will leaue off, if any of these phantasies bode vnluckinesse. The fruits, birds, beasts, and feedes, are in manner like to the people, all wilde. The aire is vnwholesome. But what vnhealthfomenesse can there be found, where Gold is found? which makes men commit themselues (no maruell what they commit with others) to the most scorching heats, to contagious aires, to tempestuous Seas, and the darkest prisons of the disembowelled Earth.

Modestie had almost forbidden me to recite that, which may with some easily obtaine a Plaudite, in the last Act and finishing of this Chapter, concerning the Cassares. Linschoten<sup>b</sup> shall recite it for mee. They liue, sayth he, like beasts (he speaketh of those which liue neere Mosambique, and those especially more within the Land) they are blacke as pitch, with flat noses, thicke lippes, some haue holes both aboue and vnder in their lippes, and, as it were, other mouths in their cheekes, wherein they thrust small bones to beautifie themselues: for which cause they rase and seare their bodies with Irons. If they wil make a diuell sh forme and picture, they represent a white man in his apparell, as thinking nothing more vgly. Some also file their teeth as sharpe as Needles. They haue Villages wherein they dwell together, and in euery Village a Lord or King, to whom they are subiect. Religion and Faith are vnknowne to them. They vse mutuall warres, and some eat mans flesh. When they take prisoners in warre, or kill their enemies, they obserue a more then beastly testimony of their great valour, which is after this manner.

They cut off their priuy members (to deprive them of all hope of generation) and then drie them well for preseruatiō: after which they come before the King with great reuerence, in the presence of the principall men of the Villages, and there take these members, so dried, one by one in their mouths, and spit them on the ground at the Kings feet, which the King with great thanks accepteth; and the more to honour them, cause h them all to be taken vp and giuen to them againe, which is from thenceforth an Ensigne of their Knight-hood. For they take all those members, and tie them on a string like a bracelet or chaine; and at all solempne meetings, as when they marrie, or goe to a wedding or feast, the Bride, or wiues of these Knights, doe weare that chaine about their neckes, being, sayth our Authour, among them as great an honour as the Golden Fleece, or the renowned Garret with vs, and their wiues as proud, as if some Crowne or Scepter had befallen them.

CHAP. VIII.

Of Benomotapa, and the parts adioyning.

Benomotapa, <sup>a</sup> called also Benomotaxa, and Monomotapa, is a large Empire, so entituled after the name of the Prince thereof (for Benomotapa is with them a title, as Cesar or Emperour with vs the Portugals call him Emperour of the Gold.) extendeth after some mens reckoning almost a thousand leagues in compasse, betweene the great Lake, whence Nilus springeth on the North-east, Magnice and Toroa on the South, and the Sea-coast of Sofala on the East. It is betweene the Sea and the fresh waters, accounted a huge Island. Betweene Cuama and Corrientes it is pleasant and wholesome and fruitfull: and from the Cape Corrientes to Magnice, it abounds with beasts; but it is cold. Their principall Cities are Zimbab (happily the same which Ptolomey <sup>b</sup> calls Agisymba) and Benamataza; that one and twentie, this fiftene dayes iournie, from Sofala. Of the abundance of Elephants in Benomotapa is said before; whereof Ethiopia is every where stored with manifolde herdes: <sup>c</sup> although I dare not subscribe to their opinion, that esteeme Elephants as common there, where wee haue Oxen. It is a Creature nine cubites high (in their largest stature) and five cubits thicke: with long and broad eares, little eyes, short tailes, and great bellies. Of their disposition is spoken already.

The Mines neere to Sofala, are those of Manica, which are in wide Champaines compassed with mountaines, ninetie myles in circuit. The places where the Golde is, appeare and are knowne by the drynesse and barrennesse of the soile, as if Nature it selfe could not hord vp Gold in her spacious chest, but shee must needs proue bare and barren of her wanted good workes; and how much lesse, vnnaturall and degenerate Mankind? The Prouince is called Matuca, the people Botonghi (which although they are betweene the Line and the Tropike) yet in Winter haue such snowes in the mountaines, that if any abide there, they die frozen in them; and in Sommer-time the aire in the tops of those hills is so cleare and pure, that some of our men, which were then there, saw the New Moone, the same day that shee had kissed her bright and bountifull brother.

And who can now charge the bright eye of the World, with the obscure darknesse of this Peoples hue, which so cold Winters, nor pure Summers, can lessen or lighten? Yea even in the cold Countries neere the Cape of Good-hope, the Ethiopians haue no hope or happe of good colour; whereas the hotter Countries of Libya, and in manner all America (notwithstanding the Sunnes strait looking, and neerenesse, not allowing them a shadow to attend them in the greatest height of his bountie) know not this blacke tincture in the naturals thereof.

But to retorne (and who will not retorne?) to the Mines: There are other Mines in the Prouinces of Boro and Quiticui; in which and in the Rivers, is found Gold not so pure. The people are carelesse and negligent to get, and the Moores which traded with them, were faine to giue their wares in trust, with promise by such a time to pay them in Gold, and the people would not faile in their word.

Other Mines are in Toroa, wherein are those buildings which Barrim attributeth to some forren <sup>d</sup> Prince, and I, for the reasons before alledged, to Salomon. It is a square fortress, of stone; the stones of maruicilous greatnesse, without anie signe of mortar or other matter to ioyne them. The wall five and twentie spannes thicke, the height not holding proportion. Ouér the gate are letters, which learned Moores could neither read nor know what letters they were. There are other buildings besides, of like fashion. The people call them the Court, for an Officer keepes it for the Benomotapa, and hath charge of some of his women, that are there kept. They esteeme them beyond humane power to build and therefore account them the workes of Deuils; and the Moores which saw them, said the Portugals Castles were no way to bee compared to them. They are five hundred and tenne miles from Sofala, Westward, in one and twentie degrees of Southerly Latitude: in all which space is not found one building building Ancient or later; the people are rude, and dwell in Cottages of Timber.

All the people of this Region is of curled haire, & more ingenious then those which are against Mosambique, Quiloa and Melinde, among whom are many that eate mans flesh, and let their Kine blood to satisfie their thirst. These seeme prone to receiue the Faith: for they beleue in One God, whom they call Mozimo and haue no Idols, nor worship other thing: They punish nothing more seuerely then Witchcraft, whereunto other Negros are exceedingly addicted; no such person escapeth death. The like detestation they conceiue against Adulterie and Theft. Euery one may haue as manie wiues as they will: but the first is principall, the other serue her; and her children are heires. A woman is not marriageable with them, til her Naturall purgation testifie for her abilitie to Conception: and therefore they entertaine the first fluxe thereof with a great Feast.

In two things they are Religious; in obseruation of daies, & Rites concerning their dead. Of daies, they obserue the first day of the Moon, the sixt, the seuenth, the eleuenth, the sixteenth, the seventeenth, the twentieth, and the eight and twentieth, because in that day their King was borne. The Religion is in the first, sixt, and seuenth, all the rest are repetitions, aboue ten. When any is dead, after his body is eaten, his neere kindred, or his wife which hath had most children by him, keepe the bones, with some signes whereby to know, whose they were; and euery seuenth day they obserue Exequies in the same place where they are kept: They spread many clothes, and set thereon tables furnished with bread and sodden flesh, which they offer to the dead with prayers and supplications. And the principall thing they request of them, is, the good successe of their Kings affaires. These prayers they make, being clothed in white garments: after which the good man and his family eat their offerings. The Benomotapa must weare clothes of the same Countrie, for feare of infection; others may weare forren cloath. He is serued on the knee, and when hee drinketh or cougheth, all they which are about him make a shout, that all the Towne may know. None may cough in his presence: also, euery one must sit in token of reuerence; to stand, is a signe of dignitie which he affordeth the Portugals and Moores, and is the chiefe honour can be yeilded any. The second honour is to sit on a cloth in his house: the third, that a man may haue a dore in his house, which is the dignitie of great Lords. For meaner persons, they need not feare to haue any thing stolne out of their open houses seeing the seueritie of Iustice doth secure them. Doores are not for necessitie, but for honor. Their houses are of pyramidall or steeple forme, all the timbers meeting in the middest at the top: covered with earth and straw. Some of them are made of timbers, as long and as bigge as a great ships mast: the greater they are, the more honourable.

The Benomotapa hath Musike whither soeuer he goeth, with singers: and more then fise hundred iesters, which haue their Captaine or Master of Mis-rule. The Royall ensigne is a little plow-share, with an iuorie point, which he carrieth alway at his girdle; by which is signified peace, and husbanding of the ground. Hee beareth likewise one or two <sup>a</sup> swords in token of Iustice, and defence of his people. The Countrie is free, and giues him no other payments, but presents, when they come to speake with him: and certaine dayes seruice. No inferiour comes before his superiour without some present, in token of obedience and courtesie. The Captaines of warre with all their bestow seuen dayes in thirtie in his husbandrie or other businesse. Hee must confirme all sentences of Iudgment in his owne person: there needs no prison, for matters are presently dispatched, according to the allegations and testimonies that are brought. And if there be not sufficient testimonies, then the matter is tryed by oath, in this manner. They beat the barke of a certaine tree, and cast the powder thereof in water: <sup>b</sup> which the partie drinketh, and if he doe not vomit, he is cleared; if he vomit, hee is condemned. And if the accuser, when the accused partie vomiteth not, will drinke of the same, and doth not vomit, he is then acquitted, and the matter dispatched. If any sue to him, he speedeth not, but by mediation of a third person, which also sets downe the summe that the King must haue, sometime at so deare a rate, that the suter rather refuseth the Kings grant. They haue no Horse, and therefore warre on foot: The spoiles are generally shared amongst all. When he marcheth, in the place where he is to lodge they they make a new house of wood, and therein must continuall fire be kept, without ever going out; saying, that in the ashes might be wrought some witcheries to the indamage of his person. And when they goe to the warres, they neuer wash their hands nor faces, till they haue obtained victorie. They haue their wiues with them, which are so loued and respected, that if the Kings sonne meet with one of them in the street, he giues her way. Benomotapa hath more then a thousand women; but the first is principall, although she be inferiour in blood, and her sonne succeeds. And in feed-time and haruest, the Queen goeth to the field and ouerseeth the stufte, esteeming it a great honor. Thus farre out of Barrus.

Iohannes Boterus <sup>f</sup> tells, That his chiefe warriors are women, namely, certaine Amazones, which seare off their left paps, as Odoardo & Lopez reporteth, lest they should hinder their shooting, after the manner of the ancient Amazones: they are quick, bold, courageous, and constant in battell, and most constant in inconstancie: for when they make shew of flight, they will returne (espying their aduantage) with the greatest furie. They dwell in certaine Countries by themselves, and at certaine times haue men to accompany with them for generation, to whom they send their males, reseruing all the female children which they haue. Thus we finde Amazons, which the Ancients reported in Asia, and Diodorus in Libya, now in these times, if this report be true, in Ethiopia: and Huldericus <sup>h</sup> Shmidel hath told of the like in America. Others <sup>i</sup> deny it: and none hath yet written of them from his owne sight

In the year 1560. Consalvus <sup>i</sup> Silueria, with two other Iesuits, went from Goa to the Kingdomes of Inhamban, and Monomotapa: and comming to Inhamban, they went to Tonge, the Citie Royall, where they Baptised the King and all his people in a short space, naming the King Constantine, the Queene Mary. Thence went Consalvus to Monomotapa, and so preuailed with his Images, Preaching, and Contempt of the world, that he wanne the King and his mother, with multitudes of others to Baptisme. But soone after the King, by suggestion of the Moores, slew him. Sebastian in reuenge raised an Armie of fixteene hundred, <sup>k</sup> most of them being Gentlemen, which he sent under the conduct of Francis Barretto. The Benomotapa fearing the Portugals forces, offered reasonable conditions, which Barretto refusing, was discomfited, not by the Negro, but by the aire; the malignitie whereof (the sowre sauce of all these golden Countries in Africa) consumed his people. There are other Kingdomes adioyning to Monomotapa, and the Mountaines of the Moone, Matana, Melemba, Quinbebe, Berreza, Bauagul, of which I can giue you but the names.

Caphraria, or the Land of the Caphars is next to be considered, which Maginus boundeth betweene Rio di spirito sancto, and Cape Negro, extending to the Cape of Good Hope Southwards. Why he should call this part the Caphars, I know not: for the Arabians, of whom this word is borrowed, giue that name to all the Heathen people in Africa: yea both the Arabians, and all of their Religion, call all such as receiue not that superstition, Caphars, euen Christians also, as Master Jenkinson <sup>l</sup> long since told vs. And for the Heathens in Africa, Barrus affirmeth, that it is by the Moores giuen to them all: signifying, Without Law, or lawlesse people. Zanguebar is in this respect called Caphraria. It should seeme it is appropriated to these the Southerliest Nations of Africa; for want of other the more true proper names which were vknowne. With the names of the Capes, and other places of note, Master Pory <sup>m</sup> hath alreadie acquainted his English Reader: Onely that notable and famous Cape of good hope (so named <sup>n</sup> by Iohn the second, King of Portugall, for that hope which he conceiued of a way to the Indies, when it was first discouered) deserueth some mention. It hath three head-lands, the Westernmost beareth name of Good hope, the middlemost, Cabo falso, because they haue sometimes, in their returne from the Indies, mistaken this for the former: betweene which two Capes runneth into the Sea a mightie Riuer, called by the Portugals, Rio dulce, which springs out of a Lake called Gale, situate among the Mountaines of the Moone, so much celebrated by the ancient Geographers: The third and Easternmost, is that of Agulhas or Needles, about fife and twenty leagues from the first: both which seeme as two hornes, wherewith it threatens the Ocean, which in these parts is found oftentimes <sup>o</sup> tempestuous, and when it cannot preuaile against this rough-faced and horned Promontory, it wreketh the whole malice vpon the ſhippes, whoſe ribs, in the enraged fits, it would breake if they were of iron; as Linschoten teſtifieth of his owne experience. True it is, that ſometimes it is paſſed with more eaſe, but not ſo vſually: and Linschoten tells, that at his returne from India, the Saint Thomas, a new Carrick, was heere caſt away, and their ſhip, wherein he ſailed, in ſuch danger, that one while they prayed, another while murmured, another time would returne backe, and the Captaine profeſſed no ſmall maruell why our Lord ſuffered ſuch good Catholikes to endure ſuch torments, and the Engliſh Heretikes, and blaſphemers to paſſe ſo eaſily. The waues there (ſaith he) ſtrike againſt a ſhip, as if they ſtrucke againſt a hill, that if it were of ſtone it would at laſt be broken. Heere Captaine Lancaſter traded with the people, and for two kniues bought an Oxe for one, a ſheepe, &c. in good quantitie. Their ſheepe are great, with great tailes, but hairie, not woolled. Their oxen great, not fat, but well fleſhed. The Captaine killed there an Antelope as big as a Colt. There were diuers great beaſts vnknowne to them. When they had paſſed this Cape, they loſt their Admirall, Captaine Raimond, and neuer ſaw them, or heard of them more. And foure dayes after they found a terrible enemy from aboue, and encountred with a thunder-clap, which ſlew foure of their men out-right, their necks being wrung aſunder: And off foureſcore and foureteene men there was not one vntouched, but ſome were blinde, others bruised in their legges and armes, or breſts, others drawne out, as if they had beene racked; which all yet, God be thanked, did after recouer.

The ſame Sir James Lancaſter was after this ſent Generall for the Eaſt-India Company; which hauing made a ſtocke of threeſcore and twelue thouſand pound, bought the Dragon of ſix hundred tunnes, the Hector of three hundred, the Aſcenſion of two hundred and foureſcore, the Suſan of two hundred and threeſcore, and ſent in them in merchandize and Spaniſh mony, to the value of ſeuene and twentie thouſand pound. The Scorbute ſo weakened their men, that they were not able to hoize out their boats, except in the Generalls ſhip, whoſe men (drinking euery morning three ſpoonfulls of the iuice of Limons) were healthfull. He bought a thouſand ſheepe in Soldania, and fortie two oxen as bigge as ours, the ſheepe greater, but hairie, and might haue bought more, for old iron. The people, he ſaith, are tauny; Cornelius Houtman ſaith, Oliue blacke, blacker then the Braſilians, their haire curled and blacke, as in Angola, not circumciſed, clocke like a brood-hen in ſpeaking. paint their faces with diuers colours, ſtrong, actiue, ſwift, ſubiect to Monomotapa: they ſlew ſome Flemings for wrongs, which made the Engliſh warie in trading with them. Sir Edward Michelborne found heere great reliefe. Beſides great herds of oxen and flockes of ſheepe, heere is abundance of Deere, Antilopes, Baboones, Foxes, Hares, Oſtriches, Cranes, Pelicans, Herons, Geefe, Duckes, Pheſants, Partridges, &c. A great Bullocke they might buy for an old iron hoop not worth two pence, a ſheep for a peece not worth two good horſe-nailes. The people liued on the guts and filth of the meate which our men caſt away, not ſo much as waſhing the ſame, but couering them ouer with hot aſhes, before they were through hot, pulled them out, and ſhaking them a little with their hands, did eat both guts, excrements, and aſhes. They liue vpon raw fleſh and certaine roots. Sir Henry Middleton, a Generall of the foure ſhippes aboue named, found (in his returne) three and fifty men dead in the Hector at this Bay, and but ten left: The Suſan was loſt, it was thought for want of men. And long before the trade of the Engliſh (which is now very much encreaſed in the Eaſterne parts) Gionanni da Empoli telleth, That neere the Cape, the Countrey-people would giue them a Cow for a little bell. The men and women were clothed, or rather a little couered, with hairy ſkinnes, the women beautifying this their beaſtly habite with the tailes of the beaſts, hanging downe before and behinde to couer their ſhame. Theſe women had large and deformed pappes. Religion they could obſerue none amongſt them, and thought that they ate their fleſh raw.

The Hollanders alſo in the yeare 1595. trafficked with theſe Caffres, which were valiant, but baſe in apparell, couered with Oxe or ſheepe-ſkinnes wrapped about their ſhoulders, with the hairy ſide inward, in forme of a mantle: their priuy-parts couered with with a sheepes taile, fastened before and behind with a girdle. But now we see it made a daily matter to the Portugall, English and Dutch, so capable of Hope of Good, that the Cape of Good hope is nothing feared: although at home many haue no good hope of publike good, and wish that they would carry out of Europe lesse <sup>r</sup> money, and bring home more men. For my part, I wish so wel to Nauigation and Discoueries, that I could wish such complaints to be but calumnies, and to be the knauigations of false discouersers. I cannot omit, <sup>r</sup> that vpon the top of this Promontory, Nature hath as it were, framed her selfe a delightfull bower, heere to sit and contemplate the great Seas, which from the South, East and West beat vpon this shore: and therefore hath heere formed a great plaine, pleasant in situation, which with the fragrant herbes, variety of flowers, and flourishing verdure of all things, seemes a terrestriall Paradise. It is called the table of the Cape. That which from hence lieth to Cape Negro, hath not to our purpose any thing notable. This also deserueth mention, that notwithstanding all the damages of this dreadfull Promontory, and the seas on this side and beyond, <sup>r</sup> James Botellinus a Portugall, to recouer the fauour of his Prince, John the third, by the first bringing newes of a happy accident that then befell in India, in a little boat or vessell scarce eightene foot long, and six broad, sailed from Cochin to Dabul, and from thence alongt the Arabian and African shores, doubling this terrible Cape, and missing Saint Helena, came yet safe to Lisbone, worthily welcomed both for his message, and the messenger, that durst aduenture to encounter Neptunes strongest forces, notwithstanding so weake furniture.

The Hollanders <sup>r</sup> at the Cape of Good hope, (if you will heare other testimonies) had of the Inhabitants two kine for two rustie kniues, and one much greater for a new one: two fat buls and three sheep for a bar of iron, weighing threescore and ten pound. The people make much account of iron: they are of short stature: darkish colour: their armes are adorned with copper and iuory, their fingers with rings of gold, and with beads of bone and wood. They brand their bodies with diuers markes. And because they alway annoint themselves with grease and fat, they yeeld a ranke smell. If we killed a beast for our vse, they would aske the inwards, and eat them raw, the filth being not well cleansed from them. At their Feasts they would seeth a beast in his hide, fastened on foure sticke with fire vnderneath. They liued miserably, yet for gallantry ware bones and peeces of dried flesh about their neckes. Neere this Cape are weeds growing in the sea siue and twentie fathome long.

The Ascension <sup>r</sup> built their Pinnesse An 1608. at Soldania, about fifteene or sixteene leagues from the Cape of Good Hope, and there tooke in for their prouision about foure hundred head of cattell, as Oxen, Steeres, Sheepe, and Lambes, together with fowles and fresh water. They filled their boat with Seales at the Ile Pengwin, a little from thence. Such was the brutish nature of the Inhabitants, that when the English had cast out of their ship one of those Seales, and the same had lien foureteene dayes, and now swarmed with crawling Maggots, they would take them vp and eat them, as they would also doe the guts, garbage, and panch of the beast. They more esteemed iron, then gold or siluer. Heere the first night after they weighed anchor, The Ascension lost the Union, and the Good Hope their Pinnesse (so neere the Cape of Good Hope) which, me thinkes, obseruing what after befell them, seemes an ominous presage, written in these names, of their other losses which followed, concluded with the losse of their ship on the coast of Cambaya. It is morally true, that ascending and aspiring mindes lose Vnion (<sup>r</sup> for only by pride doth man make Contention) Union being gone, Good Hope followeth, Qua concordia crescunt discordia & res & spes pereunt: and so it befell in this their tragedie, after the losse of those Vessels which bare such names. The ship was lost by the Masters indiscretion, but yet hath the honor (suruiuing her fate) that shee was the first English ship that euer sailed on those Seas. But let vs returne (lest this Ascension or extension of our Discourse bring it to the like shipwrack) vnto the Ethiopian Cafres.

<sup>r</sup> For money, both Portugals and others haue found that the Indians more esteeme it farre then merchandise. *Vid. Lit. Fr. de Sagitta in N. <sup>g</sup> Andrew Battell was taken by the Portugals on the coast of Brasil, and shipped o-uer to Congo, where (and in the Countries adiacent) he liued very many yeares, and was Sergeant of a Band, &c.

He Kingdome <sup>a</sup> of Congo (vnderstanding so much by the name, as in times past hath beene subiect thereto) hath on the West, the Ocean; on the South, the Caphars, and mountaines of the Moone; on the East, those hills from which the Riuer issue and runne into the fountaines of Nilus; and on the North, the Kingdome of Benin. Of these Countreies, Pigafetta, <sup>b</sup> from the relation of Odoardo Lopez, a Portugal, hath written two bookes, out of whom P. du Jarric, Botero and others, haue taken most of their reports.

And in this we will beginne with the most Southerly parts; in which we first come into the Kingdome of Matama (this is the Kings proper name) who being a Gentile, ruleth ouer diuers Prouinces, named Quimbebe. This is a Kingdome <sup>c</sup> great and mightie, extending from Brauagal to Bagamidri: the aire thereof is holesome, the earth outwardly furnished with store of fruits, inwardly with mines of Cristall, and other mettals. The Segniories towards the Sea-coast are very meane, and want Hauens. Angola sometime a Prouince of the Kingdome of Congo, is now a great Kingdome it selfe, and very populous. They speake the same language, with small difference of dialect, that is vsed in Congo, whose yoake they cast off since the Congois became Christians. Diego <sup>d</sup> Can first discovered these parts for the Portugals, Anno 1486. And the Portugals vsed to trade quietly with the Angolans: but some of them trading as high into the Countrey as Cabazza, the royall City, which is an hundred & fiftie miles from the Ocean, were there by order from the King put to the sword, vnder pretence of intended treason. This was done 1578, Paulo Dias (to whom the King Sebastian had giuen the gouernment of these parts, with licence to conquer three and thirtie leagues alongst the coast to him and his heires) to reuenge himselfe for this despight done to his people, armed such Portugals as he had, and with two Gallies and other Vessels, which he kept in the Riuer Coanza, he went on both sides the Riuer, conquering and subduing many Lords vnto him. The King of Angola raised a mightie armie of a million of men, <sup>e</sup> as is supposed. For they vse to leaue none at home that is fit to carrie a weapon: and make no preparation for victuall, but such, as haue any, carry it vpon the shoulders of their seruants, and therefore no maruell if their food being soone consumed, their Campes be soone dissolued. Small likewise is their prouision of Armour for offence, and for defence much lesse. Diaz sent to the King of Congo for aid, who sent him sixtie thousand men: with which, and his owne Nation, he made his partie good, against the confused rabbles of the Angolans. The trade of Angola is yet continued, and from thence the Portugals buy and carry to Brasil and other parts yearly, a world of slaues, which are bought within the Land, and are captiues taken in their warres. One Thomas <sup>f</sup> Turner that had liued a long time in Brasil, and had also been at Angola, told me, that it was supposed eight and twentie thousand slaues (a number almost incredible, yet such as the Portugals told him) were yearly shipped from Angola and Congo, at the Hauen of Loanda. He named to me a rich Portugal in Brasil, which had ten thousand of his owne, working in his Ingenios (of which he had eigh-teene) and in his other employments. His name was John de Paus, exiled from Portugall, and thus enriched in Brasil. A thousand of his slaues, at one time, entered into conspiracie with nine thousand other slaues in the Countrey, and barricadoed themselves for their best defence against their Masters, who had much adoe to reduce some of them into their former seruitude.

To returne to Angola, we may adde the report of another of our Countrey-men, <sup>g</sup> Andrew Battell (my neere neighbour, dwelling at Leigh in Essex) who serued vnder Manuel Siluera Perera, Gouernor vnder the King of Spaine, at his Citie of Saint Paul: and with him went farre into the Countrey of Angola, their armie being eight hun-dred ced Portugals, and fiftie thousand Naturals. This Andrew Battell telleth that they are all Heathens in Angola. They had their Idols of wood in the middest of their Townes, fashioned like a Negro, and at the foot thereof was a great heape of Elephants teeth, containing three or foure tunnes of them: these were piled in the earth, and vpon them were set the skulls of dead men, which they had slaine in the warres, in monument of their victorie. The Idoll they call Mokisso, and some of them haue houses built ouer them. If any be sicke, he accounteth it Mokisso's hand, and sendeth to appease his angrie god, with powring wine (which they haue of the Palme-tree) at his feet. They haue proper names of distinction for their Mokissos, as Kissungu, Kalskie, &c. and vse to sweare by them, Kissungu, that is, by Kissungu. They haue another more solemne oath, in triall of controuersies: <sup>h</sup> for which purpose they lay a kinde of hatchet, which they haue, in the fire, and the Ganga-Mokisso, or Mokissos Priest taketh the same red hot, and draweth it neere to the skinne of the accused partie; and if there be two, he causeth their legges to be set neere together, and draweth this hot iron without touching betweene them; if it burnes, that partie is condemned as guiltie, otherwise hee is freed.

For the ceremonies about the dead, they first wash him, then paint him, thirdly apparell him in new clothes, and then bring him to his graue, which is made like a vault, after it is digged a little way downe, vndermined, and made spacious within, and there set him on a seat of earth, with his beads (which they vse in chaines and bracelets for ornament) and the most part of his goods, with him in his lasting home. They kill Goats, and shed the blood in the graues, and powre wine there, in memoriall of the dead.

They are much giuen <sup>i</sup> to diuination by birds. If a bird flie on their left hand, or crie in some manner which they interpret ominous and vnluckie, they will cease from the enterprises which they haue in hand. Their Priests are <sup>k</sup> called Ganga, and so highly reputed, that the people thinke it in their power to send plentie or scarcitie, life or death. They are skilfull in Medicinall herbes, and in poysons; and by familiaritie with the Diuell foretell things to come.

In Angola euery man taketh as many wiues as he will. There are mines of siluer, and of most excellent copper. They haue many kine, but loue dogs better then any other flesh, and fat them to the shambles. Andrew Battell saith, That the dogs in those countries are all of one sort, prick-eared curtes of a meane bignesse, which they vse also to hunt with, but they open not; (for they cannot barke) and therefore they hang clappers made of little boords about their neckes. He hath seene a mastiffe sold for three slaues. Lopez affirmeth that a great dog was exchanged for two and twentie slaues; which might happen vpon some extraordinarie occasion. The money in Angola is glasse-beads, which they vse also, as is said, for ornament. The King of Angola hath seemed willing to become Christian, and hath sent to the King of Congo for that purpose, but could not obtaine any Priests in that scarcitie to instruct him.

This Kingdome hath many Lord-ships subiect thereto, as farre on the Sea-coast as Cape Negro. Towards a Lake, called Aquelunda, lieth a Countrey called Quizama, the Inhabitants whereof being gouerned after the manner of a Common-wealth, haue shewed themselues friendly to the Portugals, and helped them in their warres against Angola. The houses in Angola are made in fashion like a Bee-hiue. The women at the first sight of the new Moone, turne vp their bummes, in despight, as offended with their menstruous courses which they ascribe vnto her. The men sometimes in a valorous resolution, will deuote themselues vnto some haughtie attempt in the warres: and taking leaue of the King, will vow neuer to returne, till they bring him a horse-head, or some other thing very dangerous in the enterprise, and will either doe it or die. Horse-tailes are great jewels, and two slaues will be giuen for one taile, which commonly they bring from the Riuer of Plate, where Horses are exceedingly encreased and growne wilde. They will, by fiering the grasse round about, hemme the horses about with a fierie circle, the fire still streightning and approaching neerer, till they haue advantage enough to kill them: Thus haue the European cattell, of horse and kine, so encreased in that other world, as they spare not to kill the one for their hides, and the other for their tailes.

1 Od. Lopez,

Next to Angola Northwards, <sup>1</sup> is the Kingdome of Congo, the Westerne line, whereof Lopez extendeth three hundred threecore and fiftene miles; the Northerne five hundred and fortie; the Easterne, five hundred; and the Southerne, three hundred and threecore. The breadth thereof from the mouth of Zaire, crossing ouer the Mountaines of the Sunne, and the Mountaines of Crystall, is fixe hundred miles. And yet is it much streightned of the ancient bounds, only the title except, which still holdeth the old stile; DON ALVARO King of Congo, and of Abundos, and of Matama, and of Quixama, and of Angola, and of Cacongo, and of the seven Kingdomes of Congers Amolaza, and of the Langelungas, and Lord of the River Zaire, and of the Anziquas, and Anziguana, and of Loango. The present Kingdome is diuided into fixe Prouinces, Bamba, Songo, Sundi, Pango, Batta, Pemba. Bamba is the chiefe for greatnesse and riches, then gouerned by Don Sebastian Mani-Bamba: the word Mani is a title of honor, and signifieth a Prince or Lord: when need requireth, the Mani-Bamba may haue in Campe foure hundred thousand men of warre. Therein are mines of siluer: and on the Sea-coast a kinde of shells which they vse for money, for siluer and gold is not vsed for money amongst them. In this Prouince are yearly bought by the Portugals aboute five thousand Negros. There are among them very migtie men, that will cleaue a slaue in the middle, or cut off a Bulls head at one blow. Yea one of them did beare on his arme a vessell of wine, containing the fourth part of a Butt, and might weigh three hundred and five and twentie pound, vntill it was cleane emptied. There are certaine creatures as bigge as Rammes, and haue wings like Dragons, with long tailes and chappes, and diuers rowes of teeth, and feed vpon raw flesh. Their colour is blew and greene, their skinne be-painted like scales, and they haue but two feet. These the Pagan Negros doe worship for gods, and at this day many of them are kept for a miracle. And because they are very rare, the chiefe Lords doe curiously preserue them, and suffer the people to worship them, in regard of the profit which accreweth to them by the offerings which the people make vnto them. Other Creatures of these parts are mentioned in the first Chapter of the former Booke. Peacockes are not common, and are very deare, their feathers being vsed for royall ensignes. The King of Angola bringeth vp some in an inclosed wood, and suffereth none to keepe them but himselfe. To speake at large of the other five Prouinces, would be tedious to the Reader, and Master <sup>m</sup> Hartwell hath taught Lopez to speake English, of whom such as are desirous, may be further satisfied.ouer-against the Ile Loanda, where the shell-money is gathered, is vpon the Continent, the Towne of Saint Paul, inhabited with Portugals and their wiues.

m Historie of Congo translated by Abraham Hartwell.

The Riuers of Congo are many, Bengo, Coanza, Dande, Lembe, Ozone, Loze, Ambriz, and the greatest of all, Zaire: all which haue some, either affinitie in mutuall marriages of their streames, or consanguinitie in the fountaines from whence they flow, which are certaine Lakes, the first of which is Zembre, the other Aquelunda. In all these Riuers are common the rarities of Nilus, the ouer-flowing of the waters, Riuer-horses, Crocodiles, and such like. Andrew Battell told me of a huge Crocodile, which was reported to haue eaten a whole Alibamba, that is, a company of eight or nine slaues chained together, and at last payed for his greedinesse: the chaine holding him slaue, as before it had the Negroes, and by his vndigestible nature deuouring the deuourer; remaining in the belly of him after he was found, in testimony of this victorie. Hee hath seene them watch and take their prey, hailing a Genner, man, or other creature into the waters. A souldier thus drawne in by a Crocodile, in shallower waters, with his knife wounded him in the belly, and slew him. In their Summer it raineth not, and then the places in their Winter (the time of the Sunnes neere presence, attended with daily raines) couered with water, doe grow thicke, and matted with abundance of little trees, herbes and plants, which the farned wombe of that moist soile conceiueth by the directer beames of the Sunne, and the ouer-flowing waters in the Winter carry away, as it were small <sup>n</sup> Ilands; lifting them vp together with the roots and soile, the yong trees and Deere standing and growing thereon, carried captiue vnto Neptunes eternall prisons. In Bengo and Coanza they are forced to set vp, for a time, houses vpon cratches, their other houses being taken vp for the Riuers lodgings. Zaire is of such force, that no ship can get in against the current, but neere to the shore: yea it preuailes against the Oceans saltnesse threescore, and as some say, fourescore miles, within the Sea, before his proud waues yeeld their full homage, and receiue that salt temper in token of subiection. Such is the haughtie spirit of that streame, which ouerrunning the low Countreies as it passeth, and swollen with conceit of daily conquests, and daily supplies, which in armies of showers are by the clouds sent to his succour, runnes now in a furious rage, thinking euen to swallow the Ocean, which before hee neuer saw, with his mouth wide gaping, eight and twentie miles, as Lopez affirmeth, in the opening; but meeting with a more Giant-likeemie, which lies lurking vnder the cliffes to receiue his assault, is presently swallowed in that wider wombe; yet; so, as alwayes being conquered, he neuer giues ouer, but in an eternall quarrell, with deep indented frownes in his angry face, soming with disdain, and filling the aire with noise, (with fresh helpe) supplies those forces which the salt-sea hath consumed. In this Riuer is a fish called Ambize, Angulo, or Hog-fish, that hath, as it were, two hands, and a taile like a Target, which eateth like Porke, and whereof they make Larde, and hath not the saour or taste of fish. It feedeth on the grasse that groweth on the banks of the Riuer, and neuer goeth out: it hath a mouth like the mozell of an Oxe: there are of them that weigh fise hundred pound a peece.

About the yeare 1490. Iohn the second, King of Portugall, sent Consaluo di Sosa, with three ships, and Priests in them, to bring the King and people of Congo to Christian Religion, which was effected: and although hence arose ciuill warres amongst them, yet the matter was at last ended to the advancement of the Christian Religion (such as the Portugals taught, and no doubt, infinitely better then their Pagan superstition, howsoeuer sported with many Romish staines) and from that time to this, now an hundred and twentie yeares, hath Congo continued Christian, vnder Iohn, Alfonso, Pedro, and the rest of their Kings.

When the first Bishop of Saint Thomas went into Congo, to take possession of his Pastorall charge there (for the Kingdome of Congo was annexed to the Bishopricke of Saint Thomas) for the Sea-side to the Citie, which is an hundred and fiftie miles, King Pedro caused the wayes to be made smooth and trimme, and couered ouer with mattes, that the Bishop should not set his feet vpon any part of the ground, not adorned: all the wayes, trees, and higher places swarming with people, offering Lambes, Kiddees, Chickins, Partridges, Venison, Fish, and other necessities, to testifie their zeale. And at last arriuing at the Citie of Saint Daniels (before called Banza, which signifieth a Court, and is commonly attributed to all the chiefe Cities, where the King of any of those Countreies holdeth his residence) he was there receiued by the King and his Nobles, and ordained the Church there to be the Cathedrall Church of his See, which had belonging to it eight and twentie Canons, with other Officers, and Ornaments vsuall.

After Don Pedro succeeded Francisco, and after him, Diego: who being dead, his sonne, and two other Competitors of the Kingdome were slaine, and Henrico, brother to Diego, was made King, and after his death, Aluaro, whom the Giacchi draue out of his Kingdome, till King Sebastian sent Francisco di Gouea to expell them.

The greatest, and most zealous Prince for Christian Religion, was Alphonso, who, on paine of death, forbade to all his subiects the hauing, or worshipping of Idols, which he commanded should be all brought, and deliuered to the Lieutenants of the Countrey, together with their Characters and Witcheries. For before euery man adored that which best liked him: some, those Dragons before spoken of; others, Serpents, which they nourished with their daintiest prouisions. Some worshipped the greatest Goats they could get; some, Tigres; and the more vncouth and deformed any beasts were, the more in their beastly and deformed superstition were they obserued. Bares, Owles, and Scritch-owles, birds of darknesse, were the obiects of their darkened Deuotions; Snakes and Adders enuenedomed their soules, with a more deadly payson, then they could doe their bodies. Beasts, Birds, Herbes, Trees, Characters, and the formes of those things painted and grauen, yea the skinned of them, being dead, stuffed with straw, had their shares in this diffused varietie, and confused masse of irreligious Religion. The ceremonies they vsed to them, were, kneeling on their knees, casting themselves groueling on the earth, defiling their faces with dust, verball prayers, reall offerings. They had their Witches, which made the people beleue that their Idols could speake: and if any man had recouered of any sicknes, after he had recommended himself to them, they would affirme that the angry Idoll was now appeased. All these Idols King Alphonso caused to be burned in one heape, in stead whereof, the Portugals gaue them Images of Saints, and Crucifixes to worship. This may seeme an exchange rather, then a ceasing from Superstition, were not some fundamentall and especiall substance of Truth communicated (besides those blinde shadowes) wherewith, no doubt, God draweth some out of darknes (this darknes notwithstanding) in a true and sauing, though a dimme and shadowed light; wherewith as farre going before vs in affection, as we before them in knowledge; I dare not but in the hope of the saluation of some, thanke God for this glimse of heavenly light, rather then rashly to censure and sentence them to a totall and hellish darknesse.

Emanuel 9 since sent supplies of religious persons, to confirme them in their Christianitie, and his sonne, Iohn the third sent also Iesuits to that purpose, who erected Schooles among them: and they also send their sonnes into Portugall to learne the Sciences and knowledge of Europe. f Andr. Battell.

They vse in Congo 2 to make cloathes of the Enzanda tree, (of which some write the same things that are reported of the Indian Fig-tree, that it sends forth a hairy substance from the branches, which no sooner touch the ground, but they take roote and grow vp, in such sort, that one tree would multiply it selfe into a wood (if Nature set not some obstacle.) The inner-most barke of the Inzanda, by beating, is made excellent cloth. Other trees there are, which the Tides couer, and are discovered by the Ebb, laden at the roote with Oysters. But more admirable is that huge tree called Alicunde, of which my friend Andrew 1 Battell supposeth some are as bigge (besides their wonderfull tallnesse) as twelve men can fathome. It spreads like an Oake. Some of them are hollow, and the liberall clouds into those Naturall Caskes dispense such plentie of water, that one time three or foure thousand of them, in that hot Region, continued foure and twentie houres at one of those trees, which yeelded them all drinke of her waterie store, and was not empried. Their Negros climed vp with pegs (for the tree is smooth, and therefore not otherwise to be climbed, and so soft, that it easily received pegs of a harder wood, driuen into her yeelding substance with a stone) and dipped the water, as it had bene, out of a Well. He supposed that there is fortie tunne of water in some one of them. It yeeldeth them good opportunitie for hony, to which end the Countee-people make a kinde of Chest, with one hole into the same, and hang it vpon one of these trees; which they take downe once a yeare, and with fire or smoake chafing or killing the Bees, take thence a large quantitie of hony. Neither is it liberall alone to the hungrie and thirstie appetite, but very bountifullly it cloathes their backs, with the barke thereof, which being taken from the yonger Alicundes and beaten, one fathome which they cut out of the tree, will by this meanes extend it selfe into twenty, and presently is cloth fit for 2 wearing; though not so fine as that which the Inzanda-tree yeeldeth. It serues them also for boats, one of which cut out in proportion of a Scute, will hold hundreths of men.

Lopez.
These boats, saith Andrew Battell, are made of another tree, for the Alicunde is of too spongy
a substance
for that purpose.

Of their Palme-trees, which they keepe with watering and cutting every yeare, they make Veluets, Sattens, Taffatas, Damaskes, Sarcehens, and such like, out of the cleansed and purged leaues thereof, drawing long and euen threads for that purpose.

And for their Palme-wines, which they draw out of the toppe of a kinde of Palme, which at first is strong and inebriating wine, and in time declineth to a sowre and holefome vineger: of the stone of the fruit, which is like an Almond, they also make bread, of the shale of the fruit, Oyle, which also serueth them for butter: Lopez distinguisheth this tree from the Coco tree, which is there also growing: and another Palme that beareth Dates; others that beare Cola, like a Pine-apple, excellent for the stomacke, and for the Liuer most admirable: it being supposed that the liuer of a Henne or other bird, bird, putrified, sprinkled with this matter, recouereth the former freshnesse and soundnesse. Other sorts of Palmes yeeld other fruits, and of their leaues they make matres, wherewith they couer their houses. Lopez saw a Pomecitron, the kernell whereof leifi within the rinde, yeelded a pretie tall sprig in foure dayes.

Of stones they haue such store to build with, that in some places they may cut out a Church of one peece. There are whole mountaines of Porphyrie, of Iaspas, of white Marble, and other Marbles: One especiall, that yeeldeth faire Iacinthos, that are good jewels, straked like as it were with Naturall veines.

The Port and Ile of Loanda lying ouer-against the Portugall Towne of Saint Paul, famous for many thinges, deserueth especiall mention for this, that it yeeldeth, in lesse then halfe a yard digging, Waters very sweete; but of so contrarie a Nature to the Sea, her mightie neighbour, that when the Sea ebbeth, the Water is salt, and when it floweth the same is sweete and fresh: as if the Sea imparted that which it selfe hath not, or rather enuied that which it hath, and therefore alway at his coming, re-demaundeth that saltnesse from those springes to attend vpon their Ocean mother. So doe wee see the Siluer Lampes of Heaven in the Sunnies absence to lighten the World, which yet want light, when it is most plentifull; to shew them selves. Euen Nature sealet and confirmeth Monopolies to her principall Countiers, alwayes provided, that it thereby better serueth for the Common good, and therefore no precedent to such dropie and splen-like Monopolies, Monie-pollings, with which some exorbitant members burthen themselves, and make others by lighting, heauie, worthily therefore by the Sunne of our Great Brittain, at the first rising of his morning brightnesse, dispersed from our Horizon. But how farre is Loanda from Brittain? And yet our scope is to bring Loanda and all the World else into our Brittain; that our Brittaines might see the in and out-side of the same. Loanda is reported (as some affirme of Egypt and Nilus to be the issue of the Ocean land, and Coanza's mire which in proceesse of time brought forth in their disagreeing agreement, this Island.

In Congo the King is Lord Supreme: and none hath power to bequeath his goods to his kindred, but the King is heire generall to all men.

CHAP. X.

IT followeth in the course of our Discouerie, to let you on shore in Loango, the Northerly neighbour of Congo, right vnder the Line, whose Countrie stretcheth two hundred myles within Land. The people are called Bramas, the King, Mani Loango; sometimes, as report goeth, subiect to the King of Congo. They are Circumcised after the manner of the Hebrewes, like as also the rest of the Nations of those Countries vse to bee. They haue abundance of Elephants, and wear clothes of Palme. Andrew Battell liued amongst them two yeares, and a halfe. They are, sayth hee, Heathens, and obseue manie Superstitions. They haue their Mokisso's or Images, to which they offer according to the proportion of their sorts and suites: The Fisher offereth Fish, when hee sueth for his helpe in his fishing; the Countrey-man, Wheat; the Weauer, Alibungo's peece of cloath; other bring bunches of wine: all wanting that they would haue, and bringing what they want, furnishing their Mokisso with those things, whereof they complaine themselves to bee furnished.

Their Ceremonies for the dead are diuers. They bring Goates and let them bleed at the Mokisso's foot, which they after consume in a Feasting memoriall of the deceased partie: which is continued foure or five dayes together, and that foure or five seuerall uerall times in the yeare, by all of his friends and kindred. The dayes are knowne, and though they dwell twentie myles thence, yet they will resort to these memoriall-Exequies, and beginning in the night will sing dolefull and funerall songs till day, and then kill, as aforesaid, and make merrie. The hope of this, maketh such as haue store of friends to contemne death; and the want of friends to bewaile him, makes a man conceiue a more dreadfull apprehension of Death,

Their conceit is so rauished with superstition that many die of none other death. Kin is the name of vnlawfull and prohibited meate, which according to each kindreds deuotion, to some Family is some kinde of Fish; to another, a Hen; to another, a Buffe; and so of the rest: in which, they obserue their vowed abstinence so strictly, that if any should (though at vnawares) eate of his Kin hee would die of conceit, alway presenting to his accusing conscience the breach of his vow, and the anger of Mokisso. Hee hath knowne diuerse thus to haue died, and sometimes would, when some of them had eaten with him, make them beleue, that they had eaten of their Kin till having sported himselfe with their superstitious agonie, hee would affirme the contrarie. They vse to set in their Fieldes, and places where Corne or Fruits grow, a Basket with Goats-hornes Parrats feathers, and other trash: This is the Mokisso's Ensigne, or token that it is commended to to his custodie; and therefore the people very much addicted to theft, dare not meddle, or take any thing. Likewise, if a man, wearied with his burthen, lay it downe in the high way, and knie a knot of Grasse, and lay thereon; or leaue any other note (knowne to them) to restifie, that hee hath left it there in the name of his Idol, it is secured from the lime-fingers of any passenger. Conceit would kill the man that should transgresse in this kinde.

stolne goods

In the Banza, or chiefe Citie, the chiefe Idoll is named Chekeke. Euery day they haue there a Market, and the Chekeke is brought forth by the Ganga, or Priest, to keepe good rule, and is set in the Market-place, to preuent stealing. Moreover, the King hath a Bell<sup>a</sup>, the strokes whereof sound such terror into the heart of the fearefull theete, that none dare keep any stolne goods after the sound of that Bell. Our Author inhabited in a litle Reed house, after the Loango manner, and had hanging by the wals, in a Cloth case, his Peece, wherewith he vsed to shoot Fowles for the King, which, more for loue of the Cloth then for the Peece, was stoln. Vpon complaint, this Bel (in forme like a Cow-bell) was carried about and rung, with proclamation to make restitution; and hee had his Peece the next morning set at his doore. The like another found, in a bagge of Beads of a hundred pound weight, stolne from him, and recouered by the sound of this Bell.

b Triall of suspected persons.

They haue a dreadfull and deadly kind of triall in Controuersies, after this manner<sup>b</sup> There is a litle Tree, or Shurbbe, with a small Root (it is called Imbunda) about the bignesse of ones thumbe, halfe a foot long, like a white Carrot. Now when any listeth to accuse a Man, or Family, or whole Street, of the death of any of his freinds, saying, That such a man bewitched him, the Ganga assemblthe the accused parties, and scrapes that Root, the scrapings whereof he mixeth with water, which makes it as bitter as gal (hee tasted of it:) one Roote will serue for the triall of a hundred men. The Ganga brewes the same together in Gourds, and with Plantaine stalkes hitteth every one, after they haue drunke, with certaine words. Those that haue received the drinke, walke by, till they can make Vrine, and then they are thereby freed. Others abide till eyther Vrine frees them, or dizzinesse takes them: which the people no sooner perceiue, but they cry, Vudoke, Vudoke, that is, naughtie Witch: and hee is no sooner fallen by his dizzinesse, but they knotke him on the head, and dragging him away, burle him ouer the Cliffe. In euery Libertie they haue such Tryals, which they make in cases of Theft, and Death of any person. Euerie weeke it falls out that some or other vndergoes this Tryall, which consumeth multitudes of people.

There be certaine persons called Dunda, which are borne of Negro-Parents, and yet are, by some vnknowne cause, white. They are very rare, and when such happen to bee borne, they are brought to the King, and become great Witches: They are his Councillors and aduise him of luckie and vnluckie dayes for execution of his enterprises. When the King goes any whither, the Dundas goe with him, and beate the ground ground round about with certaine Exorcismes, before the King sits downe, and then sit downe by him. They will take any thing in the Market, none daring to contradict them.

Kenga is the landing place of Loango. They haue there an Idoll called Gumbiri, and a holy House, called Munsa Gumbiri, kept and inhabited by an olde woman; where once a yeare is a solemne Feast, which they celebrate with Drummes, Daunces and Palme-wines: and then they say he speaketh vnder the ground. The people call him Mokissa Cola, or a strong Mokisso, and say, That he comes to stay with Chekeke, the Idoll of the Banza. That Chekeke is a Negro-Image, made, sitting on a stoole: a little house is there made him: they annoint him with Toccola, which is a redde colour made of a certaine Wood<sup>b</sup> ground on a stone, and mixed with water, wherewith they daily paint themselves, from the waste vpwards, esteeming it great beautie: otherwise they account not themselves readie. It is for like purpose carried from hence to Angola. Sometimes it fal: out, that some Man or Boy is taken with some sudden Enthusiasme, or raiuishment, becomming madde, and making a whooping, and great clamours.

b This seemeth to be Red Sanders: A. Bat. sayth it is Loga wood.

They call them Mokisso-Moquai, that is, taken of the Mokisso. They cloth them verie handsome, and whatsoeuer they bid in that fit (for it lasteth not very long) they execute as the Mokissos charge.

Morumba is thirtie leagues Northwards from hence, in the Mani Lan-Loango's Dominion; where he liued nine moneths. There is a House, and in it a great Basket, proportioned like to a Hiue, wherein is an Image called Morumba, whose Religion extendeth farre. They are sworne to this Religion at tenne or twelue yeares olde: but for probation are first put in a House, where they haue hard diet, and must be mute for nine or tenne dayes, an prouocation to speake notwithstanding. Then doe they bring him before Morumba and prescribe him his Kin, or perpetual abstinence from some certaine meat. They make a cut in his shoulder like to an halfe Moone, and sprinkle the blud at Morumbas feet, and sweare him to that Religion. In the wound they put a certaine white powder, in token of his late admission; which, so long as it continueth, doth priuiledge him to take his meat and drinke with whomsoeuer hee pleaseth, none denying him the same, at free cost. They also haue their fatall Tryals before this Image, where the accused partie kneeling downe, and clapsing the Hiue, saith Mene gusacabamba Morumba, signifying: That hee comes thither to make triall of his innocence; and if hee bee guiltie, hee fals downe dead; being free, hee is freed. Andrew Battell sayth hee knew fixe or seuen, in his being there, that made this Tryall.

Beyond the Countrie of Loango are the Anziguas, the cruellest Cannibals which the Sunne looketh on. For in other places they eat their enemies, or their dead; but here they take and eat their Kinsfolkes and Countrey-folkes. They keep Shambles of Mans flesh, as with vs of Beefe and Muttons. They eat their enemies: Their slaues (if cut out they will yeeld them more in the seuerall loyntes, or Peeeces, then to be sold aliue) they kill, though it be but to saue a halfe-penie. Some of them for wearinesse of life, and some (oh crueltie of vain-glory) euen for valour of courage, in contempt of Death, and esteeming it an honourable prooffe of their fidelitie and manhood, will offer themselves to the Butcherie, as faithfull as subiects vnto their Princes, of them to bee consumed and eaten, that with their death, and after their death, they may doe them seruice.

c Od. Lopez l. 12 cap. 5.

These Anzichi stretch from Zaire to Nubia. They haue manie Mines of Copper, and great quantitie of Sanders, redde and gray; wherewith (mixed with the Oyle of Palme-tree) they annoint themselves. The Portugals temper it with Vineger, for the healing of the French Pockes: by the smoake thereof they driue away the head-ache. It is incredible, or at least would so seeme to vs, which Lopez reporteth, That they carrying their arrowes (which are short and slender, of a very hard Wood) in the Bowe-hand, will shoot off eight and twentie (so many they holde at once) before the first of them fall to ground; and with a short Hatchet, with a sudden whirling themselves about, breake the force of the enemies Arrowes, and and then hanging this Hatchet on their shoulder, discharge their owne Arrowes. They are of great simplicitie, loyaltie, and fidelitie, and the Portugals more trust them then any other slaues. They are yet sauage and beastly, and there is no conuersing with them; but they bring slaues of their owne Nation, and out of Nubia to Congo to sell; for which they recarrie Salt, and Shells, which they vse for Monie, Silkes, Linnen, Glasses, and such like.

They <sup>a</sup> circumcise themselves, and besides that, both men and women, both of the Nobilitie and Comminaltie, from their childhood marke their faces with sundrie slashes made with a knife. I asked (sayth <sup>b</sup> Lopez) of their Religion, and it was told mee that they were Gentiles; which was all I could learne of them. They worshippe the Sunne for the greatest God, as though it were a man; and the Moone next, as though it were a woman. Otherwise euery man chuseth to himselfe his owne Idoll, and worships it after his owne pleasure. The Anzichi <sup>c</sup> haue one King principall, which hath many Princes vnder him.

Of Ambus and Medera, Northerne Regions, little besides the names is knowne. Biafar is inhabited with people much addicted to Enchantments; Witchcrafts, and all abominable Sorceries.

Of the Giachei we haue made often mention, and of their incursions into Congo. These, in their owne Language, are called Agag, as Lopez <sup>d</sup> testifieth, and liue on both sides of Nilus, in the borders of the Empire of Mohenhe-Muge. They vse to marke themselves about the lippe, vpon their cheekes, with certaine lines which they make with Iron Iustruments, and with fire. Moreouer, they haue a custome to turne their eye-liddes backwardes; so that their blacke skinnes, white eyes, and cauterised markes seeme to conspire a dreadfull and gastly deformitie in their faces. They holde warre with the <sup>e</sup> Amazones; and of late yeares haue inuaded the neighbour Nations. Their weapons are Darts; their food humane flesh, without all humanitie deuoured.

<sup>e</sup> These Amazones are (as we haue obserued) doubted of in other places: and Andr. Battell, which trauelled neere to those parts, denieth this report of Lopez as vntrue.

Thus Lopez reporteth by Reports. Andrew Battell liued (by occasion of the Portugals treacherie) with the Iaggas a longer time then euer any Christian, or white man had done; namely sixteene moneths: and serued them with the Musket in their warres: neyther could Lopez (saith hee) haue true intelligence whence they came. For the Christians at that time had but vncertaine coniectures of them: neither after had the Portugals any conuersing, but by way of commerce: but hee beeing betrayed, fledde to them for his life, and after, by stealth escaped from them: the only European that euer liued in their Campe.

He sayth; they are called Iaggas by the Portugall, by themselves Imbangolas, and came from Sierra Liona: That they are exceeding deuourers of mans flesh, for which, they refuse Beefe and Goats, whereof they take plentie. They haue no settled habitation, but wander in an vnsettled course. They rise in Haruest, and inuading some Countie, there stay as long as they find the Palmes, or other sufficient meanes of maintenance, and then seeke new aduentures. For they neyther Plant or Sowe, nor breed vpon Catell: and which is more strange, they nourish vpon none of their owne children, although they haue tenne or twentie wiues a man, of the properest and comeliest slaues they can take. But when they are in trauell, they digge a hole in the Earth, which presently receiueth in that darke prison of death, the new-borne Creature, not yet made happie with the light of life. Their reason is that they will not bee troubled with education, nor in their flitting wanderings bee troubled with such cumbersome burthens.

Once, a secret providence both punisheth the Fathers wickednesse, and preuenteth a Viperous; Generation if that may bee a preuention where there is a succession without Generation: and as Plinie <sup>c</sup> sayth of the Esseni; Gens aeterna est in qua nemo nascitur. For of the conquered Nations they preserue the boyes from tenne to twentie yeares of age, and bring them vp, as the hope of their succession; like Negro-Azimogli <sup>f</sup>; with Education fitting their Designs. These weare a Collar about their necke, in token of slauerie, vntill they bring an Enemies head slaine, in battaile, and then are they vn-collared, freed, and dignified with the Title of Soldiours.

If

If one of them runnes away, he is killed and eaten. So that hemmed in betwixt hope and feare, they grow very resolute and aduenturous, their Collars breeding shame, disdain, and desperate furie, till they redeeme their freedome, as you haue heard. Elembe the great Iagge brought with him twelue thousand of these cruell monsters from Siera Liona, and after much mischiefe and spoyle setled himselfe in Benguele, twelue degrees from the Line Southwards, and there breedeth and groweth into a Nation. But Kelandula, sometime his page, proceeds in that beastly life before mentioned, and the people of Elembe by great troupes runne to him, and follow his Campe in hope of spoyle. They haue no Fetisso's, or Idols. The great Iagge, or Prince, is master of all their Ceremonies, and is a great Witch. I haue seene this Kelandula (saith our Author) continue a Sacrifice from Sunne to Sunne; the Rites wherof are these: Himselfe sat on a stoole in great Pompe, with a Cappe adorned with Peacocks feathers (which fowles in one countrey called Shelambanza, are found wilde, and in one place empaled, about the graue of the King, are fiftie kept and fedde by an olde woman, and are called Inpilla Mokisso, that is, Birds of Mokisso). Now about him thus set, attended fortie or fiftie women, each of them wearing continually a Zebras tayle in their hands. There were also certaine Gangas, Priests or Witches. Behinde them were many with Drums and Pipes, and Pungas (certaine Instruments made of Elephants teeth, made hollow a yard and halfe, and with a hole like a Flute, which yeelde a lowde and harsh sound, that may be heard a mile off.) These strike, and found, and sing, and the women weaue (as is said) till the Sunne be almost downe. Then they bring forth a pot, which is set on the fire, with leaues and Roots, and the water therein: and with a kinde of white powder, the Witches or Gangas, spot themselves, one on the one cheeke, the other on the other; and likewise their foreheads, temples, breasts, shoulders, and bellies, vsing many inchanting tearmes, which are holden to be prayers for victorie. At Sunne-set a Ganga brings his Kissengula, or Warre-Hatchet, to the Prince (this weapon they vse to weare at their girdles) and putting the same in his hand, biddes him be strong, their God goes with him, and he shall haue victorie. After this they bring him foure or fise Negros, of which, with a terrible countenance, the great Iagge with his Hatchet kills two, and other two are killed without the Fort. Likewise, fise Kine are slaine within, and other fise without the Fort; and as many Goats, and as many Dogges, after the same manner. This is their Sacrifice, at the end whereof all the flesh is in a Feast consumed. Andrew Battell was commanded to depart when the slaughter began, for their Diuell, or Mokisso (as they said) would then appeare and speake to them. This Sacrifice is called Kissembula; which they solemnize when they attempt any great enterprise. There were few left of the Naturall Iagges, but of this vnnaturall broode the present succession was raised.

Now that we haue thus discoursed of these former Nations, let vs take view of the more in-land and Easterly borders, which abutte on Congo: where we shall finde the great Lake Aquilunda, which with her many Riuers aforesaid, watereth all that great Countrey, assisted therein by a farre greater Lake, called Zembre, great Mother, and chiefe Ladie of the Waters in Africa. As for the Mountaines of the Moone, now called Toroa, there is a Lake called Gale, of no great quantitie, whence issueth a Riuer, named Camissa, and by the Portugalls, the sweete Riuer, disemboquing at the false Cape, an arme whereof had before entred the Sea (in 32.40.) of Infante, one of Diad his companions, in the first Discouerie of those parts, called Infante, because he there went first on Land. But from those Hills of the Moone, the Lake whence Nilus springeth hath no helpe. Neither are there two Lakes, East and West, distant from each other about foure hundred and fiftie miles, as Ptolemy describeth; for then the one should be in the confines of Congo and Angola, the other about Sofala and Monomotapa: where is found but one Lake (for Aquilunde is no tributarie to Nilus.) This Lake is betweene Angola and Monomotapa, and containeth in Diameter 195. miles. There is indeede another Lake, which Nilus maketh in his course, but standeth Northward from the first Lake Zembre, and not in East or West parallel. Neither doth Nilus (as some affirme) hide it selfe vnder the ground, and after rise againe, but runneth through monstrous and desert Valleyes, without any setled channell, and where no people people inhabited, from whence that fabulous opinion did grow. This Lake is situate in twelue degrees of Southerly latitude, and is compassed about like a Vault with exceeding high Mountaines, the greatest whereof are called Casates, vpon the East; and the Hills of Sal-Nitrum, and the Hills of Siluer on another side, and on the other side with diuerse other Mountaines. The Riuer Nilus runneth Northwards many hundred miles, and then entereth into another great Lake, which the Inhabitants doe call a Sea. It is much bigger then the first, and containeth in breadth two hundred and twentie miles, right vnder the Equinoctiall Line. Of this second Lake, the Anzichi giue certaine and perfect intelligence: for they traffique into those partes. And they report, That in this second Lake there is a people that sayleth in great Shippes, and can write, and vseth number, weight, and measure, which they haue not in the partes of Congo; that they build their houses with Lime and Stone, and for their fashions and qualities may bee compared with the Portugalls. This seemeth to be in Goïame, where the Abassine entitleth himselfe King, and in his title (as before you haue read) calls it the Fountaine of Nilus: which Aluarez also mentioneth, that Peter Conilian saw. He affirmeth, That there are Iewes about those partes, which perhaps are the people that the Anzichi speake of.

From this second Lake in Goïame, the Riuer which is there called Gihon, passeth through the Pretes Dominion to Meroe, and so to Egypt, as elsewhere is shewed. In these two great Lakes are diuerse Islands, that we speake not of the Tritons, and other I know not what monsters, there reported to be found. The Lake Zembre yeeldeth not Nilus alone, but Zaire, a farre more spacious Riuer in widenes, and more violeat in force then Nilus, or any other Riuer in Africa, Europe or Asia, of which we lately related. And besides her Northerne and Westerne tributes, carried by those two Riuers to the Mediterranean and Ocean Seas, she sendeth her great streams of Magnice, Coaua, and Cuama, into the inner or Easterne Ocean.

Magnice<sup>f</sup> springing out of Zembre, receiueth in his voyage to the Sea three other Riuers; Nagoa, called S<sup>t</sup>. Christophers; and Margues, which both spring out of the Mountaines of the Moone, by the people there called Toroa; the third is Arroë, which besides his waters, payeth to Neptune, which neyther needs nor heeds it, a great quantitie of golde, which it washeth from the Mountaines of Monomotapa (a Countrey extending it selfe between Magnice and Cuama) whose seuen mouthes seekte to swallow vp many Islands, which they holde in their iawes, but through greedinesse loofe that which greedinesse makes them seekte, not able to swallow so great morsels, which therefore remaine and are inhabited with Pagans. Boterus saith, That this Riuer runs out of that Lake, a great space in one channell, and then is diuided into two; the one called Spirito Santo, running into the Sea, vnder the Cape Couenti; the other Cuama, receiueth the Riuers Panami Luangua, Arruia, Mangionio, Inadire, Ruina, and is failed more then seuen hundred miles.

Coaua is also a great Riuer. The Inhabitants within Land, about these Riuers, are (as you haue heard) Pagans and rude people. Let me now haue leaue to conuey my selfe downe this Riuer Coaua into the Ocean, and there take view of the many Islands with which nature hath adorned this African world, as with many Brooches & Jewels set and hanged about the fringes of her garments: and first learning what wee can of the Islands in and from the Redde Sea hither, we will in some Portugall Carricke sayle round about the African Coast, and acquaint you with what we shall finde worthiest obseruation: and then not willing as yet to set foot in Lesbone, as we meete with the Fleet of Spaine sayling to the New-found world, will passe with them for further discoueries. For, to goe into the Mediterranean, to discouer the African Islands there, will scarce be worth the while. To heare a litle of those few may content vs.

CHAP. XI.

Of the Seas and Islands about Africa: the auncient and moderne Observations, Navigations, and Discoveries.

After this long and tedious journey ouer Land, where the steepe and snowie Mountaines, the myrie and vnholosome Vallies, the vnpassable wildernesses, swift riuers, still lakes, thicke woods, and varietie of the Continent-observations, haue thus long whiled vs; let vs now, by a swifter course take view of the African Seas, and those Islands which they hold alway besieged, but neuer conquer. In the first place presents it selfe to our Discoverie that Sea, which separateth (after the moderne reckoning) Africa and Asia asunder. This is called the Redde Sea; which name (saith <sup>a</sup> Plinie) the Grecians call Erythraum (this word signifieth redde) and is ascribed by some to a King named Erythras, (whom Posseilus * and some others thinke to be Esa or Edom, which the like signification of his name signifying Redde, and habitation not very farre distant, make somewhat probable) by others to the repercussion of the Sunne-beames; by others, to the colour of the Sand and Earth (in the bottome;) and by others to the nature of the Water it selfe. Solinus <sup>b</sup> affirmeth, it is called Erythraum, of King Erythrus, the sonne of Perses and Andromade, and not onely of the colour, alledging <sup>c</sup> Varro, that learned Roman, for his author: who also mentioneth a Fountaine on the shore thereof, which changeth the colour of the sheepes fleeces which drinke there, into a darkish and darker colour. Strabo <sup>d</sup> citeth the testimonie of Nearchus and Orithaga- ra, concerning the Isle Tyrina, two thousand furlongs from Carmania, in which the Sepulchre of Erythras is shewed, being a great hill, planted with trees: and that he reigned in those parts, and left his name thereunto: which they learned of Mubropastes, who flying from Darius, had liued in that Island. Barrus <sup>e</sup> writeth, That Alfonso Dalbuquerque (that victorious Portugall, who subdued so many Islands, Seas, & King-domes to that Crowne) in a Letter to King Emmanuel affirmeth, That it may be called the Redde Sea, of certaine red spots or stains which are seene therein: and when hee mined into the Streits, he encountered a great veine of redde water, extending it selfe from Aden as farre as they could see from the Ships tops. These redde veines of water the Moores ascribed to the ebbing and flowing of that Sea. Iohn di Castro <sup>g</sup> (afterwards Viceroy of India) sayled to the bottome of the Streith, as farre as Suez, and much laboured to finde the cause, why it should be called the <sup>h</sup> Redde Sea: there known only by the name of the Sea Mecca: and they marvelled much at our name Redde. He, or Gaspard Aloisius which writ the booke of this voyage, which my friend Mr. Hakluyt communicated to me, saith that the colour of this Sea is as of other Seas, neyther is there redde dust blown in by the winds: but the land generally on both sides is brown and very darke, as if it were scorched, in some places blacke, and in some white: the Sands are of ordinary colour; onely in three places were certaine mountaines with veines of redde, which were hard Rocke. In many places the waues seeme very redde by accident: but taking vp the water in a vessell, out of the Sea, it seemed cleerer and more crySTALLINE then that without the Streits. He caused also some to diue, which did bring him out of the sandie bottome a redde matter, branched like Corall. In other places where were greene spots in the Sea, were taken out greene branches: & where the Sea was white, the sand there-vnder was very white: and though the depth in some places amounted to twentie fathom, yet the puritie of the crySTALLINE waters caused this transparent colour. Neere to Suachen he found most of those spots, and from thence to Alcozer, the space of one hundred thirtie fixe leagues. The Sea in this space hath many shelues, the ground wherof is coral stone, of which one sort is red, the other very white.
The white Sands in the bottom make it seeme white, the Ooze greene, that Corally substance redde, which in that space was the most of the three.

But neerer the bottom, towards Suez, in a great space he saw none. Further without the Strait, he saw such redde <sup>i</sup> spots or veines of water at Cape Fartach, as if Oxen had had beene slaine there, yet the water taken vp in a vessell seemed cleere; and he supposed that this rednesse proceeded of the Whales bringing forth their young. Barrus misliketh that coniecture, and those other of antiquitie, in searching the cause of this name of Redde, and is of opinion, That the violent currents of the Tides, assisted with some tempestuous windes, raise vp from the bottom that redde floore, wherof we haue spoken, and cause, by the motion of the same vnder the water, that rednesse in the vpper face therof: which is in more spacious quantitie neere the Straits, where there is greatest force of the Tides; and the threads or straines of this rednesse are lesse in the greater and more spacious Sea-roume. The Portugall Pilots first thought, that the windes brought out redde dust from the drie soile of Arabia, which no mans experience hath confirmed. Andrea<sup>k</sup> Corsali, which sailed and warred vnder the Portugalls in these Seas, An. 1516. saith, he knowes not why it should be called redde, for the water is coloured as in other Seas: which seemeth to crosse the former reports: and maye yther be construed of the water generally not discoloured, or perhaps while he was there, the tides and windes did not conspire so boisterously, as at some other times they doe, against the yeelding and weaker soyle in the bottom thereof. Howeuer it be for this rednesse, many deceiue themselves in streitning this name to the Arabian Gulfe, which the Ancients<sup>1</sup> gaue vnto all the Seas from Egypt to India: and reckon the Persian and Arabian Gulfes, armes of the redde Sea. Yea, Arrianus (not he that writ<sup>m</sup> Alexanders life, who yet in the report of Nearchus his voyage from Indus, to the Riuer Tigris, calls it the Red Sea: but another of that name) in his<sup>n</sup> Periplus of the Erythraean Sea; (translated and illustrated with a large Commentarie by Stuckius, and set forth by Ortelius in a peculiar Map thereof) comprehendeth in the title of the Redde Sea, all from Arifpoe and Egypt, to Malacca, or the Chersonesus aurea. Hauing now troubled you with the name, why, and how farre, the name extendeth: we may view the Ilands therein situate: which if any would more fully know, let him reade Arrianus and Barrus, and the voyage of Solyman Bassa, 1538, vnto Diu, written by<sup>o</sup> Damianus in Latine, and by a Venetian in Ramusius, who was present in the action. I must but touch the principall.

Sues is neere the beginning of the Sea, which some suppose to be that which the Ancients call Arifpoe, after others Heroum: here is the place where the Turke hath his Arsenall, and Gallies, for those Seas, the matter whereof is brought out of Caramania, by Sea, by Nilus, and by Camels ouer Land the rest of the way, at incredible charges. Here in olde times was a channell which conueyed the waters of Nilus to this place, where they had Cisternes to receiue it; all destroyed by the Mahumetans: and now the Inhabitants fetch the water, which they vse, fixe miles off. Some thinke that Pharaoh was here drowned: which passage others set downe at Tor, where the Sea is straitned, and is not about nine miles ouer. It seemeth that the prints of the Chariot-wheeles, which Orosius P affirmeth, still remained as testimonies of Pharaohs ouerwhelming vnder those waues, and could not by any industrie of man bee done out, but by the mightie hand of God were soone restored in the same forme, are not now there to be found: for they would soone end the controuersie.

Asion Gaber was a Port hereabouts, whence Salomon sent his Nauie to Ophir, and after him Iehoshaphat, but not with like successe: which (Iosephus<sup>1</sup> saith) was Berenice, not farre from Elana. Hierome calls it Essia. Dr. Dee writes that Ezion Geber was nere Eloth, or Elana, or Iltor, the East end of the bay: the other which some call Suez, is higher.

Bernice was the Port of the Redde Sea, where the Indian drugs and spices in the time of the Roman Empire were vnladen and landed, to be carried thence to Alexandria, the whole course whereof Plinie<sup>n</sup> describeth. Agatharchides<sup>n</sup> reckoning diuers Etymologies of the Erythraean title, liketh best of that which ascribes it to one Erythraus, who first built a ship to saile in those Seas, altogether disallowing that it should be so called of the colour. He hath written strange things of the people adioyning. He nameth foure sorts of Ethiopians, according to their dwelling neere the riuers, or lakes, or sea-coast, or wandring. Those on the Sea-coast he saith liue altogether on fish, which the tide brings vp, and leaues on the hollow places or plashes neere the shore: which they cast vpon hot rockes, which cause the fishie substance to fall from the bones: this they they treade with their feete, mixing the seede of Paliurus, and then make cakes thereof, which they drie in the Sunne, and eat all in common: and on the fift day go to drinke, laying their mouthes to the water like Oxen, and suppe in as much as their skinnes will holde, not able scarce to breathe, not eating any thing one day after. Some of those Ichthyophagi or Fish-eaters, which haue store of this provision content themselves with the moisture of their diet, and drinke not at all. Some of them seeme subject to an apathie, not of Stoikes, but of stockes; not shunning or complaining for blowes or wrongs. But methinks I see my Reader haue sense, and make complaint of wrong done him in these Relations: and therefore will referre them that will, to our Author himselfe.

Don Iohn di Castro can better acquaint vs with the later, then Agatharchides with the Ancient State. He ascribeth to Toro, which he maketh the same with Elanam 28. degrees. They are Christians; and haue a Grecian Monasterie. Hee reporteth the Moores tradition, that Moses smote the Sea twelue times, and thereby opened twelue passages for the Israelites: sixe hundred thousand Egyptians were drowned: the Iewes arrived where Toro now is. At Bohale Xame they found a Tombe within a house like a Chappell, where was hanging a banner of silke, and many arrowes or darts round about the graue: at the head of the graue was a Table with an Epitaph, testifying that there lay buried one of Mahomets kindred: and great indulgence was granted to such devout Pilgrims as to that place resorted. But the Portugallies burnt it.

Io. di Cast.

Hieronimo da Sancto Stephano, relateth his voyage from Cairo in fiftene dayes to Caniz, and a good part called Cane, finding many buildings and Temples ruined by the way: seven daies iourney they went from hence by land to Cosir a haven of the Redde Sea. Procopius saith, that this Sea is boysterous and rough in the day time, and calme in the night: that Iotabis one thousand furlongs from Aila, was an Island of Iewes: of which he mentions among the Homerite Arabians (as doe Nicephorus, Tudensis, and Vetomannus also) which he extendeth alongst the Sea: and addeth to them many other Nations and Man-eating Saracens. What the Portugalls haue done in these Seas, Barrius, Marmolius, Oforius, Maffaus, relate. Nomius Cugna in his Letter to the King, declares that An, one thousand five hundred and thirtie, they took Soraze, other peeces of Cambaia, and many Indian Shippes, and chased away the Turkes Nauie which besieged Aden, and brought the King of Aden to pay yearly tribute ten thousand Seraffins. But the Turkes after obtained it.

Outwards bound, they keepe the middle, and haue Pilots for that purpose; homewards they haue other Pilots which direct the ship within the shallowes: and are taken in at Babelmandel, called by Ptolemy, Insula Diadori, an Ile in the entrie or strait of the gulf, which Strabo saith, the ancient Kings of Egypt chained to keepe the passage. Zidem is twelue leagues from Mecca, where the Shippes haue vsed to vnlade their Spiceries, as before at Berenice: without this towne is a Moschee, which the Moores say is the Sepulchre of Eua. both sides the Gulfe, Barrim e relateth more largely. Of the Iles Achafas and Tuicce we haue but names: likewise of others; whereof Ptolemy d doth number a great multitude. The people of these parts are Mahumetans, and many Badumi, Hereticall and theeuish Morres. Many Iewes are in Adem, the chiefe Towne of merchandise in these parts: the King wherof (after much kind gratulatio) Soliman Bassa hung vp at the yards arme: and at his returne dealt the like dole to the King of Zibit, subiecting their States vnder treacherous pretences to his great Master. Sealiger e tells of Samaritans dwelling in an Iland of the Red Sea, which, when any man landed there, would religiously forbid to touch them: but we haue before mentioned both them and their letters, supposed the most auncient in the world, howsoeuer Postellus calleth the present Hebrew letters eternall, and saith, that the Law was written in them: but that they were sacred, and not publicly knowne till the time of Ezra, who excommunicated the Samaritans and their letters, first publishing (not inuenting) those which now are in vse.

The Ascension f ascended into the Red Sea, An. 1608. to Moha, which is a Citie of great trade. And An. 1612. diuers English ships were together in the same sea, where they somewhat auenged themselves for such wrongs as by the Turkes and Mogolls, or Mogors, had beene formerly offered them.

In the Ocean without the strait, neare to the African shore, are not many Ilands mentioned by the Ancients. Arrianus in his Periplus speakes of seuen Ilands, called Pyralaon: and of another great Iland neare to them, called Mennibesia or Mennibia, now called Madagascar, and S. Lawrence: some take it for the Iland of Iambolus, whereof Diodorus h hath largely related, and Ramusius i hath discoursed thereon: other seek for that Iland in Somatra. That Iambolus was a Merchant, which trading in Arabia for spices, was taken by theeuers, and made a shepheard: after carried away by Ethiopians, who tooke these forrainers according to their rites, to expiate their Countrie. For they were enioyned by Oracle to make such expiation once in 600. yeares, with two men that were forrainers. For the fulfilling wherof they were put in a Boat, fit for two men, with sixe moneths victuall: and commanded to saile Southwards, & they should come to a happy Iland, where the men liued a blessed life. And if they came safe thither, their Countrie should enioy prosperitie 600. yeares: if they turned back, they should bring vpon them much trouble. The Ethiopians meane while kept holy-dayes, and offered Sacrifices for their good voyage, which in foure months they achieved: and were exceeding courteously vsed and entertained of the Ilanders. These were foure cubites higher then other men, very nimble and strong. The reports of this his voyage fauour more of an k Utopia, and Plato's l Common-wealth, then of true Historie. Yet is it thought (as Ramusius discourseth) not altogether fabulous, but that he was indeede in some remote Iland, to which he applied such fancies, as Diodorus reporteth. To leaue there the certaine fictions and vncertain coniectures of Antiquitie: and come to more certaine relations; the onely Iland of name without the streit is, Socotera, in 13. degrees; of which we haue spoken largely already, speaking of the Ilands of Asia: yet if any will suffer vs to remember it againe amongst these of Africa (for it lies betweene both) we may here mention what others, and somewhat otherwise, haue related. Sannius calls it Zacotora, and affirmeth that the Sands on the tops of the high hills therein haue no exemption from the windes: that the people are Nestorian Christians, which obserue the Crosse with much deuotion, otherwise wanting Christian both baptisme and doctrine, and are circumcised: that the Moores say it belonged to the Amazons, in testimonie wherof the women still weare the breeches, and gouerne amongst them. Corsali m thinks it vnknowne to Ptolemy (which others suppose to be his Insula Dioscoridis) he saith, that it was inhabited of Christian shepherds, which liued on Milke, and butter: their bread was of Dates: like to the people of Prester Iohn, but their haire was longer, clothed with one onely peece of cloth about their priuities: the land barren, as in all Arabia Felix, and the Sea-coasts gouerned by the Arabians. Hence cometh and is named the Aloe Socotrina n. They are Iacobites, and haue Churches with Altars, & obserue the Crosse with great reuerence: they enter not their Churches, but stand in the Church-yard or Porch. Their Abunna, or Priest, ruleth them. Other Gouenour they haue none of their owne. The Portugalls haue two Townes there, Coro and Benin. They hold opinion that S. Thomas here suffered shipwracke: and that of his ship was built an auncient Church, which is yet to be seene, walled about with three partitions, and three doores. They liue for the most part in cabbins of boughs, or in caues: their women are as good souldiers as the men. They are much addicted to Magicke, and bring to passe matters incredible, although the Bishop excommunicate such as vse it. They will with contrarie winde hinder men that indamage them, from sayling away. Conceited they are exceedingly of their own excellence. Two small Iles lie to the North of Socotera, called the two sisters: the inhabitants of an Oliue colour, without law among themselves, or commerce with others. There are also those two Iles, the one of men, the other of women, which wee mentioned in our fift booke*, a matter, how true I know not, but very strange. They are Christians, subiect to the Bishop of Socotera, and he to the Zaoia in Balacach.

Many other Ilands there be of no great name in that Sea, called Sinus Barbaricus: as of Don Garcia, the three and the seuen brethren of S. Brandon, S. Francis, Mascarenas, Do Natal, Comoro, and many other: besides those of Quisoa, Mosambique, and some other for their vicinitie to the Land before handled. The Isle of S. Laurence (so called by the Portugalls; by themselves, Madagascar) is meetest in all those parts, to entertaine the Readers obseruation, as being one of the greatest Ilands of the world. It containeth in breadth foure hundred and fourescore miles, in length a thousand and two hundred, in compasse foure thousand miles. M. Polo saith, the Inhabitants were Saracens, and were governed vnder foure Lords, eate Camels flesh, vse Merchandise or Arts. Thus farre did the great Cao stretch his Tartarian Dominion: and sent hither to spie the Land. That which Polo saith, he heard of a bird in this Iland, called Kub, so bigge as it could take vp an Elephant, hath no likelyhood of truth. He calls it Magascar. It is situate from seuateene to fixe and twentie  $\frac{1}{2}$ . of Southerly Latitude. Onely vpon the coast they are Mahumetans: within Land Idolaters, blacke, and like the Cafres: the soyle yeeldeth Cloues, Ginger, and Siluer. It deserueth to haue better inhabitants, if Linschoten iudge rightly, hauing many faire and fresh Riuers, safe harbours, plentie of fruites and cartell: therein are foure gouernments, each fighting against other. They vse not themselves to trade with others, nor suffer others to traffique with them. The Portugalls haue some trade with them, but goe not on land. In the first discoverie of them by the Portugalls, 1506. they shewed themselves inhospitall and treacherous, rewarding receiued kindenesse in their Canoas or Boats, made of the bodie of a tree, with shot. There are said to be some white people, supposed to be of Chinian off-spring.

Of the people of Madagascar the Hollanders report, that they are of colour black, strong, and well made: they couer their priuities with Cotton: they haue large holes in their eares, in which they wear round stickes. They acknowledge one Creator, and obserue Circumcision, but know nothing of praying or keeping Festiuals. They haue no proper names, whereby to distinguish one day from another: neyther doe they number Weekes, Moneths, or Yeares. Nor doe they number about tenne. They are exceedingly afraid of the Diuell (whom they call Tainuadder) because he vseth often to afflict them. They liue most what on fishing. They marrie but one wife: their time of marriage is, for the men at twelue; the women at ten yeares of age. Adulterie and Theft are punished with death. The men vse to hunt abroad, the women spinne their Cottons at home, whereof they haue trees yeelding plentie. If any man kill any of his Kine, all his Neighbours may challenge part. Cornelius Houtman saith they are sweet-spoken men. They haue a kinde of Beanes or Lobos growing on trees, the Codde whereof is two foote long. They haue a kinde of seede, whereof a little makes foolish, a greater quantitie kills: herewith they betrayed and killed threescore and eight Hollanders, with their Captaine.

In S. Marie, an Iland by Madagascar, they met with the King, which was obserued of his subiects with great reuerence. Here they buried one of their dead men, the Ilanders being present, who signified by signes that his soule was gone to heauen: & would haue had them to cut off his legs by the knees. The Ile of Cerne, they called Maurice Island. They found excellent Eben trees there, the wood whereof is as blacke a pitch, and as smooth as Iuorie, inclosed with a thicke barke. They found of the same kinde some redde, some yellow. There were Palme-trees like the Cocos. They found store of birds, whereof they might take some in their nests with their handes. There were no people inhabiting. In the Isle of Bata our men killed a Barre as great as a Hare, in shape like a Squirrill, with two flaps of skinne, which he spread forth when he leaped from tree to tree, which they can doe nimbly, often holding only by their tailes.

S. La. Lancaster.

More wonderfull is that which others of our countrey-men obserued at Sumbrero, which was a twigge vpon the Sands by the Sea side, growing vp to a yong tree; which when they offered to plucke vp, it shrunke downe into the ground, and sinketh in, except one pull very hard. When they had pulled it vp, they found a great worme to be the roote thereof. And looke how the tree groweth in greatnesse, so the worme dieth and wasteth. It taketh the first growth out of the mouth of the worme, and is but a small twigge, yet full of Greene leaues as bigge as a Bay leafe. This worme by degrees turnes wholly into the tree, and then it rooteth in the ground, and becommeth great. Thus you see one Retrograde from a sensitiue to a vegetatiue life: another no lesse admirable vnto a stonie torpiditie they obserued in the same plant. For plucking vp the tree when it is little, and stripping off the leaues and barke, as it dried it turned into a hard stone, like white Coral. Lo here a double Metamorphosis. They brought home many of them. The people are tawnie, & naked: they paint their faces. Their Priests in their sacrifice weare apparell, so close as if it were sowed to them, and hornes on their heads, turning backe, with a taile hanging downe behinde: because the Diuell, say they, so appeareth to them. Their faces also and haire were Greene, blacke, and yellow. The Hollanders in the Bay of Anton Gil Southwards from Madascar in sixteene degrees saw the King, blacke of hew, wearing two hornes on his head, and many chaines or bracelets of brasse on his armes. This place is fertile, the people valiant.

In the channell between the firme land and Madagascar, are many Ilands: great and small, all inhabited by Mahumetans: the chiefe of which is S. Christopher, more Northwards against Mombaza, and Melinde, are three Ilands, Mornfid, Zanzibar, & Pemba: inhabited with Mahumetans of white colour. In the time of M. Polo, Zanzibar was Heathenish. The Inhabitants, he saith, very grosse and deformed, and likewise the women. Neare the Cape of Good hope are the isles of Don Aluarez, and Tristan Acunha: but, of no great note. The deepeness of these Seas, make them vncapable of manie Ilands.

IN this side the Cape is the Island of S. Helena, in 16. degrees and  $\frac{1}{2}$ . of Southerly latitude. It is very high and hilly: the name was given of the Saint, on whose day it was discovered. It hath in it store of goats, hogs, hens, and other creatures, which the Portugalls haue there left to multiply: for before there was none of them: there also they haue planted Figs, Oranges, Limons, and such like, whereof the Vallies are full; that it seemeth an earthly Paradise, the fruit growing all the yeare long. They haue great store of Fish, of which with crooked nayles they take great plentie: the Rocks yeelde salt for the furthering of their prouision. It seemes God hath planted it in convenient place, for the long and dangerous Indian Navigations. There the Portugals leaue their sicke, which stay till other ships come the next yeare to take them. It was neuer inhabited: onely an Heremite dwelt there, who vnder pretence of mortifying his flesh by penance, butchered the flesh of the Goats & Buckes so fast for their skins, that the King sent for him home, and will suffer none to dwell there. Abraham Kendall put in there about the yeare 1591, and left on shore one Segar a sicke man, whom Edmund Barker eighteene months after found there in good plight; but their vnexpected comming, as it seemeth, so rauished his weake spirits with ioy, that it distracted him, and being otherwise of bodily constitution very well, hee died eight dayes after. The like I haue read of a Portugall in the same place. North-west from hence are the Iles of Ascension, not inhabited. Of Loanda, nigh to, or rather a peece of Congo, is already spoken.ouer against the Cape of Lopo Goncalues, is the Ile of Nobon: and not far from thence Saint Thomas, an hundred and fourescore miles from the shore, and so much also in compasse, right vnder the line. At the first discoverie it was a wood: now inhabited by Portugalls and Negro's. These liue an hundred and ten yeares: but few borne in Europe exceede fiftie. It is vniuersall some, through exceeding heate, vnto Europeans especially, which in December, January, and February, can scarcely walke vp and downe for faintnesse. In the midst is a wooddie Mountaine, continually overshadowed with a thicke cloud, which so moistens the Trees that grow in great abundance thereon, that from hence droppeth water sufficient for the watering of all their fields of Sugar-Canes. They haue threescore and ten Ingenios or Sugar-houses, each of which hath two or three hundred slaues belonging thereto.

They grind the Canes and boile the iuyce to make it into Sugar; but by no meanes can they make it so white heere, as in Madera and other places. The refuse of their Canes they giue to their Hogges, which are heere very many, fat, and delicate as the flesh of a Henne. They are some yeares exceedingly plagued with Ants, and also with Rats. White men which liue there are visited two houres in euery eight or ten dayes with an ague, but strangers haue more shrewde entertainment, and scarcely in twenty dayes, with great care, can shake off this Shaker. The chiefe Citie is Pouoson, an Episcopall Sea. The Negroes worke six dayes for their Masters, and the seventh day for themselves in setting and planting their seeds, fruits, and prouision: Wheate heere sowne, becommeth all blade, without ripening any corne. No fruit which hath a stone in it will heere prosper. The Towne which hath about seuen hundred Families, and the Cattle, was taken by the Hollanders, 1690.

The Ile Del Principe, was so called, because the reuennues thereof were in times past allowed to the Prince of Portugall. It standeth in three degrees of Northerly Latitude. Julian Clerchagen tooke the same, one thousand five hundred fourescore and eightene. The Iles of Saint Matthews, Santa Cruz, Saint Paul, and Conception yeeld small matter of Historie. Next to Cape Verde stand seuen Islands, full of Birds, empty of Inhabitants, called Barbacene. But those that are called the Iles of Cape Verde are nine, situate betwene the Greene and White Capes: Linshoten reckons ten. They were first discovered by Antony di Noli, a Genoway, a thousand foure hundred and fortie. None of them are inhabited, but the Iles of Lago, and Del Fogo: both which were taken one thousand five hundred fourescore and sixteene, by Sir Anthony Sherly, who had one night showre of Ashes from that Island of Fogo or Fuego, or of Fire, so called, because it continually burneth, which fell so thicke on their shippe, that you might write your name with your finger vpon the vpper decke. Saint Lago was taken and burnt by Sir Francois Drake, one thousand five hundred fourescore and five. Braua and Buena Vista, haue brauen and goodlier names then Nature: Mais yeelds salt in a Lake of two leagues long, the Sunne congealing and turning the water into salt. From thence is passed into the Sea, called Sargasso t, because it is couered with herbes, like to the herbe Sargasso in the Portugall Wells, not vnlike to Samolys, yellow of colour, with empty Bettries like Gooseberries: which beginneth at thirtie degrees, and continueth till thirtie foure farre off in the Sea: for the shippes in their going to India keeping neere the shore meete not with any. The Sea seemeth as a green field, so thicke that a man cannot see the water, and hindreth the shippes passage, except they haue a stronger wind.

The Coast of Africa is foure hundred miles distant, neither is any land heere: save that these windes seeme to make many Islands. Thus doe men in shippes behold the wonder of the Land in the deepe, no Land being nigh; nor no ground to be found, although it is thought to come from the ground. And indeede, all those Seas are full of wonders, as they passe along the Coast toward the Indies. Thomas, Steuens complaineth of the continuall thunders, lightnings, and vnholosome raines which there they met: the raine water, if it stand a little, conuetting presently to Wormes, and filling the meat, hanged vp, with wormes. An herbe also swamme vpon the face of the waters like a Cockes-combe, so venemous that it can scarce be touched without perill: Fishes, called Sharkes, most rauinous deuourers, which had other six or seuen smaller fishes, garded with blew and greene, attending like Seruing-men. Fishes also (as bigge as a Herring) with wings which doe not so much helpe them by flying to escape another greater fish that pursueth them by Sea, as endanger them to a Sea-Fowle, which waits that opportunitee. Neither can it flie high or farre, or longer then the wings are wet: nor swimme fast, hauing exchanged finnes for wings. So haue I seene men thriue worse that haue two trades, than such as haue been skilfull and thrifty in one. Lerius addeth the like wonder of certaine Birds, so tame that they would light vpon the Hatches, and suffer themselves to be taken. These are the same Birds which pursue those flying fishes, wiser to hunt them, than to saue themselves bigge as Crows in feathers, in flesh little bigger than a Sparrow, and farre lesse than the fish which they take and deuoure.

These Seas are also subiect to great and tedious calmes, which not only hinder the Voyages, but end the liues of many. Gionanni da Empoli saith, in his returne out of India, they were heere detained foure and fiftie daies, in which they scarce sailed about six leagues; and in thirrie fve daies they cast ouer board threescore and fixteene of their companie, very few suruiuing in their ship: which likewise happened to other ships their Comforts, so that they had vterly despaired, had not God sent a Portugall ship that way, bound to relecue them. And would God the like examples many might not be produced amongst our owne.

To returne to our discouery from Iago where we left: here the Negro's were wont to bring slaues to sell to the Portugals for beads, and other trifles, and cottons, with other base commodities: and them not such alone as they tooke in warre, but their fathers and mothers, thinking they did them a benefit, to cause them thus to bee conueied into better Countries: they brought them naked. The Isles of Arguin are 6. or 7. inhabited by the Azanhagi, where the King of Spaine hath a Fortresse: concerning the trade whereof you may reade the letter of Adelchior Peton. Further inke the Sea are the Canaries: which are commonly reckoned seuen; Canaria, Teneriff, Palma, Gome, Hierro, Lanzarotte, and Enerte Ventura: Thenet addes three, others, more; Lobos, Rea, Gratiola, Saint Clara, Alegancia and Inferno. The Inhabitants were so grosse before they were discovered, that they knew not the vse of fire. They beleued in one Creatour of the world, who punisheth the euill, and rewarded the good: heerein they all contented, in other things disagreed: their weapons were stones and stauies. They shaued their heads with shripe stones like flints. Iron they had not: Gold they respected not. The women nursed not their children, but commonly committed that office to their Goats. They as much delighted in dancing, as the birds, which beare their name, in singing. They were vknowne from the times of the Romane Empire: at which time they were called Fortunatus: till either an English or French shippe by misse-fortune lighted on them. Anno thousand foure hundred and fife, Is. Bentacer conquered them, and after him, a thousand foure hundred fortie foure, Henric the Infanta of Portugall, that day Barro which by his industrie made way to the present Sun-shine of discoueries, whereby the World in her last daies hath fullest view of herselfe. Galusho calleth that Frenchman Is. Bencacourt, and saith, hee was sent by John the second of Castile, Ambro 1417: who being slaine in the action, his Sonne sold them to Peter Arden a Spaniard, and hee to Don Henric. Hee sent the people were Idolaters, and did eat their flesh raw for want of fire. They filled the ground with Oxe and Goats-hoents. They had many viues, one deliuered them to their Superiours to lie with them: before they lay with them. Don Henric conquered the rest which Bencacourt had not possessed. Their former government was, by a hundred and ninete persons, which ruled also in matters of Religion, prescribing to the people their faith, and worship. They had in highest name of authoritie a King, and a Duke. To stay a best was esteemed the basest office in the world, and therefore committed to their prisoners: they which did this, liued separate from the people: This was it in the Gran Canaria. In Gomera they vsed for hospitalitie to let their friends lie with their wives, and receiuing theirs in like courtelie: and therefore, as in India, the Sisters Sonne inherited.

In Tenarife they had two Kings, one dead, and another alive: when a new King was crowned, some man, to honour his entrance, offered himselfe to voluntary death: when the King was buried, the noblest men caried him on their shoulders, and putting him into the graue, said, Depart in peace O blessed soule. Theues affirmeth that the Canaries be so called of the Canes and Reeds that grow there: that they worshipped the Sunne, Moone, and Planets. Of these Islands, Thomas Nichols an English man, hath composed a Treatise extant, in master Hakluyts Voyages, Tom. 2. Part. 2. Hee saith they dwelt in Caves, supposed to descend of such as the Romans in Africa had exiled, and cut their tongues out for blasphemie against their Gods. The pike or high Hill of Tenarife, is after Theues measure foure and fiftie miles. Thomas Byam, a friend of mine told mee, that hee hath seene it eight and ffortie leagues into the Sea, in cleere weather. Heere before the conquest were seven Kings, which with their people dwelt in Caves. Their buriall was, to be set vpon his feet naked in a Cave, propped against the wall: and if he were a man of authority, he had a staffe in his hand, and a Vessell of milke standing by him. I haue seene (saith Nichols) three hundred of these compes together, the flesh dried vp, the body light as parchment. I my selfe saw two of those bodies in London.

Canaria, Tenerife, and Palma, haue one Bishop, who hath twelue thousand Ducats Reuenue: a which place was not long since possessed by Mitcham a great Writer in defence of the falling Babylon. They pay to the King fiftie thousand Ducats. Hierro, or the Island of Iron, is by the multitude of Auriferous affirmed to haue in it no fresh water, but what falleth from the leaues of a certaine Tree, which is alwaies greene, and covered with clouds, and vnderneath the same is a Cistern to receiue the water, for the vse both of men and beasts throughout that land. A whole wopod of such trees were mentioned in Saint Thomas Island, which yeeld from their dropping leaues Rilles of water downe all sides of the Hill, where they grow. In this Island heere is but one, and that very ancient, differing in this (if wee beleue Sanuto) from those of Saint Thomas, they alwaies, this only after noone, being covered with that cloud, which continueth till two houres before day, and then the bowle, boughes and leaues of the tree sweate out that liquor till two houres after Sunning. It is in seven and twenty degrees. This, and Gomera, and Lanceria, are in the hands of priuate men.

Madera standeth in two and thirtie degrees: is the greatest of all the Atlantic Isles. It was discovered by one Adrian an English man, who arrived there by tempest, about a thousand three hundred fortie foure, together with a woman, whom he there buried, and on her tombe did write his coming, and the cause thereof, with his and her names, and was occasioned to the King of Spaine to discover that and the Canaries. It was called Madera, of the wildernes of Trees there growing. Heere is a Cane called Eouchal. The Ile containeth in compass a hundred and ffortie miles. The woods, which gave name to the Ile, were felled, and burnt so furiously, that the people for a time were forced to go some space into the Sea from the violent heat, which caused such farriffice to the folly that at first it needed therefore felle: since halfe so much. The excellent Wines were of Vines, first brought from Candie. They bring forth more grapes (saith Richard) than leades, and clusters of two, three, and foure ffoots long. At first, the Pidgeons suffered themselves to be taken, not knowing, and therefore not fearing a man.

Fortie miles from the Ile of Madera is the Ile of Puerto, or Porto Santo, called of all Saints day, in which it was first discovered, and named 1418. It was taken by Sir Am. Preston, 1596. Heere are such store of Comets, bred of one the Cony brought hither great with young, that the Islanders were out of hope almost to withstand and a mend their damages by them sustained. A little Island, neare to this, breedeth nothing else. And now we can accompany our Portugalls no further. A word of that which remaineth.

Within the Straits are no great Islands belonging to Africa, Pannon, or the Rocks against Uelles de Gumeria, the Ile of Gerbi, and some others. Malta is the most famous, where in old time was the Temple of Iuno, spoiled by Verris, supposed to bee that Melita, where Paul suffered shipwracke: although there be another Melita in the Adriatique Sea, neare to Dalmatia: Polybius calleth it Melynsa, as Volaterranus writeth. Ptolomis and Cicero name Melita now called Malta, in this Ile of Malta. This Malta is distant from Sicilia threescore miles, from Africa, an hundred fourescore and ten. It hath bene sometime subiect to the Carthaginians, as may appeare by diuers monuments with inscriptions of Carthaginian letters: and the Islanders (if our Author say truly) can vnderstand that Scene in Plautus before mentioned, Elei, Efsetcha, Cum, words vsed in Scripture, are likewise vsed in the Maltese. Their manner of life is Sicilian. But we may not dwell heere.

Some ascribe Pauls shipwracke to Melita in the Adriatique, neere to Dalmatia, whom Beza learnedly confuteth: and proueth it to be that Malta, which now the Knights hold against the Turke: whose valour and successe, in resisting that mightie Aduersarie Curio, and Io. Antonius Viperanus in their Bookes of that Argument, Knolles in his Turkish Historie, Ri. Carra, and others, relate at large. It was 1565. That which deceiveth those men in Malta, is the name of the Adriatique Sea, which now is giuen to the Gulfe of Venice, but then, as Beza and Arctius shew out of Strabo Lib. 3. was giuen to the Ionian Sea also, and further Southwards, where Malta standeth: and Ortelius out of Ouid, and others, proueth the same, as doth also that Epitome of all learning Ioseph Scaliger.

Now a word of the Ancient Navigations about Africa. Hanno his voyage, set soorth by the Carthaginians, seemed fabulous, but Ramusius sheweth euery place by him mentioned, to agree with the latter Discoveries of the Portugalles, and thinketh (guided by a Portugall Pilot, skilfull of those Seas, which skanned this Navigation of Hanno) that hee went as farre as S. Thom. Long before this, Homer reporteth of Menelaus, compassing the Ethiopians from Egypt, which some interpret of sailing by the Cape of Good hope as the Portugals. Of this minde Sarab citeth Aristarchus. Of Salomon and Iehoshaphat is said before. Hexadotus affirmeth the Phenicians sailing in the Red Sea in Cambyses time: but this was vsuall and yeerely, as Plinius sheweth lib. 6. cap. 23. The same Plinius allegeth out of Cornelius Nepos, the sailing of Eudoxus out of the Red Sea, round about Africa to Cades: which Strabo relateth otherwise and refuteth.

The like may be shewed in some other instances; of which read Master Hakluis his Epistle Dedicatory, Tom. 1. Ramusius part. 1. pag. 111. and Ortelmannus in his Discoveries of the World. Which I mention, not to disparage or weaken the Portugalls praises, but to give Antiquitie their due, which, I thinke, could not ordinarily (if at all) compass so long a Navigation for want of the Compass: yet wee should in iurie our Authours, as wee should not beleue somewhat: although not so much as they report. And this agreeth with the Greeke proverb of Hanno Discoveries, and Inhab Historie, that hee which findeth sweetnesse in the one, may swallow the other, and as well entertaine Banyas as Manbas: the Perils of the one, and Libyke Histories of the other not obtaining full credite, nor yet wholly meetre be corrected.

And thus much of this Affrican part of the World, the Regions and Religions thereof: the one most subiect to the burning beames of the heavenly Sunne, the other least enlightning by the comfortable warmth of the Sunne of Regibus suasse; blacke in bodie, but more darkened and deformed spiritually, as hauing one onely Region of Habassia entirely possessed with Christians, besides what in Congo hath of latter yeeres bene effected by the Portugalles, and that little which is subiect to them and Spaine; all the rest being Pagan, or Mahumetan. And would God this were the case of Africa alone alone; seeing that if we diuide the knowne Regions of the World into thirtie equall parts (it is Master Brerewoods <sup>i</sup> Computation) The Christians part (vnderstand it in all Sects and Professions bearing that name) is as fiue, the Mahumetans as fixe, and the Idolaters as nineteen: besides that huge Heathenous Tract of the vnkowne South Continents, which by probable reasons is by him coniectured to be no lesse then Europe, Africa, and Asia, together. So farre is it from truth, which one <sup>k</sup> of our Countrey-men hath lustily bragged on behalfe of his Romish mother, That the Catholike Roman Religion hath had, and hath yet a farre greater sway in the world, then any other Religion euer had or hath: whereas this our Africa hath more Mahumetans <sup>l</sup> in two or three cities, then Romish Catholikes perhaps in her whole compasse. And for Asia, how pitifully doth he rumble together some names of a few Townes or little Ilands, (it seemeth vnkown to himselfe) as monuments of Romish conquests? What their American conversions <sup>m</sup> are, is touched elsewhere. Yea euen in our Europe, where this Mysticall Babylon is situate (the mother of the whoredomes and abominations of the Earth) the number of Protestants <sup>n</sup> is not much inferiour vnto them. But his reasons haue beene already proued vnreasonable, by him, whose pen then, and Prelacie since, we with all dutie acknowledge: a pillar to the Truth, and Ornament to our Church and State. For my part I am sorie his assertion is no truer, as one seeing, χάσμα μέγα, betweene Catholike and Roman, a great gulf, not easily (without many prouisoos) passable: but betweene the Heathen and Heauen, a bottomlesse depth, the way impassible, and life impossible. Let vs pray to him which is the Way, the Truth, the Life, to make and be the way, by reuelation of his truth, vnto euerlasting life, to these poore Africans, that as they are almost wholly (in all professions, Christian Iewish, Morish, Ethnike) circumcised in the flesh, so they may receiue that Circumcision of the Spirit, not made with hands, which may cut away this superfluitie of superstitions (wherein they seeme more deuout, then any part of the World) and make them with meekenesse to receiue that Word, which being grafted in them, is able to saue their soules. *Of the new World, and why it is named AMERICA: and the West Indies:

with certaine Generall discourses of the Heauens, Aire, Water, and Earth, in those parts.*

NOW are wee shipped for the New World, and for new Discoveries. But seeing this Inkie Sea, through which I vndertake a Pilots office to conduct my Readers, is more peaceable then that, which on the back-side of this American World, was called the a Peaceable, by Magellane the first Discoverer: it yeeldeth vs the fitter opportunitie to contemplation and discourse, in such Philosophicall subiects, as b the best Authors haue thought worthy the first place in their Histories of these parts. Yet, before we prie into Natures mysteries, the better to know our intended voyage, let vs enquire somewhat of the names, if any notice may thence arise, of the places thereby knowne.

The New World, is the fittest name which can be giuen to this vast and huge Tract; iustly called New, for the late Discoverie by Columbus, An. Dom. 1492. and World, for the huge extension thereof; (as M. Hakluyt hath obserued.) A new World it may be also called, for that World of new and vnknowne Creatures, which the old World neuer heard of, and heere onely are produced: the conceit whereof moued Mercator to thinke (which I dare not thinke with him) that the great deluge in the dayes of Noah, drowned not these parts, because Men had not heere inhabited, who with a Deluge of sinne might procure that deluge of waters.

America is a more common then fitting name, ſeeing Americus Veſputius the Florentine, from whom this name is deriued, was not the firſt Finder, nor Author of that Diſcouerie: Columbus will challenge that, and more juſtly, with <sup>d</sup> whom, and vnder whom Americus made his firſt Voyage, howſoeuer after that, he coaſted a great part of the Continent which Columbus had not ſeene, at the charges of the Caſtilian and Portugall Kings <sup>e</sup>. But ſo it might more rightly be termed Cabotia, or Sebaſtiana, of Sebaſtian Cabot a Venetian, which diſcouered more of the Continent then they both, about the ſame time; firſt employed by <sup>f</sup> King Henry the ſeuenth of England, and after by the Catholike King.

Columbus yet, as the firſt Diſcouerer, deſerueth the name, both of the Countrey, for the firſt finding, and of Modeſtie, for not naming it by himſelfe, ſeeking rather effects, then names of his exploits. But leaue we theſe Italian Triumviri, the Genuois, Venetian, and Florentine, to decide this queſtion among themſelues. And why now is it called the West Indies? To this <sup>g</sup> Acoſta's Expoſition of the word Indies, that thereby we meane all thoſe rich Countries, which are farre off, and ſtrange, is too generall an anſwere, and giueth not the true cauſe of the name. Gomara ſaith, that a certaine Pilot, of whom Columbus receiued his firſt Inſtructions, tooke it to be India: or elſe Columbus himſelfe, thinking by the Weſt to finde a neerer paſſage vnto the Eaſt, by reaſon of the Earths roundneſſe, ſought for Cipango, or Iapan, and Cathay, when he firſt diſcouered the Ilands of the New World. And this opinion is probable, <sup>h</sup> both becauſe he named Hiſpaniola, Ophir, whence Salomon fetched his golde: and Sebaſtian Cabot in the firſt Voyage, which he made at the charges of King Henry the ſeuenth, intended (as himſelfe <sup>i</sup> confeſſeth) to find no other Land but Cathay, and from thence to turne towards India: and the opinions of Ariſtotele <sup>k</sup> and Seneca, that India was not farre from Spaine, confirmed them therein <sup>l</sup>.

Now, that we may deſcend from the Name, to the Nature of this new World: a World it is to ſee how Nature doth deſlect and ſwarue from thoſe grounds and principles which the Naturalliſts, <sup>m</sup> and Philoſophers her forwardelt Schollers haue ſet downe for Rules and Axiomes of Natures working. For, if wee regard the ancient Poets, Philoſophers, and Fathers, we ſhall ſee them deceiued, and that not in few Opinions, which they ſeemed to haue learned in Natures Sanctuaries and inmoſt Cloſets. In the Heauens, they ſuppoſed a burning Zone; in the Earth, a Plague, plagued with ſcorching heats:

Vtq; dux dextra Cælum, totidemq; ſiniſtra
Parte ſecant Zona, quinta eſt ardentior illis, Sic ----
--- Totidemq; plaga tellure premuntur
Quarum quæ media eſt non eſt habitabilis aëſtu
Nix tegit alta duas, totidem inter vtramq; locanit:
Temperiemq; dedit.

And <sup>n</sup> a greater then Onid;
Quinq; tenent Cælum Zona; quarum vna cornuſco,
Semper ſole rubens, &c.

The ſenſe whereof is, that thoſe parts of the world next the Arctike or Antarctike Poles are not habitable, by reaſon of extreame colde; nor the middle part, by reaſon of vnreaſonable heat: the two other parts temperate, and habitable.

The Philoſophers accounted this no Poeme, or rather were more Poeticall themſelues: For that which thoſe accounted a torrid and ſcorched earth, theſe <sup>o</sup> made to be a ſpacious and vnpaſſable Ocean, where the Starres, hot with their continuall motions, and the Sunnes thirſtie ſteedes, wearied with their daily journey, might finde moiſture to reſreſh and nourish their fiery conſtitutions. And therefore they diuided the Earth into two habitable Ilands, compaſſed about, and ſeuered in the miſt with a huge Ocean: On this ſide whereof we are ſituated, and beyond, the Antipodes. Some Philoſophers <sup>p</sup> indeed held otherwiſe, but with greater errors, as Leucippus, Democritus, Epicurus, Anaximander, which multiplied worlds, according to their fancie. Raw & vncertain were the coniectures of the <sup>q</sup> beſt. Yea, thoſe whom we reuerence, as bet-

rence, as better then the best Philosophers, had no lesse error in this point. The Goldsden-mouthe'd Doctor had a Leaden conceit, that the heauens were not round, whom Theodore is said to follow. Theophilact alledgeth Basil for this his assertion, nec mobile esse cælum, nec circulare, that heauen is neither moueable nor round. How firmly, and confidently doth Firmianus & Lactantius both deny and deride the opinion, that there are Antipodes; But easier it was for him, with a Rhetoricall flourish, (wherein, I thinke, of all the Latine Fathers, * he deserueth highest prize and praise) to dash this opinion out of countenance, then to confute the Arguments and Allegations, which he there citeth in the Aduersaries name. But he that surpassed Lactantius no lesse in knowledge of truth, then hee was surpassed by him in smoothnesse of stile, herein holdeth equipage, and draweth in the same yoke of error. I meane him, whose venerable name no words are worthy and sufficient to vs her in, Saint Augustine: who, though somewhere * he affirmeth the Antipodes, yet elsewhere * pressed with an Argument, how men should passe from these parts in which Adam and Noah liued, to the Antipodes; through that vnmeasurable Ocean, he thought it easiest to deny, that, which certaine experience at that time could not so easily proue: although y even then some reports (but obscure and vncertaine) had beene spread abroad of sailing about Africa, as * a little before is shewed; which must enforce that which Augustine denied.

More hot and forcible were the Arguments of our more zealous then learned Countinian, Boniface, * Archbishop of Mentz, and of Pope Zacharie, who pursued this opinion of the Antipodes, so eagerly against Vergil Bishop of the Iuuauenfes in Boiaria, about the yeare 743. That vpon Boniface his complaint, the Pope writeth to him to cast out this Vergil the Philosopher (so doth that asse call him) out of the Temple and Church of God, and to deprive him for this peruerse Doctrine (that there were Antipodes) of his Bishopricke: and Vergil must packe to Rome to giue account of this Philosophie to the Pope. Minerva sui. Let the Reader here iudge betweene the Philosophie of the one; and the Foole-asse-phy of the other: and let our Catholike Pararites tell vs, whether their not-erring Father pronounced this sentence of error as a Pope, or as a private Doctor. But what doth this Doter in my way?

Some * also alleage Nazianzen, Hierome, and Procopius, for this or the like opinion. But Poets, Philosophers, Fathers, (in other things worthy our loue, for their delightfull Poems; our admiration, for their profound Science; our awefull respect and reuerence, for their holy learning, and learned holinesse) herein we bid you fare-well: magis amica veritas; our America, subiect to that supposed burning Zone, with clouds and armies of witneses in her wel-peopled Regions can auerre, that the parts betwixt the Tropikes are both habitable and inhabited: and for the Periaci, * Antaci, Antilbomes, and Antipodes, the worlds roundnes, and other things of like nature, this America yeelds and is sufficient prooffe: and the yearely compassing the world (which the Spaniards and Portugals diuide betwixt them) makes more then euident. And let those two English Ships, the only two of one Nation which euer haue sailed, and that with admirable successe and fortune, about the Globe of the earth, tell Lactantius ghost, whether they dropped into the clouds (as he feared) there to become new constellations, which Antiquity would easily haue attributed to them. The Golden Hinde (which tranfered the world round, and returned a golden Hinde indeed, with her belly full of Gold and Silver) is yet at Deptford, there resting after her long iorney, offering vp her self to Time, her deeds to Eternity. That which beguiled the Ancients, was the neerenes of the Sun, his direct beames, and the swift motion of the heauens, which, they coniectured, did chase away cold, and moisture out of all those parts. And hardly could reason otherwise guesse, till experience * shewed the contrary. For neuer is it moister in those parts betweene the Tropikes, then when the Sunne is neereest, then causing terrible stormes and showers every day: as if hauing drunken too much in his long and hot iorney ouer the Ocean, he did there vomit it vp againe. Once, the people of those parts reckon it Winter, when the Astronomer would cal it Summer: because of this tedious weather which every day happening cannot but coole the aire and earth, with a matuellous temper: and on the other side, they call the time of the Sunnes absence, Summer, because of the perpetuall clearenesse, which continueth those six moneths; the Sunne then exhaling no more vapours then his hot stomach can digest, which with his directer beames being drawne vp, surcharge him with abundance; and in the middle Region of the Aire, by the then stronger Antiperistasis are thickened into raines, and attended with Thunders and Lightnings, proclaime daily defiance to the Earth: threatning harme, but doing good: cooling the same, after the morning-Sunne hath heated it, the showers then falling, when the Sunne threatens his hottest furie and violence.

These Raines make the like inundations and overflowings of Riuers in America, (as before we haue obserued in Nilus, Niger, and Zaire in Africa) which breaking their bounds, and driuing the Inhabitants, sometimes to dwell on trees growing, sometimes in their carkasses framed into Boats or Canoes, therein to retire themselves, till the waters are retired, cause a cooling and refreshing to the earth, which they cover and shield by their inundations from the Sunnes angrie artowes. As in a Limbeck, a strong fire causeth abundance of vapours to be extracted out of herbs, or other matter, which being pressed, and finding no issue, turne into water: and if the fire be small, it exhaleth the vapours as fast as it raiseth them: So the Sunne (in his greatest strength) exhaleth these plentifull vapours, which it distilleth in showers, which in lesse heate are of lesse quantitie, and more easily consumed. Without the Tropikes it is contrarie: for the Summer is drie, the Winter moist; the cause being the Sunnes weaknesse, not able to concoct and disperse the vapours, which the moyst earth then easily yeeldeth: which in his greater force in the Summer season wee see effected: the like we see in greene wood and drie on the fire.

It is no lesse worthie note, that no part of the World hath so many, so great Lakes, and Riuers: the vapours and exhalations whereof, cannot but coole and moisten the neighbouring Elements of the Ayre and the Earth. Againe, the equall length of the dayes and nights perpetually sharing the Time in equall portions, causeth<sup>d</sup> that the heate is not so vnequall as the Ancients dreamed. The great dewes also in the night, which are greater then we would think, and comparable for wetting to pretty showers, encrease the freshnesse and coolenesse.

We may adde hereunto the neighbourhood of so huge an Ocean, the proprietie of the Windes, which in most places betweene the Tropikes are set, and certain, no lesse then the Sunne and Tides, and bring with them much refreshing. Further, the situation of the Land doth further the cold not a little, in those hot Regions; Contrariwise, neare the Poles, the continuance of the Sunne, and long daies make it hotter then in parts nearer the Sunne; as in Russia<sup>e</sup>, then in England. Yea the high ridges and tops of some Mountaines in the burning Zone, are vsufferable for cold, alwayes hauing on them, snow, haile, and frozen waters, the grasse withered, and the men and beasts which doe passe along that way (for heere is no conuenient dwelling) benumbed with the extremitie of cold.

When the Mountaines are subiect to this degree of cold, it cannot but temper the Neighbour Regions, with some coolenesse at least. Now to all these Reasons of the Temperature, vnder the Line, and betweene the Tropikes, some adde the influence of some vnkowne Constellations. Onely let this be remembred, That the former hold not equally in all parts of the Torride Zone, seeing that Nature hath diuersified her selfe in diuers places, and by naturall exceptions hath bounded and limited those generall Rules.

In some places, vnder the Line, it rayneth not at all: in other some, those cooling Windes are wanting: neyther hath euery Region, Lakes, Riuers, or Mountaines to refresh them. But of these particulars we shall take better view in their peculiar places. In the same space the Windes are most what Easterly, and without the Tropikes Westerly: so that the Mariners vse not to goe and returne the same way, but obseruing the generall Windes, seeke to make vse thereof accordingly. The reason the first moueable drawing (saith Acosta) with his owne motion the inferiour Orbes; yea, euen those elementarie, of the Fire, Ayre, and (where it findes no other obstacle of the water also, as some suppose. But for the Aire (whereof wee now specially speake) the motion of the Comets, circularly carried in the Ayre, (where also their motion is diuers, as is obserued in the Planets) doth sufficiently proue. Without the Tropikes from seuen and twentie to seuen and thirtie degrees, the Windes are said to bee for the most part Westerly, moued, as some thinke, by the repercussion of the Ayre, heere preuailing against that force of the Heauens; which mastereth it within the Tropikes: euen as wee see waters, being encountered with others of more force, returne in a manner back. This of the Easterly Windes, is to be vnderstood of the Sea: for at Land, though there Windes bee (as before is said) certaine and set, yet that which is the generall Winde of one Countrey, is not generall to all: yea, in the same Countrey they haue a set Winde in some places for the day, and another quite contrarie bloweth in the night. <sup>b</sup> Also, neere vnto the coasts they are more subiect to calmes in this burning Zone, then further off in the Sea, the grosser vapours which arise out of the Earth, and the diuers situation thereof being the cause of these differences.

Such is the force of this naturall situation, that in some places it is strange what effects it produceth. There is in Peru an high Mountaine called Pariacaca, whereupon Ioseph Acosta saith, he ascended as well provided as he could, being forewarned and fore-armed by men expert. But in the ascent he and all the rest were surprised with so sudden panges of straining and casting, and some also of scowring; that the Sea-sickness is not comparable hereunto. Hee cast vp Meate, Flegme, Choller, and Bloud; and thought hee should haue cast out his heart too. Some thinking to die therewith, demanded Confession: and some are said to haue lost their liues with this accident: The best is, it lasteth but for a time, neither leaueth any great harme behinde. And thus it fareth in all the ridge of that Mountaine, which runnes aboue a thousand and five hundred miles, although not in all places alike. In foure different passages thereof, he found the like difference and distemper, but not so grieuous as at Pariacaca. He ascribeth it to the subtiltie of the Ayre on those high Hilles, which hee thinketh are the highest in the World: the Alpes and Pirenees, being, in respect hereof, as ordinarie houses, compared to high Towers. It is desert, the grasse often burnt and blacke, for the space of five hundred leagues in length, and five and twentie or thirtie in breadth. There are other Deserts in Peru, called Punás, where the Ayre curteth off mans life without feeling: a small breath, not violent, and yet depruiuing men sometimes of their liues, or else of their feete and hands, which fall off as a rotten Apple from a Tree, without any paine. This seemeth to be done by the force of cold, which in the Northerne and Northeasterne parts of Europe worketh like effects: some <sup>k</sup> being found dead suddenly in those sleddes in which they came to market, sitting therein as if they were aliue, and some losing their ioynts by the like cause. But this maketh vp the strangeness of these mortall accidents, that this piercing cold Ayre both killeth and preserueth the same bodie, depruiuing it of life, and yet freeing it from putrefaction. A certaine Dominike passing that way, fortified himselfe against the cold winds, by heaping vp the dead bodies which heere he found, and reposing himselfe vnder this shelter, by these dead helpes saued his life. The cause is, Putrefaction cannot be procreated, where her Parents, Heate and Moisture are confined, and haue little or no force. The Seas which compasse this Westerne India, besides the Magellane Streits, and the Northerne vnknowne, (for the knowledge whereof our Countreymen, <sup>l</sup> Frobisher, Danis, Hudson, and others, haue aduentured their liues and fortunes, and at last haue giuen vs more hope then euer of the Discouerie) are the great and spacious Ocean, which on this side is called the North Sea, and on the other side of America, is named the South Sea. The qualities thereof will better appeare, when we come to speak of the Islands therein.

Concerning the Land of the New World, Acosta diuideth it into three parts, High, Low, and Meane: which hold almost the same proportion that Master Lambert obserueth of Kent, the first hauing some wealth, by reason of the Hauens, and

and Ports therein, and of the Vines that grow there, but are verie vnhollesome: the Hilles are healthfull, but not fertile, except in the Siluer bowels, and Golden entralls thereof: the third is the most commodious habitation, where the soile yeeldeth corne, cattell, and Pasture, and the ayre, health. The principall thing that hath brought this Westerne India into such request, is, the Mines and metals therein. The Wisedome of God hath made metals for Physicke, for defence, for ornament, and specially for instruments in the worke which God hath imposed vpon man, That in the sweate of his browes he should eate his bread. The industrie of man hath added another vse of metals, by weight or stampe, conuerting it to money, which the Philosopher calleth the measure of all things. And a fit measure might it haue bene, if the minde of man were not vnmeasurable, and vnstable in measuring this measure. Metals naturally grow (as some obserue) in land naturally most barren: Nature recompensing the want of other things with these hidden treasures: and the God of Nature enriching the Indians with this substance, otherwise barren of humane and diuine Knowledge, that might as a rich Bride (but withered and deformed) make her finde many suiters for loue of her portion. And would God, they which reape heere these Temporall things, would sew Spirituall, and giue them a Gold tried in the fire, and that which is a Siluer tried seuen times, I meane the Word of God sincerely preached, without the drosse of their owne superstitions. And would they gaue them not Iron for their Gold, as Iron Age for a golden, imposing a heauie yoke of seruitude, which hath consumed worlds of people in this New World, and made the name of Christ and Christian to stincke amongst them: yea, they abhorre the Sea it selfe, for bringing forth such monsters, as they thinke the Spaniards: whom for their execrable wickednesse, they esteemed, not to come of humane generation, but of the froth of the Sea, and therefore call them Viracochie, or Sea-froth. That which one saith of Religion, I may apply to this American World, Peperit diuitias, & filia deuorauit matrem. Shee brought forth rich metals, and the Daughter hath consumed the Mother: her gold that should haue bene a price in her hand to buy wisdom: hath to these importunate chapmen sold her freedome. It is a Golden and Siluer Age indeede to the Spaniards, for the condition and state which hereby accreweth to them, not for the conditions and state of life, which they obserue.

In the year 1587. when Acosta came to Peru, eleuen millions were transported in the two Fleets of Peru and Mexico, almost one halfe thereof for the King. In the time when Pollo was Gouvernour of Charcas in Peru, from the Mines of Potozi alone were drawne and customed every day thirtie thousand Pezos of Siluer, euery Pezo amounting to thirteene Rials, and a fourth part: and yet it is thought the one halfe was not customed: or as Oniedo reckoneth, one fourth part more then a Spanish ducket. He writeth, that Anno 1535. three or foure shippes came to Siuill, laden with none other commodities but gold and siluer. Miles Philips recordeth, That when he returned out of the Indies, 1581. there were seuen and thirtie saile, and in euery of them, one with another, thirtie pipes of Siluer, besides great store of Gold, Cochinile, Sugars, Hides, &c. And at this day saith Acosta, the Mines of Potozi yeeld the King a million of Siluer, for his fift yearely, besides the wealth that groweth by Quicke-siluer, and other prerogatiues. In the year 1574. were entered threescore and fixteene millions. That which is wrought in this Countrey is not entred, besides priue conueyances. How much differeth Potozi from the Mine Bebello in Spaine, one thousand and fife hundred paces deepe, admired, and that instly, by Antiquitie, for yeelding three hundred pounds weight of Siluer a day to Hannibal, but with much more charges, by reason, of the intollerable paines in drawing out the waters, which therein flowed, and in Potozi are wanting? But what will not this vnlovely loue of money doe? hereby man encountreth the vast Ocean, passeth the farthest and most contrarie climates, drowneth Bootes and all his teame, burieth himselfe in the bowels of the earth, raisheth new heauens, and seeketh his heauen, where he cannot see heauen, or light, neere the bottomlesse bottomes of hell: remoueth Fountaines, and Mountaines, reduceth a new Chaos, in the confusion of Elements; the Earths entralls being towred in the Ayre, and sacrificed to his hotter brother in fiery purgations, the Ayre filling ling the darke hollowes and hells which it cannot see, the Waters forced out of those possessions wherein they challenged succession and inheritance after the decease and removing of the earth: all filled with darkenesse, to bring to light those metals, which possessing the possessours, deprive them of the highest light, and brand them for the lowest darknesse. Precious perils, * where so many bodies are pined, so many soules endangered, so much good lost for goods, and man, for price, setteth himselfe at the worst and basest price of all that he hath. How happie and golden was the ourward state of these Indians, before they accounted gold any part of their happines, and found it the cause of their ruine?

Their gold γ is found either in Graines, which they call Pippins, because they are like the Pippins or Seeds of Melons; which is pure, and hath no need of melting: or in powder, which is found in Rivers, mixed with the soile and sands, for which Tagua, Pallolu, and Ganges have beene famous: or else in stone, being a veine that groweth and engendreth, intermixing it selfe with the stones. Those Pippins, or peeces of pure gold, found among the Rockes or Hills, are sometimes very great. Peter Martyr z tells of one that weighed three thousand three hundred and ten Pezos, and was with much people and treasure drowned, in the ship called Boadilla, being therewith surcharged, in the returne homewards: A fit Embleme for Christians, which when they will a lade themselves with this thicke clay, b drowne the soule in perdition and destruction, c Oniedo (who a long time held the office of Proueditor for the mines) saith that hee saw two graines of gold, one of which weighed seven pounds, and was in value seven hundred Castilians or Pezos; the other five pound, and was worth five hundred, and many other of one, two, or three hundred. Yet are not these graines so welcome to the Miners, as that in powder, because this continueth (and therefore in fine containeth) more then the former. He obserueth, that gold hath a farre brighter lustre in the natural virginie, then when it hath passed the fire and mans industrie: and that coles are often found very fresh, where they finde gold, which place he thinks was sometimes the face of the earth, and by Time (which conserueth coles as well as gold vnder the earth without corruption) couered through showers; bringing the earth from the higher places, whereby hee supposeth it came to passe, that in a virgin mine fiseene foot vnder the earth, he once found two rings of the Indian fashion: he addeth, that the gold in stone will tunne as small as a pin or threed, and meeting with a hollow place, fileth it, and so guideth the Miner by thicke and thinne, but alway pliant and flexible like liquid waxe, till the first sight of our aire breathes (as from the couetous hard hearts of men) this naturall hardnesse, which it presenteth to vs. The wilde Indians had the art of gilding their workes with such dexteritie, that they seemed pure gold: which mysterie they performed with certaine herbes, but would neuer teach it any European. The Indians d in Hispaniola obserued a kind of Religion in gathering their gold (as the Arabians in their Frankincense) fasted, and for twentie dayes space came not at their wiues, otherwise thinking they should finde none. Columbus imitating the like superstition, would suffer none to seeke this golden Idoll, without those gilded ceremonies of Confession, and their Sacrament before receiued. The greatest quantitie is drawne at the Indies in the powder-gold. The gold in stone is drawne out of the mines or pits, with great difficultie. They refine powdred gold in basens, e washing it in many waters, vntill the sand fall from it, and the gold, as more heauie, remaineth in the bottome. They haue other meanes of refining it with Quick-siluer and strong Waters. In the Fleet 1585. the declaration of the firme land was twelue Cassons or Chests, which was so many hundreth weights of gold: besides one thousand fiftie and six Mares from New Spaine, which was for the King only, not mentioning that which came for Merchants, and priuate men.

For the Siluer: the second place is giuen to it among mettrals, because next to Gold it is the most durable, and lesse endamaged by the fire, and in the sound and colour, passeth the Gold. The mines thereof are commonly in mountaines and rockes, seldome in plaines, and Champaines. Sometimes they find it f stragling, in peeces, not holding any continuing Veine: sometimes it is fixed, and spreadeth it selfe in depth and length like to great branches, g and armes of Trees. Strange it is that in some places the fire, kindled with blowing of bellows, will not serue to refine the Siluer, but they vse furnaces called Guayras, set in such places, where the winde continually bloweth. Thus in Peru, the mines of Porco stoupe to artificiall fires, which those of Potozi scorne and contemne. Potozi is a drie, cold, barren, and vnpleasant soile, if the rich mines did not more then supplie all those defects, and make it a plentifull both habitation and Mart; not fearing the Heauens disasters, the cold Aire, the frowning Earth, the fell showers, so long as the siluer hooke can be sufficient attractive for foraine store. Hence it is, that they feele no want of store, and yet haue no store but of want; the Mines excepted, which (I know not how) are both store and want, according as mens mindes in a second refining can digest and dispose them. They which worke in the Mines see no Sunne nor light, by absence whereof they finde both extreame cold, and dreadfull darknes, and an aire so vnholesome, as makes them no lesse sicke, then men tossed at sea. They breake the mettall with hammers, and split it by force, and then carry it vp on their shoulders, by ladders made of Neates Leather twisted like peeces of wood, which are crossed with stauces of wood: at the end of one Ladder beginnes another with seates of wood betweene, to rest them. They mount three and three. He that goes before carries a candle tied to his thumbe: they haue their mettall tied in a cloath like a Scrip, each man bearing about fiftie pound weight, and that commonly about an hundred and fiftie stades in height. The most visuall manner of refining in these times is by Quick-siluer. and therefore there are not now about two thousand Guayras in Potozi, which haue bene in times past fix thousand: a pleasant sight to such, whose darkned conceits make their Heauen vpon Earth, to see such a resemblance of the Starrie heauen, in the night, dispersing such a manifold light. The Siluer swimmes on the toppe, the other mettalls vnder, and the drosse in the bottome.

The Quick-siluer e is admired for his naturall properties, that being a metall it is Liquid (not by Art as other metals, or by expence, in which respect the other may no lesse bee called Quick-siluer, but) by it owne Nature: and being a Liquor, is more heauie then those which haue a Naturall subsistence; this subsisting and sinking to the bottome, when the other swimme about it. Gold onely challengeth preheminece, if Plinie f be beleued. Nothing in this admirable liquor is more to be admired, then the naturall loue, and sympathie which it hath to Gold: as appeareth in such, as for French disease vse oyntments of this composition: if they weare a Gold-ring in their mouth, it attracteth this quicke and willing metall to it, from the Veines and inward parts, into which it had secretly and dangerously conueyed it selfe: the Ring plucked out of the mouth is of a Siluer complexion, which mutuall copulation nothing but fire can diuorce, or restore the same to the former colour. In their gildings of curious workes, it hath bene obserued that the worke-men which vse Quick-siluer to that purpose, to preuent the secret and venomous exhalations thereof, haue swallowed a double ducker of Gold rolled vp, which drawes that fume of this Liquor which enters in at the eares, eyes, nose, and mouth, vnto it in the stomacke. h And for this fume, Lemnius telleth, that the Gold-smithes hanging a cloath ouer the place where they Gilde, which receiue the fume of the Quick-siluer, finde that smoake in the cloath; recovering againe his former nature in drops of that liquid metall. Venenum rerum omnium est, saith Pliny; it is a venome to all things, and yet a greater venome is in the mouth of man. I meane not that i poyson of Aspes vnder the lippes of many, as the Prophet speaketh in a spirituall sense, but even in naturall operation, the Spettle of man enuenometh, with a stronger poyson, this poyson of Quick-siluer, and either killeth it, or at least depriueth it of the motion and quicknesse, and maketh it pliant to Medicines and oyntments. Yea, some l report that this Spettle of man, arising of secret vapours out of the bodie, as infectious exhalations out of vnholesome Lakes, especially when a man is fasting, killeth Scorpions, and other venomous beasts, or at least doth much hurt them. Quick-siluer disdaineth other mettalls, onely it is thus rauished with Gold, and not a little affected to siluer, for the refining of which, it is principally in vse: it corrupteth, forceth, consumeth, and fleeth the rest, as much as may bee, and therefore they vse to keepe it in Earthen Vessells, Bladders, Skinnes, Quilles, and such vn-

stuous receptacles. It hath pierced and eaten through the bodies of men, and hath bin found in their graues. Quicke-siluer is found in a kinde of stone, which doth likewise yeeld Vermillion. At Amador de Cabrera is such a stone or rocke, fourescore yards long, fortie broad, interlaced with Quicke-siluer, with many pits in it, threescore stades deepe, and is able to receiue three hundred workemen: it is valued worth a million of golde. From the mines of Guanaculea, they draw yearly eight thousand quintals of Quicke-siluer. As for the manner of refining siluer, by Quicke-siluer, their Engines and Mills, with the triall of their mettall, I referre the Reader to m Acoſta.

Atabaliba marvelled why the Europeans hauing such Crystalline and pure Glasses, would expose themselves to those dangers by sea and land, for those mettals which he thought not comparable to the same. Well indeede might he haue wondred, if that Art had remained, which * (I know not how truly) Plinie, Petronius, Isidorus, and others report, to haue been in Tiberius his time; to whom one presented a faire Glasſe, which being cast on the ground, was bowed but not broken: and being taken vp by the same Artificer, was with his hammer brought to the former forme and beaurtie. His reward, besides the wonder and astonishment of the beholders, was that which precious things often procure their owners. For the Emperour asking whether any other knew this myſterie, this being denied, he caused his head (the onely worke-house of this secret) to be smote off, lest golde and siluer should giue place to Art. The Emeralds grow in stones like cryſtall, and there are many of them in the Indies. But of these and other gemmes it would be too tedious to write. Let vs come to the Men, Beasts, Fowles, and Plants of this new world.

Of the first knowledge, habitation, and discoveries of the New World, and the rare Creatures therein found, Beasts, Birds, Trees, Hearbs, and Seeds.

After these generall Discourses of the Americans, some other of like nature I holde not vnmeet to be handled, before we come to the particular Regions: and first of the men, whether the Ancients had any knowledge of them: how men first came into these partes, and of the first discoveries in the former Age. Concerning the first knowledge of these partes, it may iustly be a question whether the Auncients euer heard thereof. For to say nothing of that opinion, that the torrid Zone was not habitable in the opinion of the most, as wee haue shewed in the former Chapter: the allegations * are not such as can force vs to beleue that, whereto by great Authours they are alledged. Senecas Propheſie is little to the purpose: New-worlds (saith he) shall be in the last Ages discovered, and * Thule shall not be any longer the furthest of Nations. But all that Cicero seemes to a diligent Reader to intend nothing else, then to describe the vsuall affects, and effects of shipping and Navigation; agreeing to that Argo Argument of the Tragedie, wherein Iason in that famous Argo sayling to Colcos, had obtained Medea's loue, which he vnkindly requited. As for Plato's d Atlantis, and Tertullian's e Æon borrowed of him, Acofta alledgeth diuers Platonikes, Proclus, Porphyrie and Origen, which interpret Plato after a myfticall fenfe; and proueth by the wordes of Plato himfelfe, that they can be no true Hiftorie. The like allegations hath Marsilius Ficinus in his Commentaries vpon Timæus & Critias, howfoeuer he alledgeth Crantor, and some others which esteeme it a bare Hiftorie: to which yet his thousands of yeares before the flood, denie truth and credite, although we interpret them of the yeares of the Moone. Ficinus sheweth both their Allegoricall, and his Anagogicall interpretation. But the Discourse of Plato cannot agree, if it were a Hiftorie, to America, both because it placeth Atlantis at the mouth or entrie of the straits by Hercules pillars, whence this is by a huge sea feperated: and that is not faid still to continue land, but by an earth-quake to haue funke and become Sea. That which is cited out of Aristotle his Admiranda auditiones, if any reade the place, may appeare to be some neerer Island, and neither Island nor continent of America. Neither can I credite that which h Oniedo fuppofeth of the Hesperides Islands, cited out of Plinie, Mela, Solinus, daubed ouer with Morter, borrowed of fabulous Berosus, and the Poets, as if in thofe first ages of the world they had bene Spanifh inheritance, and none other then Hifpaniola, or fome other of the Islands or maine land of this new world, the hiftories whereof might perhaps moue Columbus to thefe discoveries.

Out of Plutarch and other Hiftories of the Carthaginian, Phœnician, and Tyrrhenian Navigations they haue coniectures, but very vncertaine, and obfcure: and thofe things, which Diodorus reports of that Iland, agree nothing to the New-World which had not attained to that ciuitie he there mentioneth, before the Spaniards arrival. And by his Discourse it feemes rather to be fome of the Islands of Africa; then America, if the Hiftories be true. Neither could i fuch long voyages fo farre off from any land, be performed without the helpe of the Compaffe, which was firft found thirteene hundred yeares after Chrift, by Iohn Goia of Melfi, according to that Verfe of Panormitan, k Prima dedit nautis vsum Magnetis l Amalphus. Gomara m citeth Blondus, and Maffens, Girardus, witnesses of this Melfian inuention, faue that hee calles him not Iohn, as Ortelius doth, but Flauins di Malphi. And in the tempefts, which happened among the Auncients, n it feemes that for want of this skill, they wandered very vncertaine, but as the Sunne or Starres, by returne of their defired light, after the tempefts ended, directed them.

Yet I will not fay, but that in thofe times of olde, fome fhips might come fometime by cafualtie into thofe parts, o but rather forced by weather, then directed by skill; and thus it is likely that fome parts of America haue bene peopled. This I much doubt; whether their Science in Navigation was fuch, as that they would voluntarily aduventure, and could happily effect this voyage to and from the Weft Indies. The moft probable Hiftorie in this kinde is (in my minde) that of r Madoc ap Owen Gwyneth, who by reafon of ciuill contentions, left his countrey of Wales, seeking aduentures by Sea, and leauing the coaft of Ireland North, came to a land vnknowne, where he faw many ftrange things.

This by D. Powell, and Mr. Humfrey Lbnyd, is thought to bee the Continent of the new world, confirmed herein by the fpeech of Mutezuma, profefling his Progenitors to be ftrangers; and fo were all the Mexicanes to thofe partes, as the Hiftorie in the eight Chapter following will shew: and by the vfe of certaine Welch wordes, which q David Ingram obferued in his trauell through thofe parts. The Hiftorie addeth that he left certaine of his people there, and comming home for more people, returned thither with tenne faile. Howfoeuer; it is certaine that the prints of this Britifh Expedition are in manner worne out, and no figne thereof was found by the Spaniards: Onely r they vfed a Crosse in Cumana: in the Ifland of Acuzamil, the fame was worfhipped:

shipped: but without any memorie of Christ, or any thing saouring that way: and might as well be there without any Christians erecting, as those Crosses which in the first booke we haue shewed, were in the Temple of Serapis, at Alexandria. As for Mussumma being a stranger, it might be so, and yet his Progenitors of some other parts of America. And the wordes of Welsh are very few, which, as it happens in any other language, might by some chance come to passe. But if any be desirous to belecue, that this Madoc peopled the Continent or Islands of America, rather then the Terceras, or some of the African Ilands, I will not hinder: nor will I runne too much out of compass, in pleading for the Compass, as which onely can direct in such spacious Seas. Yet of this opinion is that learned and iudicious Author, Iosephus Acosta, who diligently discussing this question, How men passed first to the Indies; largely, and learnedly contendeth, that they came not thither purposely, if they came by Sea, but by distresse of weather; and yet findes no lesse difficultie (that way) in the transporting beasts; especially wilde, and vnprofitable beasts, which is not like any would take into Ship with them, much lesse conuey them ouer so huge an Ocean. At last hee concludeth, that although some might arriue there by ship-wracke, and tempest of weather, yet is it most likely that the first Inhabitants (descended of Adam and Noah, of which one bloud God hath made all mankind, to dwell on all the face of the Earth, and hath assigned the bounds of their habitation) passed thither by some place where the Continent of our world ioyneth with America: or where the Ilands thereof are found fit mediators for this passage, being not farre distant from the land. And this on the North parts of the World, (where they place that fabulous strait of Anian, nor yet certainly discovered) may be so: besides that, on the South, men might passe from the coasts of Malacca to Iaua, and so to the South Continent, and from thence by the Magellane straits into America. Gronland is thought also, by some, to be the same Continent with Estotiland on the North. Some Negro's by force of tempest, it is probable, haue passed hither, because in Careca some haue beene found, betweene S. Martha and Cartagena. Of whom Don di Castellanos writeth.

Don todos ellos Negros como cuernos, &c. They are all (saith he) as blacke as Ravens. And of this minde is Botero,* and those French Worthies, Du Bartus, and Philip Morier. It is not likely that the beasts could otherwise passe, but by the Continent, or by Ilands not farre off from the Continent, or from one another. Mr. Brerewood, a man learned and iudicious, in his Posthume worke of Languages and Religions, affirmeth that America receiued her first inhabitants from those parts of Asia where the Tartars first inhabited. For those parts of America being most replenished which respect Asia; and there being no token of the Arts or industrie of China, India, or Cataia; in many things also they seeming to resemble those olde Tartars: and their countrey being eyther not at all, or least of all other, seuered from the North parts of America: he concludeth as aforesaid. A man may with like probable coniecture bring them from the Saimoyeds bordering Northwards from Russia, and the Laplanders, which by Northerne Ilands (whereof there are some daily discovered) might by passing from one to another, seat themselves in Greenland, Gronland, Estotiland and other parts, neere to, or vpon America. For the Inhabitants of the one are much like to the other. And thus by many wayes Gods prouidence might dispose inhabitants to these parts; that we speak not of the South vnknowne Continent, which is supposed to extend it selfe to the line, and from the Ilands of Asia might easily receiue and conuey Inhabitants hither. As for Genebrards deriuation of the Americans from the tenne Tribes, proued by the dreames of Esdras, elsewhere alledged with like truth for the Tartars, and some inscriptions out of Thucydides, they which will may beleue.

Here also ariseth another question, how these beasts could passe from the partes of the knowne world, where none such are knowne: to which it may be answered, That God hath appointed to euery Creature his peculiar nature, and a naturall instinct, to live in places most agreeing to his nature: as euen in our world, Non omnis fert omnia tellus: Euerie Countrey hath not all creatures: the Elephant, Rhinoceros, Riuer horse, Crocodile, Camell, Camelopardalis, and others, are not ordinarily, and naturally in Europe:

rope: nor the Zebra in Asia or Europe: and the like may bee said of many other creatures.

Now, as the Arke it selfe, (the Cradle of man, and stall of beasts,) we must not only Obserue Nature and Art, for the making and managing thereof, but a higher and more powerfull hand: euen so in dispensing the creatures which came from thence, they chose places by their owne naturall instinct, and man disposed by his industry, according as he had vse of them; but most of all, the secret and mightie prouidence of God co-working in those works of Nature and Industrie, and (in likelyhood) infusing sommore speciall and extraordinarie instinct in that replenishing and refurnishing of the world, Assigning their seasons and bounds of habitation, hath thus diuersified his workes, according to the diuersities of places, and sorted out to each countrey their peculiar creatures. As for the comming by ship, it is for the beasts improbable, for the men (by any great numbers, or of any set purpose) vnlikely (except as before is said) seeing in all America they had no shipping, but their Canoes. The beasts also haue not bin found in the Ilands, which are in the Continent. And if any hereunto will adde a supposition, that there might be some Ilands or Parts of the continent in times past, which is now swallowed by the mercilesse Ocean, so that then there might be a way, which now is buried in the waues: (as some<sup>e</sup> suppose) of Plato's Atlantis, placed at the mouth of the streits, or Heracles pillars, which yet they would haue to be America, and some of the Sea betwixt Douer and Callais, once one firme Land (as they doe imagine) I list not to contradict them.

As for the Indians owne report of their beginnings, which some ascribe to a fountaine, others to a lake, others to a caue, or what other opinion they conceiue thereof, we shall more sily obserue in their proper places, discoursing of their Religions and Opinions. Now for the first certaine Discouerie of this New World, the World generally ascribeth it to Columbus, and worthily: but Columbus himselfe is said to haue received his instructions from another.

This Historie is thus related by Gomara, and Ioannes Mariana: A certaine Carauel, sayling in the Ocean, by a strong East winde long continuing, was carried to a Land vnknewne, which was not expressed in the Maps and Cardes. It was much longer in returning, then in going; and arriuing, had none left aliue but the Pilot, and three or foure Marriners, the rest being dead of famine and other extremities; of which also the remnant perished in few dayes, leauing to Columbus (then the Pilots host) their Papers, and some grounds of this Discouerie. The time, place, countrey, and name of the man is vncertaine: some esteeme this Pilot an Andaluzian, and that he traded at Madera, when this befell him: some a Biscaine, and that his trafficke was in England and France; and some a Portugall, that traded at the Mina: some say he arriued in Portugall; others at Madera, or at one of the Azores: all agree that hee died in the house of Christopher Columbus. It is most likely at Madera. This relation (as it hath no witnesses to proue it, the whole companie being dead; nor any good circumstances, so) Benzo and Ramusius<sup>d</sup> plainly affirme it to be a fable, and a Spanishe trick, enuying a forreiner and Italian that glorie to be the first finder of the Indies. And the most sincere and iudicious of the Spaniards themselues esteeme it but a tale, as appears by the testimonie of Gonzalo Fernando de Oviedo in his Summarie, & more fully in his general Historie of the Indies. They shew, and so doth he which then liued in the Court of Spaine, Peter Martyr, another cause that moued Columbus to this Discouery, and not that Pilots papers or reports. For, he being a Marriner, vsed to the Sea from his youth, and sayling from Cales to Portugall, obserued, that at certaine seasons of the yeare, the windes vsed to blowe from the West, which continued in that manner a long time together. And deeming that they came from some coast beyond the Sea, he busied his mind so much heerewith, that he resolu'd to make some triall and prooue thereof. When he was now fortie yeares olde, he propounded his purpose to the Senate of Genua, vnder-taking, if they would lend him Ships, hee would finde a way by the West vnto the Ilands of Spices. But they reiected it as a dreame.

to Portugall, and communicates this matter with Alphonſus King of Portugall: but finding no entertainment to his ſuites, ſendeth his brother Bartholomew Columbus to King Henry the ſeuenth of England, to ſolicite him in the matter, whiles himſelfe paſſed into Spaine, to implore the ayde of the Caſtilians herein.

Bartholomew unhappily lighted on Pirats by the way, which robbing him and his companie, forced him to ſuſtain himſelfe with making of Sea-Cardes. And hauing gotten ſomewhat about him, preſents a Mappe of the World to King Henry, with his brothers offer of Diſcouerie: which the King gladly accepted, and ſent to call him into England. But he had ſped of his ſuite before in Spain, and by the King & Queene was employed according to his requeſt. For comming from Leſbone to Palos di Moguer, and there conferring with Martin Aloſo Pinzon, an expert Pilot, and Frier Io. Perre a good Coſmographer, he was counſelled to acquaint with theſe his proiects, the Dukes of Medina Sidonia, and of Medina Cæli: which yeelding him no credite, the Frier counſelled him to goe to the Court, and wrote in his behalfe to Frier Fernand di Talanera the Queenes Confeſſor.

Chriſtopher Columbus came to the Court of Caſtile, Ann. 1486 and found cold welcome to his ſuite, at the handes of the King and Queene then buſied with hore warres in Granada, whence they expelled the Moores. And thus remained he in contempt, as a man meanely clothed, without other Patron then a poore Frier, ſaue that Aloſo di Saintaniglia gaue him his diet, who alſo at laſt procured him audience with the Archbiſhop of Toledo, by whose mediation he was brought before the King and Queene, who gaue him fauourable countenance, and promiſed to diſpatch him, when they had ended the warres of Granada, which alſo they performed. Thus Columbus is ſet forth with three Caruels at the Kings charges, who becauſe his treaſure was then ſpent in the warres, borrowed ſixteene thouſand duckats of Lewes de Sanct Angelo: and on friday the third day of Auguſt. in the yeare of our Lord 1492. in a veſſell called the Gallega, accompanied with the Pinta and Ninna, in which the Pinzons, brethren, went as Pilots, with the number of a hundred and twentie perſons, or thereabouts, ſet ſaile for Gomera, one of the Canarie Ilands, and hauing there reſreſhed himſelfe, followed his Diſcouerie. After many dayes he incountred with that Hearbie Sea (whereof before we haue<sup>h</sup> ſpoken) which not a little amared and amazed the Spaniards, and had cauſed their<sup>i</sup> returne, had not the ſight of ſome birds promiſed him land not farre off. He alſo firſt taught the Spaniards to obſerue the Sunne and Pole in their Navigations, which till this voyage they had not vſed, nor knowne.

But the Spaniards, after three and thirtie dayes ſayling, deſperate of ſucceſſe, mutied and threatned to caſt Columbus into the Sea: <sup>k</sup> diſdayning much, that a ſtranger, <sup>l</sup> Genuois had ſo abuſed them. But he pacifying their enraged courages with milde ſpeeches, and gentle promiſes, on the eleuenth day of October<sup>l</sup> one Roderigo di Triſp eſpied and cried, Land, Land; the beſt muſicke that might be, eſpecially to Columbus, who to ſatiſſie the Spaniards importunitie, had promiſed the day before, that if no land appeared in three dayes, he would returne. <sup>m</sup> One, the night before, had deſcried Fire, which kindled in him ſome hope of great reward at the Kings hand, when he returned into Spaine, but being herein fruſtrate, hee burnt into ſuch a flame, as that it conſumed both Humanitie and Chriſtianitie in him, and in the agonie of Indignation made him leaue his countrey and faith, and reuolt to the Moores. But thee, Columbus, how can I but remember? but loue? but admire? Sweetely may thoſe bones reſt, ſometimes the Pillars of that Temple, where ſo diuine a Spirit<sup>n</sup> reſided; which neyther want of former example, nor publique diſcouragements of domeſticall and forreigne ſtates, nor priuate inſultations of proud Spaniards, nor length of time (which vſually deuoureth the beſt reſolutions) nor the vnequall Plaines of huge vnkowne Seas, nor graſſie fields in Neptunes lap, nor importunate whiſperings, murmurings, threatnings of enraged companions, could daunt: O name<sup>n</sup> Colon, worthy to bee named vnto the Worlds end, which to the worlds end haſt conducted Colonies; or may I call thee Colombo for thy Doue-like ſimplicite and patience? the true Colonna or Pillar, whereon our knowledge of this new world is founded, the true Chriſtopher, which with more then Giant-like force and fortitude haſt carried Chriſt his Name and Religion,

But lest we drowne our selues in this Sea of Extasie and Admiration, let vs goe on shore with Columbus in his new discovered Island. And first me thinkes I see the Spaniards, yesterday in mutinie, now as farre distracted in contrary passions; some gazing with greedie eyes on the desired Land; some with teares of ioy, not able to see that, which the ioy of seeing made them not to see: others embracing, and almost adoring Columbus, who brought them to that sight: some also with secret repinings enuying that glorie to a stranger; but biting in their biting enuie, and making shew of glee and gladnesse: all new awaked out of a long traunce, into which that step-mother Ocean, with dangers, doubts, dreads, despaires had deiected them, reuiued now by the sight of their mother-earth, from whom in vnknowne armes they had beene so long weaned and detained. On shore they goe, and felling a tree, make a Crosse thereof, which they erected on the shore, and take possession of that new world in the name of the Catho- like Kings. This was done on the eleuenth of October, one thousand foure hundred fourescore and twelue, in the Island Guanahani, one of the Lucai, which Columbo named San Saluatore: from whence he sayled to Baracoa, a haue on the North side of the Ile Cuba, where he went on land, and asked of the Inhabitants for Cipango (so doth Paulus call Iapan). They vnderstanding him of Cibao (where are the richest mines of Hispaniola) signed him, that it was in Haiti, (so was the Island then called) and some of them went with him thither.

What worldly ioy is not mixed with some disastre? their Admirall heere splitteth on a Rocke, but the men are saued by the helpe of the other shippes. This fell out in the North part of Hispaniola (so named by them) where they had sight of Inhabitants, which seeing these strangers, ranne all away into the Mountaines. One woman the Spaniards got, whom they vsed kindly, and gaue her meate, drinke and clothes, and so let her goe. She declaring to her people the liberalitie of this new people, easily per- swaded them to come in troupest to the Ships, thinking the Spaniards to be some di- uine Nation, sent thither from heauen. They had before taken them for the Canibes, which are certain Canibals, which vsed inhumane huntings for humane game, to take men for to eate them: Children likewise, which they gelded to haue them more fat, and then to deuoure them: the women they ate not, but vsed them for procreation, and if they were olde, for other seruices. The llanders had no other defence against them but the wooddie hills, and swiftest heeles: to which they betooke them at the Spaniards arriual, thinking them (as is said) to be Caniballs. And such haue they since pro- ued in effect, not leauing of three millions of people which here they found, two hun- dred, and that long since.

The Diuell had forewarned them of this by Oracle, that a bearded Nation should spoyle their Images, and spill the bloud of their children, as wee shall see in the particular Tractate of Hispaniola. Nothing more pleased the Spaniards then the Golde, which the naked Inhabitants exchanged with them for Bells, Glasses, Points, and other trifles.

t The Fort of the Natiuity
 in Hispaniola.

Columbus obtained leaue of Guacanarillus, the Cacike or King, to build a Fort, in which he left eight and thirtie Spaniards, and taking with him fixe Indians, returned to Spaine, where he was highly welcomed of the King and Queene. Some controuersie fell out betweene Columbus, and one of the Pinzons, Master of one of the Carauels, about leauing these men behinde; but Columbus sent a Letter to reduce him vnto peace by the Indians, who held the Letter in almost religious regard, thinking it had some Spirit or Deitie, by which they could vnderstand one another being absent.

The

The Pope <sup>a</sup> (then a Spaniard, Alexander the sixt hearing of this, diuided the World, by his Bull, betwixt the Portugals and Spaniards : bearing date the fourth of May thousand foure hundred foure score and thirteene drawing a line a hundred leagues beyond the Ilands of Afores and Cape Verde, this Alexander giuing (more then Great Alexander could conquer) the East to the one and West to the other. The Bull is become an Vnicorne, and his two hornes are now growne into one: in the vnitng of those two states. Columbus, graced with the title of Admirall, and enriched with the tenths of the Spanishe gaires in the Indies, is sent a second <sup>b</sup> time, with his brother Bartholomew, who was made Adelantado or Deputie of Hispaniola. They had allowed them for this expedition, small and great, seuentene sayle, and fiftene hundred men. The first Iland hee espied in his second Navigation, hee called Desseador Desired, because he had longed to see land. Arriuing in Hispaniola, hee found the Spaniards which hee had left there, that they were now not left, nor any where to be found. The Indians had murthered them, and laid the blame on the Spanishe insolencies.

Hee now built and peopled the Towne of Isabella, which was their chiefe place of residence and gouernment, which in the yeare a thousand foure hundred nintie eight were remoued to the Citie of San Domenico. They built also the fort of Saint Thomas: but both in the one and the other the Spaniards died of famine through the Indians wilfulnesse, who vnwilling to haue such neighbours, would not plant their Maize and Iuca, and so starued both themselves and their guests. As for the Pocks, the Spaniards in this Voyage gotte them of the Indian women and brought them into Spaine, as Oniedo of his owne knowledge <sup>c</sup> reporteth of his owne Countymen: and they after paid the Indians <sup>d</sup> (in recompense) with a disease as deadly and infectious to them, which consumed thousands, and was neuer before knowne amongst them: I meane the small Pockes. The other were improperly named of the French, or of Naples, seeing that in those warres of Naples which the Spaniards maintained against the French, some carried this disease with them thither out of Spaine, and communicated the same both to the French and Neapolitans, hauing bene vsuall, and easily curable, in the Indies. Another disease also assaulted them of a little kinde of Fleas called Niguas, which would eat into, and breed in the flesh, and haue made many loose their Toes.

Columbus at this time discovered Cuba and Iamaica with the neighbour-Iles. Returning to Hispaniola, he found his brother and the Spaniards in dissention and separation, and punishing the Authours of sedition, returned home. In the yeare of our Lord, one thousand foure hundred foure score and seuentene, hee made his third Voyage, and then touched on the Continent; discovered Cubagua, Paria, and Cumana.

But Roldanus Ximenius raysing a rebellion, and accusing the Columbi to the King effected that Bonadilla was sent Gouvernour into Hispaniola, who sent the two brethren bound as prisoners to Spaine: vnworthie recompence of the worthie attempts of these Worthies. The King freeth them, and employeth Christopher in a fourth Voyage, a thousand fise hundred and two: in which Onandus the Gouvernour forbade Columbus the first finder to land on Hispaniola. <sup>e</sup> He then discovered Guanaxa, Higueira, Fondura, Veragua, Vraba, and learned newes (as some say) of the South Sea. Hee staid at Iamaica to repaire his fleete, where some of his men were sicke, and they which were sound in bodie, were more then sicke, froward and tumultuous in behaviour and many left him. Vpon this occasion the Ilanders also forsooke him, and brought in no victuall. Here with Columbus, neither able to abide nor depart, was driven to his shifts, no lesse admirable for subtiltie then resolution. <sup>f</sup> He told the Ilanders, that if they did not bring him in prouision, the Diuine Anger would consume them, a signe whereof they should see in the darkened face of the Moone within two dayes. At that time he knew the Moone would bee eclipsed, which the simple Ilanders seeing, with feare and griefe humbled themselves to him, and offered themselves readie to all kinde and dutifull Offices.

At last, returning into Spaine, he there died, Anno a thousand fise hundred and sixe. His bodie was buried at Siuill in the Temple of the Carthusians. This was the end (if euer there can be end) of Columbus Pinzonius & one of Columbus his companions, by his example invited, made new Discoverie, and Vespucium, and Cabota and many other, every day making new searches and plantations, till the World at last is come to the knowledge of this New World almost wholly. The particulars will more fully appear in our particular relations of each Countrey.

After this discourse of the men in those parts, let vs take some generall view of the other Creatures, especially such as are more generally disperst through the Indies. I haue before noted, that America had very few of such Creatures as Europe yeeldeth, vntill they were transported thither: and therefore they haue no Indian names for them,<sup>b</sup> but those which the Spaniards that brought them, giue vnto them: as Horse, Kine, and such like. They haue Lyons, but not like in greatnesse, fiercenesse, nor colour to those of Africa. They haue Beares in great abundance, except on the North parts. They haue store of Deere, Bores, Foxes, and Tygres, which (as in Congo) are more cruell to the Naturals then to the Spaniards. Their beasts were not found in the Ilands, but in the Continent; and yet now in those Ilands, Kine are multiplied and growne wilde, without other owner then such as first can kill them: the Dogges likewise march by troupes, and endamage the cattell worse then Wolues. Their Swine did multiply exceedingly, but (as an enemie to their Sugars, a great commoditie in Hispaniola, where Anno a thousand five hundred thirtie five. Ouedo reckons almost thirty Ingenious, the number daily increasing) they were forced to root out this rooting kinde of beasts. This Iland hath stored the other about it, with store of Horse and Mares, which are sold very cheape. For Kine the Bishoppe of Venezuela had fixteene thousand heard of that kind of beasts, and more: others possessed thousands also, and some killed them only for their hides, of which were shipped from hence for Spaine Anno 1587. 35444. and from New Spaine 64350. as Acosta relateth.

The Lyons are grey, and vse to clime Trees: the Indians hunt and kill them. The Beares and Tygres are like those in other parts: but not so many. Apes and Monkeys they haue of many kindes, and those admirably pleasing in their Apish trickes and imitations seeming to proceed from Reason. A Souldier leuelling at one of them to shoot him, the sly beast died not vnreuedged, but hurling a stone as the other aimed at him, deprived the Souldier of his eye, and lost his owne life. They haue Monkeys with long beards. Acosta tells of one Monkie that would goe to the Tauerne at his Masters sending, and carrying the pot in one hand, and monie in the other, would not by any meanes depart with his monie, till hee had his pot filled with wine: and returning home, would pelt the Boyes with stones, and yet haue care to carrie his Wine home safe to his Master, neither touching it himselfe till some were giuen him, nor suffering other. They* haue a monstrous deformed beast whose fore part resembleth a Fox, the hinder part an Ape, excepting the feet which are like a mans; beneath her belly she hath a receptacle like a purse wherein shee bestowes her young vntill they can shift for themselves, neuer coming out of this naturall nest, but to sucke.

Sheep haue much increased, and by good husbandrie, in that plentie of pasture, would bee a great commoditie: but in the Ilands the wilde Dogges destroy them: and therefore they that kill these Dogges, are rewarded for it, as they which kill Wolues in Spaine. The Dogges which the Indians had before, were snouted like Foxes; they fatted them to eat, and kept them also for pleasure: but they could not bark. Such Dogs (we haue shewed) are in Congo. Their stags and Deere in the South parts of America, haue no hornes. They haue store of Conies. The Armadilla is an admirable Creature, of which there be diuers kinds: they resemble a barded Horse, seeming to be armed all ouer, and that as if it were rather by artificiall plates, opening and shutting, then naturall scales it digges vp the earth as Conies and Moules.

The Hogges of the Indies haue their nauill vpon their ridge of the backs. They goe in Heardes together and assaile men, hauing sharp talons, like rasors, and hunt their hunters vp the tops of trees whence they easily kill these enraged Sainos (so they cal them) biting the tree for anger. The Dantes resemble small kine and are defended by the hardnes of their hides. The Vicugna somewhat resembleth a Goat, but is greater: they sheare them, and of their fleeces make rugs and couerings, and stufes. In the stomacke and belly of this beast is found the Bezaar-stone sometimes one alone, sometimes two, three, three, or foure: the colour of which is blacke, or grey, or greene, or otherwise: it is accounted soueraigne against poysons and venomous diseases. It is found in diuers sorts of beasts: but all chew the cud, and commonly feede vpon the snow and rockes. The Indian sheep they call Lama, it is a beast of great profit, not only for foode and rayment, but also for carriage of burthens: they are bigger then sheepe, and lesse then calves: they will beare a hundred and fiftie pound weight. In some places they call them Amidas, and vse them to greater burthens. Hulderike Schmidel affirms, that he liuing in the parts about the Riuer of Plate, being hurt on his leg, rod fortie leagues vpon one of them. They will grow restie, and will lie downe with their burthen, no stripes nor death able to assuage their moode: only good wordes, and faire dealing, with gentle intreatie, sometimes diuers houres together, can preuaile.

Of foules they haue many kindes which wee haue, as Partridges, Turtles, Pigeons, flock-doues, Quails, Falcons, Herons, Eagles: and a World of Parrots, which in some places flee by flocks, as Pigeons. There are also Estriges. Hens they had before the Spaniards arriued. They haue other kinds peculiar: The Tomineias<sup>h</sup> is the least in quantitie, the greatest for admiration and wounder. I haue often times doubted (sayth Asaph) seeing them flie, whether they were Bees or Butter-flies; but in truth they are birds. Theuet<sup>i</sup> and Lerius call it Gonambuch, or Gonanbuch. They affirme that it yeelds nothing in sweetnesse of Note to the Nightingale, and yet is not bigger then a Beetle or Drone-bee: One would say, Vox ei, praterea nihil: but so could not any truly say, for euen otherwise is it almost miraculous: Nature making this little shoppe her great fire-house of wonder and astonishment, and shewing<sup>k</sup> her greatest greatnesse in the least Instruments. The Prouinciall of the Iesuites in Brasil, affirmeth as Clusius testifies, that the Brasilians called it Ouissia which signifieth the Sun-beame, and that it was pcreated of a flie; and that hee had seene one, partly a bird, and partly a flie: first coloured blacke, then ash-coloured, then rose-coloured, then red: and lastly, the head set against the Sunne, to resemble all colours, in most admired varietie. It flieth so swift (sayth<sup>m</sup> Oniedo) that the wings cannot bee seene. It hath a nest proportionable. I haue seene (sayth he) one of those birds, together with her nest, put into the scales, wherein they vse to weigh gold, and both weighed but two tomins, that is, foure and twentie graines. Haply it is therefore called Tomineias, as weighing one Tomine. The females are beautified with yellow, greene, and other colours: the mouth like the eye of a needle. It liueth on<sup>n</sup> dew, and the iuyce of hearbes; but sitteth not on the Rose. The feathers, specially of the necke and breasts, are in great request for those feather-pictures, or portraitures, which the Indians make cunningly and artificially with these naturall feathers, placing the same in place and proportion, beyond al admiration: The Indian Bats should not flee your light, and are for their raritie worthie consideration, but that wee haue before spoken somewhat of them.

They haue<sup>a</sup> birds called Condors, of exceeding greatnesse and force, that will oppress sheepe, and a whole Calfe, and eate the same. They haue abundance of birds, a beautie of their feathers, farre surpassing all in Europe, wherewith the skilfull Indians will perfectly represent in feathers, whatsoever they see drawne with the Pen-cill. A figure of Saint Francis, made of feathers was presented to Pope Sixtus Quintus, whose eye could not discern them to bee naturall colours but thought them pencil-work, till he made triall with his fingers. The Indians vsed them for the ornaments of their Kings and Temples. Some birds there are of rich commoditie, onely by their dung. In some Ilands ioyning to Peru, the Mountaines are all white, like snow, which is nothing but heapes of dung, of certaine Sea-foules which frequent those places. It is rich in manyelles, yea many lances in height, and is fetched thence in boates, to hearten the earth, which hereby is exceeding fertile.

To adde some what of the Indian Plants, and Trees. P Mangle is the name of a Tree, which multiplieth it selfe into a wood (as before we haue obserued of it) the branches descending and taking Root in the Earth. The Plane tree of India hath leaues sufficient to couer a man from the foote to the head: but these, the Coco, and other Indian Trees, are in the East-indies also and there wee haue mentioned them. Cacao is a fruit little lesse then Almonds, which the Indians vse for monie, and make thereof a drinke, holden amongst them in high regard. They haue a kinde of Apples called Ananas, exceeding pleasant in colour and taste, and verie wholesome, which yet haue force to eate yron, like aqua fortis. The Mamayas, Guayanos, and Paltos bee the Indian Peaches, Apples, and Peares. But it would bee a wearie wildernesse to the Reader, to bring him into such an Indian Orchard where hee might reade of such varietie of Fruites, but (like Tantalus) can taste none: or to present you with a garden of their Trees, which beare flowers without other Fruit, as the Floripondio, which all the yeare long beareth flowers sweete, like a Lilly, but greater: the Polusanchil, which beareth a flower like to the forme of the heart, and others, which I omit. The flower of the Sun is now no longer, the Marigold of Peru, but groweth in manie places with vs in England. The flower of the Granadilla they say (if they say truly) hath the markes of the Passion, Nailes, Pillar, Whippes, Thornes, Wounds, exceeding stigmaticall Francis.

For their Seedes and Graines, Mays is principall, of which they make their bread, which our English ground brings forth, but hardly will ripen: it growes, as it were on a Reed, and multiplieth beyond comparison; they gather three hundred measures for one. It yeeldeth more bloud, but more grosse, then our Wheate. They make drinke thereof also, wherewith they will bee exceedingly drunke: They first steepe, and after boile it to that end. In some places they first cause it to bee champed with Maids, in some places with olde women, and then make a Leauen thereof, which they boyle, and make this inebriating drinke. The Canes and leaues serue for their Mules to eate. They boyle and drinke it also for paine in the backe. The buds of Mays serue in steed of Butter and Oyle.

In some parts they make bread of a great roote called Tuca, which they name Cacani. They first cut and straine it in a Presse, for the iuyce is deadly \* poyson: the Cakes dried are steeped in water before they can eate them. Another kind there is of this Tuca or Luca, the iuyce whereof is not poyson. It will keepe long, like Biscuit. They vse this bread most in Hispaniola, Cuba, and Iamaica where Wheate and Mays will not grow, but so vnequally, that at one instant, some is in the grasse, other in the graine. They vse in some places another roote called Papas, like to ground Nut, for bread, which they call Chuno. Of other their rootes and fruites I am loath to write, least I wearie the Reader with tedious officiousnesse. Spices grow not there naturally: Ginger thrieth well, brought and planted by the Spaniards. They haue a good kinde of Balme, though not the same which grew in Palestina. Of their Amber, Oyles, Gummes, and Drugges I list not to relate further. Out of Spaine they haue carried great varietie of Plants, herein America exceeding Spaine, that it receiueth and fructifieth in all Spanish Plants that are brought thither, whereas the Indian thriue not in Spaine: as Vines, Oliues, Mulberies, Figges, Almonds, Limons, Quinces, and such like. And, to end this Chapter with a comparison of our World with this of America; Our aduantages and preferments are many. \* Our Heauen hath more Starres, and greater, as Acofta by his owne sight hath obserued, challenging those Authors, which haue written otherwise, of fabling. Our Heauen hath the North starre within three degrees, and a third of the Pole: their Crozier or foure starres set a-crosse, which they obserue for the Antartike, is thirtie degrees off. The Sunne communicareth his partiall presence longer to our Tropike then that of Capricorne; remaining in the Southerne signes 178. dayes: 21. houres and 12. minutes: in the Northerne 186. dayes, 8. houres and 12. minutes. B. Keckerman, Syftem. Astron. L. 1. Tycho, Brab. L. 1. reckoneth these a hundred foure score and sixe dayes, houres 18.  $\frac{1}{2}$ : dyes 8.  $\frac{1}{2}$  fero plus quam in Australi, &c.

This want of the Sunne and Starres is one cause of greater cold in those parts then in these. Our Earth exceeds theirs for the situation, extending it selfe more between East and West (fittest for humane life) whereas theirs trends most towards the two Poles. Our Sea is more fauourable, in more Gulfes and Bayes, especially such * as goe farre within Land, besides the Midland Sea, equally communicating her selfe to Asia, Africa, and Europa. This conuenience of Traffique America wanteth. Our Beasts wild and tame, are farre the more noble as the former Discourse sheweth.

* In the Islands, but not in all places of the firme Land.

f Spanish fruits thriue well in one place or other of the Indies.

For what haue they to oppose to our Elephants, Rhinocerotes, Camels, Horses, Kine, &c. Neither were the naturall fruites of America comparable to those of our World. Whence are their Spices, and best Fruit, but from hence by transportation, or transplantation? As for Artes, States, Literature, Diuine and Humane, multitudes of Cities, Lawes, and other Excellencies, our World enioyeth still the priuiledge of the First-borne. America is as a younger brother or sister and hath in these thinges almost no inheritance at all, till it bought somewhat hereof of the Spaniards, with the price of her Freedome. On the other side, for temperature of Ayre, generally America is farre before Africa, in the same height. For greatnesse of Riuers, Canada, Plata, and Maragnon, exceed our World. Whether Africa or America exceed in Golde, it is a question: In Siluer, Potozi seemes to haue surmounted any one Mine of the World, besides those of new-Spaine, and other parts, howsoeuer Boterus doubts. Yet Exitus alla probat. And now America excels, because, besides her owne store, shee is so plentifully furnished with all sorts of liuing and growing Creatures from hence, as euen now was shewed.

CHAP. III.

Of the discoveries of the North parts of the New World, and toward the Pole, and of Greenland, Groenland, Estotiland, Meta Incognita, and other Places vnto New France.

Merica is commonly diuided by that Isthmus, or necke and narrow passage of Land at Darien, into two parts; the one called Northerne America, or Mexicana; the other Southerne, or Peruana. This trendeth betwixt the Darien and Magellan Straights: that from thence Northwards where the Confines are yet vnkowne. For it is not yet fully discovered, whether it ioyneth somewhere to the Continent of Asia, whether Groenland, and some other parts, accounted Ilands, ioyned with it. These were discovered before the dayes of Columbus, and yet remaine almost covered in obscuritie, and were therefore iustly termed * Meta Incognita, by Great Elizabeth the best knowne and most renowned Ladie of the World. The first knowledge that hath come to vs of those parts, was by Nicholas and Antonio Zeno, two brethren, Venetians. Happie Italie, that first, in this last Age of the World, hath discovered the great Discoverers of the World, to whom we owe our M. Paulus, Odericus, Verto- mannus, for the East; Columbus, Vespucius, Cabot, for the West; these noble Zeni for the North: and the first encompassing the Worlds wide compasse, vnto Pagafetta's Discourse, companion of Magellan in his iournie: that I speake not of the paines of Raselli, Ramusius, Boterus, and a World of Italian Authours that (I thinke more then any other Language) haue by their historicall labours discovered the World to it selfe. Vnhappie Italy, that still hast beaten the bush, for other to catch the Bird, and hast inherited nothing in these Easterne and Westerne Worlds, excepting thy Catholike dayme, whereby the Catholike and Spanish Sword makes way for the Catholike-Roman Crowne and Keyes: Neither the Sword of Paul, nor the Keyes of Peter; for both these were <sup>b</sup> spirituall. But to returne to our Venetians. <sup>c</sup> In the yeare a thousand three hundred and foure score Master Nicolo Zeno being wealthie, and of a haughtie spirit, desiring to see the fashions of the World, built and furnished a Ship at his owne charges, and passing the Straights of Gibraltar, helde on his course Northwards, with intent to see England and Flaunders. But a violent Tempest assaying him at Sea, he was carried hee knew not whither, till at last his Ship was carried away vpon the Ile of Frisland; where the men and most part of the goods were saued. In vaine seemes that deliuerie that deliueys vp presently to another Executioner. The Ilanders like Nep- tunes hungrie groomes, or his base and blacke gard, set vpon the men whom the Seas had spared: but here also they found a second escape, by meanes of a Prince named

b 1. Cor. 4
c The discoveries of M. Nic. & Ant. Zeno gathered out of their letters by Francisco Martellus. They are related by M. Hakluyt in his 3. vol. part. 1. 11.

Zichmui, Prince of that and many Ilands thereabouts : who being neere hand with his Armie, came at the out-cry, and chasing away the people, tooke them into protection.

This Zichmui had the yeare before given the ouerthrow to the King of Norway, and was a great adventurer in feates of Armes. Hee spake to them in Latine, and placed them in his Nauie, wherewith hee wonne diuerse Ilands. Nicols behaued himselfe so well, both in sauing the Fleete by his Sea-skill, and in conquest of the Ilands by his valour that Zichmui made him Knight and Captaine of his Nauie.

After diuerse notable Exploits, Nicols armed three Barks, with which hee arrived in Engroneland : where hee found a Monasterie of Friers of the Preachers Order, and a Church dedicated to Saint Thomas hard by a Hill, that casteth out fire like Vesunius and Aetna. There is a Fountaine of hote water, with which they heat the Church of the Monasterie, and the Friers chambers. It cometh also into the Kitchen so boyling hote, that they vse no other fire to dresse their meate; and putting their Bread into Brasse Pots without any water, it doth bake as it were in an hote Ouen. They haue also small Gardens, which are couered ouer in the Winter time, and being watered with this water, are defended from the violence of the Frost and Cold, and bring forth Flowers in their due seasons. The common people astonished with these strange effects, conceiue highly of those Friers, and bring them presents of Flesh and other things.

They with this Water, in the extremitie of the Colde, heate their Chambers, which also (as the other buildings of the Monasterie) are framed of those burning stones, which the mouth of the Hill casts forth. They cast Water on some of them, whereby they are dissolued, and become excellent white Lime, and so tough, that being contriued in building, it lasteth for euer. The rest, after the fire is out, serue in stead of stones to make Walles and Vaults, and will not dissolue, or breake, except with some yron tooke.

Their Winter lasteth nine moneths: and yet there is a faire Hauen, where this water falleth into the Sea, not frozen: by meanes whereof there is great resort of wild fowle, and fish, which they take in infinite multitudes. The Fishers Boats are made like to a Weauers Shuttle, of the skins of fishes, fashioned with the bones of the same fishes, and being sowed together with many doubles, they are so strong, that in foule weather they will shur themselues within the same, not fearing the force eyther of Sea, or Winde. Neither can the hard-hearted Rockes breake these yeelding Vessels. They haue also (as it were) a Slecue in the bottome thereof, by which with a subtile deuise, they conuey the water forth, that soaketh into them. The most of these Friers spake the Latine Tongue.

A little after this Nicols returned, and dyed in Frisland, whither his brother Antonius had before resorted to him, and now succeeded both in his goods and honour; whom Zichmui employed in the Expedition for Estotiland: which happened vpon this occasion. Sixe and twentie yeares before, foure Fisher-Boats were apprehended at Sea by a mightie and tedious storme; wherewith after manie dayes, they were brought to Estotiland, aboue a thousand myles West from Frisland: vpon which, one of the Boates was cast away, and sixe men that were in it, were taken and brought to a populous Citie; where, one that spake Latine, and had beene cast by chance vpon that Iland, in the name of the King asked them what Countermen they were; and vnderstanding their case, hee acquainted the King therewith. They dwelt there five yeares, and found it to bee an Iland verie rich, being little lesse then Iseland, but farre more fruitfull. One of them said hee saw Latine Bookes in the Kings Librarie, which they at this present doe not vnderstand. They haue a peculiar Language, and Letters, or Characters to themselues. They haue Mines of Gold, and other Mettals, and haue Trade with Engroneland. They sow Corne, and make Beere and Ale. They build Barks (but know not the vse of the Compasse) and haue manie Cities and Castles. The King sent these Fishermen with twelue Barks Southwardes, to a Countrie which they call Drogio: in which Voyage escaping dreadfull Tempests at Sea

Sea, they encountered with Cannibals at Land, which deuoured many of them. These Fishers shewing them the maner of taking Fish with Nets, escaped: and for the presents which they made of their Fish to the chiefe men of the Countrey, were beloued and honoured. One of these (more expert, it seemeth then the rest) was holden in such account, that a great Lord made warre with their Lord to obtaine him: and so preuailed, that he and his company were sent vnto him. And in this order was he sent to fīue and twentie Lords, which had warred one with another to get him, in thirteene yeeres space: whereby he came to know almost all those parts; which, he said, was a great Countrey, and (as it were) a New World. The people are all rude, and void of goodnesse: they goe naked, neither haue they wit to couer their bodies with the Beastes skinner, which they take in Hunting, from the vehement cold. They are fierce, and eate their enemies, hauing diuerse Lawes and Gouvernours. Their liuing is by Hunting.

Further to the South-west, they are more ciuill, and haue a more temperate Ayre: They haue Cities and Temples dedicated to Idols, where they sacrifice men, and after eat them; and haue also some vse of Gold and Siluer.

Hee fledde away secretly, and conueying himselfe from one Lord to another, came at length to Drogio, where hee dwelt three yeeres. After this time finding there certaine Boates of Estotiland, hee went thither with them: and growing there very rich, furnished a Barke of his owne, and returned into Frisland: where hee made report vnto his Lord of that wealthy Countrey. Zichumi prepared to send thither: but three daies before they set forth, this Fisher-man died. Yet taking some of the Mariners which came with him, in his stead, they prosecuted the Voyage, and encountred, after many dayes, an Iland; where tenne men, of diuerse Languages, were brought vnto them, of which they could vnderstand none, but one of Iseland. Hee tolde them, That the Iland was called Icaria, and the Knights thereof called Icari, descended of the ancient pedigree of Dedalus, King of Scots, who conquering that Iland, left his sonne there for King, and left them those Lawes, which to that present they retained. And, that they might keepe their Lawes inuiolate, they would receiue no stranger. Onely they were contented to receiue one of our men, in regard of the Language, as they had done those ten Interpreters, Zichumi sayling hence, in foure dayes descried Land, where they found abundance of Fowle, and Birds egges, for their refreshing. The Hauen they called Cap Trin. There was a Hill, which burning, cast out smoake: where was a Spring, from which issued a certaine water like Pitch, which ranne into the Sea: The people of small stature, wilde, and fearefull, hid themselves in Caves, Zichumi built there a City, and determining to inhabite, sent Antonio backe againe, with the most of his people, to Frisland.

This History I haue thus inserted at large, which perhaps, not without cause in some things, may seeme fabulous; not in the Zemi, which thus writ, but in the relations which they receiued from others. Howsoever; the best Geographers<sup>a</sup> are beholden to these brethren, for that little knowledge they haue of these parts; of which none before had written: nor since haue there beene any great in-land Discoveries. * Dishmar Bleskens in his Treatise of Island relateth, that in the yeare 900. the Nobility of East Frisia and Breame found that Iland, and 200. leagues from thence discovered Gronland, which he saith was named per antiphrasin, of the Contrarie, for want of greene and pleasant Pictures: and that by Whirle-pooles and misty darknesse, all their Nauie, but one ship perished.

Somewhat since there hath beene discovered by Gaspar Cortereale, a Portugall; Stephen Gomes, a Spaniard, and Sebastin Cabot: and more by later Pilots, of our Nation, but little of the disposition of the In-land people. Yes, it is thought to be all broken Ilands, and not inhabited, but at certaine seasons frequented by some Sauages, which come thither to fish. Such as we can, in due order we here bestow.

Sebastin * Cabot reported to Ramusio, that in the yeare 1497, at the charge of King Henry the seventh, he discovered to the sixty; seuen degree and a halfe of Northerly latitude, minding to haue proceeded for the search of Cathay, but by the mutiny of the Mariners was forced to returne. The Map of Sebastin Cabot, cut by * Clement Adams, relateth, That John Cabot, a Venetian, and his sonne Sebastin, set out from Bristol, discovering couering the Land, called it Prima Vista, and the Island before it, S. Iohns. The inhabitants weare Beasts skinnes. There were white Beares and Stagges farre greater then ours. There were plenty of Seales, and Soles about a yard long. Hee named (saith Peter Martyr) certaine Ilands & Baccalaos, of the store of those fish, which the inhabitants called by that name, which with their multitudes sometimes staid his Ships. The Beares caught these Fish with their claws, and drew them to land, and eat them. In the time of Henry the seventh (William Purchas being then Mayor of London) were brought vnto the King three men, taken in the New-found Island: these were clothed in Beasts skinnes, and did eat raw flesh. But Cabot discovered all along the Coast to that which since is called Florida; and returning, found great preparations for wars in Scotland, by reason whereof, no more consideration was had to this Voyage. Whereupon he went into Spaine; and being entertained by the King and Queene, was sent to discover the Coasts of Brasil, and sayled vp into the River of Plate more then six-score Leagues. He was made Pilot Major of Spaine: and after that, Anno 1549, was constituted Ground Pilot of England by King Edward the sixth, with the yearly Pension of an hundred threescore and sixe pounds, thirteene shillings, foure pence: Where, in the year 1553, hee was chiefe dealer and procurer of the Discouery of Russia, and the North-east Voyages, made by Sir Hugh Willoughby, R. Chancelour, Stephen Burrough, and prosecuted by Pet. Jackman, and others, towards Nova Zemla, Persia, Tartaria, as in Master Hakluyts first Tome appeareth. Perhaps this voyage of Cabot was the same which is mentioned by Mr. Robert Thorne in a treatise of his written 1527. that his father and Hugh Eliot a Merchant of Bristow, were the discoverers of the New-foundlands: and if they had followed their Pilots minde, the lands of the West Indies had beene ours.

Anno 1500 Gaspar Corteregalis, a Portugall, minding new Discoueries, set forth a Ship at his owne charge from Lisbone; and sayling farre North, at last came to a Land, which for the pleasantesse thereof, he called Greene. The men, as hee reported, were barbarous, browne-coloured, very swift, good Archers, clothed in Beasts skinnes, They liue in Caues, or base Cottages, without any Religion, but obserue Soothsayings. They vsed mariages, and were very icalous. Petrus Pasqualis in a letter concerning this voyage, saith they brought from thence a peece of a gilded sword, which seemed to be of Italian workmanship: a child also amongst them ware two siluer eare-rings, which by the workmanship appeared to be brought from these parts: perhaps belonging to some of Cabots company. Returning into Portugal, he sayled thitherward again, Anno 1501. But what became of him, none can tell. His brother Michael Corteregalis the next year set forth two Ships to make search for his brother, but he also was lost. The King Emanuel grieved heerewith, sent to enquire of them, but all in vaine. Their brother Vasco would haue put himselfe on this aduenture, but the King would not suffer him. The name Greene vpon this occasion was withered, and the Land was called Terra Corteregalis. Thus farre Oforius. It reacheth, according to Boternus reckoning, to the 60. degree. Let vs come to our owne: For of Stephen<sup>m</sup> Gomes little is left vs but a least.

This Gomes hauing beene with Magellan a few years before, in his Discouery of the South Sea, enlarged with hopes of new Straits, in the year 1525 set forth to search this Northerly passage. But finding nothing to his expectation, he laded his Ship with slaues, and returned. At his returne, one that knew his intent, was for the Moluccas by that way, enquiring what he had brought home, was told Esclauos, that is, slaues. He, therefore, stilled with his owne imagination of Cloues, had thought it was said Clauos, and so posted to the Court to carry first newes of this Spicie Discouery, locking for a great reward: but the truth being knowne, caused heereat great laughter. William Steers translated a booke, Anno 1608. before translated out of the North language 1560. for the vse of Henry Hudson, in which is mention of diuers townes of Gronland, as Skagenford an Eastern dorp or village, and from thence more Easterly, Bearesford, where was great fishing for Whales by the Bishops licence the benefit redounding to the Cathedral Church: Allaborg Sound, where Fowle and Oxen were plentifull: Fendbrother Hauen, where in S. Olafss time some were drowned and their ship cast away, Crosses being yet seene on their graue-stones: Corschought, where by authority from the Bishop they hunted hunted for white Beares : from hence Eastward nothing but Ice and Snow. Westward flood Kodesford, a dorp, well built with a great Church, Wartdale, Peterwicke, Saint Olesses Monastery, and another of S. Benets Nunnes : here were many warme waters, in the Winter intolerably hot, and medicinable. There was also a Church of S. Nicholas and many other Parishes and Villages, Deserts ; Beares with red patches on their heads, Hawkes, Marble of all colours, great streams, Nuts, and Acornes in the hilles, Wheat, Sables, Loshes, &c. Hee affirmeth that it is not so cold there as in Island and Norway. But let vs obserue the discoueries of our owne Country-men.

Sir Martin Frobisher * deserueth the first place, as being the first that in the dayes of Queene Elizabeth sought the North-west passage in three seuerall Voyages. The first whereof was written by Christopher P Hall ; the second, by Dionise Settle ; the 3. by Thomas Ellis ; and all in one Discourse by M. George Best : all which, at large, the Reader may finde in M. Hackluyts laborious Discouery of Discoueries. To speake briefly what may best besit vs in our Pilgrimage : Sir Martin Frobisher sayled from Blacke-wall, Iune the fifteenth ; and the tenth of Iuly * had sight of Frisland, but could not get on shore for the abundance of Ice, which was also accompanied with an extreame Fogge, as double gard to that Iland (vncertaine weather to fortifie it, or to imprison them.) The twentieth of Iuly he had sight of an high Land, which he named Queene Elizabeths Fore-land. Here was he much troubled with Ice : but sayling more Northerly, descried another Foreland, with a great Gut, Bay, or Passage, which he entred, calling it Frobishers Straits, supposing it to be the diuision of Asia and America. Hauing entred threescore Leagues, he went on shore, and was encountered with mighty Deere which ran at him, with danger of his life. Heere had hee sight of the Sauages, which rowed to his Ship in Boates of Seales skinnes, with a Keele of wood within them, like a Spanish Shallop, saue onely they be flat in the bottome, and sharpe at both ends. They eat raw Fiesh and Fish, or rather deuoured the same : they had long blacke haire, broad faces, flat noses, tawnie of colour, or like an Oliue (which neither Sun or Winde, but Nature it selfe, imprinted on them, as appeared by their infants, and seemeth to be the generall Liuey of America.) Their apparrell was Seales skinnes : their women were painted or marked downe the cheekes and about the eies with blew streakes. These Sauages intercepted fise of our men, and the Boat : Ours also tooke one of theirs, which they brought into England, where they arriued the second of October, 1576. He had taken possession of the Countrey in right of the Queene, and commanded his company to bring every one somewhat, in witnesse of the same. One brought a peece of blacke Stone, like Sea-coale which was found to hold Gold in good quantity. Whereupon a second Voyage was made the next yeare 1577, to bring Ore. And comming to those Straits in Iuly, found them in manner shut vp with a long Mure of Ice, which sometime indangered their Shippes, especially on the nineteenth of that Moneth. They found a great dead Fish, round like a Porpys, twelue foote long, hauing a Horne of two yardes, lacking two ynches, growing out of the Shout, wreathed and straight, like a Wax Taper, and might be thought to be a Sea-Vnicorne. It was broken in the top, wherein some of the Sayers said they put Spiders, which presently died. It was referued as a Iewell by the Queenes commandement, in her Wardrobe of Robes. They went on shore, and had some encounter with the inhabitants, which were of so fierce and terrible resolution, that finding themselves wounded, they leapt off the Rockes into the Sea, rather then they would fall into the hands of the English. The rest fled. One woman, with her child, they tooke and brought away. They had taken another of the Sauages before. This Sauage had before, in the Ship, scene the Picture of his Country-man, taken the yeere before, thought him to be aliue, and began to be offended, that he would not answer him ; with wonder thinking, that our men could make men liue and die at their pleasure. But strange were the gestures and behaiour of this man and the woman, when they were brought together ; which were put into the same Cabbin, and yet gaue such apparant signes of shamefastnesse and chastity, as might be a shame to Christians to come so far short of them.

Where they could haue any Trade with the Sauages, their manner of Traffique was, to lay downe somewhat of theirs, and goe their way, expecting, that our men should lay downe downe somewhat in lieu thereof; and if they like of their Mart, they come againe, and take it: otherwise, they take away their owne, and depart. They made signes, that their Catchoe, or King, was a man of higher stature then any of ours, and that he was carried vpon mens shoulders.

e Friesland is in length 25. leagues: the Southern part of it is in the latitude of 57. degrees, & one second. Thomas Wiat,

They could not learne what became of the five men they lost the yeare before: onely they found some of their apparell; which made them thinke they were eaten. They laded themselues with Ore, and so returned. And with fifteene sayle the next yeere 1578 a third Voyage for discouery was made by the said Capitaine and Generall. He went on shore the twentieth of Iune on Friesland, which was named by them West England, where they espied certaine Tents and People like those of Meta Incognita. The people fled, and they found in their Tents a box of small nayles, red Herrings, and Boords of Firre-tree well cut, with other things artificially wrought: whereby it appeareth, that they are workemen themselues, or haue trade with others. Some of them were of opinion, That this was firme land with Meta Incognita, or with Gronland; whereunto the multitude of Ilands of Ice, betweene that and Meta Incognita induced them. In departing from hence, the Salamander (one of their Ships) being vnder both her Courses and Bonets, happened to strike on a great Whale with her full stemme, with such a blow, that the Ship stood still, and neither stirred forward nor backwards. The Whale thereat made a great and hideous noyse, and casting vp his body and tayle, presently sanke vnder water. Within two dayes they found a Whale dead, which they supposed was this which the Salamander had striken.

The second of Iuly they entred in with the Straits, the entrance whereof was barred with Mountaines of Ice, wherewith the Barke Dennis, was sunke, to the hinderance of their proiects. For in it was drowned part of a house, which they had intended to erect there for habitation. The men were saued. The other Ships were in very great danger, the Seas mustering Armies of ycie souldiours to oppresse them, vsing other naturall stratagemes of Fogges and Snowes to further these cruell designes.

u It seemeth they are of fresh waters, because the ice is fresh, and the Sun melting the tops, causeth rills of fresh water to run downe, which meeting together make a prettie streame.

These Icie Ilands seeme to haue beene congealed in the Winter further North, in some Bayes, or Riuers, and with the Summers Sunne being loosed, and broken out of their naturall prisons, offer themselues to all outrages, whereto the swift Currents and cold Windes will conduct them. Strange it is to see their greatnesse, some not lesse then halfe a mile about, and fourescore fathomes aboue water, besides the vnkowne depth beneath: strange the multitude; strange the deformed shapes: if this be not more strange, that they sometimes saue with killing, and suffer men to moore their Anchors on them, and to get vpon them to worke against them, for the safegard of their Ships: That bloody enemies should entertaine them with disports, to walke, leape, shout, fortie miles from any Land, without any Vessell vnder them (according to M. Bess's Riddle) and a hundred and ten miles from Land should present them with running streames of fresh Waters, able to driue a Mill. The Floud was there nine houres, the Ebbe but three. A strong Current ranne Westwards. The people resemble much the Tatars, or rather the Samoeds, in apparrell, and manner of liuing. It is colder here in 62. then 9. or 10. degrees more Northerly toward the North-east, which (it seemeth) comes to passe by the Windes, East, and North-east, which from the Ice bring so intollerable a cold. The people are excellent Archers; a thing generall throughout America. Besides Seales skinnies, they vse the skinnies of Deere, Beares, Foxes, and Hares, for Apparrel, and the cases also of Fowles sowed together. They weare in Summer the hairy side outward; in Winter, inward; or else goe naked. They shoot at the Fish with their darts. They kindle fire with rubbing one sticke against another. They vse great blacke Dogges, like Wolues, to draw their Sleds, and a lesse kind to eat. They haue very thin beards. In the best of Summer they haue Haile and Snow (sometimes a foot deepe, which freezeth as it fallies) and the ground frozen three fathome deepe. They haue great store of Fowle, whereof our men killed in one day fifteene hundred. They haue thicker skins, and are thicker of Downe and Feathers then with vs, and therefore must be stayed. The Sunne was not absent about three houres and a halfe; all which space it was very light, of that they might see to write and read.

Hence is it, that those parts neere (and perhaps vnder) the Pole are habitable: the continuance continuance of the Sunnes presence in their Summer, heating and warming with lively cherishment all Creatures: and in the Winter, by his oblique motion, leauing so long a twy-light; and the increased light * of the Moone, the Sunnes great and diligent Lieutenant, the brightnesse of the Stars and whitenesse of the snow, not suffering them to be quite forlorne in darknesse. The beasts, fowles, and fishes, which these men kill, are their houses, bedding, meat, drinke, hose, thread, shooes, apparell, and sailes, and boats, and almost all their riches. Besides their eating all things raw, they will eat grasse and shrubs like our kine: and morsels of Ice, to satisfie thirst. They haue no hurtfull creeping things but Spiders; and a kinde of Gnat is there very troublesome. Timber they haue none growing, but as the vndermining water doth supplant and bring them from other places. They are great Inchanters. When their headsake, they tie a great stone with a string into a sticke, and with certaine words effect, that the stone with all a mans force will not be lifted vp, and sometimes seemes as light as a feather, hoping thereby to haue helpe. They made signes, lying groueling with their faces vpon the ground, making a noyse downward, that they worship the Diuell vnder them. There is no flesh or fish which they finde dead (smell it neuer so filthily) but they will eate it, without any other dressing. Their Deere haue skinnies like Asses, and feet lerge, like Oxen, which were measured seuen or eight inches in breadth, There are no Riuers or running Springs, but such as the Sunne causeth to come of snow. Sometimes they will perboile their meat a litle, in kettles made of beasts skins, with the bloud and water which they drinke; and lick the bloody knife with their tongues: This licking is the medicine also for their wounds. They seeme to haue trafficke with other Nations: from whom they haue a smal quantity of Iron. Their fire they make of Heath and Mosse. In their leather boates they row with one oare faster, then we can in our boates with all our oares.

Master John Davis in the yeere 1585. made his first voyage for this North-west Discovery, and in sixty foure degrees, and fiftene minutes, they came on shore on an Island, where they had sight of the Sauages, which seemed to worship the Sunne. For pointing vp to the Sun with their hands, they would strike their breasts hard with their hands: which being answered with like action of the English, was taken for a confirmed league and they became very familiar. They first leaped and danced with a kind of Timbrel, which they stricke with a sticke. Their apparell was of beasts and birds skins, buskins, hose, gloues, &c. Some leather they had which was dressed like the Glouers leather. The sixt of August they discouered land in 66. 40. They killed white Beares, one of whose fore-feet were foureteene inches broad, so fat that they were forced to cast it away. It seemed they fed on the grasse, by their dung, which was like to Horse-dung. they heard Dogges howle on the shore, which were tame: They killed one with a collar about his necke: he had a bone in his pisse; these it seemed were vsed to the sled, for they found two sleds.

The next yeere he made his second voyage, wherein he found the Sauage people tractable. They are great Idolsters, and Witches. They haue many Images which they weare about them, and in their Boates. They found a graue, wherein were many buried couered with Seales skinnies, and a Crosse laid ouer them. One of them made a fire of Turfs, kindled with the motion of a sticke in a peece of a boord, which had a hole half thorow, into which he put many things, with diuers words and strange gestures: our men supposed it to be a sacrifice. They would haue had one of the English to stand in the smoke, which themselves were bidden to doe, and would not by any meanes; whereupon one of them was thrust in, and the fire put out by our men. They are very therruist, They eat raw Fish, grasse and Ice: and drinke salt-water. Heere they saw a whistle-winde take vp the water in great quantity, furiously mounting it vp into the aire, three houres together with little intermission. They found in 63. deg. 8. min. a strange quantitie of Ice in one entire masse, so bigge, that they knew not the limits thereof, very high, in forme of land, with Bayes and Capes like high-cliffe-land; they sent their Pinnesse to discouer it, which returned with information, that it was onely Ice. This was the seuteenth of Iuly, 1586. and they coasted it till the thirtieth of Iuly. In 66. deg. 33. min. they found it very hot, and were much troubled with a stinging Flie, called Muskito. All the Lands they saw seemed to be broken, and llands; which they coasted coasted Southwards, till they were in foure and fiftie and a halfe, and there found hope of a passage. In the same voyage he had sent the Sun-shine from him in 60. degr. which went to Island, and on the seventh of Iuly had sight of Gronland, and were hindered from harbour by the ice. They coasted it till the last of Iuly. Their houses neere the Sea-side were made with peeces of wood, crossed ouer with poles, and couered with earth. Our men plaied at foot-ball with them of the Iland.

John Davis in his Hydrographical description.

The third voyage was performed the next yeere, 1587. wherein Master Davis disco- uered to the 73. degree, finding the Sea all open, and forty leagues betweene land and land, hauing Groenland ( which hath an Iland neere it on the West, for the lothsome view of the shore couered with snow, without wood, earth, or grasse to be scene, and the irksome noise of the Ice called Defolation ) in 59. on the East, and America on the West. The Spanish Fleete, and the vntimely death of Master Secretary Walsingham, (the Epitome and summrie of Humane worthinesse) hindered the prosecution of these tended Discoueries.

M. Hak. hath many written by Cor. Jorius Poole, Cherry
Iland in 74.
Some say 74½.

I might here adde diuers Voyages to Cherry Iland, where they haue thousands of Morfes, the Teeth and Oyle whereof yeelde them no small commodity. There also are many Beares. They killed one whose skin was 13. foote long. I might here recreate your wearied eyes with a hunting spectacle of the greatest chase which Nature yeeldeth, I meane the killing of the Whale. When they espy him on the top of the water, ( which some say he is forced to for to take breath ) they row toward him in a Shallop, in which the Harponier stands ready, with both his hands to dart his Harping-iron, to which is fastened a line of such length, that the Whale ( which suddenly, feeling himselfe hurt, sinketh to the bottom ) may carrie it downe with him, being before fitted, that the Shallop be not therewith indangered; comming vp againe they againe strike him, holding him in such persuit, till after streames of water, and next that of blood, cast vp into the Aire and water (as angry with both Elements, which haue brought thither such weak hands to his destruction) hee at last yeeldeth his slaine carkasse as meed to the conquerours. They row him to the Ship with two or three Shallops made fast to one another: and then floating at the sterne of the Ship, they cut the blubber or fat from the flesh, in peeces three or foure foote long, which after at shore are cut smaller, and boyled in coppers: which done they take them out and put them into wicker baskets, which are set in Shallops halfe ful of water, into which the Oile runneth, and is thence put into buttes. This Whale-fishing is yeerely now vsed by our men in Greene-land, with great profit. The ordinary length of a Whale is sixtie foote, and not so huge as Olau hath written, who maketh the Mors also as bigge as an Elephant. But let vs now returne to our Discoueries.

G. Weymouth.

In the yeere 1602. Captaine George Weymouth made a voyage of Discouery to the North-west, with two Flie-boats, set forth by the Muscouie Company; saw the South part of Gronland, and had water in 120. fadome, blacke, as thicke as puddle, and in a little space cleere, with many such enterchanges. The breach of the Ice made a noise as a thunder clap, & ouerturning had sunke both their Vessels, if they had not with great diligence preuented it. They had store of Foggies, some freezing as they fell. In 68. 53. they encountred an Inlet 40. leagues broad, and sailed West and by South in the same 100. leagues.

James Hall his
4. voyage to Groenland.

This Gronland is Westward from Greenland 150 leagues. In Greenland are no people nor wood.

James Hall An. 1605. sailed to Groenland from Denmarke, and had like encounters of Ice, yeelding in the breach no lesse noise then if fiue Canons had beene discharged: with people also like those, which in Frobishers voyage are mentioned; they make sailes of guttes sowed together, for their fishing Boates, and deceiue the Seales with Sealeskinne garments. Groenland is high, mountainous, full of broken Ilands alongst the Coasts, Riuers nauigable, and good Bayes, full of fish. Betweene the Mountaines are pleasant plaines and vallies, such as a man would scarce beleue. He saw store of Fowles; no beasts but blacke Foxes, and Deere. The people seemed a kinde of Samoydes, wandering in Summer by companies for Hunting and Fishing, and remouing from place to place with their Tents and Baggage: they are of reasonable stature, browne, active, warlike, eate raw meate, or a little perboiled with bloud, Oile, or a little water which they drinke: their apparel, beasts or fowles skinned; the hairy or feathered side outward in Summer, in Winter inward : their arrowes and darts with two feathers, and a bone-head : they haue no wood but drift : they worship the Sun.

Anno 1606. He made a second voyage thither : found their Winter houses built with Whales bones, couered with Earth : and Vaults two yards deepe, vnder the Earth, square. They call Greenland in their language Secanunga. Vp within the Land they haue a King carried on mens shoulders. The next yeere he sailed thither the third time : \* and in a fourth voyage \* 1612. was slaine there by a Saunge, in reueng as was thought for some of the people before shipped from thence. They haue Hares white as snow, with long furre : Dogges which liue on fish, whose pisse, as also of their Foxes, are bone. Their Summer worke is to dry their Fish on the Rockes. Euery one both man and woman, haue each of them a Boate, made with long peeces of Firre couered with Seales skinnies, sowed with sinewes or guts, about 30. foote long, and two  $\frac{1}{2}$  broad, like a shuttle; so light, that one may carry many of them at once; so swift, that no Ship is able with any winde to hold way with them, and yet yse but one oare which they hold by the middle, in the middest of their Boat, broad at both ends, wherewith they row forwards and backwards at pleasure. Generally they worship the Sunne, to which they pointed at our approach (saith Baffin) striking on their breasts, and crying Ilyout, not comming neere till you doe the same. They bury in out-lands on the tops of hills in heapes of stones to preserue from the Foxes, making another graue hard by, wherein they place his Bow and Arrowes, Darts, and other his vtensils. They bury them in their apparrell, and the cold keepes them from putrefaction.

In the Greenland voyage 1611. from Cherry land toward Greenland, they met with a banke of Ice 40. leagues long : and ran alongst another 120. leagues. One place they named Smiths Tower in 77. lat. and 34. long. Crosse rode in 79. 23. Sailing further they met with Ice, snow, windes and a high sea. They lost the Ships Elizabeth and Mary Margaret. At their first comming, all was couered with snow, at their departure the tops of the hills and plaines had receiued a new liuery of greene mossie, and a little grasse. The Aire was mistie like night. They found many fat Deere, many white Beares, with white, gray, and dunne Foxes. There was a bird called an Allen, which beats the other birds till they vomit their pray for him to deuoure : and then dismissh them with little meate in their bellies or feathers on their backs. They find Morfes, Sea-vnicornes hornes, white Partriches, Wilde-geesse, but not a bush or tree.

Anno 1606 Mr. John Knights made a North-west voyage, lost his Ship, sunke with her, and was with three more of his company surprisid by the Sauages : of whose language he wrot a pritty Dictionary, which I haue seene with Mr. Hakluyt.

Henry Hudson, 1607. discouered further North toward the Pole, then perhaps any before him. He found himselfe in 80. deg. 23. where they felt it hot, and dranke water to coole their thirst. They saw land to 82. and further : on the shore they had snow, Morfes teeth, Deeres hornes, Whale-bones, and footing of other beasts, with a streame of fresh water. The next yeere 1608. he set forth on a Discouery to the North-east, at which time they met, as both himselfe and Inet haue testified, a Marmaid in the Sea, seen by Thomas Hills and Robert Rainer. Another voyage he made 1609, and coasted Newfoundland, and thence along to Cap Cod. His last and fatall voyage was 1610. which I mentioned in my former edition, relating the same as Hesselius Gerardus had guided me, by his card & reports, who affirmeth that he followed the way which Captain Winwood had before searched by Lumleys inlet, in 61. deg. so passing thorow the strait to 50. &c. But hauing since met with better instructions, both by the help of my painful friend Mr. Hakluyt, * (to whose labours these of mine are so much indetted) and specially from him, who was a speciall setter forth of the voyage; that, learned and industrious Gentleman, Sir Dudley Digges (how willingly could I here loose my selfe in a parenthesis of his due praises? to whom these studies haue seemed to descend by inheritance in diuerse descents, improved by proper industrie, employed to publike good both at home and in Discoueries and Plantations abroad, & for my particular, but why should I vse words, vnequall pay to him, vnequall stay to thee?) from him I lay, so great a furtherer of the North-west Discouerie, and of your Discouerer the poore Pilgrim and his Pilgrimage, hauing receiued full relations, I haue bene bold with the Reader to insert this Voyage more largely.

on the Western side of Fretum Danis, any passage might be found to the other Ocean

they plied North-west among Ilands of Ice, whereon they might run and play, and filled sweete water out of Ponds therein: some of them aground in fixe or seuen score fadome

Inlets aboue mentioned, the depth whereof and plying forward of the Ice, made Hud- son hope it would prouoe a through-fare. After he had sailed herein by his computation 300. leagues West, he came to a small strait of two leagues ouer and very deepe water, through which he passed betweene two Headlands, which he called, that on the South, Cape Wostenholme, the other to the N. W. Digges Island in deg. ( ) into a spacious Sea, wherein he sayled about 100. leagues South, confidently proud that he had won the passage.

A strange tree.

But finding at length by shole water that he was embayed, he was much distracted therewith, and committed many errors, especially in resolving to winter in that desolate place, in such want of necessary prouision. The third of November he moored his Barke in a small Cope, where they had all vndoubtedly perished, but that it pleased God to send them seuerall kinds of Fowle; they killed of white Patriches about 120. downie;
these left them at the Spring, and other succeeded in their place, Swan, Goose, Teale, Ducke, all easie to take; besides the blessing of a Tree, which in December blossomed, with leaues greene and yellow, of an aromaticall saour, and being boyled, yielded Oylie substance, which proued an excellent salve, and the decoction being drunke proued as wholesome a potion, whereby they were cured of the Scorbutie, Sciaticas, crampes, conuulsions, and other diseases which the cold-esse of the climate bred in them. At the opening of the yeare also, there came to his Ships side such abundance of Fish of all sorts, that they might therewith haue fraught themselues for their returne, if Hudson had not too desperately pursued the voyage, neglecting this opportunity of storing themselues with fish, which he committed to the care of certaine careless dissolute villaines, which in his absence conspired against him; in few dayes the fish all forsooke them. Once a Sausage visited them, who for a knife, glasse, and beads given him, retuned with Beuers skinnes, Deeres skins and a Sledde. At Hudsons returne, they set saile for England. But in few daies their victuals being almost spent, and he out of his despaire, letting fall some words of setting some on shore, the former conspirators (the chiefe wherof was Hen. Greens, none of their allowed company, but taken in by Hudson himselfe, and one Wilson) entered his Cabin in the night, and forced him the Mast together with his sonne Iohn Hudson, Tho. Widowes, Arn. Ludlo, Sidrach Faner, Ad. Moore, Hen.
King, Mic. Bute; to take the Shallop and seeke their fortune. But see what sincerity can doe in the most desperat trials: One Philop Staffe, an Ipswich man, who according to his name, had been a principall staffe and stay to the weaker and more enfeebled courages of his companions in the whole action lightning and enlightning their drooping darkened spirits with sparkes from his owne resolution; their best Puruey our with his peece on shore, and both a skilfull Carpenter and lusty Mariner on bord; when he could by no persuasions, seasoned with teares, diuert them from their diuellish designs, notwithstanding they intreated him to stay with them, yet chose rather to commit himselfe to Gods mercy in the forlorne Shallop, then with such villaines to accept of likelier hopes.

A few daies after, their victuals being spent, the Ship came aground at Digges Island, and so continued diuers howers, till a great flood (which they by this accident tooke first notice of) came from the Westward, and set them on flore. Vpon the Cliffes of this Island they found abundance of fowles tame, whereof they tooke two or three hundred, and seeing a great long boate with fourty or fifty Sauages vpon the shore, they sent on land, and for some of their toies had Deeres skinner well dressed, Morfe teeth, and some few furs. One of our men went on land to their Tents, one of theirs remayning for hostage, in which Tents they liued by hoords, men, women and children; they are bigge boned, broad-faced, flat-nosed, and small footed, like the Tartars: their apparell of skinner, but wrought all very handfomely, cuan gloues and shooes. The next morning Greene would needes goe on shore with some of his chiefe companions, and that vnarmed, notwithstanding some aduised and intreated him the contrary. The Sauages entertained him with a cunning ambush, and at the first onset shot this mutinous Ringleader into the heart where first those monsters of trechery and bloody cruelty, now paired with the like, had bene conceiued) and Wilson his brother in enill, had the like bloody inheritance, dying swearing, and cursing: Perse, Thomas, and Moter, died a few daies after of their wounds. Euery where can diuine iustice finde executioners.

The Boate by Gods blessing with some hurt men escaped in this manner. One Abacucke Pricket, (a seruant of Sir Dudley Digges, him whom the Mutiners had saued, in hope to procure his Mr. to worke their pardon) was left to keepe the Shallop, where he lay in a gowne, sicke and lame, at the stern: vpon whom, at the instant of the ambush, the leader of all the Sauages leapt from a Rocke, and with a strange kinde of weapon, *indented, broad and sharpe, of bright Steele, riueted into a handle of Morse tooth, gaue him diuerse cruell wounds, before he could from vnder his gowne draw a small Scottish-dagger, wherewith at one thrust into his side, he killed this Sauage, and brought him off with the boate and some of the hurt company that got to him by swimming. Being got a bord with a small weake and wounded company, they made from this Island into the Northern Continent, where they saw a large opening of the sea North-westward, and had a great flood, with such a large billow, as they say is no where but in the Ocean. From hence they made all possible hast home wards, passing the whole straites, and so home without euer striking faile or any other let, which might easily haue made it impossible. For their best sustenance left them, was Sea-weedes fried with Candies ends, and the skins of the fowles they had eaten. Some of their men were starued, the rest all so weake, that onely one could lie along vpon the Helm and sterre. By Gods great goodnesse the sixt of Septe, 1611. they met with a Fisher-man of Foy, by whose means they came safe into England.

This Newes so encouraged the Aduenturers, that by the gracious assistance of that Starre of the North, (illustrious Sonne of Britaines brightest Sunne, and in his presence shining with beauteous beames in this, and euen to that further Hemispheir, but with speedier setting, raised aboue the Sun, and Spheres, and Stars, to discover the Straights and passage to a better World, there to shine with light vspeakable, in the fruition of that light inaccessible with the Father of Lights and Sunne of Righteousnesse: For how could a wordly kingdome, though the Kingdome of the World, deserue so good, so great a spirit to rule it? but these my words are to short an Epitaph, his owne name, euen after death, speakes more, and proclaimeth in a few letters all humane Greatnesse, Great Britaines great hope, Prince Henry) the Aduenturers I say (whom my weaker eyes, dazzled with this greater light, could scarce recover) by this Princely assistance, pursued the action in more royall fashion, with greater Shipping, vnder the command of a worthy Sea-man, seruant to Prince Henry, Captaine Thomas Button, whose Discouery of a great Continent, called by him New-Wales, and other accidents of his Voyage, I haue not ferne: but I heare that he passed Hudsons Straits, and leauing Hudsons Bay to the South, sailed about 200. leagues South-westward, ouer a Sea about 80. fadom deepe, without sight of land, which at length he found to be another great Bay. And after much misery of sicknesse in his Wintering, notwithstanding hee was forced to quit the great Shippe, he beat and searched the whole Bay, with very great industry, euen backe again almost to Digges Island: neere which hee found the comming in of the great and strong tide from the North-west, which feedes both those huge Bayes, and leaues great assurance of nothing now left, but a little sayling to the North-west, for the finding of that passage; or reason to looke no further for it.

c As Borderers are most vnru-ly and lawlesse so in these out-bor-derers of the world, the power of Na-tures greatest officers, the Sunne &c. is least seene.

For which the first Aduenturers to their great charge, are now setting out the third Voyage (which God prosper) this instant moneth of March 1614. in the good and luckie Ship called the Discovery; and some other, which are now employed in hope of perfecting that, to the glory of our Nation, which vndaunted spirits amongst vs with such cost and danger haue attempted, Resolute, gallant, glorious attempts, which thus seeke to tame Nature, where shee is most vnbridled, in those Northeasterly, Northwesterly, and Northerly borders (where she shewes her selfe a borderer indeed) and to subdue her to that Government and Subiection, which God our all blessed for ever, hath imposed on all sensible Creatures to the Nature of Man; resembling in one Image and a bridgement, both God and the World, consisting of a spirittuall and bodily, visible and inuisible subsistence. How shall I admire your valour and courage, yee Martine Worthies beyond all names of worthinesse, that neither dread to long, either presence or absence of the Sunne, nor those foggie mists, tempestuous windes, cold blasts, inowes and haile in the aire: nor the vnequall Seas, which might amaze the hearer, and amare the beholder, where the Tritons and Neptunes selfe would quake with chilling feare, to behold such monstrous Icie Islands, renting themselves with terrour of their owne massines, and disdayning otherwise, both the Seas souerainety, and the Sunnes hottest violence, suffering themselves in those watery plaines, where they hold a continuall ciuill war, and rushing one vpon another, make windes and waues giue backe, seeming to rent the eares of others, while they rent themselves with crashing and splitting their congealed armours: nor the rigid ragged face of the broken lands, sometimes trowing themselves in a lofty height, to see if they can finde refuge from those snowes and colds that continually beat them, sometimes hiding themselves vnder some hollow hills or cliffes, sometimes sinking and shrinking into valleyes, looking pale with snowes, and falling in frozen and dead swounes: sometimes breaking their neckes into the Sea, rather embracing the waters, then the aires, cruelty; and otherwhile with horrible Earth-quakes, in heat of Indignation shaking asunder, to shake off this cold and heauy yoke, Great God, to whom all names of greatness are little, and lesse then nothing, let me in silence admire and worship thy greatnesse, that in this little heart of man (not able to serue a Kite for a break-fast) hast placed such greatnesse of spirit, as the world is too little to fill; only thy selfe the Porototype and Samplar of this modell, canst of thine owne selfe, becomming all in all vnto vs, fill and more then satisfie. Thee I beseech, to prosper in this and like attempts, this Nation of ours, that as in greater light then to others, thou hast giuen vs thy Sonne, so with him thou wilt giue all things; euen this among other blessings, that thy Virgin Truth, by Virginian Plantation, or Northerly Discovery, may triumph in her conquests of Indian Infidelity, maugre the braggies of that Adulteresse, that vanteth her selfe to be the only Darling of God and Nature.

CHAP. IIII.

Of Newfound-Land, Noua Francia, Arambec, and other Countries of America, extending to Virginia.

Leauing those vknowne and frozen Lands and Seas, (although there is yet knowne no frozen Sea, otherwise then as you haue heard) let vs draw somewhat nearer the Sunne, gently marching, as the situation of Regions shall direct vs, lest if wee should suddenly leape from one extremity to another, wee should rather exchange then auoide danger. And heere wee haue by Land Saguenay, and many Countries of Canada, which the French haue stiled by a new name of New France : and by Sea the Ilands many in number, and much frequented for their plenty of fish, commonly called New-found-Land, which name some ascribe to an Isle, others to diuers Ilands, and broken Lands which the French call Bacallan, vpon the gulfie and entrance of the great Riuer called Saint Laurence, in Canada. This Riuer some<sup>b</sup> call the Strait of the three brethren, some<sup>c</sup> Saint Laurence, and others<sup>d</sup> Canada. It far exceedeth any Riuer of the elder World. It beginneth, saith Iaquis Cartier, beyond the Island of Assumption, ouer-against the high Mountaines of Honbuedo, and of the seven Ilands. The distance from one side to another, is about fife and thirtie, or forty leagues. In the middest it is about<sup>e</sup> two hundred fathome deepe. There are great flocks of Whales and Sea-horses. From the entrance vp to Hochelaga is three hundred leagues. Many Ilands are before it, offering of their good nature to be mediators betweene this haughty streame and the angry Ocean : many others all alongst his passage he holdeth in his louing vnlovely lap, washing and hugging them with his ruder embracings. The former are vsually frequented, and were first discovered by the English, the other by the French. Of Sebastian Cabot his proceeding this way is spoken already. Robert Thorne,<sup>f</sup> in a Treatise of his before mentioned, affirmeth that his father, and one Master Eliot were the Discoverers of the New-found-Lands : and exhorted King Henry to vndertake the search of the Indies by the Pole, which he held to be Navigable. Vpon this motion, 1527. the King sent two ships (as Hal and Grafton mention in their Chronicles) one of which ships was cast away about the North parts of New-found-Land, the other shaping her course towards Cap Briton, and the coasts of Arambec (or as some call it Norumbega) returned home. John Rut wrot a discourse hereof to the Honorable Kings Grace of England (that I may borrow his owne words) wherein he declareth their coasting and the height of some places, as Cap Bas, in 52. and 25. leagues thence Cap Ras, &c. They found there eleuen saile of Normans, one Briton, and two Portugall Barkes, fisting. Albertus de Prato, another of them, wrote another Iournal to Cardinall Wolsey. More tragicall was the successe<sup>h</sup> of Master Hores company, which set out nine yeares after in this Discouery, but by famine were brought to such extremities, that many of the company were murdered and eaten by their fellowes. And those which returned were so altered, that Sir William Butts, a Norfolk Knight, and his Lady, knew not their sonne M. Thomas Butts one of this starued number, but by a secret marke, namely a wart, which Nature had sealed on one of his knees. The commodities and qualities of New-found-land, are related<sup>i</sup> by M. Parkhurst, M. Haies, St. Geo. Peckham, Stephen Parmenius, Richard Clarke, M. Christopher Carle, all whose Discourses and experiments hereof, Mr. Hackluyts hath collected and bestowed on the World. The North-part is inhabited, the South is desert, although fitter for habitation. Besids the abundance of Cod, heere are Herrings, Salmones, Thornbacke, Oysters and Muskles, with Pearles, Smelts and Squids, which two sorts come on shore in great abundance, fleeing from the deuouring cod, out of the frying-pan into the fire. It is thought that there are Buffes, and certain, that there are Beares and Foxes, which before your face wil rob you of your Fish or Flesh. Before they come at New-found-Land by 50. leagues, they passe the Banke : so they cal certain high grounds, as a vaine of mountains, raising themselves vnder the water, about ten leagues in breadth, extending to the South infinitely on which is thirty fathome water, before and after two hundred. Sir Hum. Gilbert tooke possession therof, by vertue of her Maiesties Commission. Anno 1582. It is with-in-land a goodly Countrey, naturally beautified with Roses sown with Pease, planted with stately trees, and otherwise diuersified both for pleasure and profit. And now our English Nation doe there plant and fixe a settled habitation : a chiefe aſtour and Authour of which businesse is Master John Gwy of Bristow : who in the yeere 1608. Sayled from Bristow in three and twenty daies to Conception Bay* in New-found-Land. Of this Plantation and their Winterings, and continuance there I haue seene diuers Relations with Master Hackluyt, written by Master Gwy, William Colston, &c.

In the yeere 1611. In October and Nouember, they had scarcely fixe dayes frost or snow, which presently thawed, the rest of those Moneths being warmer and drier then in England : December was also faire, with some Frost, Snow, and Raine. The Winde in these three Moneths variable, from all parts.

part Frost to mid-March : the Winde most commonly Westerly, and sometimes from the North. The Sunne often visited them with warme and comfortable rayes, chasing away the Snow, and not suffering the Brookes to be frozen ouer three nights with Ice able to beare a Dogge. The Snow was neuer (except in drifts) aboue eightene inches deepe. They had there, * Filberds, Fish, Makerels, Foxes; in the Winter: Patriches, white in the Winter, in Summes somewhat like oures, but greater; they are much afraide of Rauens: They killed a Wolfe with a Mastiue and a Greyhound. Eastons piracies were some trouble to them.

Anno 1612. They found houses of Sauages, which were nothing but pooles set round and meeting in the top, ten foote broad, the fire in the midst, covered with Deeres skinner. They are of reasonable stature, beardless, and in conditions like to those which Sir Martin Frobisher discovered: broad faced, full eyed, coloured on their faces and apparell with red Oaker: Their Boats of barker, as in Canada, twentie foote long, foure and a halfe broad, not weighing a hundered weight, made in forme of a new Moone, which carrie foure men, & are by them caried to all places of their remouings. Their Patent was granted 1610. for Plantation between fourty fixe and fifty too to be gouerned by a Councell of twelue and a Treasurer. There Wintered 1612. fifty foure men, sixe women, and two children. They killed there, Beares, Otters, Sables: sowed Wheat, Ric, Turneps, Cole-worts. Their Winter till Aprill 1613. was dry, and cleere with some frost and snow. Diuerse had the Scuruy, whereto their Turneps, there sowne were an excellent remedie, no lesse then Cartiers tree hereafter mentioned. April was worse then the midst of Winter, by reason of East windes which came from the Ilands of Ice which the current bringeth at that time from the North.

Neere to New-found-land in 47. deg. is great killing of the Morfe or Sea-oxe. <sup>k</sup> In the Ile of Ramea, one small French Ship in a small time killed 1500. of them. They are great as Oxen, the hide dressed, is twice as thicke as a Bulles hide: It hath two teeth like Elephants, but shorter, about a foote long growing downe wards, and therefore lesse dangerous, dearer sold then Iuory, and by some reputed an Antidote, not inferiour to the Vnicornes horne. The yong ones are as good meat as Vcale. And with the bellies of fiue of the said fishes (if so we may call these Amphibia, which liue both on land and water) they make an Hogshead of traine Oile. Some of our English ships haue attempted this enterprise for the killing of the Morfe, but not al with like successe, nor with so good as reported of Cherry Iland. At Brions Iland is such abundance of Cods, that M. Leigh company with 4. hooks in little more then an houre, caught 200. & 50. of them. Neere to the same in the gulfes of S. Laurence, are 3. teamed Ilands of Birds: the soile is sandy red, but by reason of many birds on them they looke white. The birds fit as thicke, as stones lie in a Paved street; or to vse laques Cartier's comparison, as any field or Meadow is of grasse. Two of these Ilands are steepe and vpriight as any wall, that it is not possible to climbe them. On the other which is in 49. de. 40. min. and about a league in circuit, they killed, and filled two boates <sup>m</sup> in lesse then halfe an houre. Besides them which they did eat fresh, euery ship did powder 5. or 6. barreles of them. There are an hundred fold as many houering about, as within the Iland. Some are as big as Iayes, blacke and white with beakes like vnto crows: their wings are no bigger then halfe ones hand, and therefore they cannot flie high; yet are they as swift neere the water, as other birds. They are very fat: these they called Aponatz, a lesser kinde which there aboundeth, they named Godetz: A bigger, and white, which bite like dogs, they termed Margaulx. Although it be fourteene leagues from the maine, yet Beares swim thither to feast with these birds. One they saw as great as a Cow, saith Cartier, and as white as a Swan, which they did kill and eat, and the flesh was as good as of a two-yere-old Calf. About the Port of Brest, they found so many Islets, as they were impossible to number, continuing a great space.

The Iland of Assumption, <sup>a</sup> by the Sauages called Natscotec, standeth in 49. deg. The Sauages dwell in houses made of Fir-trees, bound together in the top, and set round like a Doue-house. This, as before is said, is at the entry of the Riuer into the gulfes of S. Laurence. The bankes of this Riuer are inhabited of people that worship the Diuel and sometimes sacrifice to him their owne blood. <sup>o</sup> Francis the first, King of France, sent thither James Berton; and Henry his sonne, Nicolas Villagnon: but the greater riches they found, were were the Diamonds of Canada, and those of small value for their britlenesse. Thus Boterus, Jaques & Cartier made three voyages into these parts. First in the yeare 1534. p Jaq. Car. 1. Then was hee gladly welcomed of the Sauages, singing, dancing, and expressing other signes of ioy, as rubbing his armes with their hands, and then lifting him vp to heaven, giuing all to their naked skinne (though all were worse then nothing) for the trifles hee gaue them. They went naked, sauing their priuities which were couered with a skinne, and certaine old skinnes they cast vpon them. Some they saw, whose heads were altogether shauen, except one bush of haire which they suffer to grow vpon the top of their crowne, as long as a horse taile, and tyed vp with leather-strings in a knot. They haue no dwelling but their boats, which they turne vpside downe, and vnder them lay themselues along on the bare ground. They eat their flesh and fish almost raw, only a little heated on the coales. The next yeare Capitaine Cartier returned, and carried back two Sauages, which hee before had carried into France to learne the language. Hee then passed vp to Hochelaga <sup>r</sup>. They found Rats which liued in the water, as bigge as Conies, and were very good meat. Hochelaga is a Citie round, compassed about with Timber, with three course of Rampiers one within another, framed sharpe, about two rods high. It hath but one gate, which is shut with piles and barres. There are in it about fiftie great houses, and in the midst of euery one a Court, in the middle whereof they make their fire. Before they came there, they were forced to leaue their boats behinde, because of certaine falls, and heard that there were three more higher vp the streame, towards Sanguenay, which in his <sup>t</sup> third Voyage were discovered. q Jaq. Car. 2.

Concerning the Religion in these parts of Canada, euen amongst the Sauages wee finde some Tracts and foot-prints thereof, which neither the dreadfull Winters haue quite frozen to death, nor these great and deepe waters haue wholly drowned, but that some shadow thereof appeareth in these shadowes of men, howsoeuer wilde and sauage, like to them which giue her entertainment. This people beleeueth, saith Jaques Cartier, in one which they call Cudrnaigni, who, say they, often speakes to them, and tells them what weather will follow, whether good or bad. Moreouer, when he is angrie with them, hee casts dust into their eyes. They beleue that when they die, they goe into the Starres, and thence by little and little descend downe into the Horizon, euen as the Starres doe, after which they goe into certaine greene fields, full of goodly, faire, and precious trees, flowers, and fruits. The Frenchmen told them Cudrnaigni was a Diuell, and acquainted them with some mysteries of the Christian Religion, wherupon they condescended and desired baptisme; the French excused, and promised after to bring Priests for that purpose. They liue in common together, and of such commodities as their country yeeldeth they are well stored. They wed two or three wiues a man, which, their husbands being dead, neuer marrie againe, but for their widdowes liuery weare a black weed all the daies of their life, besmearing their faces with cole-dust and grease mingled together, as thick as the back of a knife. They haue a filthy and detestable vse in marrying their Maidens, first putting them (being once of lawfull age to marrie) in a common place, as Harlots, free for euery man that will haue to doe with them, vntill such time as they finde a match. I haue seen houses as full of such prostitutes, as the schooles in France are full of children. They there vse much mis-rule, riot, & wantonnes. t Jaq. Car. 2.
sep. 10.

They dig their ground with certaine peeces of wood, as big as halfe a sword, where they sow their Maiz. The men also doe much vse Tobacco. The women labour more then the men in fishing and husbandrie. They are more hardie then the beasts, & would come to our ships starke naked, going vpon Snow and Ice, in which season they take great store of beasts, Stags, Beares, Martens, Hares, and Foxes, whose flesh they eat raw, hauing first dried it in the Sunne or smoke, and so they doe their fish. They haue also Otters, Weasils, Beauers, Badgers, Conies: fowle and fish great varietie: and one fish, called Adborhuir, whose body and head is like to a Grey-hound, white as snow. Their greatest iewell is chaines of Esurgnie, which are shell-fishes, exceeding white, which they take on this manner. When a captiue or other man is condemned to death, they kill him, and then cut slashes in his most fleshie parts, and hurle him into the River Cornibots, Cornibots, whence after twelue houres they draw him, finding in those cuts these Esurgnie, whereof they make beades and chaines. They are excellent for stanching of blood. Thus much out of Cartier. In the yeare 1542. y Monsieur Roberual was sent to inhabit those parts. He saith that he built a Fort faire and strong: the people haue no certaine dwelling place, but goe from place to place, as they may finde best food, carrying all their goods with them.

The straits mouth from Cape Ray to the Cape of S. Laurence, within the gulfes of Canada, is eightene leagues. He obserued a feast made by Anadabijon the great Sagamo, in his Cabin: in which eight or ten Kettles of meat were set on seuerall fires, sixe paces asunder. The men sate on both sides of the roome, each hauing a dish made of the barke of a tree: one appointed to diuide to euery man his portion. Before the meat was boiled, one tooke his dogge, and danced about the Kettles from one to another, and when he came before the Sagamo, cast downe his dogge: and then succeeded another in the like exercise. After their feast, they danced with the heads of their enemies in their hands, some singing. Their Canoas are of the barke of birch, strengthened within with little circles of wood, eight or nine paces long, fit for actiue and passiue carriage. Their Cabins are low, like tents, couered with the said barke, the roofe open, a foot space vncovered to let in light, with many fires in the middest; ten households, sometimes together: they lie vpon skinneres one by another, and their dogs with them.

After a certaine feast, the Algo-mequins (one of these three Nations in league) went out apart, and caused all their women and maides to sit in ranks, themselues standing behinde singing: suddenly all the women and maides cast off their mantles of skinneres and stripped themselues naked, not ashamed of their shame, keeping on still their Matichia (which are b Pater nosters and chaines, enterlaced made of the haire of the Porke-picke died of diuers colours). Their songs ended, they cried with one voice, Ho, ho, ho, and then couered themselues with their mantles which lay at their feet, and after a while renewed their former songs, and nakednesse. Their Sagamo sate before the Virgins and women, betweene two staues, whereon were hanged those enemies heads; and he exhorted the Montainers and Eschemains to the like significations of ioy: which then cried altogether, ho, ho, ho. When he was returned to his place, the great Sagamo and all his companie cast off their mantles, their priuities only remaining couered with a little skinne: and tooke each what they thought good, as Matichias, Hatchets, Swords, Kettles, Flesh, &c. which they presented to the Algo-mequins. After this two of each Nation contended in running, and the best runners were rewarded with presents.

Their customs

They are well set, of tawnie or oliue colour by reason of their paintings: they are liars, giuen to reuenge, without law. When a maide is fourteene or fifteene yeares old, shee hath many lovers, and vseth carnall filthinesse with whom shee pleaseth, so continuing siue or sixe yeares: and then takes whom shee likes for her husband, liuing with him chastly all her life after, except for barrennesse he forsake her. The husband is iea-lous, and giues presents to her parents. When one dies, they make a pit, and therein put all his goods with the corpe, couering the same with earth, and setting ouer it many peeces of wood, with one stake painted red and set vp on end. They beleue the im-mortalitie of the soule, and that the dead goe into farre Countries to make merrie with their friends.

c M. Champlain.

Monsieur Champlain discoursed with certaine Sauages yet liuing, of whom hee learned touching their Religion, that they beleue in one God, who hath created all all things: that after God had made all things, he tooke a number of Arrowes, and did sticke them into the ground, from whence men and women sprung vp, which haue multiplied euer since. Touching the Trinitie, being asked, a Sagamos or Gouvernour answered, <sup>b</sup> There was one only God, one Sonne, one Mother, and the Sunne, which were foure Notwithstanding, <sup>c</sup> that God was ouer and aboue all: the Sonne was good, and the Sunne also: but the Mother was naught and did eat them, and that the Father was not very good. Being asked, if they or their auncestors had heard that God was come into the World: Hee said that hee had not seene him; but that anciently there were fve men, who traueilling toward the setting of the Sunne, met with God, who demanded of them, whither goe yee? They answered wee goe to seeke for our liuing. God said, You shall finde it heere: But they not regarding, passed further: and then God with a stone touched two of them, who were turned into stones. And hee said againe to the three other, whither goe yee? they answered, and he replied as at first: they yet passing further he tooke two staues, and touched therewith the two formost, and transformed them into staues. Asking the third man whither hee went, hee said to seeke his liuing: whereupon he bad him tarrie, and hee did so, and God gaue him meate, and he did eat: and after he had made good cheare, he returned among the other Sauages, and tolde them all this tale. This Sagamos also tolde, that at another time there was a man which had store of Tabacco, and God came and asked him for his pipe, which the man gaue him, and he dranke much of it, and then brake the pipe. The man was offended hereat, because he had no more pipes, but God gaue him one, and bad him carrie it to his Sagamos, with warning to keepe it well, and then he should want nothing, nor any of his. Since, the said Sagamos lost the pipe, and found famine and other distresse: this seemeth to be the cause, why they say God is not very good. Being demanded what Ceremonie they vsed in praying to their God, hee said that they vsed no Ceremonie, but euery one did pray in his heart, as he would. They haue among them some Sauages, whom they call Pilotona, who speake visibly to the Diuell, and hee tels them what they must doe, as well for warre, as for other things. And if he should command them to put any enterprife in execution, or to kill a man, that they would doe it immediately. They beleue also that all their dreames are true. So farre Champlein.

In the yeare 1604. Monsieur de Monts (according to a Patent granted him the yeare before, for the inhabiting of Cadia, Canada, and other parts of New France, from the fortieth degree to the sixe and fortieth) rigged two ships, and bare with those parts that trend Westward from Cape Breton, giuing names to places at pleasure, or vpon occasion. One Port was named Saualet of a French Capitaine, who was there a fishing, and had made this his two and fortieth voiage hither: an other was named of Rossignol, whose ship was confiscated for trading there with the Sauages (a poore prelerment, to leaue name to a Port by his miserie) another was named Port Moutton, and within a great Bay, they named another Port-Royall, where after they fortified. The Inhabitants of these parts were termed Souriquous. From them Westward are the people called Etechemins, where the next Port, after you are passed the Riuer of S. Iohn, is Saint Croix, where they erected a Fort, and wintered. Threescore leagues West from thence is the Riuer Kinibeki: and from thence the Land trendeth North and South to Malaharre. Authors place in that former extension of Land betwixt East and West, a great Towne and faire Riuer, called Norombega, by the Sauages called Agguncia. These French Discoverers vterly denie this Historie, affirming that there are but Cabans here and there made with perkes, and couered with barkes of trees, or with skins: and both the Riuer and inhabited place is called Pemtegoet, and not Agguncia. And there can be no great Riuer (as they affirme) because the great Riuer Canada hath (like an insatiable Merchant) engrossed all these water-commodities, so that other streames are in manner but meere pedlers.

The Armonchiquois are a traiterous and theutish people, next vnnighbourly neighbours to the Etechemins: they are light-footed and lime fingered, as swift in running away with their stolen prey, as the Grey-hound in pursuing it. Champlein testifieth that the Armonchiquois are deformed, with little heads, short bodies, armes small like a bone, as are their thighs also; their legges great and long and disproportioned with

earbut.

Monsieur du Point arriued in those parts in the yeare a thousand sixe hundred and fine and du Monts remoued the French Habitation to the Port Royall. Monsieur du Pourtrincourt sayled thither in the yeare a thousand sixe hundred and six, and with him the Authour of the Booke called Noua Francia<sup>a</sup>, who hath written of the Rites and Customes of these Countries. He sayth, that the Armonchiquis are a great people, but haue no adoration. They are vicious and bloudie. Both they and the Soniquois haue the industrie of painting and caruing, and doe make pictures of Birds, Beasts, and Men, both in stone and wood, as well as the workmen in these parts. They, as is said, ascribe not diuine worship to any thing: but yet acknowledge some spirituall and inuisible power. I know not by what Diuine Iustice, and Iniustice of the Deuill, it comes to passe, that God hath giuen some men vp so farre vnto the Deuils tyrannie, that he hath banished out of their hearts the knowledge and worship of the true God: and yet the nature of man cannot bee without apprehension of some greater, and more excellent Nature, and rather then want all Religion, they will haue a Religious-irreligious commerce with the Deuill. Yea, the more all knowledge of God is banished, the baser seruice doe men, in doing and suffering, yeeld to the Deuill: as (to leaue other parts to their owne places) it falleth out in these Regions. The Prince and greatest Commander of men among them, seemes by this meanes to bee the Deuils Vicegerent, and by wisely and deuillish practises to vp-hold his owne greatnesse. So it was with Sagamos Memberton: if any bodie were sicke hee was sent for, hee made inuocations on the Deuill, hee bloweth vpon the partie grieved, maketh incision sucketh the blood from it: (a practise vsed in very many Countries of the Continent and Ilands of America) if it bee a wound hee healeth it after the same manner, applying a round slice of Beauers stones. Some present is therefore made to him, of Venison or skionnes.

If it be a question to haue newes of things absent, hauing first questioned with his spirit, hee rendreth his Oracle, commonly doubtfull, very often false, and sometimes true. He rendred a true Oracle of the coming of Pontrincourt to du Pont, saying, his Deuill had tolde him so.

When the Sauages are hungrie, they consult with Membertons Oracle, and hee telleth them the place whither they shall goe: and if there bee no game found, the excuse is, that the Beast hath wandered and changed place: but very often they finde. And this makes them beleue that the Deuill is a God, and know none other, although they yeeld him no adoration. When these Aoutmoins (so they call these Wisards) consult with the Deuill, they fixe a staffe in a pit, to which they tye a Cord, and putting their head into the pit, make inuocations or coniuurations, in a language vnkowne to the others that are about, and this with beatings and howlings vntill they sweat with paine. When this Deuill is come, the Master Aoutmain makes them beleue that hee holds him tied by his cord, and holdeth fast against him, forcing him to giue him an answer, before hee let him goe. That done, hee beginneth to sing something in the prayes (as it seemeth) of the Deuill, that hath discouered some game vnto them, and the other Sauages that are there make answer with some concordance of musike among them. Then they daunce with songs in another, not vulgar, language: after which, they make a fire and leape ouer it, and put halfe a pole out of the top of the Cabin, where they are with some thing tyed thereto, which the Deuill carrieth away.

Memberton carried at his necke the marke of his profession, which was a purse, triangle wise couered with their imbrodered worke, within which there was somewhat as big as a Nut, which he said was his Deuill, called Aoutem. This function is successeful, and by tradition they teach their eldest sonnes the mysterie of this iniquitie. Euerie <sup>b</sup>Sagamos eyther is, or hath his Aoutmain.

b Sagamos signifies a King, or Ruler.

The men and women weare their blacke haire long, hanging loose over the shoulder, wherein the men sticke a feather, the women a bodkin. They are much troubled with a stinging flye, for preuention whereof they rub themselues with certaine kind of

of grease and oyles. They paint their faces with blew or redde, but not their bodies.

For their marriages, they are contracted with the consent of Parents, who will not give their Daughters in marriage to any except he bee a good hunter. The women are said to be chaste, and the contrarie. seldome found; and though the husband hath manie wives, yet is there no ieaousie among them. The widowes here, if their husbands be killed, will not marrie againe, nor eate flesh, till their death be reuenged. Otherwise they make no great difficultie (which Cartier reporteth of Canada) to marrie againe if they finde a fit match. Sometimes the Sauages hauing many wiues will giue one to their friend, if he likes her so to disburthen themselves. The women eat not with the men in their meetings, but a-part. When they make feasts they end them with dances all in a round, to which one singeth; at the end of euery song all make a loud and long exclamation: and to bee the more nimble, they strip themselves starke naked. If they haue any of their enemies heads or armes, they will carrie them (as a iewell) about their necks whiles they dance, sometimes byting the same.

After their feasts they wil dyet themselves, liuing sometimes eight dayes more or lesse with the smoke of Tabacco. They are in nothing laborious but in hunting. They sow but so much as will serue them for six moneths and that very hardly during the Winter they retire, three or foure moneths space, into the woods, and there liue on Acornes, Fish, and Venison. They wash not themselves at meales, except they be monstrous foule, and then wipe on their owne or their Dogges haire. Their entertainment is with smal complement: the guest sits downe by his Host, if it be the King, takes Tabacco, and then giues the pipe to him that he thinkes the worthiest person in the companie. They are dutifull to their Parents, obey their commandements, and nourish their persons in age. They vse humanitie to the wiues and children of their conquered enemies but the men of defence they kill. Their chiefe hunting is in Winter; they carrie alwayes tinder-boxes with them, to strike fire when hunting, is done, or night takes them. For they follow the game sometimes three dayes together.

Their Dogges are like Foxes, which spend not, neuer giue ouer, and haue rackets tyed vnder their feet, the better to runne on the snow. They seeth the flesh in a Tubbe of wood, by putting stones heated red hot therein. The womens durie is to slay the Beast and bring it home. The Ellan, Deare, Stagge, and Beare, are their game. They take also with their hands Beuers, which are of a chest-nut colour, short legged, his forefeet haue open claws, the hinder, finnes like a Goose, the tayle skaled almost of the forme of a Sole-fish: it is the delicatest part of the beast. The head is short and round, with two rankes of iawes at the sides; and before foure great teeth (two aboue and two beneath) with which he cuts downe small trees. Hee builds on the brinkes of a Lake, cuts his wood, therewith rayseth a Vault; and because the waters sometimes rise he hath an vpper storie to betake himself to in such case: he builds it Pyramide-wise, sometimes eight foot high, and daubes it with mud. He keeps his tayle still in the water. They take him with their hands in a frost, one fraying him on the Ice; whiles another seizeth on his neck. When one dies, they mourne for him long, euery cabin his day by course: after that, they burne all his goods, and burie the bodie in a graue: where when they haue placed him, euery one maketh a present of the best thing hee hath: as skins to couer him, bowes, kniues, or the like.

Quebec is a strait of Canada, where is a goodly Countrie furnished with Okes, Cypresses, wilde Vines, Peares, Nuts, Cherries, Goose-berries, Diamonds, in the Rockes of Slate and other profitable pleasures. They saw in fortie fiue degrees a Lake fiftene Leagues long, and eight wide, with a Salt or full Net aboue three fadome, but very furious. The Sauages related to them of passages to a salt lake, whereof they knew no end, reaching so farre southerly, that the Sunne set to the North thereof in Summer: it was foure hundred leagues from the place where the French then were. In the Additions to Nona Francia mention is made of a lake about three score leagues long, with faire Ilands in it. The Iroquois haue no Townes; their dwellings and Forts are three or foure stories high, as in New Mexico. Another Lake is said to continue a hundred leagues in length, and some conceiue hope of passage to the South Sea thereby.

CHAP. V.
Of VIRGINIA.

Leauing New-France, let vs draw nearer the Sunne to New Britaine, whose Virgin soile not yet polluted with Spaniards lust, by our late Virgin-Mother, was iustly called Virginia. Whether shall I here beginne with Elogies or Elegies? Whether shall I warble sweete Carols in prayse of thy louely Face, thou fairest of Virgins, which from our other Britaine-World, hath wonne thee Wooers and Suters, not such as Leander, whose loues the Poets haue blazed for swimming ouer the Straits betwixt Sestos and Abydos, to his louely Hero; but, which for thy sake, haue forsaken their Mother-earth, encountered the most tempestuous forces of the Ayre, and so often ploughed vp Neptunes Plaines, furrowing the angrie Ocean, and that to make thee of a ruder Virgin, not a wanton Minion; but, an honest and Christian Wife? Or shall I change my accent, and plaine mee (for I know not of whom, to whom, to complaine) of those disaduentures, which these thy louely Louers haue sustained in seeking thy loue What enuie, I know not, whether of Nature, willing to reserue this Nymph for the treasure of her owne loue testified by the many and continual presents of a temperate Clymate, fruitfull Soile, fresh and faire streames, sweet and holosome Ayre, except neare the shore (as if her iealous policie had prohibited forraigne Suters:) or of the sauage Inhabitants, vnworthie to embrace with their rustlike armes so sweet a bosome & to appropriate with greatest disparagment so faire a Virgin to Sauage Louers: haply some conceiued indignitie, that some Parents should thither send their most viruly Sonnes, and that our Britannia should make her Virginian lap to bee the voider, for her lewder and more disordered Inhabitants, whose ill parts haue made distastfull those kinder offices of other our Britaine Worthies which else had bene long since with greatest gladnesse, and the recompense of her selfe entertained: Or whether it be Virginian modestie, and after the vse of Virgins, shee would say nay at first, holding that loue surest in continuance, which is hardest in obtaining: Whether any, or all of these, or what else hath hindered; hindered wee haue bene, and haue not yet obtained the full fruition of her Loue, and possession of her gainefull Dowrie, which yet now (more then euer before) she seemeth to promise, and doubtlesse wil quickly performe, if niggardise at home doe not hinder. And should men be niggardly in this aduenture, where Nabal must needs verifie his name, where keeping loofeth, aduenturing promysyth so faire a purchase? Miserie of our times, that miserable men should here want what they already haue, and refuse to haue there, at no rate, abundant supply to their too miserable feares of want. Lift vp your eyes and see that brightnesse of Virginia's beautie: which the Mountaines lift vp themselues alwayes with wilde smiles to behold, sending downe siluer streames to salute her which powre themselues greedily into her louely lap, and after many winding embracements, loth to depart, are at last swallowed of a more mightie corriuall, the Ocean: He also sends Armies of Fishes to her Coasts, to winne her Loue, euen of his best store, and that in store and abundance: the Mountaines out-bid the Ocean, in offering the secret store-houses of vndoubted Mines: hee againe offereth pearles: and thus while they seeke to out-face each other with their puffed and bigge swollen cheekes, who shall get the Bride, the one laies hold on the Continent and detaines the same, maugre the Oceans furie, and he againe hath gotten the Ilands all along the Coast, which hee guardeth and keepeth with his his waterie Garrisons. Virginia, betwixt those two sower-faced Suters, is almost distracted, and easily would giue entertainment to English loue, and accept a New Britain appellation, if her husband be but furnished out at first in sorts and sutes, befitting her marriage solemnitie: all which her rich dowrie would maintain for euer after with advantage.

And well may England court her, rather than any other European louers, in regard of his long continued amitie, and first Discouerie of her lands and seas: this by Sebastian Cabot with his English Mariners, a hundred and fifteene years since, and the other by Sir Walter Raleighs charge and direction, Ann Dom. one thousand five hundred eightie foure.

Then, first of all Christians, did Master Philip Amadas, and Master Arthur Barlow, take possession in Queene Elizabeths name. The next yeare, that mirror of Resolution, Sir Richard Greenville, conuayed thither an English Colonie, which he there left for plantation, vnder the gouernement of Master Ralpho Lane, which there continued vntill the eighteenth of Iune in the yeare following, and then (vpon some virgint occasions) returned with Sir Francis Drake into England. Yet, had they stayed but a little longer, a ship of Sir Walter Raleighs had supplied their necessities: and soone after Sir Richard againe repaired thither with three ships, and then also left fiftene men more to keepe possession. In the yeare 1587. a second Colonie were sent vnder the gouernement of Master John White. To their succour Sir Walter Raleigh hath sent five severall times, the last by Samuel Mace of Weymouth, in March, one thousand six hundred and two; but he and the former performed nothing, but returned with fruitles allegations. The same yeare, Captaine Bartholomew Gosnold, and Captaine Gilbert, discouered the North parts of Virginia, of which voyage John Brereton hath writen a Treatise.

In the yeare 1603, the Brissow men (by leaue of Sir Walter Raleigh) set forth a voyage thither in deg. 43. In this Expedition was Robert Salterne, which had bene the yeare before with Captaine Gosnold. They discouered Whitson-bay (so they termed it) in one and fortie deg. twentie five min. The people vsed Snakes skinner (of which some were six foot long) for girdles: they were exceedingly rauished with the musick of a Gitterne-boy, dauncing in a ring about him: they more feared two English Maniues then twentie men. They had such Boats as before are mentioned, seuateene foot long, foure broad, of Birch-barke sowed with Osyers, the seames couered with linden, almost as sweete as Frankincense, carrying nine men standing vpright, and yet not weighing aboue threescore pound. They brought one of them to Brissoll. This yeare Captaine Gilbert set forth again for Virginia: at Meuis they laded twentie tunnes of Lignum vita: hee and foure more were slaine by the Sauages. And in the yeare 1605. Captaine George Weymouth made thither a prosperous voyage, and discouered threescore miles vp a most excellent Riuer. His voyage was set forth in print by James Rosier.

After this followed the plantation by the present Adventurers, for the foundation of a New Britain Common-wealth: and the East and West parts of England ioyned in one purpose of a two-fold plantation, in the North and South parts of Virginia. Of the North parts our Method requires first mention. Mawoothen was many yeares together visited by our men, extending betwene deg. 43. and 45. fortie leagues in breadth, and fiftie in length. They found therein nine riuers, Quibique, son, Pemaquid, Ramassoc, Apanawapeske, Apaumensek, Aponeg, Sagadahoc, Ashamahaga, Shawokotoc. Sagadahoc is in 43. it is a mile and halfe at the mouth, holding the same bredth a dayes journey, and then makes a sound three dayes journey broad, in which are six lands: it hath two branches, the one from the Northeast twentie foure dayes journey, the other N.W. thirtie daies journey. At the heads are two Lakes, the Westermost eight dayes journey long and foure wide, the Eastermost halfe so large. This is Roanokes his dominion. The Tarentines countrey is in 44. where the Sauages sell of a Rocke of Allum, neere the riuer of Sasnowa. Captaine Thomas Hanham sayled to the Riuer of Sagadahoc 1606. He relateth of their beasts, dogs like wolues, of colours black, white, red, grissled: redde Deare, and a beast bigger, called the Mus, &c. of their fowles, fishes, trees:

He expresseth also the names of their twelue Moones or moneths: as Ianuarie Muskekefnos, Februarie Gignokiskefnos, &c.

Ann. 1607. was settled a Plantation in the Riuer Sagadahoc, the ships called the Giff, i James Davies and the Mary and Iohn, being sent thither by that famous English Iusticer Sir Iohn Popham and others. They found this coast of Virginia full of Ilands, but safe. They chose the place of their plantation at the mouth of Sagadahoc, in a Westerly Peninsula: there heard a Sermon, read their Patent and Lawes, and built a Fort. They sailed vnto discouer the Riuer and country, and encountred with an Iland where was a great fall of water, ouer which they haled their Boate with a rope, and came to another fall, shallow, swift, and vnpassable. They found the Countrey stored with Grapes white & red, good Hops, Onions, Garlike, Okes, Walnuts, the soyle good. The head of the Riuer is in foure fife and oddeminuts Cape Sinicamis in 43. 30. a good place to fortifie. Their Fort bare name of S<sup>t</sup>. George. Fortie fife remained there, k Captaine George Popham being President, Raleigh Gilbert Admirall. The people seemed affected with our mens deuotions, and would say King Iames is a good King, his God a good God, and Tanto naught. So they call an euill spirik which haunts them euery Moone, and makes them worship him for feare. He commanded them not to dwell neere, or come among the English, threatning to kill some and inflieck sickenesse on others, beginning with two of their Sagamos children, saying he had power, and would doe the like to the English the next Moone, to wit, in December.

The people <sup>1</sup> tolde our men of Caniballs, <sup>m</sup> neere Sagadahoc, with teeth three inches long, but they saw them not. In the Riuer of Tamescot they found Oysters nine inches in length: and were tolde that on the other side there were twice as great. On the 18. of Ianuarie they had in seuen houres space, thunder, lightning, raine, frost, snow, all in abundance, the last continuing. On Feb. 5. the President died. The Sauages remoue their dwellings in winter neerest the Deare. They haue a kind of shoos a yard long, 14. inches broad, made like a Racket, with strong twine or sinews of a Deare; in the midst is a hole wherein they put their foot, buckling it fast. When a Sagamos dieth, they blacke themselves, & at the same time yearely, renue their mourning with great howling: as they then did for Kashurakeny, who died the yeare before. They report that the Caniballs haue a Sea behinde them. They found a Bath two miles about, so hot that they could not drinke it. Mr. Patteson was slaine by the Satages of Nanhoc, a Riuer of the Tarentines. Their short comons <sup>n</sup> caused feare of mutinie. One of the Sauages, called Aminguin, for a straw hat and knife giuen him, stript himselfe of his clothing of Beuers skins, worth in England 50 sh. or 3 l. to present them to the President, leauing onely a flap to couer his priuities. He would also haue come with them for England. In winter they are poore <sup>o</sup> and weake, and do not then company with their wiues, but in summer when they are fat & lusty. But your eyes wearied with this Northerne view, which in that winter communicated with vs in extremity of cold, looke now for greater hopes in the Southerne Plantation, as the right arme of this Virginian body, with greater costs and numbers furnished from hence. Captaine Bartholomew Gosnold, hauing long sollicitated many of his friends, at last preuailed with som Gentlemen, as Mr. Edward Maria Wingfield, Captain Iohn Smith, & diuers others, with the help of som Noblemen & Merchants, his M<sup>tie</sup> granting Comission for establishing Councils to direct here, & to gouern & execute there; so that Decemb. 19. 1606. they set saile, & after long contending with contrary winds, & the windy inconstancy of some of the copanie that would haue returned for England before they had saluted their desired Port, they were by a storme forced into the same vnexpected; where after some harme by assault of the Sauages, on the thirteenth of May, M. Wingfield was chosen President, their fort contriued, & the fals soone after discovered. Six weeks being thus spent, Cap. Newport returned with the ships, & Cap. Smith (before held in much ialousie) was by the paines of Mr. Hunt the Preacher reconciled, & admitted of the Council, 100. being left there for the plantatio.

Within ten daies after the departure of this moueable Tauern, as they called it, a more sauage enemy then the Sauages had assailed them, & scarcely ten left vntrouched with sicknes, through want of convenient lodging & diet, of which from May to Septemb. fiftie died. Wingfield was depofed & Ratcliffe eftablifht in his place, and by the induftry of Smith, James Town was builded, the fauages fupplying their neceffities: they failing, Captaine Smith fought trade abroad, others at home, intending a returne in the Pinace for England, by his vnexpected returning were forced to ftay or finke, which action coft the life of Captaine Kendall. Soone after the like plot of the Prefident & Captaine Archer was difcouered, and by him againe fuppreffed. The Winter approaching, the Rivers affoorded them plentie of Cranes, Swans, Geefe, Ducks, with which, and Peafe, wilde Beasts and other land-commodities they daily feafted. But in the difcouerie of Chickahamine River, George Caffon was fupprifed, & Smith with two others, were befet with 200. fauages his men flain, & himfelfe in a quagmire taken prifoner; but after amoneth he procured himfelfe not onely libertie, but great admiration amongst them, and returning, once more ftayed the Pinace from flight, and the Fort from being abandoned.

The Treafurer and Councell meane while carefull to fupply their wants, fent two fhips with neere 100. men: Captaine Newport arrived fafely, Captaine Nelson with the other fhip by force of windes was driven to fhift as he could, elfewhere. Now the fauages enchanted by Smiths relations of God, Nature, and Art, were in murther at his command, till the ambition of fome (by giuing foure times as much for their commodities as he appointed, feeking to feeme of fo much greater magnificence and authoritie) made them price their commodities dearer. Newport (whom Smith had called father, and extolled with Powhatan the Emperour) went with folemnitie to vifit him, fending Smith before, who after his manner of State; gaue him 9 royall entertainement; fitting vpon his bed of Mats, his pillow of leather embrodered with pearle and white beads, attired with a robe of skins large as an Irifh mantle; at his head and feete fate a handfome yong woman, on each fide his houfe twentie others their heads & fhoulders painted red, with a great chaine of white beads about their necks; before thofe fate his cheefeft men in like order in his Arbor-like houfe. Newport gaue him a boy, for whom Powhatan gaue him Namontacke his feruant, which was after brought into England. Powhatan wittily cheated our men, & offering fo much corne as they gaue copper, faid he could eate that, not this. Their gettings in this voyage, other commodities, & their towns, were casually confumed by fire: and the fhip ftaying foureene weekes, fpent moft of that prouifion for reliefe of the Colonie: and by the bitterneffe of that great froft 1607. aboue halfe took their deatht. Wingfield and Archer were fent for England. Being buifed in the Spring to rebuild their towne, Nelson arrived with his loft Phoenix; (fo they fupposed his fhip) & dealt honeftlier then they report of the former Mariners. The fecond of Iune 1608. Smith left the Fort to difcouer the Bay of Chelapeack: in the way, wanting of convenient watering places, they were fo thirftie as to refufe two Baricoes of golde for one of water: and they arrived at James Towne in Septemb. where they found fome ficke, many dead, and the Prefident prifoner: which place by election of the Councell and request of the companie was beftowed on Smith.

Captaine Newport returned with rich prefents of Bafon Ewer, Bed, Clothes, with a Crowne for Powhatan, which made him ouer-value himfelfe: fome Polés and Dutch which were tent to make Pitch and Tarre, Glaffe mills and Sope-afhes, prooued after treacherous. Powhatan minding murther and villainie, at once fixteene of our men were befet with feuen hundred, which by the policie of Smith (fealing on Opechancaugh their King) was prevented, and turned to their en iching with their commodities: and amongst other they vfed poyfon, which wrought not. After, Smith took the King of Pafpaheigh prifoner, which forced the fauages to peace. Thus haue we a little while beheld Tragicall, more then fhewes, on this Virginian Theatre, thofe things which were wel intended, being il peruerted, & their greateft aduantages arifing from cafuall difaduantages: diuerfite of emulationes beclowding that morning ftarre, and difaftrous Comet, fhining rather with ferie gleames of ciuill broyles and bralls in that Hemifphære, then comfortable illumination and influence to the common good.

The Sauages were now in good termes with the Englifh, their Plantation at James Towne where they had build a Church and many houfes, in fome reafonable manner flourifhed;

p M. Wingfield writes that one Rend a Smith efaped hanging by accusing Kendall, who was fhoot to death: and that Smith and he had followed if Newport had not come.

flourished : the countrey was with great paines and perills of the President further discovered ; their Swine, Hens, and other prouision nourished ; and some quantitie of many commodities, as Furrs, Dyes, Mineralls, Sassafrasse, Sturgeon, and other things sent hither, in testimonie of their industry and successe. And Virginia grew now in such request,* that nine ships were furnished with the better part of five hundred men, to inhabit there, in the yeare one thousand sixe hundred and nine, the gouernement being deuolued to the L. de la Ware.

Sir Thomas Gates was appointed Lieutenant Generall; Sir George Sommers Admirall of Virginia, and were sent to reside there as Gouvernours of the Colonie. But the Sea-Venture, wherein the two Knights, and Captaine Newport, with a hundred and fiftie persons, sayled, after long conflict with the two angrie elements, was sent to bee imprisoned in Bermuda, where betweene two Rockes the ship split, the people escaping to Land. In the meane time s three of the other ships<sup>b</sup> had landed their men in Virginia, some of whom<sup>i</sup> were such as had bene the emulous and enuious corruall of the President, which they then beganne to shew : and to second the same, a greater hurt by gunne-powder befell him, which forced him for his recouerie to set saile for England, after he had liued there three yeares, maintayning himselfe and his thartime principally, with such soode as the Countrey yeilded. Hee saith, he left behinde at his returne five hundred men and women, three Ships, seuen Boats, two hundred expert Souldiers, thirtie nine of their Weroances or Kings, as Subiects and Contributors to the English, so farre subiect, that at his commaund they haue sent their subiects to Jamestowne, to receiue correction at his appointment for wrongs done ; and their Countreies were free to the English for trauell or trade. But Necessitie forced him to leave the Countrie, which it forced the other appointed Gouvernours not to finde, Hinc illa lacryma. Hence proceeded the disorder and confusion which after happened amongst them. A great bodie was heere, which acknowledged no head, and therefore grew vnweldie and distempered. Some sought for rule ouer others, which were oueruled by vnruely passions of Ambition, and Faction in themselues : others sought their ease, except sometimes they were ouer-busie in displeasing others, and deuouring that which others had carefully laboured for : Ruine seifeth on the Church, Rapine makes prey and spoyle of the goods, Rauine deuoureth their beasts, Famine consumeth the men, Iniuries make the Indians their enemies ; two of the shippes perish vpon V-shant, and one man alone was left to bring home newes of their perishing : the rest returne laden with Letters of discouragement, painting out Famine, Sedition, and other Furies, which had broken loose amongst them, in the blackest colours : which were sealed with report of the losse of their Admirall, to make vp the measure of mischiefe.

All this did not daunt the Noble Spirit of<sup>k</sup> that Resolute Lord, appointed Lord Gouvernour, who in the beginning of Aprill, one thousand six hundred and tenne, set sayle from the coast of England, and on the ninth of Iune arriued safely at the disfortified Fort in Virginia, where he found the present State like to the Boxe<sup>l</sup> of Pandora, who being endowed with manifolde good gifts (each of the Gods bestowing one on her) was sent with a Boxe full of euills to Promethew, who refused the offer, but by Epimethew was opened, whereby all euills were suffered to flie out, Hope onely remaining, which he shut fast in the bottome. And thus was it with this Virginian Pandora, enriched with the best offerings of Natures bountie, but by Epimethean carelesnes. All euills had now disperfed themselues, and made the Virginian Colonie a stage of Miserie : onely Hope remained. But alas euen that also proued sicke, and was ready to giue vp the Ghost, in the dangerous sicknesse, which befell that Noble<sup>m</sup> Lord, which forced him after eight moneths sicknesse, to returne for England againe. He shipped himselfe indeede for Meuis, an Iland in the West Indies, famous for wholsome Bathes, but by Southerly windes was compelled to change his purpose, and at last to make home : hauing left Deputie Gouvernour Captaine George Pearcie, a Gentleman of honour and resolution, with vpward of two hundred persons.

Almightie God that had thus farre tried the patience of the English, would not suffer them to bee tempted aboue that they were able : and therefore in his secret providence, dence, before any knowledge was here had of his Lordships sicknesse, had ordayned Sir Thomas Dale should be furnisht out with a good supply of three ships, men, cattell and many prouisions, all which arriued safe at the Colonie the tenth of May, one thousand six hundred and eleuen. He by his Letters, and the Lord Gouvernour by his Relations, did animate the Adventurers; the one protesting himselfe willing and readie to lay all that he was worth vpon the aduerture of the action, rather then so honourable a worke should faile, and to returne with all conuenient expedition, if their friendly indeuours would therein second his resolutions: the other<sup>1</sup> writing that foure of the best Kingdomes in Christendome, put all together, may no way compare with this Countrey, eyther for commodities or goodnesse of soyle. This sparke kindled in their hearts such constancie of zeale and forwardnesse, that they furnished out Sir Thomas Gates (who had happily returned with the rest from Bermudas) with six ships, three hundred men, and a hundred Kine, with other Cattell, Munition, and prouision of all sorts.

Sir Thomas Dale, hauing newes that it was a Fleet of enemies, prepared himselfe and the rest to an encounter, but it ended with a common ioy, in the shaking of hands, and not of Pikes. Lawes are now made (for lawlesnesse had marred so much before) for the honour of God, frequenting the Church, obseruation of the Sabbath, reuerence to Ministers, obedience to Superiours, mutuall loue, honest labours, and against Adulterie, Sacriledge, Wrong and other vices, harbengers of Gods wrath and mans destruction. The Colonie consisted of seuen hundred men of sundrie Arts and professions (few of them sicke) which hauing left the Fort at Cape Henrie, fortified and kept by Capraine Danies, and the keeping of James Towne, to that noble and well-deseruing Gentleman, Master George Pearce, is removed vp the Riuer fourescore miles further beyond James Towne, to a place of higher ground, strong and defensible by nature, with good ayre, plentie of Springs, much faire and open grounds, freed from woods, and wood enough at hand. Here they burnt bricke, cut downe wood, and euery man falls to somewhat: they haue built, they say, competent houses, the first storie all of bricke, that euery man may haue his lodging and dwelling by himselfe, with a sufficient quantitie of ground allotted thereto. Here also they were building an Hospitall with fourescore lodgings, and beds already sent, for the sicke and lame, as the booke, called the New life of Virginia, relateth. Master Whitaker in his Letter and book from Henrico 1612. testifieth the health and welfare of the Colonie. Samuel Argall in the yeare 1613. affirmed likewise that he found the state of Virginia farre better then was reported. In one voyage they had gotten one thousand and one hundred bushells of corne: they found a slow kinde of Cattell, as bigge as<sup>m</sup> Kine, which were good meate; and a medicinable sort of earth. They tooke Pokobuntis (Powhatans deere's daughter) prisoner, and for her ransome had Corne, and redeliuerie of their Prisoners and Weapons.

Thus I haue bin bolde somewhat largely to relate the proceedings of this Plantation, to supplant such slaunders and imputations as some haue conceiued or receiued against it, and to excite the diligence and industrie of all men of abilitie, to put to their helping hand in this action, so honorable in it selfe, glorious to God in the furtherance of his truth, and beneficiall to the common-wealth and to the priuate purses of the Adventurers, if the blooming of our hopes be not blasted with our negligence.

As for the want of successe hitherto, careat successib<sup>9</sup> opto, quisquis ab euentu facta notanda putet. Reason should preuaile with men; leaue sense and euent of things, as an argument for beasts. That reason which sheweth Virginia's more then possibilities and probabilities, doth also point out the causes of those ill successes: Discontents at Sea, Ignorance of the Countrey, and of their language, Diuision in the Councell, Commanders (some of them) not skilfull Souldiers, nor forward Adventurers, Care to relate the ships before they could prouide houses or victuals, Ambition, Crueltie, Neglect of the seasons for Fish and land-commodities, brackish slimie water at James Fort, Riort, Sloth, false information in England, sending ill people that consumed the rest with idlenes, want of Authoritie to punish them, Iniuries to and from the Sauages, and yet a necessity of their vse and helpe, sicknesse caused by the grosse and vaporous aire and soile about James Towne, and drinking water, the thecuissh trucke & exchange which som secretly held with them the treachery of fugitiues, falshood of the sauages, and the many many faults (as they report) of Mariners in priuate truckings & night-marts, both with our men and sauages, their long stay & spending the Colonies releese, besides extraordinary casualties of fire, cold, shipwracke; and (if we beleue Oniedo, and obserue the like amongst the Spaniards) the very aire of the Indies seemes to be of inclination & disposition to contentions, which easly ruine & dissolue the greatest and best enterprises, that I speake not of the Diuels malice to Christian hopes. Experience hath now made men wiser, both to preuent & remedie these euils, & to order their proceedings accordingly. And although Fame fills not our eares with so often and many Virginian rumors, as aforesometimes, yet we know that still waters are deepest, and we cannot but hope that those worthy Virginian-Consuls o, cumstando restitunt rem, rather with carefull prouidence and watchfull diligence working sure, then with humorous hastines laying foundations to a leisurely repentance; seeking more the common good there, then to be the common talk of here. Once, they there maintain themselves now a long time without the wonted charge to the Companie, and diuers of our Nobilitie and Gentry do now (as after a long slumber) while we are writing these things, againe bethinke them of this Virginian Plantation, whereunto the profitable neighbourhood of the Summer Iles, or Bermudas will be good furtherance. God Almighty prosper both, that the Word may goe out of Bermuda, and the Law of the Lord from Virginia, to a truer conuersion of the American world, then hitherto our Humorists, or Spanish insolencies haue intended.

p Since printed at Oxford.

For the description of the countrie, Mr. Hakluyt from others relations in his third Volume of voyages hath written largely of those parts, discovered for Sir Walter Raleigh. Concerning the later, Captain John Smith, partly by word of mouth, partly by his map therof in print, & more fully by a Manuscript, which he courteously communicated to me, hath acquainted me with that whereof himselfe with great perill and paine, had bene the discoverer, being in his discoveries taken Prisoner, as is before said, and escaping their furie yea receiuing much honor and admiration amongst them, by reason of his discourses to them of the motion of the Sunne, of the parts of the World, of the Sea, &c. which was occasioned by a Dial then found about him. They carried him prisoner to Powhatan, and there beganne the English acquaintance with that sauage Emperour.

q Al. Whitaker
 saith not so hot as Spaine, nor Winter so cold as in England.

The summe of his obseruation in that and other Discoveries since, concerning the countrie, is this: Virginia is situate betweene 34. and 44. degrees of Northerly latitude; the bounds whereof on the East side are the great Ocean, Florida on the South, on the North Nova Francia: the Western limits are vnknowne. But that part which began to be planted by the English Southerne Colonie, in the yeare 1606. is vnder the degrees 37, 38, and 39. The Temperature agreeth with English bodies, not by other meanes distemperd. The Summer is hot as in Spaine, the Winter cold as in France and England: certaine coole Brizes do asswage the vehemencie of the heat. The great frost in the yere 1607. reached to Virginia, but was recompenced with as milde a Winter with them the next yeare.

There is but one entrance by Sea into this Countrey, and that at the mouth of a very goodly Bay. The Capes on both sides are honoured with the names of our Britanian hopes, Prince Henric, and Duke Charles. The water floweth in this Bay neere two hundred miles, and hath a channell, for a hundred and fortie miles of depth, betwixt feuen and fiftene fathome; of breadth, tenne or fourteene miles. At the head of the Bay, the Land is Mountainous. and so runneth by a Southwest Line: from which Mountaines proceede certaine Brookes, which after come to fiew principall Navigable Riuers. The Mountaines are of diuers compositions, some like Mil-stones, some of Marble: and many pieces of crystall they found throwne downe by the waters, which also wash from the Rockes such glistering Tinctures, that the ground in some places seemeth gilded.

The colour of the earth in diuers places resembleth bole Armoniac, terra sigillata, and other such apparances; but generally is a blacke sandie molde. The Riuer next to the the mouth of the Bay is Powhatan, the mouth whereof is neare three miles broad: it is Nauigable an hundred miles: falls, rockes, sholds, prohibite further Nauigation: hence Powhatan their greatest King hath his Title. In a Peninsula on the North-side thereof is situate James Towne.

The people inhabiting which haue their Veronances, are the Kecoughtans, which haue not past twentie fighting men. The Paspahbeghes, haue fortie. Chichahamania, two hundred. The Weanocks, an hundred. The Arrowhatocks, thirtie. The Place called Powhatan, fortie. The Appamatucks, threescore. The Quiyoughcohanocks, fiue and twenty. The Warraskoyacks, forty. The Nandsamunds, two hundred. The Chesapeake, an hundred. The Chickahamians are not gouerned by a Veronance, but by the Priests. No place affordeth more Sturgeon in Summer, (of which at one draught haue been taken threescore and eight) nor in Winter more Fowle. Fourteen miles from Powhatan is the River Pamaunk, nauigable with greater Vessels, not about threescore and ten miles. Toppahanock is nauigable an hundred and thirty miles; Patowomeke, an hundred and twentie. To speake of Powmoxunt, Bolus, and other Riuer on the East side of the Bay: likewise, of diuers places which receiued name by some accident, as Fisher Stones Bay, so called of the death of one of ours there happening, and the like: or to mention the numbers which euery people can make, would exceed our scope, and the Readers patience. Captaine Smiths Mappe may somewhat satisfie the desirous, and his booke now printed, further. This the Captaine saith, that he hath bin in many places of a Asia and Europe, in some of Africa and America, but of all, holds Virginia by the naturall endowments, the fittest place for an earthly Paradise. Alexander Whitaker the Preacher at Henrico, writes, that at the mouth of Powhatan, are the Forts of Henrico and Charles, two and forty miles vpward in James Towne, and threescore and ten miles beyond that the new Towne of Henrico, ten miles higher the falls (where the Riuer falleth downe betwene many minerall rockes:) twelue miles beyond a Crystall rocke, wherewith the Indians head their arrowes: three dayes iourney from thence is a rock or hill found couered ouer with a rich siluer Oare. Our men that went to discouer those parts, had but two iron pickaxes with them, and those so ill tempered, that the points turned againe at euery stroake, but triall was made of the Oare, with argument of much hope. Six dayes iourney beyond this mine, runnes a ridge of hills, beyond which the Indians report is a great sea, which (if it be true) is the South sea. At Henrico they are exceeding healthfull, and more then in England.

Matter Thomas Hariot hath largely described the commodities which the Water and Earth yeeld (set forth also in Latine with exquisite pictures by Theodore de Bry) in the Relations of Brereton and Rosier, and others. There is a grasse which yeeldeth silke, beside store of Silke-wormes. Hempe and Flax surpassing ours in growth and goodness, exceeded by a new found stuffe of a certaine sedge or water-flagge, which groweth infinitely, and with little paines of boyling yeeldeth great quantitie of sundry sorts of skeines of good strength and length, some like silke, and some like flax, and some a courser sort, as hempe.

There is also a rich veine of Allum, of Terra Sigillata, Pitch, Tarre, Rozen, Turpentine, Sassafras, Cedar, Grapes, Oyle, Iron, Copper, and the hope of better Mines, Pearle, sweet Gummes, Dies, Timber, Trees of sweet wood for profit and pleasure, of which kinde haue beene discovered foureene seuerall kinds. Neither is it needfull that heere I relate the commodities of Virginia for food in Fowles, Beasts, Fishes, Fruits, Plants, Herbs, Beries, Graines, especially their Maiz, which yeeldeth incredible recompence for a litle labour. One acre of ground will yeeld with good husbandrie two hundred bushels of corne. They haue two roots<sup>n</sup>; the one for Medicinall vse to cure their hurts, called Weighsacan, the other called Tockawbough, growing like a flagge, of the greatnes and taste of a Potato, which passeth a fiery purgation before they may eate it, being poyson whiles it is raw. Yet in all this abundance our men haue had small store but of want, and no fire nor water could purge that poyson which was rooted in some, to the hinderance of the Plantation.

The chiefe Beastes of Virginia are Beares, lesse then those in other places, Deere like ours, Arongbenn much like a Badger, but living on trees like a Squirrel: Squirrels, rells, as bigge as Rabbits, and other flying Squirrels, called Assepanick, which spreading out their legges and skins, seeme to flie thirtie or fortie yards at a time. The Opassom hath a head like a Swine, a taile like a Rat, as big as a Cat, and hath vnder her belly a bag, wherein she carrieth her yong. Their Dogs barke nor, their Wolues are not much bigger then our Foxes, their Foxes are like our siluer-haired Conies, and sinell not like ours. Mussasem is otherwise as our water-Rat, but smelleth strongly of Muske: Master Whitaker saith, they yeeld Muske, as the Muske-Cats doe. Their *Vinchunquoy*s are wilde Cats. Their vermine destroyed not our egges and pullen: nor were their Serpents or Flies any way pernicious. They haue Eagles, Haykes, wilde Turkeys, and other Fowle, and Fish, which heere to repeate, would to some nice fastidious stomachs breed a fulnesse, though with some of their Country-men in Virginia, they would haue bene sauourie sometimes and daintie.

They are a people • clothed with loose Mantles made of Deere skins, and aprons of the same, round about their middles, all else naked: of stature like to vs in England. They vse to paint themselues, and their children, he is the most gallant which is most monstrous. Their women imbroder their legges, hands, &c. with diuers workes, as of Serpents, and such like, with blacke spots in the flesh.

• M. George Peercie writeth that one with an arrow of an ell length shot thorow a Target, which a Pistoll could not pierce.

Their houses are made of small poles, made fast at the top, in round forme, as is vsed in many arbouris with vs: couered with barkes or mats, twice as long as they are broad. They are exact Archers, but faint-hearted if they see their arrowes pierce nor. They will with arrowes kill birds flying, fishes swimming, beasts running: one of ours by them hath bene shot thorow the body, and both • his armes thereby fastened and pierced. They speake of men two hundred yeares old and more, as Master Wingfield reporteth. Their bowes are of tough Hasill, the strings of Leather, arrowes of Canes or Hasill, headed with stones or hornes, and artificially feathered. They are hearlesse, if they see defence to frustrate their arrowes.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Religion and Rites of the Virginians.

• Tho. Hariot.
Hak. 29.3. p. 277.

Now for the manners and Rites of the people, thus hath Master • Hariot reported. They beleue that there are many Gods, which they call Mantoas, but of different sorts and degrees: one only chiefe and great God, which hath bene from all eternitie. Who, as they affirme, when he purposed to make the World, made first other gods of a principall Order, to be as meanes and instruments to be vsed in the Creation, and the instruments of the other Order more principall.

First, they say, were made waters, out of which by the gods was made all diuersitie of Creatures, that are visible or inuisible. For mankinde, they say, a woman was made first, which by the working of one of the gods, conceiued and brought forth children. And in such sort they say they had their beginning: But how many yeares or ages haue passed since, they say, they can make no relation: hauing no letters, nor other meanes to keepe records of times past, but onely Tradition from Father to Sonne. They thinke that all the gods are of humane shape, and therefore they represent them by Images, in the formes of men, which they call Kewasowak: one alone is called Kewas. Them they place in Houses or Temples, which they call Machicomuck, where they worship, pray, sing, and make many times offerings vnto them. In some Machicomuck we haue seene but one Kewas, in some two, in other three. They beleue the immortalitie of the soule: that after this life, as soone as the soule is departed from the bodie, according to the workes it hath done, it is either carried to heauen the habitation of Gods, thereto enioy perpetuall blisse and happinesse: or else to a great pit or hole, which they thinke to be in the furthest parts of their part of the World toward the Sunne-set, there to burne continually. This place they call Popogusso. For the confirmation firmation of this opinion they tell tales of men dead and reuiued againe, much like to the Popish Legends.

Thus they tell of one, whose graue the next day after his buriall was seene to moue, and his bodie was therefore taken vp againe: who reported, that his soule had bene very neere the entring into Popogussu, had not one of the gods saued him, and giuen him leaue to returne againe, and teach his friends how to auoide that terrible place. They tell of another, which being taken vp in that manner; related, that his soule was aliue while his bodie was in the graue, and that it had travelled farre in a long broad way, on both sides whereof grew most delicate pleasant Trees, bearing more rare and excellent fruits then euer hee had seene before, or was able to expresse: and at length came to most braue and faire houses, neare which he met his father, that had bin dead before, who gaue him great charge to go back againe, and shew his friends what good they were to doe to enioy the pleasures of that place, which when hee had done, hee should after come againe.

What subtiltie soeuer be in their Wiroances <sup>b</sup> and Priests, the vulgar are hereby very respectiue to their Gouvernours, and carefull of their manners: although they haue also in criminall cases, punishments inflicted according to the qualitie of the offence. This I learned by speciall familiaritie with some of their Priests, wherein they were not so sure grounded, but that they lent open eare to ours, with doubting of their owne.

The <sup>c</sup> Priests in Secota haue their haire on the crowne like a Combe, the rest being cut from it: onely a fore-top on the forehead is left, and that Combe. They haue a garment of skinnes peculiar to their function. They are great Wisards.

Our artificiall Workes, Fire-workes, Gunnes, Writing, and such like, they esteemed the workes of Gods, rather then of Men, or at least taught vs by the Gods. They bare much respect to our Bibles. When the Wiroans was sicke, he sent to vs to pray for him. Some were of opinion that we were not mortall, nor borne of Women, but that we were men of an old Generation many yeares past, then risen againe to immortalitie: some would likewise seeme to prophesie that there were more of our Generation yet to come, to kill theirs, and take their places: which were now in the Aire inuisible, and without bodies, and that they by our entreaty did make men to die which had wronged vs.

They haue <sup>d</sup> their Idoll in the innermost roome of their house, of whom they tell incredible things. They carrie it with them when they goe to the Warres, and aske counsell thereof, as the Romans did of their Oracles. They sing songs as they march towards the battell, in stead of Drummes and Trumpets: their warres are bloody, and haue wasted much of their people.

A certaine King called Piemacum, hauing inuited many men and women of the Secotans to a feast, whiles they were merrie and praying before their Idoll, came vpon them and slew them. When <sup>e</sup> one of their Kings had conspired against the English, a chiefe man about him said, that we were the seruants of God, and not subiect to be destroyed by them: and that we, being dead men, could doe more hurt then while wee were aliue. They vse to solemnize certaine months mindes in their Savage manner for any great personage dead. James <sup>f</sup> Rosier from the relation of Owen Griffin, an eye-witnesse, thus tells of their ceremonies. One among them, the eldest as he iudged, riseth right vp, the other sitting stil: and looking about, suddenly cried with a loud voice, Baugh: Waugh: then the women fall downe, and lie vpon the ground: and the men all together answering the same, fall a stamping round about the fire, with both feete, as hard as they can, making the ground shake, with sundrie out-cries, and change of voice and sound. Many take the fire-stickes and thrust them into the earth: and then rest a while. Of a sudden they beginne as before, and continue so stamping till the yonger sort fetched from the shore many stones, of which euery man tooke one, and first beat vpon them with their fire-stickes, then with the stones beat the earth with all their strength. And in this manner they continued about two houres. After this ended, they, which had wiues, tooke them apart, and withdrew themselves seuerally into the wood. This seemed to be their euening deuotion.

When they have obtained some great deliuerance from danger, or returne from warre, they obserue a publike and solemn reioycing by making a great fire, encompassed with the men and women promiscuously, all of them with Rattles in their hands making a great noise.

They hold one time in the yeare Festiuall, and then they meet together out of many Villages, euery one hauing a certaine marke or Character on his backe, whereby it may bee discerned whose Subiect hee is. The place where they meet is spacious, and round about are set postes, carued with the resemblance of a Nunnes head: in the midds are three of the fairest Virgins louingly embracing and clasping each other: about this liuing Center, and Artificiall circle, they dance in their sauage manner.

Their Idoll called Kwasa, is made of wood foure foot high, the face resembling the Inhabitants of Florida, painted with flesh-colour, the brest white, the other parts black, except the legges, which are spotted with white; he hath chaines or strings of beades about his necke.

This Idoll is in Socota, as it were the keeper of the dead bodies of their Kings. In their Temples are houses of publique deuotion, they haue two, three, or more of them, set in a darke place. The dead bodies of their Wiroances are kept on certaine Scaffolds nine or ten foote high, this Kwasa their guardian being placed with them; and vnderneath dwelleth a Priest, which night and day there numbred his deuotions.

h. Newes from Virginia, and a M.S. of Captaine Smith.

But let vs take view of our last Colonies obseruations. Captaine <sup>h</sup> Smith was taken by the Virginians, and while he stayed amongst them obserued these their Magi-call Rites. Three or foure dayes after his taking, seuen of their Priests in the house where he lay, each with a Rattle, (setting him by them) began at ten of the clocke in the morning, to sing about a fire, which they enuironed with a circle of Meale, at the end of euery song, (which the chiefe Priest began, the rest following) laying downe two or three Graines of Wheate: and after they had thus laid downe six or seuen hundred in one circle, accounting their songs by Graines, as the Papiests their Orisons by Beades, they made two or three other circles in like manner, and put at the end of euery song, betwixt euery two, or three, or fise Graines, a little sticke. The High Priest disguised with a great skinn, his head hung round with li tle skinnes of Weasills, and other Vermine, with a crownet of Feathers, painted as vgly as the Diuell, at the end of each song vsed strange and vehement gestures, casting great cakes of Deere-suet, and Tobacco into the fire: thus till six of the clocke in the euening, they continued these howling deuotions, and so held on three dayes. This they pretended to do, to know if any more of his Country-men would arriue, and what he there intended. They so fed this our Author, that he much misdoubted, that he should haue bene sacrificed to the Quoyonghquosicke, which is a superiour power they worship, then the Image whereof a more vgly thing cannot be described. To cure the sicke, a certaine man with <sup>i</sup> a little Rattle, vsing extreme howlings, shouting, singing, with diuers anticke and strange behaviours ouer the Patient, sucketh blood out of his stomacke, or diseased place.

Not much vnlike to that rattling deuotion of their exorcising Priests, (at least in absurditie) was that entertainment <sup>k</sup> which Powhatans women gaue the same Captaine then being free, and President of the company, at Werowocomoco; Where thirtie of them came out of the woods naked, onely couered behinde and before, with a few greene leaues, their bodies painted, but with some difference each from other: the leader of these Nymphes resembled both Alceon and Diana, hauing on her head a faire paire of Stagges hornes, and a quiver of arrowes at her back, with bow and arrowes in her hand: The rest followed all horned alike, weaponed with vnlike instruments: these (as if they had bene the infernall guard, comming with Cerberus to welcome Proserpina to her Palace) rushed from the trees with hellish shouts and cries, dancing about a fire, which there was made for that purpose: and after an houre thus spent, they departed.

* How could
he chuse?

Then did they solemnly inuite him to their lodging, where he was no sooner come, but all rounded about him with tedious kindnesse, crying, * Loue you not me? This salutation

lutation ended; which Pan and all his Satyrs would haue accepted, they feasted him with plentie and varietie, some singing and dancing whiles others attended: and at last led him with a fire-brand, in stead of a torch to his lodging.

When they intend any warres, the Weroances or Kings consult first with the Priests and Coniurers. And no people haue there beene found so sauage which haue not their Priests, gods, and Religion. All things that are able to hurt them beyond their prevention, they after their sort adore, as the Fire, Water, Lightning, Thunder, our Ordnance, Peeeces, Horses: Yea, I haue heard Captaine Smith say, that they seeing one of the English Bores in the way, were stricken with awfull feare, because he bristled vp himselfe and gnashed his teeth, and tooke him for the god of the Swine, which was offended with them.

The chiefe god they worship is the Diuell, which they call Oke: They haue conference with him, and fashion themselves vnto his shape. In their Temples they haue his Image ill-fauouredly made, * painted, adorned with chaines, copper, and beads, and covered with a skinne. By him is commonly the Sepulchre of their Kings; whose bodies are first bowelled, then dried on a hurdle, and haue about the ioynts chaines of copper, beads, and other like trash; then lapped in white skinnies, and rowled in mats, and orderly entombed in arches made of mats, the remnant of their wealth being set at their feet. These Temples and Bodies are kept by their Priests. For their ordinarie burials, they digge a deepe hole in the earth with sharpe stakes, and the corpes being wrapped in skins and mats with their iewels, they lay them vpon sticks in the ground, and couer them with earth. The buriall ended, the women hauing their faces painted with blacke cole and oyle, sit foure and twentie houres in the houses mourning and lamenting by turnes, with yellings and howlings. Euery Territorie of a Weroance hath their Temples and Priests. Their principall Temple is at Vitamussack in Pamaunk, where Powhatan hath an house vpon the toppe of certaine sandie hilles in the woods. there are three great houses filled with Images of their Kings and Diuels, and Tombes of their Predecessours. Those houses are neere threescore foot long, built, after their fashion; arbour-wise. This place is in such estimation of holinesse, that none but the Priests and Kings dare enter: yea, the Sauages dare not passe by in boats, without casting copper, beads, or somewhat into the Riuer.

Heere are commonly resident seuen Priests: the chiefe differed from the rest in his ornaments: the other can hardly be knowne from the common people, but that they haue not so many holes at their eares to hang their Jewels at. The high Priests head-tire is thus made. They take a great many Snakes skinnies stuffed with mofse, as also of Weasils and other Vermines skinnies, which they tie by their taitles, so that all the taitles meete on the toppe of the head like a great tassell. The faces of their Priests are painted as vgly as they can deuise: in their hands they haue rattles, some Base, some Treble.

Their deuotion is most in songs which the chiefe Priest beginneth, the rest following: sometime hee maketh inuocations with broken sentences, by starts and strange passions, and at euery pause the other giue a short grone. It cannot be perceived that they haue any set holy dayes: onely, in some great distresse of want, feare of enemies, times of triumph, and of gathering their fruits, the whole Countrey, Men, Women, and Children, assemble to their solemnities. The manner of their deuotion is sometimes, to make a great fire, all singing and dancing about the same with Rattles and shouts, foure or fife houres: sometimes they set a man in the middest, and dance and sing about him, he all the while clapping his hands, as if he would keepe time: after this, they go to their Feasts. They haue certaine Altar-stones, which they call Pawco-rances, standing from their Temples, some by their houses, others in the woods and wildernesses; vpon which they offer bloud, Deere-suet, and Tobacco. This they doe when they returne from the wars, from their huntings, and on other occasions. When the waters are rough in stormes, their Coniurers runne to the waters sides, or passe in their boats, and after many hellish out-cries and inuocations, cast Tobacco, Copper, Pocoes, or such trash into the water, to pacifie that god whom they thinke to be very angry in those stormes. Before their dinners and suppers the better sort wil take the first bitt,

bitt, and cast it into the fire, which is all the grace they are knowne to vse. In some part of the Countrey they haue yearely a sacrifice of children: such a one was performed at Quiyoughcobanock some ten miles from James Towne in this manner. Rapahannock * Will. White. Werowance made a feast in the woods: the people were so painted, that a Painter with his pensill could not haue done better. Some of them were blacke like Diuels, with hornes and loose haire, some of diuers colours. They continued two dayes dancing in a circle of a quarter of a mile, in two companies, with anticke trickes, soure in a ranke, the Werowance leading the dance; they had rattles in their hands; all in the middest had black hornes on their heads, and Greene bowes in their hands: next them were soure or siue principall men diuersly painted, which with bastinadoes beat forward such as tired in the dance. Thus they made themselues scarce able to go or stand. When they met together they made a hellish noise, and euery one flinging away his bough, ranne (clapping their hands) vp into a tree, and tare it to the ground, and fell into their order againe: thus they did twice. Fourteene well fauoured children, or (if you had rather heare * Captaine Smith) fiftene of the properest yong boyes betweene ten and fiftene yeares of age they painted white: Hauing brought them forth, the people (saith he) spent the forenoone in dancing and singing about them with Rattles: in the afternoone they put these children to the roote of a tree, all the men standing to guard them, each with a Bastinado of Reeds bound together, in his hand. Then doe they make a Lane betweene them all along, through which there were appointed siue yong men (White calles them Priests) to fetch these children. Each of these fetcheth a childe, the guard laying on with their bastinadoes, while they with their naked bodies defend the children to their great smart. All this time the women weepe and grieve very passionately, providing Mosses, skinned Mats, and drie wood, as things fitting the childrens Funerall. When the children are in this manner fetched away, the guard teares downe trees, branches, and boughes, making wreathes for their heads, or be-decking their haire with the leaues. What else was done with the children was not seene, but they were all cast on a heape in a Valley, as dead, where was made a great Feast for all the company.

William White relating this sacrifice, saith, That they remoued them from tree to tree three times, and at last carried them into a Valley where the King sat; where they would suffer our men to see, but fasted there two houres. On a sudden all arose with cudgels in their hands, and made a lane as is before said, and the children being laide downe vnder a tree (to their seeming) without life, they all fell into a ring againe and danced about the children a good space, and then sat downe in a circle about the tree. Rapahanna, in the middes, caused burthens of wood to be brought to the Altar, made of poles set like a steeple, where they made a great fire to sacrifice their children to the Diuell (whom they call Kewase) who, as they report, suckes their bloud. They were unwilling to let them stay any longer. They found a woman mourning for yong Paspiba sacrificed at the Towne of Rapahanna.

The Werowance (Captaine Smith addeth) being demanded the meaning of this sacrifice, answered, that the children were not all dead, but that the Oke or Diuell did sucke the bloud from their left brest, who chanced to be his by lot, till they were dead, but the rest were kept in the wildernesse by the yong men, till nine Moones were expired, during which time they must not conuerse with any, and of these were made their Priests, and coniurers. This sacrifice they held to be so necessarie, that if they should omit it, their Oke or Diuell, and their other Quiyoughcosughes, or gods, would let them haue no Deere, Turkeys, Corne, or Fistr; and would besides make a great slaughter amongst them. They thinke that their Werowances and Priests, which they also esteeme Quiyoughcosughes, when they are dead, doe goe beyond the Mountaines towards the setting of the Sunne, and euer remaine there in forme of their Oke, hauing their heads painted with Oyle and Pocomes <sup>m</sup> finely trimmed with feathers, and shall haue Beads, Hatchets, Copper, and Tobacco, neuer ceasing to dance and sing with their predecessors. The common people, they suppose, shall not liue after death: Some sought to conuert them from these superstitions: the Werowance of Quiyoughcobanock was so farre perswaded, as that he professed to beleue that our God exceeded theirs, as much

much as our Gunnes did their Bowes and Arrowes : and many times did send to the President many presents, intreating him to pray to his <sup>n</sup> God for raine, for his God would not send him any.

William White reporteth these their ceremonies of honoring the Sunne. By breake of day, before they eate or drinke, the men, women, and children aboue ten yeares old, runne into the water, and there wash a good space, till the Sunne arise, and then they offer sacrifice to it, strewing Tobacco on the land or water: the like they doe at Sunneset. He also relateth that one George Casson (before mentioned) was sacrificed, as they thought, to the Diuell, being stripped naked and bound to two stakes, with his backe against a great fire: then did they rippe him and burne his bowels, and dried his flesh to the bones, which they kept aboue ground in a by-roome. Many other of our men were cruelly and treacherously executed by them, though perhaps not sacrificed, and none had bene left, if their ambushes and treasons had taken effect. Powhatan thus inuited <sup>p</sup> Captaine Ratcliffe and thirtie others to trade for corne; and hauing brought them within his ambush, murdered them.

Alexander Whitaker saith, That their <sup>q</sup> Priests (whom they call Quiokosanghs) are Witches, of whom the people stand in great awe. The manner of their life is Heremite-fashion, in woods, in houses sequestred from the common course of men, where none may come, or speake with them, vncalled. They take no care for victualls, for all such necessities are set in a place neere his cottage for his vse. If they would haue raine, or haue lost any thing, hee at their request coniureth, and often preuaileth. Hee is their Physitian if they be sicke, and sucketh their wounds. At his word they make warre and peace, and doe nothing of moment without him.

The Wirowance of Acammacke told our men of a strange accident: two children being dead, and buried, being reuiued by the parents, seemed to haue liuely and cheerefull countenances, which caused many to behold them, and none of the beholders escaped death.

The Sasquesahanokes are a Giantly people, strange in proportion, behauiour, and attire, their voice sounding from them, as out of a Caue: their attire of Beares skins, hanged with Beares pawes, the head of a Wolfe, and such like jewels: and (if any would haue a spoone to eate with the Diuell) their Tobacco-pipes were three quarters of a yard long, carued at the great end with a Bird, Beare, or other device, sufficient to beat out the braines of a Horse (and how many Asses braines are beaten out, or rather mens braines smoaked out, and Asses haled in by our lesse Pipes at home?) the rest of their furniture was sutable. The calfe of one of their legges was measured three quarters of a yard about, the rest of his limbes proportionable. With much adoe restrained they this people from worshipping our men. And <sup>r</sup> when our men prayed (according to their daily custome) and sung a Psalm, they much wondered: and after began in most passionate manner to hold vp their hands to the Sunne, with a Song: then embracing the Captaine, they began to adore him in like manner, and so proceeded (notwithstanding his rebuking them) till their song was ended: which done, one with a most strange action and vncomely voice began an Oration of their loues. That ended, with a great painted Beares skinn they covered the Captaine, another hung about his necke a chaine of white Beads. Others laid eigheteene mantles at his feete, with many other ceremonies to create him their Gouvernour, that he might defend them against the Massa-womekes their enemies. As these are very great, so the Wigbe- comokes are very little.

I may also here insert the ridiculous conceits which some Virginians hold, concerning their first originall, as I haue heard from the relation of an English youth, which liued long amongst the Sauages: that a Hare came into their Countrey and made the first men, and after preserued them from a great Serpent: and when two other Hares came thither, that Hare for their entertainment killed a Deere, which was then the only Deere that was, and strewing the haire of that Deere hide, euery haire proued a Deere. He said they worshipped towards a certaine Hoop or Sphere doubled a crosse, which was set vpon an heape of stones in their houses. They had a house without the Towne for the women, in the time of their naturall sicknes to keepe in, where no men might come.

n In that extreme of misery which ours since sustained, I haue been told that both the Sauages and fugitives would obiect our want and their plenty, for theirs, and against our Religion.

Master George Percie.

They haue * a certaine herbe called Weyfacke, like Liuerwort, which they chew and spit into poisoned wounds, that are thereby healed in foure and twenty houres. In finding out their medicinable root, (it is the relation of Master George Percy) six of them hold together by the armes, and so go singing, and withall searching: and when they haue found it, sit downe singing, crossing the roote with their hands for a good space, then gather, chew, and spit. He thus describeth their dances; One stands in the middlest singing and clapping hands; all the rest dance about him, shouting, hallowing, stamping with antike gesture, like so many Diuels, their feet alwayes (and only) agreeing in one stroke. Landing at Kecoughtan, the Sauages entertained them with a doleful noise, laying their faces to the ground, and scratching the earth with their nailes. The Warrance of Rapahanna, met them, playing on a flute of a reed, with a crowne of Deeres haire coloured red, fashioned like a Rose, with a chaine of Beads about his necke, and Bracelets of Pearle hanging at his eares, in each eare a birds claw; of a modest-proud behauiour. The women with an Iron pounce and race their bodies, legs, thighes, and armes, in curious knots and portraitures of fowles, fishes, beasts, and rub a painting into the same, which will neuer out. The Queene of Apametica, was attired with a Coronet beset with many white bones, her eares hanged with copper, a chaine thereof six times compassing her necke. The maids shaued their heads all but the hinder part: the wiuues weare it all of a length: the men weare the left locke long, sometimes an ell, which they tie when they please in an artificiall knot, stucke with feathers, the right side shauen. The King of Paspahey was painted all black, with hornes on his head like a Diuell. He testifieth of their hard fare, watching euery third night, lying on the bare cold ground, what wether fouer came, and warding the next day, a small can of barly sodden in water, being the sustenance for siue men a day: their drinke brackish and slimie water. This siue moneths.

q Cap. Smith.

The Virginians q are borne whire: their haire black, few haue beards: the women with two shels are their Barbers: they are strong, nimble, and hardie, in constant, timorous, quicke of apprehension, cautelous, couetous of copper and beads; they seldome forget an iniury, and seldome steale from each other, lest the Coniurers should bewray them, which it is sufficient that these thinke they can doe. They haue their lands and gardens in proper, and most of them liue of their labour. Master Wingfield saith, they would be of good complexion, if they would leaue painting (which they vse on their face and shoulders.) He neuer saw any of them grosse, or bald: they would haue beards, but that they plucke away the haire: they haue one wife, many loues, and are also Sodomites. Their elder women are Cookes, Barbers, and for seruice, the yonger for dalliance. The women hang their children at their backes, in Summer naked, in Winter vnder a Deere-skin. They are of modest behauiour. They seldome or neuer brall: in entertaining a stranger, they spread a mat for him to sit downe, and dance before him. They weare their nailes long to flea their Deere: they put bow and arrowes into their childrens hand before they are six yeares old.

d. Mar. Wingfield.

In each eare commonly they haue three great holes, wherat they hang chains bracelets, or copper: some weare in those holes a small Snake coloured greene and yellow, neare halfe a yard long, which crawling about his neck, offereth to kisse his lips. Others weare a dead Ratt tied by the taile. Their names are giuen them according to the humor of the parents. Their women they say are easily deliuered: they wash in the riuers their yong infants to make them hardy. The women and children do the household and fieldworke, the men disdaining the same, and only delighting in fishing, hunting, wars, and such man-like exercises: the women plant, reape, beare burthens, pound their corne, make baskets, pots their bread, and doe their cookerie and other businesse. They easily kindle fire by chafing a drie pointed sticke in a hole of a little square peece of wood.

Powhatan had about thirtie Commanders, or Wirrawances vnder him, all which were not in peace only, but seruiceable in Captaine Smiths presidencie, to the English, and still, as I haue beene told by some, that haue since beene there, they doe affect him, and will aske of him. Powhatan hath three brethren, and two sisters, to whom the inheritance belongeth successiuelly, and not to his or their sonnes till after their death, and then the eldest Sisters sonne inheriteth. He hath his treasure of skinnes, copper, pearles, beads, and such like, kept in a house for that purpose, and there stored against the time of his buriall. This house is fiftie or threescore yards long, frequented onely by Priests. At the foure corners of this house stand foure Images as Sentinels, one of a Dragon, another of a Beare, a third of a Leopard, and the fourth of a Giant. He hath as many women as he will, which when he is wearie of, he bestoweth on whom he best liketh. His will, and Custome are the Lawes. He executeth ciuill punishments on malefactors, as broyling to death, being encompassed with fire, and other tortures. The other Wiro-wances, or Commanders (so the word signifieth) haue power of life and death, and haue some twentie men, some fortie, some an hundred, some many more vnder their command. Some were sent to enquire for those which were left of Sir Walter Rawleighs Colony, but they could learne nothing of them but that they were dead.

Ext to Virginia towards the South is situate Florida,<sup>a</sup> so called, because it was first discovered by the Spaniards on <sup>b</sup> Palme-sunday, or as the most <sup>c</sup> interpret, Easter-day, which they call Pasqua Florida: and not, as Thenet writeth, for the flourishing Verdure thereof. The first <sup>d</sup> finder, after their account, was John Ponce of Leon, in the yeare 1512. but we haue before shewed that Sebastian Cabot had discovered it in the name of King Henry the seuenth of England. The length of this Region extendeth to the fise and twentieth degree. It runneth out into the Sea with a long point of land, as if it would either set barres to that swift current which there runneth out, or point out the dangers of these coasts to the Hazardous Mariners:

Into the Land it stretcheth Westward vnto the borders of New-Spaine, and those other countries which are not fully knowne: otherwhere it is washed with a dangerous sea, which separateth Cichora, Bahama, and Lucia from the same. John Ponce <sup>e</sup> afore-said hearing a rumour of a prodigious well, which (as the Poets tell of Media) would make old men become yong againe, plaid the yongling to go search it six months together, and in that inquiry discouers this Continent: and repairing into Spaine, obtaineth this Prouince with the title of Adelantado. He returned with a Nauy and band of souldiers, but at his landing was so welcomed by the Floridians, that many of his men were slaine, and himselfe wounded vnto death. <sup>f</sup> Pamphilo de Naruaes had no better successe: he entred Florida, 1527. Aluaro Nunez called Capo di vacca or Cabeça de vaca, and some of his company, after long captiuitie, escaped.

Pamphilo carried with him sixe hundred men: about the Riuer of Palmes his ships were wracked, and most of the Spaniards drowned. A few escaped drowning, but twelue fell madde, and like dogs sought to worry each other. Scarcely ten returned into Spaine. These comming to Mexico, reported that they had restored three dead men to life: I rather belecue, saith Benzo, that they killed foure quicke men.

Don Ferdinando de Soto <sup>g</sup> enriched with the spoiles of Asibalba King of Peru, in which action he was a Captaine and horse-man, heere found place to spend that which there he had gotten. For hauing obtained the Government of Florida, and gathered a Band of sixe hundred men for that Expedition, in it hee spent fise yeares seacheing for Mineralls, till hee lost himselfe. Indian Samado, and Abumada made sute for the like grant, but could not obtaine it: Frier Luys de Beluastro, and other Dominikes had vndertaken by the way of Preaching to haue reduced the Floridians to Christianitie, and the Spanish obedience, and were sent at the Emperours charge, but no sooner set foote on shore, then hee and two of his companions were taken by the Sauages, and cruelly slaine and eaten, their shauen skales being hanged vp in their Temple for a monument. This happened in the yeare 1549. In the yeare 1524. Francis the first, the French King, had sent John <sup>h</sup> de Verrazano hither, but because he rather sought to discover all along the Coast, then to search or settle within Land, I passe him ouer. of Religion and of his Countrey, sent Captaine Iohn Ribault to Discover and Plant in these parts, which his Voyage and Plantation is written by Rene & Landonniere, one employed therein. He left Captaine Albert there with some of his company, who built a Fort called Charles Fort: but this Albert was slaine in a mutiny by his souldiers, and they returning home, were so pursued by Famine, the Pursuiuant of Diuine Iustice, that after their shoes and leather jerkins eaten (their drinke being Sea-water, or their owne Urine) they killed and ate vp one of their owne company. Landonniere was sent thither againe to inhabite, Anno 1564. and the next yeare Ribault was sent to supply his place.

* He was relieved by Sir Iohn Hawkins great bountie.

But vncouth * Famine had so wasted and consumed the French, before his arriual, that the very bones of most of the Souldiers pierced thorow their starued skins in many places of their bodies, as if they would now trust the emptie hands no longer, but would become their owne purueyers, and looke out for themselves. And yet, better it is to fall into the hands of God, then of mercilesse Men: Famine being but a meere Executioner to Gods Iustice, but these executing also a diuellish malice. Such were the Spaniards, who were sent thither vnder the conduct of Don Pedro Melendes, which massacred all of euery sexe and age, which they found in the Fort: and Ribault being cast by shipwrecke on the shore, and receiued of Vallemendus the Spaniard, with promises of all kindnesse, was cruelly murdered with all his company, except some few which they referred for their owne employments. The manner of it is at large handled by Landonniere, i by Morgues, by k Challusius, which were as brands by diuine hand plucked out of this Spanish combustion. The Petition or Supplication put vp by the Orphanes, Widowes, and distressed kindred of that massacred number to Charles the ninth, mentioneth nine hundred, which perished in this bloudie deluge.

o Gaspar Bens lib. 3. Botero parte 1. lib. 5.

The Spaniards hauing laid the foundations of their habitation in bloud, found it too slippery to build any sure habitation thereon. For their cruelties both to the French and Floridians were retorted vpon themselves, in the yeare 1567. by m M. Dominique de Gorgues, and his associates, assisted by the Natiue Inhabitants, and Florida was left destitute of Christian Inhabitants. Thus hath Florida bene first courted by the English, wooed by the Spanish, almost wonne by the French, and yet remaines a rich and beautifull Virgin, waiting till the neighbour Virginia bestow on her an English Bridegroom, who as making the first loue, may lay the iustest challenge vnto her.

Her riches are such, that n Cabeza de Vaca, (who was one of Naruaes wracked company, and Sotos Corriual in this Floridian sute, and had trauelled thorow a great part of the In-land) affirmed to Charles the Emperour, that Florida was the richest Countrey of the world, and that hee had therein scene gold and siluer, and stones of great value. Besides there is great varietie of o Trees, Fruits, Fowles, Beasts, Beares, Leopards, Ounces, Wolues, wilde Dogges, Goats, Hares, Conies, Deere, Oxen with woolly hides, Camels backes, and Horses manes. Sir Iohn Hawkins his second Voyage published by Master Hakluyt, mentioneth Vnicornes hornes amongst the Floridians, which they weare about their neckes, whereof the French-men obtained many peeces; and that they affirme there are many of those beasts with one horne which they put into the water before they drinke. Happily this might be a tale of the French, to sell such peeces deare to the English, or the horne of some other beast, or of the Sea-Vnicorne. Our Discourse hath most right vnto their Rites. For their many Cities, the manner of their building, the manners of their Inhabitants, I would not be so long. Morgues p hath let vs see them in the Pictures.

p America, parte 2. de Bry.

They wall or impale them with postes fastened in the ground, the circle as of a snail comming within that point where it beganne, and leauing a way but for two men to enter; at either end of that double empaling or entrance, stand two watch-towers, one within, the other without the Citie, where Watch-men alway are set for defence: their houses are round: their apparell nakednesse, except a beastes skinne, or some ornament of Mossie about their secret parts. They paint and rase their skinnies with great cunning; the smart makes them sicke seuen or eight dayes after; they rub ouer those rased workes, with a certaine hearbe, which coloureth the same so as it cannot be done done away. They paint their faces, and their skinnes cunningly (this Morgues a painter being iugde) euen to admiration. They let the nailes on their toes and fingers grow long: they are tall, nimble, comely.

They warre alway one Countrey vpon another, and kill all the men they can take, the women and children they bring vp: they cut off the haire of the head together with the skin, and drie it to reſerue the ſame as a monument of their valour. After their returne from the warres, if they be victorious, they make a ſolemne Feaſt, which laſteth three dayes, with dances and ſongs to the honor of the Sunne. For the Sun and Moone are their Deities. Their Priests are Magicians alſo and Phyſicians with them. They haue many Hermaphrodites, which are put to great drudgerie, and made to beare all their carriages. In neceſſitie they will eat coales, and put ſand in their pottage. Three months in the yeare they forſake their houſes, and liue in the woods: againſt this time they haue made their prouiſion of victuall, drying the ſame in the ſmoake. They meet in conſultation euery morning in a great common houſe, whither the King reſorteth and his Senators, which after ſalutation ſit downe in a round. They conſult with the Iawas or Prielt. And after this they drinke Caſſine, which is very hote, made of the leaues of a certaine Tree, which none may taſte that hath not before made his valour euident in the warres. It ſets them in a ſweat, and taketh away hunger and thirſt ſoure and twentie houres after. When a King dieth they burie him very ſolemnelly, and vpon his graue they ſet the cup wherein hee was wont to drinke: and round about the graue they ſticke many arrowes, weeping and faſting three dayes together without ceaſing. All the Kings which were his friends, make the like mourning: and in token of their loue cut off half their haire (which they otherwiſe weare long, knit vp behind) both men and women. During the ſpace of fixe Moones (ſo they reckon their moneths) there are certaine women appointed which bewaile his death, crying with a loud voice thrice a day, at morning, noone, and euening. All the goods of this King are put into his houſe, which afterwards they ſet on fire. The like is done with the goods of the Priests, who are buried in their houſes, and then both houſe and goods burned.

The women that haue loſt their husbands in the warres, preſent themſelues before the King ſitting on their heeles, with great lamentations ſueing for reuenge, and they with other widowes ſpend ſome dayes in mourning at their husbands graues, and carry thither the cup wherein he had wont to drinke: they cut alſo their haire neere the eares, ſtrewing the ſame in the Sepulchre. There they caſt alſo their weapons, They may not marrie againe till their haire be growne that it may couer their ſhoulders.

When any is ſicke they lay him flat on a forme, and with a ſharpe ſhell rafiſg off the ſkinne of his forehead, ſucke out the bloud with their mouthes, ſpitting it out into ſome veſſell. The women that giue ſucke, or are great with childe, come to drinke the ſame, eſpecially if it be of a luſtie yong man, that their milke may be bettered, and the childe thereby nourished, may be ſtronger.

Ribault at his firſt being there had fixed a certaine pillar of ſtone, engraueu with the Armes of France on a hill in an Iland, which Landomiere at his coming found the Floridians worſhipping as their Idol, with kiſſes, kneeling, and other deuotions. Before the ſame lay diuers offerings of fruits of the Countrey, roots (which they vſed either for food or Phyſick) veſſels full of ſweet oyles, with bowes and arrowes. It was girt about with garlands of flowers, and boughes of the beſt trees, from the top to the bottome. King Athore himſelfe performed the ſame honor to this pillar, that he receiued of his ſubjects. This King Athore was a goodly perſonage, higher by a foot and halfe then any of the French, repreſenting a kinde of Maieſtie and grauitie in his demeanure. He had married his owne mother, and had by her diuers children of both ſexes; but after ſhe was eſpouſed to him, his father Satonrioua, did not touch her.

This Satonrioua when he went to warre, in the preſence of the French vſed theſe ceremonies: The Kings his coadiutors ſitting around, he placed himſelfe in the miſt, at his right hand had a fire, and at his left two veſſels full of water. Then did he expreſſe Indignation and anger in his lookes, geſture, hollow murmurings, and loude cries, answered with the like from his ſouldiours: and taking a wooden diſh, turned himſelfe to the Sunne, as thence deſiring victorie, and that as he now ſhed the water in the diſh, so he might shed the blood of his enemies. Hurling therefore the water with great violence into the aire, and therewith besprinkling his souldiers he said, Do you thus with the blood of our enemies: and powring the water which was in the other vessell on the fire, so (saith he) may you extinguish your foes, and bring backe the skinnes of their heads. Ontina <sup>a</sup> or Vtina another King was an enemy to this Satanionia: he in his expedition which he made against his enemies (wherein he was assisted by the French) consulted with this Magician about his successe. He espying a French mans Target, demandeth the same, and (in the mids of the armie) placeth it on the ground, drawing a circle five foote over about it, adding also certaine notes and Characters: then did he set himselfe vpon the Target, sitting vpon his heeles, mumbling I know not what with varietie of gestures about the space of a quarter of an houre: after which he appeared so transformed into deformed shapes, that he looked not like a man, wreathed his limbes and his bones cracking with other actions seeming supernaturall. At last he returns himselfe as it were weary and astonished, and coming out of the circle saluted the King, and told him the number of their enemies and place of their encamping, which they found very true. This King was called Holata Ontina, which signifieth, a King, of Kings, and yet a few hundreths of men in his armie, which he <sup>x</sup> conducted in their ranks, himselfe going alone in the mids. They drie the armes and legges, and crownes of their enemies which they haue slaine, to make solemne triumph at their returne, which they doe, fastning them on poles pitched in the ground, the men and women sitting round about, and the Magician with an Image in his hand, mumbling curses against the enemy: ouer against him are three men kneeling, one of which beareth a stone with a club, and answereth the Magician at euery of his imprecations, the other two sing and make a noise with certaine Rattles.

Icon. 14.

They sow or set their corne rather, as in Virginia: and haue two seed-times, and two haruests, which they bring into a publike barne, or common store-house as they doe the rest of their victuals, none fearing to be beguiled of his neighbour. Thus doe these Barbarians enioy that Content, attended with Sobrietie and Simplicities, which we haue banished together out of our coasts: euery one distrusting or defrauding others, whiles either by miserable keeping, or luxurious spending, he (which is bad to all) is worst to himselfe. To this barne they bring at a certaine time of the yeare, all the Venison, Fish, and Crocodiles, (dried before in the smoke for the better preservation) which they meddle not with till need forceth them, and then they signifie the same to each other. The King may take thereof as much as he will. This prouision is sent in baskets on the shoulders of their Hermaphrodites, which weare long haire, and are their Porters for all burthens.

Icon. 16.

They hunt Harts after a strange manner: for they will put on a Harts skinne, with the legges and head on, so that the same shall serue them to stalke with, and they will looke thorow the eye and holes of the Hide, as if it were a visour, thereby deceiuing their game, which they shoot and kill, especially at the places, where they come to drinke. Their Crocodiles they take in a strange manner. They are so plagued with these beasts, that they keepe continuall watch and ward against them, as other-where against their enemies. For this purpose they haue a Watch-house <sup>z</sup> by the Riuers side, and when hunger driues the beast on shore for his prey, the Watch-men calls to men appointed: they come ten or twelue of them, bearing a beame or tree, the smaller end whereof they thrust into the mouth of the Crocodile (comming vpon them gaping for his prey) which being sharpe and rough, cannot be got out, and therewith they ouer-turne him, and then being laid on his backe, easily kill him. The flesh <sup>a</sup> tasteth like Veale, and would be sauory meat, if it did not sauer so much of a musky sent. Their sobrietie <sup>b</sup> lengtheneth their liues, in such sort that one of their Kings told me, saith Morgues, that he was <sup>b</sup> three hundred yeares old, and his father, which there he shewed me aliue, was fiftie yeares elder then himselfe: when I saw him, me thought I saw nothing but bones couered with skinne. His sinewes, veines, and arteries, saith Laudonniere, in description of the same man, his bones and other parts appeared so clearly thorow his skin, that a man might easily tell them, and discern the one from the other. He could not see, nor yet speake without great paine. Monsieur de Otigny

<sup>b</sup> Laudon saith two hundred and fiftie, but he saw them not himselfe, as this our Author did: this man gaue two Eagles to the French,

demanding of their age, the yonger of these two called a company of Indians, and striking twice on his thigh, laide his hands on two of them, he shewed that they were his sonnes: and striking on their thighs, he shewed others which were their sonnes, and so continued till the fift generation. And yet it was tolde them, that the eldest of them both might by the course of Nature liue thirtie or fortie yeares more.

They haue <sup>c</sup> a diuellish custome, to offer their first borne male children to the King for a sacrifice. The day of this dismall Rite being notified to the King, he goeth to the place appointed, and sits downe. Before him is a blocke two foote high, and as much thicke, before which the mother of the childe sitting on her heeles, and couering her face with her handes, deploret the death of her sonne. One of her friends offereth the childe to the King: and then the women which accompanied the mother, place themselves in a Ring, dauncing and singing, and shee that brought the childe, stands in the mids of them with the childe in her hands, singing somewhat in the Kings commendation. Six Indians stand apart, and with them the Priest with a Clubbe, where-with after these ceremonies, he killeth the childe on that block: which was once done in our presence.

Icon-34.

Another <sup>d</sup> religious Rite they obserue about the end of Februarie: they take the hide of the greatest Hart they can get (the hornes being on) and fill the same with the best herbs which grow amongst them, hanging about the Hornes, Necke, and Body, as it were Garlands of their choicest fruits. Hauing thus sowed and trimmed it, they bring the same with songs and pipes, and set it on a high tree, with the head turned toward the East, with prayers to the Sunne, that he would cause the same good things to grow againe in their land. The King and his Magician stand neere the tree and begin, all the people following with their Responde. This done, they goe their wayes, leauing it there till the next yeare, and then renewe the same ceremonie.

<sup>e</sup> Ribault: at his first comming had two of the Floridians aboard with him certaine dayes, who, when they offered them meat refused it, giuing them to vnderstand, that they were accustomed to wash their face, and to stay till sun-set before they did eate: which is a ceremonie common in all those parts. They obserue a certaine Feast called Toya, with great solemnitie. The place where it is kept is a great circuir of ground, swept and made neate by the women the day before: and on the feast day they which are appointed to celebrate the Feast, come painted and trimmed with feathers, and set themselves in order. Three <sup>f</sup> others in differing painting and gestures follow with Tabrets, dauncing and singing in a lamentable tune, others answering them. After that they haue sung, daunced, and turned three times, they fall to running like vnbridled Horses, through the middest of the thicke Woods: the Indian women continuing all the day in weeping and teares, cutting the armes of the young Girles with muskleshells, with hurling the bloud into the Ayre, crying out three times, He Toya. Those that ranne through the Woods, retorne two dayes after, and then daunce in the middest of the place, and cheere vp those which were not called to the Feast. Their daunces ended, they deuoure the meate, for they had not eate in three dayes before. The Frenchmen learned of a boy, that in this meane-while the Tawus had made inuocation to Toya, and by Magicall Characters had made him come that he might speake with him, and demanda diuers strange things of him, which for feare of the Tawus he durst not vtter.

are Tawus, which are priests, magicians, and physitians:

To prouoke them vnto reuenge against their enemies, they in their Feasts haue this custome: There is a Dagger in the roome, which one taketh, and striketh therewith one that is thereunto appointed, and then places the Dagger where hee had it, and anone reneweth the stroke, till the Indian falling downe, the women, Girles, Boyes, come about him, and make great lamentation, the men meane-while drinking Cassine, but with such silence, that not one word is heard: afterwards they applie Mosse warmed, to his side to heale him. Thus doe they call to minde the death of their Ancestors slaine by their enemies, especially when they haue inuaded, and retorne out of their enemies countrey without the heads of any of them, or without any Captiues.

But let vs take view of the more Southerly and Westerly parts of Florida beyond the

the point. Of Pamphilo Narvaez his vnfortunate Expedition yee haue heard. The whole historie written by one of his companie, Aluaro Nunez is extant in Ramusius, out of which I haue inserted such things as I holde most fit. At their landing in Cuba at la Trinita a tempest by land and sea assailed them, so furious, that it ouerthrew all the houses and Churches, making them to flie with no lesse feare of the trees falling on them, and holding six or seuen together, lest the wind should haue lifted them into the aire: they heard also (or feare so phantasied) the noyse of bells, cries, flutes, and other instruments making this dreadfull musicke, to which the hills, trees, and houses thus daunced: and after found one of the ship-Boats vpon the trees; the ships being perished. The first towne in Florida they came to was Apalachen, which had not about fortie small low cottages, so built by reason of continuall tempests. From thence they trauelled to Aute, by the way encountering a Giant-like people, with bowes as bigge as ones arme, eleuen or twelue spannes long, wherewith they shoot both exactly and forcibly, peircing good armours. A long time they held on an vnprofitable march, till many of them were slaine or consumed by sicknesse and famine, which made them bethinke them of building vessels there, to transport them. But their hard hap pursued them at Sea, and besides outward tempests, assaulted them with one inward (more implacable) of thirst, which forced them to drinke the sea-water yea, and that so greedily, that some died therewith presently. Neither would the Sea continue this hospitalitie (howsoeuer inhospitable) but hauing satisfied himselfe in the persons of some, and goods of all, betrayed the rest to the barbarous Indians, through many nations, of which they trauelled with as hard disaduentures as euer Virginia yeelded, euen when it was at worst; and let our most clamorous excepters be Iudges. Cold which then attended the Winter was exceeding sharpe, and they naked: and yet Famine was more terrible then cold, which made fiue of their companie eat vp each other, till only one remained. And no maruell; for famine, which will be a traueiler and sojourner in all places, hath seemed to fixe his habitation in these, and to hold all the nations adioyning vnder his lawlesse law, and tyrannicall subiection.

g They called this place Mal-faito.

The first Indians they met with, had one, & some both of their teats bored thorow, in the hollow wherof (with no little gallantry) they weare a Reed, two spans & a halfe long, & two fingers thick: and likewise for greater brauerie, weare another lesse Reed thorow their nether lip. They liued in these parts two moneths (which was the season of certain roots growing vnder the water, which they then liued on) at other times in other places, with fish and what they can find. When one of them hath a sonne dead, all of the kinred & people mourne for him a yeare, at morning and noone, and then burie him. These exequies they obserue to all but the old folkes, of which they hold no such account, as hauing already liued out their time. They haue amongst them Physicians or Priests, whose dead bodies they burne with great solemnitie, & make poulder of the bones, which the kinsmen a yeare after drink. These may haue more wiues, the rest but one. When any brother or son is dead, those of that house in three moneths space, seeke not abroad for their food, though they die of famin, leauing that care to their kinsfolks and neighbors, which somtimes almost sterue their cures. The Physicians vsed to heale with breathing on the sicke & touching them, they beleeuing that if stones and hearbs haue such faculty being applied, much more man, as a more excellent creature: they wold needs haue these Spaniards such Physicians, who (if you beleue them) did many cures with great admiration, but could not cure their famin & captiuitie in many years.

h Al. Nunez his peregrination thorow many sauage Nations.

This our Author fled from these to the Queuenes & Marianes, which 3. months in the yeare leaue their former habitations, to go seeke a kind of fruit called Tune, of the bignes of an egge, black & of good tast. These are festiuall months to these festiuall nations, eating & drinking the iuyce of these Tune, yea, many moneths afore comforting their present famine, & pacifying their croking entrailes, with hope of the approaching Tune-season: & thus with words they solaced *Aluaro*s impatient hunger six moneths before he could thus indeed satisfie it. Their houses are Mats vpon foure Arches, shifted euery second or third day, to seek food. They sow nothing, hauing as well a Dogs ease as hunger, yea (like some of Duke Humfries gallant guests) they set a good face on the matter, and passe the time in mirth and dauncing, when sometimes their teeth daunce

not in foure dayes together. They doted so superstitiously on their dreames, that vpon this dream-warning they would kill their sonnes, and without so much, would leaue their daughters to be deuoured of beasts, lest (said they) they should grow vp (as the times then were) by marriages with them, to increase the number of their enemies. They haue two or three kinds of bad roots, and sometime fish, or Venison, but all rare. They eat Ants egges, wormes, serpents, frogges, earth, wood, dung of wilde beasts, and keep the bones of fishes and serpents to grinde and eate afterwards. Their women and old men are put to beare their burthens and drudgeries. They are molested with three sorts of flies, whose biting leaues a seeming leproy: they vse smokie fires in their rooms, almost with the price of their eyes, sauing their skins: others carrie firebrands in their hands, and therewith set all things as they passe on fire, both to preuent them, and to hunt their game into fittest places for their taking the same. They haue kine as bigge as in Spaine, with small hornes and long haire, 400. leagues alongt the cuntry.

Much like was the state of the Canagadi, Camoni, Auauares, Malicones and other Floridian Nations. These keep no reckoning of time by the Sunne or Moone, but (like Plantus his Parasite) by the bellie, which is Magister artis in obseruing the seasons of their fruits and fish. They tell strange things of an euill spirit, which in fearfull apparitions did astonish them, and cut their flesh. All these Indians haue a custome, not to lie with their wiues after they know them once conceiued, till two yeares after their deliuerie, and the mothers giue them sucke<sup>i</sup> (he saith) till they be twelue years old, and are able to get food for themselves: which they did because of the famine in those parts, whereby they would otherwise haue died. If any sicken by the way, they leaue him there to die, except he hath a father or brother which will carrie him (in this their fleeting habitation) on their necks. They vpon any discontent, diuorce themselves & marrie to others, except they haue had children together: and in mutual contentions they come to buffers & bastonados, till wearines on their wiues part them, but neuer deale with deadly weapons, & sometimes seporate themselves and their families, til time waite away their indignation, and then returne. Yet are they fierce and politick in warre.

biggs.

These Nations, and the Sufolas, Comos, Camoles, Quitones, and other names of Barbarisme, vse Tobacco, and a drink made of the leaues of certaine trees boyled with water, and put vp into certaine vessels, which they drinke as hot as they can endure, crying meane-while, who will drinke? And when the women heare this crie, they suddenly stand still, without stirring any way, although they be laden; they beleeuing that if any woman should then moue her selfe, some euill thing would enter into the drink, wherof they must die soone after: & therefore if any such accident happen, they cast all away; and likewise if a woman passe by whiles they are brewing it, if the vessel be vncovered. When the women haue their naturall fluxe, they must be their owne Cooks, but for no bodie else. They haue some men married to other men, being attired in habit of women, & performing only womanly offices. In some places as they passed, their Phisicians (which commonly are in sauage Nations Magicians and Priests) had rattles of Gourds, which they suppose to com fro heauen, & to haue great vertue, none other daring to touch them. Some vsed for boyling wilde gourds, not by putting fire vnder, but by heating stones continually in the fire, and putting into the liquor till it seethe. Some people on the Mountaines, for a third part of the yeare eate nothing but a powder made of straw. In some places were trees of such venomous qualitie, that the leaues thereof in standing waters would poyson whatsoeuer dranke thereof. Some acknowledged a certaine man in heauen called Aguar, who gaue them raine & all good things. All these people as he passed with a Negro and two others, (after he had escaped some of his first Masters which held him in hard slauerie) held them for children, of the Sunne, and therefore receiued them with great reuerence, and festiuall pomp, and conueyed them stil to the next nation Westward towards the South Sea, till they came to Spaniards: alwaies vsing to robbe those people to whom they deliuered them of their little wealth, which departed from the same with the greater content, because they serued the next people (and so successiuelly) with like sawce. They found some rich fables of muskie sent, and emeralds. They were out in this Expedition and captiuitie, ten yeares before they could recouer Spaine, from 1527. to 1537.

These things following Ortelius<sup>k</sup> saith, he had from his Nephew Calim Ortelius, by the relation of an eye-witnesse: The King giueth, or selleth rather, to euery man his wife. If a woman commit adulterie, she is bound to a tree, her armes and legges stretched out all day, and sometimes whipped. A woman, three houres after she is deliuered of a childe, carries the Infant to the riuer to wash it. They obserue no discipline in their families with their children. They haue fleas, which bite so eagerly, that they leaue a great deformitie like a leproie after. They haue winged Serpents, one of which I saw, saith<sup>l</sup> Nicolaus Challusius, the wings whereof seemed to enable it to flie a little height from the ground. The inhabitants were very carefull to get the head thereof, as was thought, for some superstition. Botero<sup>m</sup> saith, that they haue three sorts of Harts, and of one of them make the same commodities which we doe of our Kine, keeping them tame, and milking them. The Spaniard hath three Garrisons on the coast of Florida, S. Iacomo, S. Agostino, and S. Philippo.

They are<sup>n</sup> much addicted to vncery, and yet abstain from their wiues after conception knowne. When<sup>o</sup> Ferdinando Soto entred Florida, he there found amongst the Indians one John Ortiz a Spaniard, which by the subletie of the people, vnder colour of deliueing a Letter which they had fastened to a cleft cane, was taken and liued twelue yeares with them, Veita the Lord of the place made him his Temple-keeper, because that by night the wolues came and carried away the dead corps. He reported that these people are worshippers of the Diuell, and vse to offer vnto him the life and blood of their Indians, or of any people that they can come by: and when he will haue them do that sacrifice vnto him, he speaketh vnto them, and tells them that he is a thirt, and enioynes them this sacrifice. They haue a Prophecie, That a white people should subdue them; wherein the French and Spanish haue hitherto failed in their attempts, Soto hauing in his greedy hopes neglected the many commodities he might haue enioyed, to finde greater, was brought to such dumps that he thereon sickened, and after died. But before he tooke his bed, he sent to the Cacique of Quigalta, to tell him, that he was the childe of the Sunne, and therefore would haue him repaire to him: he answered, That if he would drie vp the Riuer, he would beleue him. And when he was dead, because he made the Indians beleue that the Christians were immortall, the Spaniards sought to conceale his death. But the Cacique of Guachoya busily enquiring for him, they answered, that he was gone to heauen, as many times he did, and had left another in his place. The Cacique thinking he was dead, commanded two yong and well proportioned Indians to be brought thither, saying, it was their custom to kill men, when any Lord died, to waite on him by the way: which their cruell courtesie the Spaniards refused, denying that their Lord was dead. One Cacique asked Soto what hee was, and why he came thither, he answered, that he was the sonne of God, and came to teach them knowledge of the Law. Not so, saith the Cacique, if God bids thee thus to kill, steale, and worke all kinde of mischief.

For their crudelitie in like case, Laudonniere telleth, that a strange and vheard-of lightning hapned within a league of their fort, which consumed in an instant 500. acres of meadow, being then greene, and halfe couered with water, together with the foules that were therein. It continued burning three dayes together, and made the Frenchmen think, that for their sakes the Indians had set fire on their dwellings & were gone to some other place. But a certaine Paracouffy, which is one of their pettie Kings, or Caciques, sent to him a Present, beseeching him to command his men that they should shoot no more towards his dwelling, thinking that the Ordinance had caused all this; which occasion he vsed to his own good, by arrogating that to himselfe which he saw their simplicitie conceiued of him. Within two dayes after this accident, fell such an heate, that the Riuer (I thinke) was readie to seeth: and in the mouth of the Riuer were found dead therewith, fishes enow to haue laden fiftie Carts, whereof issued by putrefaction, much sicknesse.

Calos is neere the Cape of Florida. The King therof made his subiects beleue, that his sorceries and charms were the cause that made the earth bring forth her fruit, and that he might the easier perswade them, he retired himselfe once or twice a yeare to a certaine house, accompanied with two or three of his friends, where he vsed incantments.

ments. If any man offered to see what he did, it cost him his life. Every yeare he offereth a man in the time of haruest, which was kept for that purpose, and taken of such Spaniards as had suffered shipwracke on that coast.

They which further desire to know the riches and commodities of these Countries, may resort to the Authors in this Chapter mentioned: Sir Francis Drake, in the yeare 1586, besides his worthy exploits in other places, tooke the forts of S. Iohn and S. Augustine; whence he brought Pedro Morales, and Nicholas Burgoignon, whose relations concerning that country M. Hackluit hath inserted among other his painfull labours.

David Ingram reported many strange things which he saith he saw in these parts, Elephants, Horses, and beasts twice as bigge as Horses, their hinder parts resembling Grey-hounds; Bulls with eares like Hounds; beasts bigger then Beares, without head or neck, but having their eyes & mouths in their breasts: and another beast, Cerberus he calls him Colluchio, which is (saith he) the Diuell in likenesse of a Dog, & sometimes of a Calfe; with many other matters. wherein he must pardon me, if I be not too prodigall of my faith. He tells also of punishment of adulterie by death, the woman cutting the adulterers throat, and the neereft kinsman, hers, after many prayers to the Colluchio, and a further punishment, in that they have no quick body buried with them to attend them into the other world, as all others have. But they that list to beleue, may consult with the Author. Antonie Goddard (another of Ingrams companie, left by Sir Iohn Hawkins) going another way, at Panuco yeilded himselfe to the Spaniards: with whom was Miles Philips and Iob Hortop, whose discourses of their disadventures with the Spaniards & Indians, M. Hackluit hath published; & hath Goddards also written.

CHAP. VIII.

hitherto wee haue discovered those parts of this Northerne America, which trend along the North sea, which the English & French nations haue most made knowne vnto vs: further Westward the midland countries are not so wel known; yet following our Spanish guides we here present them from their relations to your view. When as Cortez had conquered Mexico, as after followeth to be related, he was made Admirall of the South Seas, but the gouernment of Mexico and New Spain was, with the title of Viceroy, giuen to Don Antonio de Mendoza. These two, partly in emulation of each others glorie, partly in hope of enriching themselves, sought to discover vnkown lands; the one by Sea; the later, both by sea and land.

The Viceroy sent as he himselfe testifieth, Francis Vasquez de Coronado, and Frier Marco de Niza, with Stephen a Negro by land: out of whose relations we haue inserted that which concerneth our purpose. Marke the Frier, and Stephen set forth with certaine Indians in this Discouerie: and Stephen going before, came to Ceuola, as Marke related, where he was slain: the Frier followed with his Indian guides, and passed thorough one place where was small store of victuall, because it had not there rained, as the Inhabitants affirmed, in three yeares space. The Indians call him Hayota, that is, a man come from heauen. He passed on further, ledde by the fame of Ceuola, which with other six Cities were reported to be vnder the gouernment of one Lord, and to haue houses of stone, consisting of diuers stories, where were many Turqueses, with many other strange reports of their markets, multitudes, and wealth. But because the Frier came not there for feare of the Negros entertainment, let vs listen to c Francis Vasques, who came, saw, and ouercame. Ann. 1540. he went with his Armie from Culiacan, which is 200. leagues from Mexico, & after a long and tedious iournie, he at last arriued in this prouince, & conquered (almost with the losse of himselfe) the first Citie of the 7. which he called Cranado. Twice he was stricken down with stones from the wall, as he offered to scale the same: he saith that their houses were of foure or siue stories or lofts, to which they ascended on ladders; and that they had sellers vnder the ground, good, & paued. But those seuen cities were small towns, all standing in the compasse of foure leagues, all called by that generall name of Cenola or Cibola, and none of them particularly so called, but hauing other peculiar names, they were of like building. In this town which he conquered stood 200. houses, walled about, and 300. others not walled. The Inhabitants had before remoued their wiues and wealth to the hill. He reporteth of beasts there, beares, tygres, lions and sheep as big as horses, with great hornes. & little tailes, Ounces also and stags. That which the Indians worshipped (as far as they could learn) was the water, which, said they, caused the corne to grow, and maintained their life. He found there a garment excellently embroidered with needle-worke. Vasques went hence to Tiguez, to Cicuic, and to Quiuira, as Lopez de Gomara reporteth. This way is full of crooke-backed Oxen. Quiuira is in fortie degrees, and the country is temperate. They saw ships in the Sea, which bare Alcatrazes or Pelicans of golde and siluer in their prowes, laden with merchandise: which they tooke to be of China or Catheu.

Quiuira.

The men in these parts cloth & shooe themselves with leather: they haue no bread of any kinde of graine: their chiefe food is flesh, which they often eate raw, either for custome, or for lacke of wood. They eate the fat as they take it out of the Ox, & drink the blood hot (which of our bulls is counted poison) and the flesh they warme (for they seeth it not) at a fire of Ox-dung. They rather may be said to rauen, then to eate it: and holding the flesh with their teeth, cut it with rasors of stone. They goe in companies as the Seythian Nomades, Tartarian hoords, & many other nations, following the seasons and best pasturings for their Oxen. These oxen are of the bignes & colour of our buls, but their hornes are not so great. They haue a great bunch vpon their shoulders, & more haire on their fore-part, then on the hinder: and it is like wooll. They haue, as it were, a horse-mane on their back-bone, & much haire, & very long, from their knees downwards. They haue great tufts of haire on their foreheads, and haue a kind of beard vnder their chins and throats. The males haue very long tailes, with a great knob or flock at the end: so that in some respect they resemble a Lion, in other the Camels, Horses, Oxen, Sheep, or Goats. They push with their hornes, and in their rage would ouertake and kill a horse: for the horses fled from them, either for their deformitie, or because they had neuer seene the like. The people haue no other riches: they are vnto them meat, drinke, apparell: their hides also yeeld them houses, & ropes; their bones, bodkins: their sinews and haire, thread: their hornes, mawes, and bladders, vessels: their dung, fire: the Calues-skins, budgets, wherewith they draw and keep water.

Gomara also mentioneth their sheepe, which they so call because they haue fine wooll and hornes: they are as big as horses; their hornes weigh fiftie pound weight a peece. There are also Dogges which will fight with a Bull, and will carrie fiftie pound weight in Sackes when they goe on hunting: or when they remoue from place to place with their heards.

f Taking of Tiguez.

The Winter is long and sharpe, with much snow in Cibola, and therefore they then keepe in their Cellers which are in place of Stoues vnto them. In the height of seven and thirtie degrees, at Tiguez, the cold was so extreme, that the horses and men passed ouer the Riuer vpon the Ice. They there tooke a town<sup>f</sup> after fise and fortie daies siege, but with much losse and little gaine. For the Indians killed thirtie horses in a night: and in another slew certaine Spaniards, sent Ouando vp into the country (they could not tell whether for sacrifice or for the shew) and wounded fiftie horses: they drunk snow in stead of water: and seeing no hope to hold out, made a great fire, and cast therein all they had of worth, and then went all out to make way by force; where they were all in manner slaine, but not vnreunged, forcing some Spaniards to accompanie them into the Regions of death, and wounding many more, both men and horses. The snow continueth in these parts halfe the yeare. Quiuira is more Northerly, and yet more temperate. The Spaniards returned to Mexico in the end of the yeare 1542. to no small grieue of Mendoza, who had spent in this expedition six thousand Duckats. Some Friers stayed, but were slaine by the people of Quiuira, onely one man escaped, to bring newes to Mexico.

Sir Francis Drake sailed on the other side of America to fortie degrees of Northerly latitude, and with cold was forced to retire, although the Sun followed him all the way way from Guatulco hither (which he sailed from the sixt day of Aprill to the fift day of June) as if that most excellent and heauenly Light had delighted himselfe in his societie, and acknowledged him for his sonne, more truly then the Spaniards (whereof anon we shall heare) or that Phaeton of the Poets, not able to compasse this compassing journey: once, he was so good a scholer and learned the sunnes instruction so well, that hee followed him in a waterie field, all that his fctie circle, round about this earthly Globe, carried with the mouing winde (as it were airie wings) new starres, Ilands, Seas, attending and admiring the English colours: and first of<sup>b</sup> any General, loosed the girde of the world, and encompassing her in his fortunate armes, enjoyed her loue. But I loose my selfe while I finde him: and yet excellent names, I know not how, compell men to stand awhile, and gaze with admiration, if not with adoration. This our English Knight landed on this coast in thirtie eight degrees, where the Inhabitants presented themselves vnto him, with presents of feathers, and kalls of net-worke, which he requited with great humanitie. The men went naked, the women knit loose garments of bull-rushes about their middles. They came a second time, and brought feathers, and bags of Tobacco; and after a long Oration of one that was Speaker for the rest, they left their bowes on a hill, and came downe to our men: the women meane while remaining on the hill, tormented themselves, tearing their flesh from their cheekes, whereby it appeared that they were about some sacrifice. The newes being further spread, brought the King thither, which was a man of goodly stature: many tall men attended him: two Embassadours with a long Speech of halfe an houre, signified his coming before. One, went before the King with a Scepter or Mace, whereon hanged two Crownes with three chaines: the Crownes were of knit-worke, wrought artificially with diuers coloured feathers, the chaines of a bonie substance. The King followed clothed in conieskinnes: the people came after, all hauing their faces painted with white, black, and other colours, euery one bringing his present, euen the very children also. The Scepter-bearer made a loud speech of halfe an houre, taking his words from an other which whispered the same vnto him, which with a solemne applause being ended, they came all down the hill in order without their vveapons: the Scepter-bearer beginning a song and dancing, vvherein all the rest followed him. The King, and diuers others, made severall Orations or Supplications to the Generall, to become their King: and the King with a song did set the Crowne on the Generalls head, and put the chaines about his neck, honouring him by the name of Hiob. The common sort leauing the King and his guard, scattered themselves, with their sacrifices, among our people, taking view of all, and to such as best pleased their fancie, which were the yongest, offered their sacrifices, with weeping, scratching, and tearing their flesh, with much effusion of blood. The English mistook their deuotions, & directed them to the living God: they shewed againe their vvwounds, vvhereunto the other applied plaisters and lotions. Euery third day they brought their sacrifices, till they perceiued that they were displeasing. And at the departure of the English, they (by stealth) prouided a sacrifice, taking their departing very grievously. They found heards of Deere feeding by thousands, and the Countrie full of strange Conies, headed like ours, vvith the feet of a Want, and taile of a Cat, hauing vnder their chins, a bagge, into which they gather their meat when they haue filled their bodie abroad. There is no part of this earth, wherein there is not some speciall likelihood of gold or siluer. The Generall named the Countrie<sup>k</sup> Nova Albion.

In the yeare 1581. <sup>l</sup> Augustine Ruiz, a Frier, learned by the report of certaine Indians called Conchos, that toward the North there were certaine great Townes, not hitherto discovered by the Spaniards: whereupon, he, with two other companions of his owne Order, and eight Souldiers, went to seeke these parts, and to preach vnto them. They came vnto the Prouince of los Tiguas, two hundred and fiftie leagues Northwards from the mines of S. Barbara, where one of the Friars was slaine by the Inhabitants. This caused the Souldiers to returne back, but the Friars staid still behinde. The Franciscans fearing the losse of these their brethren, procured Antonio de Espejo<sup>m</sup> to vnder- take this journey, with a companie of Souldiers. He passing the Conchos, the Paslaquates, the Toboses, came to the Patarabueyes, which is a great Prouince, and hath many Townes, their houses flat roofed, and built of lime and stone, their streets orderly placed. The people are of great stature, and haue their faces, armes, and legges tased and powned. Here were many Lakes of salt-water, which at a certaine time of the yeare waxeth hard, and becommeth very good salt. The Caciques kindly entertained them with victualls and other presents, especially hides, and Chamois skins very well dressed, as well as those of Flanders: And passing many dayes iourney further Northwards, they came where the houses were foure stories high, well build, and in most of them, stoues for the winter season. The men and women weare shooes and boots with good soales of neats leather, a thing not elsewhere to bee seene in the Indies. In this Prouince they found many Idols, which they worshipped: and particularly they had in euery house an Oratorie for the Deuill, whereinto they ordinarily carrie him meat: and (as the Papists erect Crosses, vpon high-waies) so haue this people certaine high Chappells, very well trimm'd and painted, in which they say the Deuill vseth to take his ease, and to recreate himselfe as he trauaileth from one Towne to another. In the Prouince of Tiguas there were sixteene Townes, in one of which the Friars aforesaid were slaine. Sixe leagues from thence was the Prouince Los Quires which worship Idols as their Neighbors: they saw there certaine Canopies, wherein were painted the Sunne, Moone, and many Starres. It is in 37th. Hence they passed, keeping still their Northerly course, and found a Prouince called Cuames, where were fise Townes, one of which was Chia, which contained eight Market places, the houses were plaistered and painted with diuers colours: they presented them curious mantles, and shew'd them rich minerals. Beyond this they came to the Amcies, and fiftene leagues thence, to Acoma, which is situate vpon a Rock: and hath no other entrance but by a ladder, or paire of staires, hewen in the same Rock: all their water was kept in Cisterns. They passed hence to Zuny, which the Spaniards call Cibola, and there found three Spaniards, left by Vasques fortie yeares before, which had almost forgotten their owne language Westward from hence they came to Mohotze, where were exceeding rich mines of siluer, as likewise in some of the other. These parts seeme to incline toward Virginia.

M. Perez.

Cinaloa, and
their customs.

Martin Perez a Iesuite writeth of these Inland parts, from Cinaloa 1591. that the flies about the Mountaine Tepesuan (in deg. 23.) are so troublesome, as no beast can abide there: the Cimmechi are warlike Indians. Some Spaniards kept there, which heard Masse scarcely once in a yeare. The Prouince of Cinaloa is watered with eight Rivers, the soile fertile and aire holtsome: extending three hundred miles Northwards, and within two daies iourney of New Mexico. The people weare many ear-rings in fifty holes which they make for that purpose, so that they are forced to sleepe with their faces vpwards. The women are clothed beneath the waste, aboue naked. Both they and the men vveare long haire tied vp on knots, with Corals and shels therein: They are a handfull higher then the Spaniards, valiant, vse poisoned arrowes, peaceable at home, terrible in warre, haue many languages. Some of them haue familiaritie and commit abominable finnes with the Deuill. They vse Polygamie, and thinke it not vnseemly to vse the Mother, Sister, Daughter, as furthering domestike Peace. Thus respect they affinitie, but of Consanguinitie are very religious. They correct not their Children. Their marriages are solemnised after consent of Parents on both sides, with dances; the consummation is staied till fit age of the parties, to whom they then leaue a house and household. They obserue a custome to make Gentlemen or Knights, giuing a bow, and then setting him to fight with a Lyon or wild beast, the death of which is the life of their Gentilitie. When one adopteth another, a stake is thrust into his throat, causing him to vomit all in his belly, and (as it were) his former birth together. They are great gamsters, their play like that of Dice: in which they carrie themselves very patiently without swearing or wording, and yet will loofe the clothes from their backs, goe home naked. If any be dangerously sick, a graue is digged and stands open, in which they bury him presently being dead, or else burne him together with his house and stuffe, and there couer the ashes; sprinkling the Sepulchre with certaine dust, whereof they make a drinke, and eat and drinke themselves drunke.

L. T. Toletus.

Ludonius Tribaldus Toletus in his Letter to M. Hakluis 1605. writeth of one John Onnate who in the yeare 1599. trauailed fise hundred leagues from the old to New Mexico. He sent his Nephew to Acoma (a Towne strongly fortified by Nature) to truck with them, whom they deceitfully slue with his sixe Companions. Onnate in reuenge, takes and kills the Indians and fires their dwellings: forced a great Citie to sweare obedience to the King of Spaine, and another Citie also greater then the former. They built a Towne named St. Iohns: found mines of gold and siluer: hunted the heards of Cibola. In the yeare 1602, he made another Expedition to the Lake of Comibas, on the banke whereof was a Citie seuen leagues long, and two in breadth, the houses built scattering with hills and pleasant Gardens betweene. The Inhabitants all had fortified themselves in the Market place which was very large: the Spaniards departed without assault. Neare California were found large Hauens before vnknowne; and the Spaniards determined to build Forts.

Now that we haue heard of the In-land Discoueries by the Spaniards, and that North Albion of St. Francis Drake, let vs take some view of the Spanish Nauigation on these Coasts.

Cortes the Conquerour of Mexico sent Francis de Villosa with a fleet for discouerie, in the yeare 1539, from Acapulco, which came to Santa Cruz in California. They sailed ouer the Gulfe, and came to the Riuer of St. Peter and St. Paul, where they beheld, on both sides, a goodly Country. I am loth to hold on with them in their voiage, lest I faile from my scope, and leaue the offended Reader behinde me. Here they found in their course burning Mountaines, which cast vp fire, ashes, and smoke in great quantitie. They encountered with a cruell storme, and being almost out of hope, they saw, as it were, a candle vpon the shrowdes of the Trinitie (one of their ships) which the Marriners said was St. Elmo, and saluted it with their Songs and Prayers. This is the darkenesse of Poperie, to worship a naturall light: yea that which hath little more then being, and is an imperfect Meteor, is with them more perfect then humane, and must participate in diuine worships. Without the gulfe of California they found store of great fish, which suffered themselves to be taken by hand: also they saw weedes floating on the Sea, fifty leagues together, round, and full of gourdes, vnder them were store of fish, on them store of fowle: they grow in fifteen or twenty fadom depth. They caught with their Dogs, a beast very fat, haired like a Goat, otherwise resembling a Deere: in this, neither, that it had sours dug like vnto a Cow full of milke. But because they had little dealing with the Inhabitants, I leaue them, and will see what Fernando <sup>b</sup> Alarcon can shew vs of his discouerie. He was set forth by Antonio de Mendoza the Viceroy, in the yeare of our Lord 1540. with two ships. Hee came to the bottome of the Bay of California, and there found a mightie Riuer, which ranne with such furious violence, that they could scarce saile against it. Here leauing the ships with some of his companie, he passed vp with some peeces of Ordnance, and two boates: and so drawing the boates with halsers, they made vp the Riuer called Buena Guia: they were encountered with the Indian Inhabitants, who forbad them landing, but Alarcon hurling his weapons downe, and pulling out certaine wares to giue them, appeased their furie, and caused them also to lay downe their weapons, and receiue of him some trifles, which he gaue them. Two leagues higher many Indians came and called to him: these were decked after a strange manner, some had painted their faces all ouer, some halfe way, others had visards on with the shape of faces: they had holes in their nostrils, whereat certaine pendants hung, others ware shells, hauing their eares full of holes, with bones and shells hanging thereat. All of them ware a girdle about their waste whereunto was fastned a bunch of feathers which hung downe behinde like a taile: They carried with them bagges of Tobacco. Their bodies were traced with cole, their haire, cut before, hung downe long behinde. The women ware bunches of feathers before and behinde them. There were foure men in womens apparell. Alarcon perceiued by signes, that the thing they most reuerenced, was the Sunne, and therefore signified vnto them, that he came from the Sunne; whereat they maruelled, and tooke curious view of him with greater reuerence then before; brought him abundance of foode, first flinging vp part of euery thing into the Aire, and after, turning to him to giue him the other part; offering in their Armes to carrie him into their houses, and doing else whatsoever he would haue them. And if any stranger came, they would goe and meet him, to cause him to lay downe his weapons, and if he would not, they would breake them in peeces. Hee gaue the chiefe of their small wares. They needed not pray them to helpe draw the boate vp the streame, every one laboured to get hold of the Rope: otherwise it had beene impossible to haue gotten vp against the Current. Hee caused Crosses to bee made and giuen them, with instruction to honour them, which they did with extasie of blinde zeale, kissing them, and lifting them vp, euery one comming for them till hee had not paper and sticks enough for that purpose.

And as he passed further, he met with one which vnderstood his Interpreter, and asked of him many questions, to which he answered that he was sent of the Sunne, which the other doubting, because the Sunne went in the skie he said that at his going downe and rising, he came neare the Earth, and there made him in that Land, and sent him hither to visit this Riuer and the People, and to charge them not to make further warres one vpon another. But why, saith the Indian, did he send you no sooner? he answered, because before he was but a child. A long Dialogue thus passed betwixt them, the issue whereof was that the Indians cried out, they would all receive him for their Lord, seeing he was the child of the Sunne, and came to doe them good. This vse did he make of their superstitious obseruation of the Sunne, which they worshipped because he made them warme (said they) and caused their croppes to grow, and therefore of all things which they eate, they cast a little vp into the aire to him. They warre one vpon another (a thing common to all Sauages) for small occasions: the eldest and most valiant guided the armie (for in some places they had no Lord;) and of those which they tooke in the warre, some they burned, and from some they plucked out the hearts, and eate them. Alarcon caused a Crosse to be made of Timber, commanding his owne people to worship it, and leauing it with the Indians, with instructions euery morning at the Sunne-rise to kneele before it. This they tooke with great deuotion, and would not suffer it to touch the ground, vntill they knew it by questioning, how deep they should set it, with what composition of gesture to worship it, and the like curiosities of Paganish Christianitie. He was told, that this Riuer was inhabited by three and twenty languages, that they married but one woman to one man, that Maides before marriage conuerfed not with men, nor talked with them, but kept at home and wrought: adulterie was death: they burned the dead: widowes staid halfe a yeare or a whole year before they married againe. Euery familie had their seuerall Governour, other Rule they had none. The Riuer vsed at some times to overflow the banks. These people told Alarcon, that in Ceuola they had many blew stones, or Turqueses, which they digged out of a Rock of stone, and when their Governours died, all their goods were buried with them: that they eate with Napkins, many waiting at Table: that they killed the Negro before mentioned, because hee said hee had many brethren, to whom they thought he would giue intelligence, and therefore killed him. An old man told him the names of two hundred Lords and people of those parts. This old man had a sonne clothed in womans attire, of which sort they had foure: these serued to the 9 Sodomiticall lusts of all the vnmarried yong-men in the Countrey, and may not themselves haue to deale with any woman. They haue no reward for this their beastiall trade, but haue libertie to goe to any house for their foode: when any of them die, the first sonne that is borne after, succee-des in their number.

CHAP. IX.

Of New Spaine, and the conquest thereof by Hernando Cortes.

NOW are we safely arrived out of the South<sup>a</sup> Sea, and North unknowne Lands, where we haue wildered our selues, and wearied the Reader, in this great and spacious Countrey of New Spaine. New Spaine is all that which lieth betweene Florida and California, and confines on the South, with Guatimala and Iucatan; how it came to be so called, asketh a long discourse, concerning the Conquest thereof by Cortes, whose Historie is thus related.

Hernando<sup>b</sup> Cortes was borne at Medellin in Andulozia, a Province of Spaine, Anno 1485. When he was nineteene yeares old he sailed to the Iland of St. Domingo, where Onando the Gouvernour kindly entertained him. He went to the conquest of Cuba in the yeare 1511, as Clerke to the Treasurer, vnder the conduct of James Velasques, who gaue vnto him the Indians of Manicorao, where he was the first that brought vp Kine, Sheepe and Mares, and had herds and flocks of them: and with his Indians hee gathered great quantitie of gold, so that in short time hee was able to put in two thousand Castlins for his stock, with Andres de Duero a Merchant. At this time Christopher Morante had sent (Anno 1517.) Francis Hernandes de Cordona, who first discovered Xucatan, whence hee brought nothing (except the relation of the Countrey) but stripes: whereupon James Velasques in the yeare 1518. sent his kinsman John de Grijalua, with two hundred Spaniards in four ships: he traded in the Riuer of Tauasco, and for trifles returned much gold, and curious workes of feathers, Idols of gold, a whole harnesse or furniture for an armed man, of gold thinne beaten, Eagles, Lyons, and other portraictures found in gold, &c. But while Grijalua deferred his returne, Velasques agreed with Cortes to be his partner in the Discouerie, which he gladly accepted, and procured licence from the Gouvernours in Domingo, and prepared for the Voiage.

Velasques afterward vsed all meanes to breake off, in so much that Cortes was forced to engage all his owne stock, and credit, with his friends in the Expedition, and with five hundred and fiftie Spaniards in eleuen ships, set saile the tenth of Februarie 1519. and arrived at the Iland of Acusamil. The Inhabitants at first fled, but by the kinde entertainment of some that were taken, they returned, and receiued him and his with all kinde offices.

They told him of certaine bearded men in Yucatan, whither Cortes sent; and one of them, Geronimo de Aguilar came vnto him, who told him, that by shipwrack at Jamaica, their Caruell being lost, twentie of them wandred in the boat without saile, water, or bread, thirteene or fourteene daies, in which space the violence of the Current had cast them on shore in a Province called Maija, where, as they trauelled, seuen died with famine; and their Captaine Valdina and other foure were sacrificed to the Idols by the Cacike, or Lord of the Countrey, and eaten in a solemne banquet, and he with six other were put into a coupe or cage, to be fatned for another Sacrifice. But breaking prison, they escaped to another Cacike, enemy to the former, where all the rest died, but himselfe, and Gonsalo Guerrer a Marriner. Hee had transformed himselfe into the Indian Cut, boring his Nose full of holes, his eares iagged, his face and hands painted, married a wife, and became a Captaine of name amongst the Indians, and would not returne with this Aguilar.

Cortes with this new Interpreter passed vp the Riuer Tauasco, called of the former Discouerer, Grijalua, where the Towne that stood thereon, refusing to victuall him, was taken and sacked. The Indians herewith enraged, assembled an Armie of fortie thousand, but Cortes by his Horse and Ordnance preuailed: the Indians thinking the Horse and Rider had beene but one Creature, whose gaping and swiftnesse was terrible vnto them, whereupon they submitted themselves. When they heard the Horses ney, they had thought the horses could speake, and demanded what they said: the Spaniards answered, these Horses are sore offended with you, for fighting with them, and would haue you corrected: the simple Indians presented Roses and Hennes to the beasts, desiring them to eate and to pardon them.

Cortes purposed to discouer further Westward, because hee heard that there were mines of gold, hauing first receiued their vassallage to the King his Master. to whom (he said) the Monarchie of the Vniuersall did appertaine. These were the first Vassalls the Emperor had in New-Spaine. They named the Towne, where these things were done, Vitorie, before called Potonchan, containing near fise and twentie thousand houses, which are great, made of lime, and stone, and brick, and some of mud-walls and rafters, covered with straw; their dwelling is in the vpper part of the house, for the moistnesse of the soile. They did eate mans flesh sacrificed.

The Spaniards sailed Westward, and came to Saint Iohn de Vltima, where Tenidilli, the Gouvernour of the Countie, came to him with foure thousand Indians. He did his reuerence to the Captain, burning Frankincense (after their custome) and litle Strawes, touched in the bloud of his owne bodie: and then presented vnto him Victualls, and Jewells of gold, and other curious workes of Feathers; which Cortes requited with a Collar of Glasse, and other things of small value. A woman slaue, giuen him at Potonchan, vnderstood their language, and shee, with Aguilar, were his Interpreters. Cortes professed himselfe the seruant of a great Emperour, which had sent him thither, whose power he so highly extolled, that Tenidilli maruelled, thinking there had beene no such Prince in the world as his Master and Soueraigne, the King of Mexico, whose Vassall he was, named Mutezuma. To him he sent the representations of these bearded Men, and their Horses, Apparrell, Weapons, Ordnance, and other rarities, painted in Cotton clothes, their Ships, and Numbers. These painted Cottons he sent by Posts, which deliuered them from one to another with such celeritie, that in a day and night the message came to Mexico, which was two hundred and ten miles distant. Cortes had demanded, whether Mutezuma had gold? Tenidilli affirmed, and Cortes replied, That hee and his fellowes had a disease of the heart, whereunto gold was the best remedie.

Spanish incurable sickness.

Mutezuma sent him many Cotton cloathes of diuers colours, many tusses of feathers, two wheeles, the one of siluer, with the signe of the Moone, and the other of gold, made like the Sunne, which they hold for Gods, and giue vnto them the colours of the mettalls most like them. Each wheele was two yards and a halfe broad. These with other parts of the present were esteemed worth twentie thousand Ducats. Mutezuma also professed ioy, to heare of so great a Prince, and so strange people, and promised prouision of all necessaries; but was very vnwilling that Cortes should come to see him, as he pretended. Yet Cortes persisted in that his desire of seeing Mutezuma, that he might further acquaint himselfe with the knowledge of those parts.

The silly Indians hauing neuer seene such strange sights, came daily to the Campe to see them: and when they heard the Ordnance discharged, they fell downe flat, thinking the heauens had fallen: the ships they thought were the God of the aire; called Quetzalcozolt, which came with the Temples on his back, for they daily looked for him. Amongst the rest, or rather aloofe off from the rest, were certaine Indians of differing habit, higher then the other, and had the gristles of their Noses slit, hanging over their mouthes, and rings of Iet and Amber hanging thereat: their neather lips also bored, and in the holes rings of gold and Turkesle-stones, which weighed so much, that their lips hung ouer their chinnes, leauing their teeth bare. This vglinessse they accounted gallantrie, and such vncouth deformitie to be the only brauerie. And thou gallant that readest and deridest this madnesse of Fashion, if thine eyes were not dazeled with lightnesse (light I cannot call it) of selfe-reflected Vanitie, mightest see as Monster-like fashions at home, and more fashionly monster of thy selfe; thy cloathes and oathes, thy gestures gestures and vestures, make thy naked Deformity worse then their thus deformed nakednesse: both indeed seeme to haue receiued some hellish character (if there may be bodily representation) of that old Serpent in these new fashions, striving who shal shape himselfe neerest to that mishapen vglinesse, whetein the Indian iaggges himselfe out of humane lineaments, the other swaggers himselfe further out of all ciuil and Christian ornaments. But these fashion-mongers haue made me almost out of my fashion, and to forget my selfe, in remembring their forgetfulnesse.

These Indians of this new Cur, Cortez caused to come to him, and learned that they were of Zempoallan, a City distant thence a daies journey, whom their Lord had sent to see what Gods were come in those Tencallis, that is, Temples (so, it seemeth, they called the shippes:) which held no conuersation with the other Indians, as being not subiect to Mutezuma, but onely as they were holden in by force. Hee gaue them certaine toyes, and was glad to heare that the Indians of Zempoallan, and other their neighbours were not well affected to Mutezuma, but ready, as far as they durst, to entertaine all occasions of war with him. He sailed from thence to Panuco, and passed the Riuer farther, till he came to a little Towne, where was a Temple, with a little Tower, and Chappell on the top, ascended by twenty steps, in which they found some Idols, many bloody Papers, and much mans blood, of those which had bene sacrificed; the blocke also wheron the cut open those Sacrifices; and the razors made of flint, wherewith they opened their breasts, which stricke the Spaniards with some horrour and feare. They passed a little further; and there hauing taken possession, in the Emperours name, of the whole Countrey, they founded the Towne De la vera Cruz, Cortez resigning his authority, and Officers being elected; and lastly, all with generall consent appointing Cortez their Capitaine.

Cortez went forward to Zempoallan, where he was solemnly receiued and lodged in a great house of Lime and Stone, whited with plaister, that shined in the Sun, as if it had bene siluer; so did the siluer conceits of the Spaniards imagine, the desire of that mettall hauing made such an impression in their imagination, that they told Cortez before he came at it, they had seene a house with wals of siluer. Here, and at Chiauitlan, Cortez incited them to rebell against Mutezuma, and to become seruants to the Spaniards, which they did: and he vnder-hand so wrought, that Mutezuma tooke him for his friend.

All his intent was to fish in troubled waters, and to set them both by the eares, that he might watch opportunity to benefit himselfe. His owne people rebelled, some of whom hee chastised with the halter and the whippe for example to the rest: and after caused all his shippes to bee sunke closely, that they should not minde any returne. Hee left an hundred and fifty men for the Guard of the New Towne, vnder Pedro de Henrico, and with foure hundred Spaniards, fiteene hortes, and sixe peeces of Artillery, and thirteene hundred Indians, they went from Zempoallan; and came to Zacloran, the Lord whereof was Olintler the subiect of Mutezuma, who to testifie his ioy; and to honour Cortez, commanded fiftie men to be sacrificed, whose blood they sawe new, and fresh.

They carried the Spaniards on their shoulders, sitting on Beeres, such as wheron they vse to carry dead men. He bragged as much of the power of Mutezuma, as the Spaniards of their Emperour. He said he had thirty vassals, each of which was able to bring into the field an hundred thousand men of war, and sacrificed twenty thousand men yeerely to the Gods: in this he somewhat exceeded; the other was true, although some yeeres the sacrifices also were thought to amount to fifty thousand. This Towne was great, and had thirteene Temples, in each of which were many Idols of stone of diuers fashions, before whom they sacrificed men, Doves, Quails, and other things with great perfumes and veneration. Heere Mutezuma had five thousand souldiers in Garrison. Cortez passed from thence to Mexico by the frontiers of Tlaxcallon; which were enemies to Mutezuma, whom hee might easily haue ouercome, but reserved partly for the exercise of his subiects to the war, partly for the sacrifices to his gods.

These ioyned an hundred and fifty thousand men against Cortez, taking him for Mutezuma's friend: and yet every day sent him Guinney-cockes and bread, partly to espie his strength, and partly in a bravery, lest their glory should be obscured in the conquest of men already steruen. But when in many skirmishes and fights they could not preuaile against that handfull of Spaniards, they thought they were preserved from harme by enchantments: and sent him three presents with this message; That if he were that rigorous god which eateth mans flesh, hee should eat those five slaues which they brought him, and they would bring him more: if he were the meeke and gentle God, behold frankincense, and feathers: if he were a mortall man, take heere fowle, bread, and cherries. At last they made peace with him, and submitted their Citie to him. Their Citie Tlaxcallan was great, planted by a Riuer side, which issued into the South-sea. It had foure streets, each of which had their Captaine in the time of war. The gouernment was an Aristocracy, hating Monarchie no lesse then tyranny. It had eight and twenty Villages, and in them an hundred and fifty thousand households, very poore, but good warriors. They had one market-place so spacious, that thirty thousand persons in a day came thither to buy and sell by exchange: for money they had none.

Chololla.

Mutezuma  had sent before to Cortes, and promised tribute to the Emperour, whatsoever should be imposed; onely he would not haue him come to Mexico. And now he sent againe, that he should not trust that new friendship with the beggerly Nation of Tlaxcallan, and they againe counselled him not to aduenture himselfe to Mutezuma . Cortes held his determination for Mexico, and being accompanied with many of the Tlaxcantexas he went to Chololla, a little from whence Mutezuma  had prepared an armie to entrap him in the way; but he finding the trechery, it redounded vpon the Cholollois, the same day they had thought to haue executed the same vpon him. For this end they had sacrificed ten children, five males, and as many females, three yeeres old, to Quetzalcoatl  their God, which was their custome when they began their war. He out-going them in their owne art of subtilty, entrapped their Captaines in Counsell, and sent his armie to spoile the Citie, where were slaine thousands. There were twenty Gentle-men, and many Priests which ascended vp to the high Tower of their Temple, which had an hundred and twenty steps, where they were burned, together with their gods and Sanctuary.

Store of Temples and deuotions.

This Citie had twenty thousand households within the walles, and as many in the Suburbs. It shewed outward very faire and full of Towers, for there were as many Temples as dayes in the yeere, and euery one had his Tower. The Spaniards counted foure hundred Towers. It was the Citie of most deuotion in all India, whither they travelled from many places far distant in Pilgrimage. Their Cathedrall Temple was the best and highest in all New Spaine, with an hundred and twenty steps vp to it. Their chiefe god was Quetzalcoatl , god of the Aire, who was (they say) founder of their City, being a Virgin, of holy life and great penance. He instituted fasting, and drawing of blood out of their eares and tongues, and left precepts of Sacrifices. He neuer ware but one garment of Cotton, white, narrow, and long, and vpon that a Mantle, beset with certaine red crosses. They haue certaine greene stones which were his, and are kept for great reliques: one of them is like an Apes head. Eight leagues from Chololla is the hill Popocatepec, or smoake-hill, which the Earth seemeth to haue erected as a Fort to encounter and assault the aire: now with smoaky mists endeavouring to choak his purer breath, another while with violent flames, and naturall fire-workes threatning to ioyne league with his elder and superiour brother to disinherit him: sometimes with showres of ashes and embers, as it were, putting out the eyes, and sometimes with terrible and dreadfull thunders, rending the eares of that Airy Element; alwaies (such is the euent of warre) hurting and wasting it selfe, to endamage the enemy. The Indians thought it a place of Purgatory, whereby tyrannical and wicked officers were punished after their death, and after that purgation passed into glory. The Spaniards aduentured to see it, but two onely held on their journey, and had there beene consumed, had they not by a rocke beene shadowed from the violent eruption of the fire which then happened. It chanced that the Earth, weary it seemeth of the warre, as hauing spent her store and munition, agreed on a truce which continued ten yeeres: but in the yeere 1540. it brake forth into more violent hostility then before, quaking and renting it selfe with vnbridled passion and whereas the Aire had alwayes a snowie garrison about her high tops, and frontires to coole and quench her fiery shoures, yet these did but kindle a greater flame, the ashes whereof came to Huexozinco, Quetzacocon, Tepiacac, Chololla and Tlaxcallan, and other places, ten, or as some say, fiftene leagues distant, and burned their hearbes in their Gardens, their fieldes of corne, trees and clothes that they laid a drying. The Vulcan Crater, or mouth whence the fire issued, is about halfe a league in compasse. The Indians kissed their garments (an honour done vnto their gods) which had aduentured themselves to this dreadfull spectacle.

Cortes drawing neere to Mexico, Mutezuma feared, saying, These are the people which our gods said should come and inherit this Land. Hee went to his Oratory, and there shut vp himselfe alone, abiding eight dayes in prayer and fasting, with Sacrifice of many men, to asslake the fury of his offended deities. The Diuell biddes him not to teare and that he should continue those bloody Rites, assuring him that hee should haue the gods Vitziliputzli and Tescatlipuca to preferue him, saying, That Quezalcoatl permitted the destruction at Chololla, for want of that bloody sacrifice. Cortes passed a hill sixe miles in height, where by the difficulty of the passage, and of the cold (being alway couered with snow) the Mexicans might easily haue prevented his passing further. Hence hee espied the Lake, whereon Mexico and many other great Townes did stand, Ixtacpallapan a Towne of ten thousand households, Coyocan of six thousand, Vizilopucheli of five thousand. These Townes are adorned with many Temples and Towers, that beautifie the Lake. From Ixtacpallapan to Mexico is two leagues, all on a faire Causey, with many draw-bridges, thorow which the water passeth.

Mutezuma receiued Cortes with all solemnity on the eight of November 1519. into this great Citie, excusing himself of former unkindnes the best he could. Of his house, and Maiestie and the diuine conceit the people had of him, wee shall speake after more fully, as also of the Temples, Priests, Sacrifices and other remarkable things of Mexico.

Mutezuma provided all things necessary for the Spaniards and Indians that attended them: euen beddes of flowers were made, in place of litter for their horses. But Cortes disquieted with those thoughts which commonly attend ambition (discontent in the present, hopes and feares of the future) vsed the matter so, that he tooke Mutezuma prisoner, and detayned him in the place appointed for the Spaniards lodging, with a Spanish Guard about him, permitting him otherwise to deale in all priuate or publike affaires, as before. Heereupon Cacama, Lord of Tezcuco, nephew to Mutezuma, rebelled, but by treachery of his owne people was presented prisoner to Mutezuma. Hee, after this summond a Parliament, where he made an Oration vnto his subiects, saying, * That he and his Predecessours were not naturals of the Countrey, but his Fore-fathers came from a farre Country; and their King returned againe, and said, hee would send such as should rule them. And he hath now sent these Spaniards, saith he. Heereupon he counselled them to yeelde themselves vassals to the Emperour, which they did at his command, though with many teares on his part and theirs, at this farewell of their liberty. Mutezuma presently gaue to Cortes, in the name of tribute, a great quantity of Gold and other jewels, which amounted to sixteene hundred thousand Castlins of Gold, besides Silver.

* The like speech he had made at first to Cortes, who easily wroughton that aduantage applying this Tradition to the Spaniards, Cortes, Narrat.

Cortes had hitherto a Continuall victory in Mexico without any fight: but newes was brought him of Pamphilo de Naruaes, who was sent with eighty horse, and some hundredes of Spaniards by Velasques, to interrupt the proceedings of Cortes: who leauing two hundred men in Mexico, with two hundred and fifty other came suddenly in the night, and tooke Naruaes Prisoner, and returned to Mexico with Naruaes his company, now his followers also, where he found his men exceedingly distressed by the Citizens, for a murther committed in the great Temple at a solempne Feast, where in a religious daunce, they were slaine, for the rich garments and iewels they ware, by the Spaniards. Cortes came in good time for the reliefe of his men: and Mutezuma caused the Mexicans to bridle their rage, which presently was renued, and when Mutezuma was againe by his Guardians, the Spaniards, caused to speake to the people: a blow of a stone on his temples wounded him, whereof three daies after he died.

Cortes had some thousands of the Tlaxoltecas to helpe him, but was driven to flee from Mexico with all his Spaniards and Indians, which he did closely in the night, but yet an alarme was raised, and the bridges being broken, much slaughter of his people was made by the Mexicans, and all his treasure in manner lost. They pursued after him also, and had two hundred thousand in the field: when it was Cortes his good hap to slay the Standard-bearer, whereupon the Indians forsooke the field. This battell was fought at Otumpan.

At Tlaxcallan, he and his were kindly enterrayned; they had prepared before 50 thousand men to goe to Mexico for his helpe, and now they promised him all offices of loyalty and seruices. With their helpe he subdued Tepeacac; and built certaine Brigandines, or Frigats, which were carried many leagues on the backs of those Indians, and there fastened and finished, without which he could neuer haue won Mexico.

In Tezcuco certaine Spaniards had bene taken, sacrificed and eaten, which Cortes now reuenged on them. Eight thousand men had caried the loose peeces and timber of this Nauy, guarded with twenty thousand Tlaxcallans, and a thousand Tamemez or Porters, which carried victuals attending. They calked them with Tow, and for want of Tallow and Oyle, they vsed mans grease, of such as had bene slaine in the wars. For so the Indians vsed, to take out the gresse of their sacrifices. Cortes had beere nine hundred Spaniards, of which fourescore and six were horse-men, three cast peeces of iron, fifteen small peeces of Brasse, and a thousand weight of powder, and 10000 Indian souldiers on his side. He made a sluice or trench about twelue foot road, and two fathome deep, halfe a league long, in which 40000 men wrought fifty dayes. He lanced his Vessels, and soone ouercame all the Canoas of the Lake, of which were reckoned in all 5. thousand. The Spaniards brake the Conduits of sweet water, wherewith the Citie was wont to be serued.

Quabutimoc now the new King of Mexico, receiuing encouragement from the diuinish Oracle, caused to breake downe the Bridges, and to exercise whatsoeuer wit or strength could doe in defence of his Citie, sometimes conquering, sometimes (as is the doubtfull chance of warre) conquered. Cortes had in Tezcuco ordained a new King, a Christian Indian, of the royall bloud, who much assisted him in this siege. The Spaniards being Lords of the Lake, and of the Causey, by helpe of their Galliot and Ordinance, they fired a great part of the Citie. One day the Mexicans had gotten some advantage, and thereupon celebrated a Feast of Victory. The Priests went vp into the Towers of Tlatelulco, their chiefe Temple, and made there perfumes of sweet Gummes, in token of victory, and sacrificed forty Spaniards, which they had taken captiues, opening their breasts, and plucking out their hearts for offerings to their Idols, sprinkling their bloud in the Ayre, their fellowes looking on, and not able to reuenge it. They slew likewise many Indians, and foure Spaniards of Alvarado's company, whom they eat in the open sight of the Army. The Mexicans danced, dranke themselves drunke, made bone-fires, stricke vp their Drummes, and made all solempne expressings of ioy. Dread, Disdain, and all the Furies that passion or compassion could coniure vp, had now filled the Spaniards hearts and their Indian partakers: and Cortes, that hitherto had hoped to reserve some part of the Citie, now did the vtmost that Rage and Reuenge could effect, helped no lesse within with Famine and Pestilence, then with sword and fire without. At last Mexico is rased, the Earth and Water sharing betwixt them what the Fire had left, and all which had sometime challenged a lofty inheritance in the Ayre. Their King also was taken; all that mighty State subuerted: And as the Mexicans before had prophesied, That the Tlaxantleca's should againe build the Citie, if conquered, for them; if conquerors, for the Spaniards. It was re-built with a hundred thousand houses, fairer and stronger then before. The Siege lasted three Moneths, and had therein two hundred thousand Indians, nine hundred Spaniards, fourescore Horses, seuentene Peeces of Ordinance, thirteene Galliot, and six thousand Canoas. Fiftie Spaniards were slaine, and six Horses: of the Mexicans a hundred thousand, besides those which died of Hunger and Pestilence.

This was effected Anno. 1521. on the thirteenth day of August, which for for that cause is kept festiuall euery yeere. For the Discription of the Country wherein Mexico is situate, Cortes in his second Narration to the Emperour saith, it is enuironed with hilles: (He telleth of some hilles also in his journey wherein diuers of his people died with cold) in the middest is a plaine of 70. leagues compasse, and therein two lakes which extend the circuit of 50. leagues; the one salt which ebbeth and floweth, (an argument for Patritius his opinion, that salteneſſe is a chiefe cause of that vicissitude of ebbing and flowing, in the Ocean) the other fresh: When the water of the salt Lake increaseth, it runneth like a violent streame into the fresh Lake, which when it decreaseth, is repaid againe by the like issue of this into the former.

Nunno di Gusman* hath written his expedition into Mechoacan and other Countries of New-Spaine 1530. subduing and taking possession for the Emperour: He found some of them Sodomites, others Sacrificers of mens flesh, and some cloſly practising this burchery after they had professed themselves Christians: none of them which durst looke a Horse in the face, but were afraid that that beast would eat them. The seuerall peoples by him reckoned would heere be tedious to name: which we may say of the like made by Godoy and Aluaredo*. Of the customes of the ancient Mexicans one of Cortes his Gentlemen hath written a Treatise* extant in Ramusius, wherein are described their Citie, Temples, Rites of Sacrifice, and the like; as after followeth out of him and others.

CHAP. X.

Having now declared the subuersion of this State and Kingdome by the Spaniards, I hold it not amisse to looke backe vpon the first people which heere inhabited, with the beginnings and proceedings of the Mexican Empire. The first inhabitants of New-Spaine were very barbarous and sauage, which liued onely by Hunting, and for this reason were called Chichimecas. They liued naked, solitary in the Mountaines, without Tillage, Policie, or any religious Ceremonies: their wiues followed the same Hunting exercise, leauing their children tied in a Panier of Reedes to the boughes of some Tree. They did eat what they got in Hunting, raw. They eat also Snakes and Lizards, which they offered likewise in sacrifice to the Sunne, whom onely they worshipped, and that without any Image: they offered to him Fowles, from the Butter-flie to the Eagle. And some remnants of the like beastly men (as is said before) are yet found, which doe great hurt, and will not, by either cunning or force of the Spaniards, be reduced to any other course. They seeme to haue learned the Sauage nature of the wilde Beasts, of whom and with whom they liue. By this meanes it came to passe, that this wilde Mountainous people left the best and most fertile part of the Countrey vnpeopled, which certaine remote Nations possessed, whom they called Navatalcas, for their ciuility. These came from those Northerne parts, which now they call New Mexico. The Navatalcas paint their beginning and first Territory in manner of Caves (because of their seuen Tribes) and men comming out of them. By the supputation of their Bookes this departure was about eight hundred yeeres since, and (by reducing to our accompt) about the yeere of our Lord 720. Four score yeeres they staid on the way, the cause whereof they ascribe to their Gods, which speake visibly to them, and bad them seeke new Lands that had such signes as they notified.

b Navatalcas signifieth well-speakers.

Thus they proceeded in seeking those signes, and peopled the best partes, still removing their habitations as they found more fertill Countries, leauing onely the aged, sicke, and weary, with a few others to remaine in the former. And by these leisuely proceedings they entred the Land of Mexico, about the yeere 902, after our accompt. Those seuen Nations came not all at once; but first the Suchimilcoas, next the

the Chalcas, and thirdly the Tepanetans, fourthly those of Tescuco, after them the Tlalluicans : the sixth were the Tlascaltecan, which helped the Spaniards to conquer Mexico, and therefore are exempted from tribute to this day. These expelled, as their Histories say, certaine Gyants, whom in pretence of friendship they had invited to a banquet, and in their drunkenness stole away their weapons, and slew them. Neither doth this seeme a fable; for at this day are found dead mens bones, of incredible bignesse. I saw a tooth (saith Acosta) at Mexico, in the yeere 1586, as big as the fist of a man, and according to this, all the rest was proportionable. Three hundred and two yeares after the first transmigration, those of the seventh Cave or Line arrived, which is the Mexican Nation : they worshipped the Idoll Vitzliputzli, and the Devill ipake and governed this Nation. He promised to make them Lords over all, which the other six Nations possessed, and to give them a Land plentiful in riches : whereupon they went forth, carrying their Idoll with them in a Coffin of Reedes, supported by foure of their principal Priests, with whom he talked, and communicated his Oracles and Directions. He likewise gaue them Lawes, and taught them the Ceremonies and Sacrifices they should obserue. And euen as the pillar of Cloud and Fire conducted the Israelites in their passage thorow the Wildernesse, so this apish Devill gaue them notice when to aduance forwards, and when to stay. The first thing they did wheresoeuer they came, was to build a house or Tabernacle for their Vitzliputzli, which they set alway in the midst of their Campe, and there placed the Arke in the midst of the Altar. This done, they sowed the Land, and if their God commanded to gather, they did so, and if to raise their Campe, they obeyed, leauing the aged, sicke, and weary, to gather their fruits, and to dwell there. The chiefe Captaine whom they follow was called Mexi, whence the name of their Citie and Nation. Their Idoll perswaded them, when some were bathing themselves in certaine Lakes, to remoue the Campe closely, and steale away their cloathes : whereat they which were thus forsaken, changed their language and manner of life, retaining alway their hatred to the Mexicans. They peopled the Prouince Machouacan, From hence to Mexico is fifty leagues, and vpon the way is Malinalco, which they say was peopled by a Witch and her family, whom by the commandement of their God they left behind, closely remouing the army by night. They stayed in a place called Tuta, where by stopping a Riuer, they drowned a Plaine, and planted it round with Willowes and other Trees; and many liking the place, talked of staying there : whereat their God offended, threatened the Priests, and in the night slew those which had consulted of staying. Their hearts were found pulled out, and their stomackes opened, which, after that, they obserued in their Sacrifices. The Mexicans, by the aduise of their Idoll, proceeded, and by force made way through the Caalcas, and sent to the Lord of Culhuacan, who granted them the place of Ticaapan to dwell in, which was full of Snakes and venomous Beasts, which by the helpe of their God they tamed. He would not suffer them to stay there, but commanded them to proceede, and to seeke forth a woman, whom they should name the Goddesse of Discord. Whereupon they sent to the King of Culhuacan, to demand his daughter to be Queene of the Mexicans, and mother of their God; who easily condescended, and sent his daughter gorgeously attyred. The same night she arrived, by order of their God, she was murdered, and slayed, and a young man was couered with her skinne, with her apparrell thereon, and being placed neere the Idoll, was consecrated a Goddesse, and mother of their God, euer after worshiping the same, making an Idoll which they call Tocay, that is, our Grand-mother. The King of Culhuacan hereupon warred against them, and chased them out of those parts, by which meanes they came to the place where Mexico now is. Heere certaine old Priestes or Sorcerers, entering into a place full of Water-Lillies, they met with a very faite and cleare current of Water, with Trees, Medowes, Fish, and other things : all verie white which were the signes their God had giuen them of their promised Land. In the night following, Vitzliputzli appeared in a dreame to an ancient Priest, saying, That they should goe seeke out a Tunal in the Lake, which grew out of a stone, vpon which they should see an Eagle feeding on small Birdes, which they should hold for the place where their Citie should be built, to become famous through the World. Heereupon, the next day they all assembled, and diuiding themselves into bands, made that search with great diligence and deuotion.

In their search they met with the former Water-course, not white (as it was then) but redde like blood, diuiding it selfe into two streames, one of which was an obscure Azure. At last they espied the Eagle with wings displayed toward the Sunne, compassed about with many rich feathers of diuerse colours, and holding in his Talions a goodly bird. At this sight they fell on their knees, and worshipped the Eagle, with great demonstrations of ioy and thanks to Vitzliputzli. For this cause they called the Citie, noxtiltan. e Mexico Te-which there they founded e, Tenoxtiltan, which signifies, Tunal, on a stone; and to this day carrie in their armes an Eagle vpon a Tunal, with a bird in his Talion.

The next day following, by common consent, they made an Heremitage, adioyning to the Tunal of the Eagle, that the Arke of their God might rest there, till they might haue meanes to build him a sumptuous Temple. This they made of Flagges and Turfes, couered with Straw. Afterwardes they consulted to buy of their neighbours Stone, Timber, Lime in exchange of Fish, Fowles, Frogges, and other things which they hunted for in the Lake: by which meanes they procuring necessaries, built a Chappell of Lime and Stone, and laboured to fill vp part of the Lake with rubbish. The Idoll commanded, that they should diuide themselves into foure principall quarters about this house, and each part build therein: to which he enioyned certaine Gods of his appointment, called Calpulteco, which is, Quarter-Gods. This was the beginning of Mexico.

This diuision seemed not equall to some of the Ancients, who valued their deserts farre above their allotted portion who therefore separated themselves, and went to Tladedulco: whose practises against the Mexicans caused them to chuse a King, to which Soueraigntie was chosen Acamapitzli, Nephew to the King of Culhuacan, and of the Mexican blood by the fathers side. Him by embassage they demanded, and obtained in the name of their God, with this answer from the King of Culhuacan: Let my grand-child goe to serue your God, and be his Lieutenant, to rule and gouerne his Creatures, by whom we liue; who is the Lord of Night, Daie, and Windes: Let him goe and bee Lord of the Water and Land, and possesse the Mexican Nations, &c. Acamapitzli the first King of Mexico.

Hee was solemnely welcommed by the Mexicans: Welcome thou art (sayth an Orator f Many of these Orations are expressed in Acofta's sequenth booke at large full of wittie inventions and Rhetoricall flourishes. tour vnto him in their name) to this poore House and Citie, amongst these Weeds and Mud, where thy poore Fathers, Grandfathers, and Kinsfolkes endure what it pleaseth the Lord of things created. Remember Lord, thou comest to be our defence, and to be the resemblance of Vitzliputzli, not to rest thy selfe, but to endure a new charge: with manie wordes of that effect, expressed in the Mexican Histories, reserved by tradition; the children to that end learning them by heart, and these being as presidents to them which learned the Art Oratorie. After this, they were sworne, and he crowned. The Crowne was like that of the Dukes of Venice. His name Acamapixtli signifieth a handfull of Reedes, and therefore they carrie in their Armories a hand, holding manie Arrowes of Reedes.

The Mexicans at this time were tributaries to the Tapanecans, whose chiefe Cittie was Azcapuzalco: who iudging, according to the nature of Enuie and Suspicion, that they were so much weaker how much the stronger they saw their neighbours, thought to oppresse them by a strange policie, in imposing an vncouth, and (in shew) impossible tribute: which was that they should bring the Tapunecan King a Garden, planted and growing in the water. In this their distresse, Vitzliputzli taught them to doe it, by casting earth vpon Reedes and Grasses layed in the Lake, and planting in this moving Garden Maiz, Figges Gourds and other things, which at the time appointed they carried growing and ripe: a thing often since prooued in that Lake, emulous no lesse of that glorie, to be accounted one of the Wonders in that New World, then those pensill Gardens, towred vp in the Ayre at Babylon, both here and there the reason of man, according to his naturall priuiledge, subiecting to his vse the most rebellious Elements of Ayre and Water.

Acamapixtli, the Mexican King, after hee had reigned fortie yeares, dyed, leauing Vitzliputzli the second King.
it to their choise to chuse his Successour. They chose his Sonne Vitzliputzli, which signifieth a rich Feather : They annointed him with an Ointment, which they call Divine, being the same wherewith they annoynt their Idoll.

Of their Coronation thus * Lopez de Gomara sayth, that this was done by the High Priest, attyred in his Pontificalibus, attended with many others in Surplices, the Ointment was as blacke as Inke. They blessed him and sprinkled him foure times with Holy Water, made at the time of the consecration of their God. Then they put vpon his head a Cloth, painted with the bones and skuls of dead men, clothed him with a blacke garment, and vpon that a blew, both painted with figures of skuls and bones. Then did they hang on him Laces, and bottles of Pouders, whereby he was deliuered from diseases and Witchcrafts. Then did he offer Incense to Vitzliputzli, and the High Priest tooke his Oath, for the maintenance of their Religion, to maintaine Iustice and the Lawes; to cause the Sunne to giue his light, and the Clouds to raine, and the Earth to bee fruitful, &c. Lastly, followed the acclamations of the people, crying, God save the King, with dances, &c.

Izcoalt. 4.

He being crowned and hauing receiued homage of his Subiects, obtained the King of Azcapuzalco his daughter to wife, by whom he had a sonne called Chimalpopoca, and procured a relaxation of tribute from his father in Law. Hee was deuout in his superstitions: hauing reigned thirteene yeares, he dyed. His sonne then but ten yeares old, was chosen in his roome, but was soone after slaine by the Inhabitants of Azcapuzalco. The Mexicans enraged with this iniurie, assembled them themselves, and an Orator, among many other wordes tels them, That the Sunne is eclipsed and darkened for a time, but will returne suddenly in the choise of another King. They agreed vpon Izcoalt, which signifieth a Snake of Rasors, the sonne of Acamapixtli their first King. The common people were earnest with this new King for peace with the Tapanecans, for the obtaining whereof they would carrie their God in his Litter for an intercessor. This was hindered by Tlacaellec the Kings Nephew, a resolute and valiant young man, who also with perill of his life, vnderooke and Embassage to Azcapuzalco and there desired the King annointing him with the ointment of the dead, after their mannner. The commons of Mexico were herewith offended, and to pacifie them, the King indented with them, That if hee lost the Field, they should eate him and his Nobles: they on the other side promising, if he did ouccome, to become his Tributaries (for before they enioyed much freedome) and to labour in his Fields and Houses, and to become his seruants in Warre and Peace. In fine, such was the valour of Tlacaellec the Generall, that the enemies were overthrowne, their Citie sacked, and the remainder of them made tributarie, the lands and goods of the conquered being diuided among the Conquerours, and some reseruet to each quarter of Mexico, for the vse of their Sacrifices.

Moteczuma the first King.

Cuyacan had the next place in the Mexican Conquests: who hauing inuited the Mexicans to a banquet, in the end thereof sent for the last seruice, womens habits, which they forced them to put on: but Izcoalt and Tlacaellec made them know, by their ruine, the manhood of the Mexicans. They subdued also the Suchimilcos, and Cuitlavaca, a Citie in the Lake; Tescuco, yeelded it selfe. Izcoalt after twelue yeares died, and Moteczuma the first was chosen in his stead.

Presently after his Election they conducted him to the Temple with a great traine, where before the Diuine Harth (so called in regard of the continuall fire there kept) they enthronized him. The King there drew blood from his eares and legges with a Griffons talions as a Sacrifice, and was congratulated with many Orations of the Priests, Auncients, and Captaines. And whereas before they had accustomed, in their Elections to make great Feastes and Daunces, and wasted many Lights; Hee brought in the custome, personally to make warre in some Prouince, thence to procure Sacrifices, to feast their Gods and men. This he performed at Chalco, from whence hee brought many Captiues, which on the day of his Coronation were sacrificed and eaten. At this Feast all his Tributes were brought in with great solemnitie, each Prouince marching by it selfe, besides innumerable Presents. All Commers were bountifully entertained, and the poore were clad with new garments, given them by the King. The Chalcas had taken a brother of Moteczuma, and would haue made him their King,

King, but hee enioyning them to make a high Scaffold, ascended thereon, and telling them, the Gods would not permit that to be a King, he should bee a Traitor vnto his Countrey, cast downe himselfe; whose death Moteczuma reuenged with the ruine of that whole Nation, conquering further vnto the North and South Seas, by the counsell and courage of Tlacaeleac. This King instituted new Ceremonies, and increased the number of the Priestles: hee built the great Temple of Vitzliputzli and sacrificed great number of men at the dedication. Hauing Raigned eight and twentie yeares, hee died.

Tlacaelel was chosen his successour by the foure Deputies, and the two Lords of Tescuco and Tacuba (these were the Electors) but refused the Empire, as being fitter for the common good, as an instrument to another, then if himselfe welded the Scepter. At his nomination they chose Ticocic, sonne of the late King, and piercing his nothrills, for an ornament put an Emerald therein. He, in seeking captives for the solemnitie of his Coronation, lost more of his owne people, and after foure yeares was poysoned by his malecontent Subiects.

Axayaca his brother succeeded, altogether of another spirit. In his time died Axayaca. Tlacaelles, chiefe Authour of the Mexican greatnesse, whom before in his age they vsed to carrie in his Chaire, on mens shoulders, to counsell. Hee was buried more solemnely then any of the Kings, and his sonne was made Generall for the warres. Axayaca conquered Tequantepec, two hundred leagues from Mexico, thence to furnish the bloudie Solemnities of his Coronation. Hee added to his Conquests Guatulco on the South Sea: in single combate overcame the Lord of Tlatelulco, and subdued those Mexican-Enemies of the Mexicans, setting fire on their Citie and Temple. After eleven yeares hee died, and Axtolol the eight King was chosen. Hee punished the pride of Quazulatlan, a rich Prouince, with those Captiues, to celebrate his Coronation-Feast, and extended his Dominion to Guatimala, three hundred leagues from Mexico. Hee much adorned his Royall Citie, pulling downe the olde houses, and in their roome erected fairer. Hee let in a course of water to the Citie, because that of the Lake was muddie. But because they of Guyoacan vsed these waters, the chiefe man of that Citie, which was a great Magician, sought to hinder it, whereby the King being prouoked sent to attatch him. Hee escaped by his Protean Arts; now appearing like an Eagle, the second time like a Tygre, the third like a Serpent. But at last hee was taken and strangled, and the Mexicans forced a Channell, whereby the water might passe to their Citie, the Priests meane-while casting Incense on the bankes, sacrificing the bloud of Quailes; others winding their Cornets: and one of the chiefe went attired in a habite like to the Goddesse of the Waters, which was saluted and welcommed by all the people. All which things are painted in the Annales of Mexico: which Booke is now in the Vatican * Librarie at Rome. Thus he enuiroined the Citie with water, like another Venice; and hauing reigned eleven yeares, died.

Moteczuma the second was chosen, who before his Soueraignty was of graue and stayed disposition, much addicted to his deuotions. Hee retired himselfe into a Chappell, appointed for him in the Temple of Vitzliputzli, where (they say) the Idoll spake to him; wherein also he hidde himselfe, after he had intelligence of this Election. From whence he was ledde to the Harth of their Gods, where hee sacrificed, with drawing blood from his eares and the calves of his legges. They attired him with the Royall ornaments, and piercing his nostrils, hung thereat a rich Emerald. Being seated in his Throne, the King of Tecuco, one of the Electors, made an Eloquent Oration, which Joseph <sup>b</sup> Acosta hath set downe word word, and deserueth a roome here, if our hastic pilgrimage would suffer.

This Moteczuma commanded, That no Plebian should serue him in any Office in his House ; providing Knights and Nobles for that purpose. His Coronation was solemnized with Dances, Comedies, Banquets, Lights, and other pompe : the sacrificed Captiues were of a farre Prouince toward the North Sea, which he subdued. Macanachan Tlacalla, and Tapasca neuer yeelded to the Mexicans ; which Moteczuma told Cortez, that he spared for the vse of his sacrifices and the exercise of his Souldiers. Hee laboured to bee respected and worshipped as a God. It was death for any Plebian to looke him in the face: Hee neuer set his foot on the ground, but was alwaies carried on the shoulders of Noblemen; and if he lighted, they layed rich Tapestrie, whereon hee did goe. He neuer put on one Garment twice, nor vsed one Vessell, or Dish, aboue once. He was rigorous in execution of his Lawes, and for that purpose would disguise himselfe, to see how they were executed, and offer bribes to the Iudges, to prouoke them to iniustice; which, if they accepted, cost them their liues, though they were his kinsmen, or brethren. His fall is before declared: it shall not be amisse here to mention some prodigious fore-runners of the same. The Idoll of Cholola, called Quetzacoalt, declared, That a strange people came to possesse his Kingdome. The King of Tescuco a great Magician, and many Sorcerers, told him as much. The King shut vp the Sorcerers in prison, where they vanished presently: wherefore he exercised that rage on their wives and children, which he had intended against them. He sought to appease his angrie Gods by Sacrifices, and therefore would haue remoued a great stone, which by no humane industrie would be moued, as refusing his attonement. Strange voices were heard, accompanied with Earth-quakes and swellings of the waters. A prodigious Bird, of the bignesse of a Crane, was taken: which on his head had (as it were) a Glasse representing armed men, and in the Kings presence vanished. A stranger thing befel a poore man, who was taken vp by an Eagle, and carried into a certaine Caue where hee let him downe, pronouncing these words, Most mightie Lord, I haue brought him whom thou hast commanded. There he saw one like the King, lying asleepe; touching whom hauing receiued threatening Prophecies, he was againe by that former Pursuiuant placed where hee had beene taken vp. These things as Deuillish illusions, abusing Gods Prouidence and Iustice, and imitating his Power, to robbe him of his glorie, deserue to be mentioned.

Ominous prodigies.

Mutezuma hauing intelligence of Cortes his arriual, was much troubled, and conferring with his Counsell, they all said, that without doubt their great and ancient Lord Quetzacoalt, who had said, that hee would returne from the East whither hee was gone, had now fulfilled his promise and was come. Therefore did he send Embassadors with presents vnto Cortes, acknowledging him for Quetzacoalt, (sometime their Prince, now esteemed a God) and himselfe his Lieutenant.

Concerning the State of Mexico vnder the Spaniards, Robert h. Tomson who was there about the yeare a thousand five hundred fiftie five sayeth, that then it was thought there were a thousand and five hundred households of Spaniards, and aboue three hundred thousand Indians. The Citie is couroned with a Lake, and the Lake also with Mountaines about thirtie leagues in compasse; the raines falling from these Hills cause the Lake.

In

In this Citie resideth the Viceroy, and here the highest Indian Courts are kept. There are weekly three Faires or Markets, abounding with plentie of commodities at a cheape price. Manie Rivers fall into the Lake, but none goe out. The Indians know how to drowne the Citie, and would haue practised it, had not the Conspirators beene taken and hanged. The Indians here are good Artificers, Gold-smithes, Copper-smithes, Black-smithes, Carpenters, Shooe-makers, Taylors, Sadlers, Embroderers, and of all o-ther Sciences, and worke exceeding cheape, liuing of a little. They will goe two or three leaguesto a Faire, carrying not aboute a pennie-worth of commodities, and yet maintaine themselves thereby.

Miles a Philips sayth, that when Sir Francis Drake was on the South Sea, the Vice-roy caused a generall muster to be made of all the Spaniards in Mexico, and found aboue seuen thousand houtholds, and three thousand single men, and of Mestizoes twentie thousand.

Master Chilton<sup>b</sup> testifieth, that euery Indian payeth tribute to the King twelue Reals of Plate, and a Hauneg of Maiz, (siue Haunegs make a quarter English) and euery Widow halfe so much. And all their children, aboue fifteene yeares olde, pay after the same rate. He hath great gaine by his fiths, and by the Popes Bulls: this leaden ware was worth to the King at first aboue three Millions of Golde yearly. The greatnesse of exactions caused two rebellions whiles hee was there, and the King will not suffer them to haue Oyle or Wine there growing, although the earth would prodigally repay them, that they may still haue neede of Spaine. Tlaxcalla, for their merits in the conquest of Mexico, as before is shewed, is free: only they pay a handfull of wheate a man in signe of subiection: but some later encrochers haue forced them to till at their owne charge as much ground as their tribute would amount to. There are in it two hundred thousand Indians.

Some of the wilde people in New-Spaine are deadly enemies to the Spaniards, and eat as many as they get of them. John Chilton fell into their hands, but being sicke and leane, they thought (as a Captiue wench tolde him) that hee had the Pox, and was but vnholosome foode, and so let him depart. It is an ill winde that blowes none to good: sickness the harbenger of death, was to him preseruer of life.

Mexico is now an<sup>c</sup> Vniuersitie, and therein are taught those Sciences which are read in our Vniuersities of Europe. This Vniuersitie was<sup>d</sup> there founded by Antonie Mendoza, and King Philip erected a Colledge of Iesuites, Anno 1577. Mexico is an Archbishoprick. There<sup>e</sup> be many Spanish Colonies or Plantations, Compostella, Colima, Guadaleira, Mechocan, Citie of Angele, and others: whereof diuers are Episcopall Sees: Antonie Herrera reckoneth in this and other parts of America, siue Archbishops-likes, twentie seuen Bishoplikes, two Vniuersities, foure hundred Monasteries and Hospitals innumerable.

In Guastecan, not farre from Panuco, is a Hill, from whence spring two Fountaines one of blacke pitch, the other of red, very hot. To speake largely of New Galicia, Mechuacan, Guastecan, and other Regions, would not bee much to the Readers delight, and lesse to my purpose.

Of the Idols and Idolatrous Sacrifices of New Spaine.

THE Indians (as Acoſta<sup>f</sup> obserueth) had no name proper vnto God but vse the Spanish word Dios fitting it to the accent of the Cuscan or Mexican tongues. Yet did they acknowledge a supreme power, called Vitziliputzli, terming him the most puissant, and Lord of all things, to whom they erected at Mexico the most sumptuous Temple in the Indies. After the Supreme God they worshipped the Sunne, and therefore called Cortes (as hee writ to the Emperour) Sonne of the Sunne. That Vitziliputzli was an Image of Wood, like to a man, set vpon an Azure-coloured stoele in a bran-kard or litter; at euerie corner was a peece of wood like a Serpents head. The stoole signified that he was set in Heauen. He had the forehead Azure, and a band of Azure vnder the nose, from one eare to the other. Vpon his head he had a rich plume of feathers, couered on the top with gold: he had in his left hand a white target, with the figures of five Pine Apples, made of white feathers, set in a crosse; & from aboue issued forth a creft of gold: At his sides hee had foure Darts, which the Mexicans say, had bene sent from Heauen. In his right hand he had an Azure staffe, cut in fashion of a wauing Snake. All these ornaments had their mysticall sense. The name of Vitziliputzli signifies the left hand of a shining feather. Hee was set vpon an high Altar in a small boxe, well couered with linnen clothes, iewels, feathers, and ornaments of gold: and for the greater veneration he had alwayes a curtaine before him. Ioyning to the Chappel of this Idol, there was a pillar of lesse work and not so well beautified, where there was another Idol called Tlaloc. These two were alwayes together, for that they held them as companions, and of equall power. There was an other Idol in Mexico much esteemed, which was the God of Repentance, and of Iubilees and Pardons for their sinnes. He was called Tezcallipuca, made of a blacke shining stone, attyred after their manner, with some Ethnike deuises: it had eare-rings of gold and siluer, and through the nether lip a small Canon of Chrysall, halfe a foote long, in which they sometimes put an Azure feather, sometimes a Greene, so resembling a Turkeis or Emerald: it had the haire bound vp with a baire-lace of Gold, at the end whereof did hang an eare of Gold, with two Fire-brandes of smoke painted therein signifying that he heard the prayers of the afflicted, and of sinners. Betwixt the two eares hung a number of small Herons. Hee had a iewell hanging at his necke, so great that it covered all his stomacke: vpon his armes, bracelets of gold; at his nauila rich green stone, and in his left hand a fan of pretious feathers of green, Azure, and yellow, which came forth of a looking glasse of Gold, signifying that hee saw all things done in the World. In his right hand he held foure Darts as the Ensignes of his Iustice, for which cause they feared him most. At his festiuall they had pardon of their sinnes. They accompted him the God of Famine, drought, barrenesse, and pestilence. They painted him in another forme, sitting in great Maiestie on a stoole, compassed in with a red Curtin, painted and wrought with the heads and bones of dead men. In the left hand was a Target with five Pines, like vnto Pine-Apples, of Cotton; and in the right hand a little Dart, with a threatening countenance, and the arme stretched out, as if he would cast it: and from the Target came foure Darts. The countenance expressed anger, the bodie was all painted blacke, and the head full of Quailles feathers. Quecalcanatl was their God of the Ayre.

l Cholula.

In Cholula<sup>l</sup> they worshipped the God of Merchandise, called Quetzalcoatl, which had the forme of a man, but the visage of a little Bird with a red bil, and aboue, a combe full of warts, hauing also rankes of teeth, and the tongue hanging out. It carried on the head a pointed Mitre of painted paper a Sicke in the hand and many toyes of Gold on the legges: it had about it gold, siluer, iewels, feathers, and habits of diuers colours: and was set aloft in a spacious place in the Temple. All this his furniture was significant. The name importeth Colour of a rich feather. No maruell if this God had many futes, seeing Gain is both God and godlinesse to the most; the whole World admiring and adoring this Mammon or Quetzalcoatl. Tlaloc was their God of Water: to whom they sacrificed for Raine.

part. 1.

They had also their Goddesses<sup>m</sup>, the chiefe of which was Tozi, which is to say, Our Grand-mother, of which is spoken before; shee was slayed by the commaund of Vitziliputzli, and from hence they learned to slay men in Sacrifice, and to cloth the living with the skinned of the dead. One of the Goddesses, which they worshipped, had a sonne who was a great Hunter, whom they of Tlascalla afterwards tooke for a God; being themselves addicted much to that exercise. They therefore made a great feast vnto this Idoll as shall after follow.

They had an other strange kinde of Idoll which was not an Image but a true Man. For they tooke a Captiue, and before they sacrificed him they gaue him the name of the Idoll, to whom hee should bee sacrificed, apparrelling him also with the same ornaments. And during the time that this representation lasted (which was for a yeare in some some feastes, fixe monethes in some, in others lesse) they worshipped him in the same manner, as they did their God; he in the meane time eating, drinking, and making merrie. When hee went through the streets, the people came forth to worshipping him, bringing their almes, with children and sicke folkes, that he might cure and blesse them, suffering him to doe all things at his pleasure; only hee was accompanied with tenne or twelue men, lest hee should flee. And hee (to the end hee might bee reuerenced as hee passed) sometimes sounded on a small flute. The feast being come, this fat foole was killed, opened, and eaten. The Massilians are said<sup>n</sup> to haue vsed the like order, nourishing one a whole yeare with the purest meats, and after with many Ceremonies to lead him through the Citie, and sacrifice him.

Lopes de Gomara writeth, that the Mexicans had two thousand Gods; but the chiefe were Vitziliputzli and Texcatlipuca. These two were accounted brethren: There was an other God who had a great Image placed on the top of the Idols chappell, made all of that Countrie seedes, ground, and made into past, tempered with childrens blood, and Virgins sacrificed, whose hearts were plucked out of their opened breasts, and offered as first fruits to that Idoll. It was consecrated by the Priests with great Solemnitie, all the Citizens being present, many deuout persons sticking in the dowle Image, Gold and jewels: after which consecration no secular person may touch that Image, nor come in his Chappell. They renew this Image with new dow many times, and Oterque quaterque blessed man he that can get any reliques of him. The Souldiers thought themselves hereby safe in the warres. At this consecration also a Vessell of water was halloved with many ceremonies, and kept at the foot of the Altar for the Kings Coronation, and to blesse the Captaines that went to the warres, with a draught of it.

Next after their Gods it followeth to speake of their Goddesse sacrifices: wherein they surmounted all the Nations of the World in beastly butcheries. The persons they sacrificed were Captiues: to get which, they made their warres, rather seeking in their victories to take then to kill. Their manner of Sacrificing was this. They assembled such as should bee sacrificed in the Pallisadoe of dead mens skuls, of which wee shall after speake, where they vsed a certaine Ceremonie at the foot of the Palisado; they placed a great guard about them. Presently there slept forth a Priest attyred with a short Surplice full of tassels beneath, who came from the top of the Temple, bearing an Idoll made of Wheat and Mays mingled with honic, which had the eyes thereof made of green glasse, and the teeth of the graines of Mays. He descended the steps of the Temple with all speed, and ascended by a little ladder vpon a great stone, planted vpon a high terrasse in the midst of the Court. This stone was called Quauxi-calli, that is, the stone of Eagle: as hee went vp and came downe, still he embraced his Idoll. Then went hee vp to the place, where those were which should be sacrificed, shewing his Idoll to euery one in particular, saying vnto them, this is your God. This done; he descended by the other side of the staires, & all such as should die, went in Procession to the place where they should bee sacrificed, where they found the Ministers readie for that office. Sixe of the Priests were appointed to this execution; foure to hold the handes and feete of him that should be sacrificed, the fift to hold his head, the sixt to open his stomacke, and pull out his heart. They called them Chachalmua, that is, the Ministers of Holy thinges. It was a high dignitie wherein they succeeded their Progenitours.

The sixt, which killed the Sacrifice, was as a high Priest, or Bishop, whose name was different according to the difference of times and solemnities. Their habits also differed according to the times. The name of their chiefe dignitie was Papa and Topilzin. Their habite and robe was a red Curtin with tassels below, a Crowne of rich feathers Greene, White, and Yellow vpon his head, and at his eares like pendants of Golde, wherein were set greene stones and vnder the lip vpon the midst of the beard, he had a peece lik vnto a smal Canon of an Azured stone.

The sacrificer came with his face and hands shining blacke: the other siue had their haire much curled, and tyed vp with laces of Leather, bound about the midst of the head: vpon their fore-head they carried small Roundelets of paper painted about with diuers colours, and they were attyred in a Dalmatike Robe of white wrought with blacke, blacke, in this attyre representing the Deuill. The Soueraigne Priest carried a great knife in his hand of a large and sharpe flint, another carried a collar of wood wrought in forme of a Snake, all put themselves in order before a Pyramidall Stone which was directly against the doore of the Chappel of their Idol. This stone was so pointed, that the man which was to bee sacrificed, being laied thereon vpon his backe, did bend in such sort, as letting the knife but fall vpon his stomacke, it opened very easily in the middest. Then did the Guard cause them to mount vp certaine large staires in ranke to this place, and as euery one came in their order, the six sacrificers tooke him, one by one foot, an other by the other; and one by one hand, an other by the other, all naked, and cast him on his backe vpon this pointed stone: where the fift of them put the collar of wood about his necke, and the high Priest opened his stomacke with the knife with a strange dexteritie and nimblenesse, pulling out his heart with his handes, the which he shewed smoking vnto the Sunne, to whom he did offer this heart and some of of the heart: and presently he turned towards the Idol, and did cast the heart at his face, and then cast away the bodie, tumbling it downe the staires of the Temple, there being not two foot space betwixt the stone and the first step. In this sort they sacrificed them all one after another, Their Masters, or such as had taken them, tooke vp the bodies and carried them away, and diuiding them amongst them, did eat them. There were euer for tie or fiftie at the least, thus sacrificed. The neighbour Nations did the like, imitating the Mexicans in this sacred Butcherie.

a Gomara saith, that the ancient persons, & sometimes the King himselfe, would put on this skinned being of a principall Captiue.

There was another kinde of Sacrifice, which they made in diuers Feastes, called Raxcipe Velitzli which is as much as the slaying of men, because they slayed the sacrifice (as is said) and there with apparelled a man appointed to that end. This man<sup>a</sup> went dancing and leaping through all the houses and market places of the Citie, euery one being forced to offer something vnto him: which, if any refused he would strike him ouer the face with the corner of the skinne defiling him with the congealed bloud. This continued till the skin did stinke, during which time much almes was gathered, which they employed in necessities for their deuotions. In many of these Feastes they made a challenge betwene him that did sacrifice, and him that should be sacrificed, thus: They tyed the slaue by one foot to a wheele of stone, giuing him a sword and target in his hands to defend himselfe: then stepped forth the other armed in like manner. And if he, that should be sacrificed, defended himselfe valiantly against the other, hee was freed, and was reputed a famous Captaine: but if he were vanquished, he was sacrificed on that stone whereto he was tyed.

They euery yeare gaue one slaue to the Priests, to represent their Idoll. At his first entrie into the office after hee had bene well washed they adorned him with the Idols ornaments and name, as before is said: and if hee escaped before his time of Sacrifice was expired, the chiefe of his guard was substituted to that representation and Sacrifice. Hee had the most honourable lodging in all the Temple, where hee did eate and drinke, and whither all the chiefe Ministers came to serue and honour him: he was accompanied with Noblemen through the streets. At night they put him into a strong Prison, and at the appointed feast sacrificed him.

b Ioh. 8. 44.

The Deuill (<sup>a</sup> Murderer from the beginning) suggested to the Priests, when there seemed defect of these Sacrifices, to goe to their Kings, telling them that their Gods dyed for hunger, and therefore should be remembered. Then assembled they their people to warres to furnish their bloudie Altars.

There happened a strange accident in one of these Sacrifices, reported by men of worthie credit, That the Spaniards beholding these Sacrifices, a young man whose heart was newly plucked out, and himselfe tumbled downe the staires, when hee came to the bottome, he said to the Spaniards in his Language; Knights they haue slaine mee. The Indians themselves grew wearie of these cruell Rites, and therefore they easily embraced the Spaniards Christianitie: Yea, Cortes writ to the Emperour Charles, that those of Mechuacan sent to him for his Law, being wearie of their owne, as not seeming good vnto them.

Some of the Spaniards* were thus sacrificed at Tescuco, and their Horse-skinnes tanned

ranned in the haire, and hung vp with horse-shoes in the great Temple, and next to them the Spaniards garments for a perpetuall memorie. At the siege of Mexico, they sacrificed at one time, in sight of their Countie-men, fortie Spaniards.

The <sup>1</sup> Mexicans, besides their cruelties, had other vn-beseeming Rites in their Religion: as to eat and drinke to the name of their Idols, to pisse in the honour of them, carrying them vpon their shoulders, to annoint and besmeare themselves filthily, and other things, both ridiculous and lamentable.

They<sup>m</sup> were so deuour in their Superstitions, and superstitious in their deuotions, that before they would eat or drinke, they would take a little quantitie and offer it to the Sunne, and to the Earth. And if they gather Corne, Fruit, or Roses, they would take a lease before they would smell it, and offer the same: hee which did not thus, was accounted neither louing nor loued of God.

The Mexicans in the siege of their Citie, being brought to all extremities, spake thus, as Lopes reporteth, vnto Cortes; Considering that thou art the child of the Sunne, why dost thou intreat the Sunne thy Father to make an end of vs: O Sunne that canst goe round about the World, in a day and a night, make an end of vs, and take vs out of this miserable life, for we desire death, to goe and rest with our God Quetzanath, who tarrith for vs.

CHAP. XII.

Of the Religious places and persons in New Spaine: wherein is also handled their Penance, Marriges, Burials, and other Rites performed by their Priests.

EE haue alreadie mentioned the Temple of Vitziliputzli in Mexico, which requireth our further description. It<sup>a</sup> was built of great stones in fashion of Snakes tied one to another: and had a great circuit, called Coatepanthly, that is, a circuit of Snakes. Vpon the toppe of euerie Chapell or Oratorie, where the Idols were, was a fine pillar wrought with small stones blacke as Iet, the ground raised vp with white and red, which below gaue a great light: Vpon the top of the pillar were Battlements wrought like Snailles, supported by two Indians of stone, sitting, holding Candlestickes in their hands, were like Croysants, garnished and enriched at the ends, with yellow and greene feathers, and long fringes of the same. Within the circuit of this Court there were many chambers of Religious men, and others that were appointed for the Priests and Popes. This Court is so great and spacious, that eight or tenne thousand persons did daunce easily in a round, holding hands, which was an vsuall custome there, howsoeuer it seemeth incredible. Cortes relateth, that within the compasse of the wall, a Citie of five hundred houses might haue bene builded: round about encompassed with goodly buildings, Hals, and Cloisters for the Religious Votaries to dwell in. In that circuit hee numbred fortie high towers well built, to which the ascent was by fiftie steps or staires: the least of them as high as the steeple of the Cathedrall Church in Siuill. The stoneworke as curious as in any place, full of grauen and painted imagerie. All these Towers were sepulchres of great Lords, and had each of them a Chappell to some speciall Idol. There were here three large Hals with their Chappels annexed into which none but certaine Religious men might enter, both full of Images: the chiefe of which Cortes cast down, & insteed thereof placed the Image of the Euer-blessed, neuer worthy to be dignified with indignitie, the glorious Virgin & Mother of our Lord, such with other Saints.

There were foure gates or entries, at the East, West, North, and South, at euery of which began a faire causey of two or three leagues long. There were in the midst of the Lake wherein Mexico is built, foure large causeies. Vpon euery entrie was a God or Idol, hauing the visage turned to the causey right against the Temple gate of Vitziliputzli. There were thirty steps of thirty fadom long, diuided from the circuit of the court by

by a street that went betwene them, Vpon the top of these steps, there was a walke of thirtie foot broad, all plastered with chalke in the midst of which walke was a Pallisado artificially made of very high Trees, planted in order a fadome a-sunder. These Trees were very bigge and all pierced with small holes from the foot to the top, and there were rods did runne from one Tree to another, to which were tied many dead mens heads, Vpon euery rod were many skuls, and these rankes of skuls continue from the foote to the top of the Tree. This Pallisado was full of dead mens skuls from one end to the other, which were the heads of such as had beene sacrificed. For after the flesh was eaten, the head was deliuered to the Priests who tied them in this sort, vntill they fell off by morsels. Vpon the top of the Temple were two stones or Chappels, and in them the two Images of Vitziliputzli and Tlaloc. These Chappels were carved and grauen verie artificially, and so high, that to ascend vp to it there were an hundred and twentie staires of stone. Before these Chappels there was a Court of fortie foote square, in the midst whereof was a high stone of fise hand breadth, pointed in fashion of a Pyramide, placed there for the sacrificing of men as is before shewed.

b Pe. Mart. Dec. 5. l. 4. saith that in largenesse the situation of this Temple is matchable with a Towne of fise hundred houses.

Gomara saith, that this and other their Temples were called Temcalli, which signifieth Gods Hauſe. This Temple, hee saith, was square, containing euery way as much<sup>b</sup> as a Crosse-bow can shoote leuell: in the midst stood a mount of earth and stone fittie fadome long euery way, built Pyramide-fashion, saue that the top was flat; and tenne fadome square. It had two such Pyramide stones or Altars for sacrifice, painted with monstrous figures. Euery Chappell had three lofts, one aboue another sustained vpon pillars: From thence the eye with much pleasure might behold all about the Lake. Besides this Tower, there were fortie other Towers belonging to other inferior Temples; which were of the same fashion: only their prospect was not Westward, to make difference. Some of those Temples were bigger then others, and euery one of a seuerall God.

There was one round Temple dedicated to the God of the Aire, called Quecalcomatl, the forme of the Temple representing the Aires circular course about the earth. The entrance of that Temple had a doore, made like the mouth of a Serpent, with foule and deuellish resemblances, striking dreadfull horrore to such as entered. All these Temples had peculiar Houses, Priests, Gods, and Seruices. At euery doore of the great Temple was a large Hall and goodly buildings, which were common Armories for the Cite. They had other darke houses full of Idols of diuers mettals, all embrewed with blood, the daily sprinkling whereof makes them shew blacke: yea, the wals were an inch thick, and the ground a foot thick with blood, which yeelded a lothsome sent. The Priests entered daily therein, which they allowed not to others except to Noble personages, who at their entrie were bound to offer some man to bee sacrificed to those slaughter-houses of the Deuill. There did continually reside in the great Temple fise thousand persons, which had there their meate, drinke, and lodging; the Temple enjoying great reuenues and diuers Townes for the maintenance thereof.

c Acoſt. l. 5. c. 13.

Next<sup>c</sup> to the Temple of Vitziliputzli was that of Tescalipuca, the God of Penance, punishments (& Providence) very high and wel built. It had foure ascents; the top was flat, an hundred & twenty foot broad; and ioyning to it was a Hall hanged with Tapeſtrie, and Curtins of diuers colours and workes. The doore being low and large was alwaies couered with a Vaile, and none but the Priestes might enter. All this Temple was beautified with diuers Images and Pictures most curiously: for that these two Temples were as the Cathedrall Church, the rest as parishionall. They were so spacious, and had so many Chambers, that there were in them places for the Priestes, Colledges, and Schooles.

Without<sup>d</sup> the great Temple, and ouer against the principall doore, a stones cast distant was the Charnell house, or that Golgotha (before mentioned;) where vpon poles or sticks, and also in the wals (two Towers hauing no other stufte but lime and skuls) Andrew de Tapia certified<sup>e</sup> Gomara, that he and Gonsola de Vmbria did reckon in one day, an hundred thirtie six thousand skuls. When any wasted, supply was made of others in their roomes.

Within this great Circuit of the principall Temple were two Houses, like Cloysters, the the one opposite to the other, one of men, the other of women. In that of women they were Virgins only, of twelue or thirteene yeares of age, which they called the Maids of Penance: they were as many as the men, and liued chastely, and regularly, as Virgins dedicated to the seruice of their God. Their charge was to sweepe and make cleane the Temple, and euerie morning to prepare meate for the Idoll and his Ministers, of the Almes the Religious gathered. The foode they prepared for the Idoll were small Loaves, in the forme of handes and feete, as of March-pane: and with this bread they prepared certaine sauces, which they cast daily before the Idoll, and his Priests did eat it.

These Virgins had their haire cut, and then let them grow for a certaine time: they rose at mid-night to the Idols Martins, which they daily celebrated, performing the same exercises which the Religious did. They had their Abbesses, who employed them to make cloth of diuers fashions, for the ornaments of their Gods and Temples. Their ordinarie habite was all white, without any worke or colour. They did their penance at mid-night, sacrificing and wounding themselves, and piercing the tops of their eares, laying the bloud which issued forth vpon their cheekes, and after bathed themselves in a poole which was within the Monasterie. If any were found dishonest, they were put to death without remission, saying, she had polluted the house of their God.

They held it for an ominous token, that some Religious man or woman had committed a fault, when they saw a Rat or a Mouse passe, or a Batte in the Idol-Chappell, or that they had gnawed any of the vailles, for that they say, a Cat, or a Bat would not aduenture to commit such an indignitie, if some offence had not gone before: and then began to make inquisition, and discovering the offender put him to death. None were receiued into this Monasterie, but the daughters of one of the fixe quarters, named for that purpose: and this profession continued a yeare, during which time, their fathers and themselves had made a vow to serue the Idoll in this manner, and from thence they went to be married.

The other Cloyer or Monasterie was of young-men of eighteene or twentie yeares of age, which they called Religious. Their Crownes were shauen, as the Priests in these partes, their haire a little longer, which fell to the middest of their eare, except on the hinder part of the head, where they let it grow to their shoulders, and tyed it vp in trusses. These serued in the Temple, liued poorly and chastly, and (as the Leuites) ministred to the Priests, Incense, Lights and Garments, swept and made cleane the Holy place, bringing wood for a continuall fire, to the harth of their God, which was like a Lamp that stil burned before the Altar of their Idoll. Besides these, there were other little Boyes that serued for manuell vses, as to decke the Temple with Boughes, Roses, and Reedes, giue the Priests water to wash, Rasours to sacrifice, and to goe with such as begged almes, to carrie it. All these had their superiours, who had the gouernment ouer them, and when they came in publike, where women were, they carried their eyes to the ground, not daring to behold them. They had linnen garments, and went into the Citie foure or fixe together, to aske almes in all quarters, and if they got none, it was lawfull for them to goe into the Corne-fields, and gather that which they needed, none daring to contradict them.

Cortes writeth that almost all the chiefe mens sonnes in the Citie, after they were fixe or seuen yeares old, till the time of their marriage, especially the eldest, were thrust into a kinde of Religious habit and seruice.

There might not aboue fiftie liue in that strict penance, they rose at midnight, & sounded the Trumpets, to awake the people. Euerie one watched by turne, least the fire before the Altar should die: they gaue the censor, with which the Priest at midnight incensed the Idoll, and also in the morning, at noone, and at night. They were very subiect and obedient to their superiours, and passed not any one point commanded. And at midnight after the Priest had ended his censuring, they retired themselves a-part into a secret place, where they sacrificed and drew bloud from the Calues of their legges with sharpe bodkins therewith rubbing their Temples and vnder their Eares, presently washing themselves in a Poole appointed to that end. These young men did not annoynt their heades and bodies with Petuum, as the Priests did. This austeritie continued a yeare.

The Priests likewise rose at mid-night, and retired themselves into a large place where were many lights, and there drew bloud, as the former, from their legs, then did they set these Bodkins vpon the battlements of the Court, stuck in straw, that the people might see. Neyther might they vse one Bodkin twice. The Priestess also vsed great fasts of fve or tenne dayes together, before their great Feasts. Some of them to preserve their chastitie, slit their members in the midst, and did a hundred thinges to make themselves impotent, lest they should offend their Gods. They drunke no Wine, and slept little, for that the greatest part of their exercises were by night.

Thy did vse also (that the selfe-tyrannising Catholike should not out-vie merits) to Discipline themselves with cords full of knots, wherein the people likewise came not behinde in cruel Processions, especially on the Feast of Texcalipuca, lashing themselves with knotted Mauguey-cords over the shoulders. The Priest fasted fve dayes before that Feast, eating but once a day, and abstaining from their Wiues; the whips supplying those delicacies.

part. 1. pag. 396.

Gomara<sup>i</sup> speaketh of others, besides those yong ones before mentioned, which lived in those Cloysters, some being sicke, for their recouerie; some in extreme pouvertie, to find reliefe; some for riches, for long life, for good husbands, for many children, and some for vertue: euery one abode there as long as they had vowed, and after vsed their libertie. Their offices were to spinne Cotton, Wool, and feathers, and to weaue cloth for their Gods, and themselves, to sweepe all the holy roomes: they might goe on Procession with the Priests, but not sing, nor goe vp the staires of the Temple: their food was boiled flesh and hot bread, receiued of almes, the smoke whereof was offered vnto their Gods: they ate and lay all together, but lay in their clothes. The multitude of Idols and Idoll Temples in New Spaine was such that a Bishop of Mexico in his letters 1532. saith that the Friars had defaced twentie thousand of the one and desolated fve hundred of the other: and where in Mexico they had vsed yearely to offer more then twentie thousand Harts of Boyes and Girles to their Idols, they now (sayth hee) offer them by good instruction to God. God grant it.

Touching their Priests in Mexico<sup>k</sup>, there were some high Priests or Popes, euen vnder the same name, called by the Mexicans, Papas, as they should say, Soueraigne Bishops: others, as before you haue heard, were of inferiour ranke. The Priests of Ytzaliputzli succeeded by linages of certaine quarters of the Citie, deputed for that purpose: and those of other Idols came by election, or by being offered to the Temple in their Infancie. The daily exercise of the Priests was to cast incense on the Idols, which was done foure times in the space of a naturall day: at breake of day, at noone, at Sun-set, at mid-night. At mid-night all the chiefe Officers of the Temple did ryse, and in stead of Bells they did sound a long time vpon Trumpets, Cornets, and Flutes, very heauily; which being ended, he that did the Office that weeke, slept forth attyred in a white Robe with a Censor in his hand, full of coles, which he tooke from the harth, burning continually before the Altar; in the other hand he had a purse full of incense, which hee cast into the Censor, and entring the place where the Idoll was he incensed it with great reuerence; then tooke he a cloth with the which hee wiped the Altar and the Curtins. This done, they went all into a Chappell, and there did beat themselves and draw bloud with Bodkins, as is said: this was alwayes done at mid-night. None other but the Priestesses might intermeddle with their Sacrifices, and euery one did employ himselfe according to his dignitie and degree. They did likewise preach to the people at some Feastes. They had reuenues and great offerings. They had<sup>m</sup> conuenient houses for their habitation. They ware blacke garments, and cut not nor combed their haire in the time of their ministration.

The Mexican Priests<sup>l</sup> were thus annoynted; they annoynted the bodie from the foot to the head, and all the haire likewise, which hung like tresses, or a Horse-maine, for that they applyed this vnction wet and moist. Their haire grew so<sup>n</sup> that in time it hung downe to their hammes, insomuch, that the weight made it burthenesome: for they neuer cut it vntill they dyed, or were dispensed with for their great age, or were employed in gouernments, or some honourable charge in the Common-wealth. They carried their haire in tresses of fixe fingers breadth, which they dyed blacke with the fume

of Sapine, Firre, or Rosine. They were alwayes died with this tincture, from the foote vnto the head, so as they were like vnto shining Negros. This was their ordinarie vnction; they had another when they went to sacrifice or incense on the tops of mountaines, or in darke Caues, where their Idols were, vsing also certaine ceremonies, to take away feare, and add courage. This vnction was made with diuers venomous beasts, as Spiders, Scorpions, Salamanders, and Vipers, which the boyes in the Colledges tooke and gathered together: wherein they were so expert, as they were alway furnished when the Priests called for them. They tooke all these together, and burnt them vpon the harth of the Temple which was before the Altar, vntill they were consumed to ashes. Then did they put them in Morters with much Tobacco or Petum, which maketh them loose their force, mingling likewise with these ashes, scorpions, spiders, and palmers aliue. After this, they put to it a certain seed being grownd, which they called Ololuluehqui, whereof the Indians made drinckes to see Visions, for that the vertue of this herb is to depriue men of sense: they did likewise grinde with these ashes blacke and hairie wormes, whose haire onely is venomous: all which they mingled together with black, or the fume of Rosine, putting it in small pots, which they set before their God, saying it was his meate, and therefore called it a diuine meate. By meanes of this oyntment they became Witches, and did see and speake with the Diuell. The Priests being slubbered with this oyntment, lost all feare, putting on a spirit of crueltye. By reason whereof they did very boldly kill men in their sacrifices, went all alone in the night time to the mountaines, and into obscure Caues, contemned all wilde beasts, beleeuing, that Lyons, Tygres, Serpents, and the rest fledde from them by vertue hereof.

This Petum did also serue to cure the sicke, and for children; all resorted to them as to their Sauour, to applie vnto them this Diuine Physicke, as they called it. They vsed manifolde other superstitions to delude the people, in tying small flowers about their neckes, and strings with small bones of Snakes, commanding them to bathe at certaine times, to watch all night at the Diuine harth, to eate no other bread but that which had beene offered to their Gods, that they should (vpon all occasions) repaire to their wisards, who with certaine graines tolde fortunes, and diuined, looking into keelers and pailles full of water. The forcerers and <sup>1</sup> ministers of the diuell vsed much to besmeare themselves. There were an infinite number of these witches, diuiners, inchanters, and the like: and still there remaine of them (but secret) not daring publickly to exercise their superstitions.

1 Their witches.

The Mexicans <sup>m</sup> had amongst them a kinde of baptisme, which they did with cutting the eares and members of yong children, hauing some resemblance of the Iewish circumcision. This ceremonie was done principally to the sonnes of Kings and Noblemen: presently vpon their birth the Priests did wash them, and did put a little sword in the right hand, in the left a Target. And to the children of the vulgar sort, they put the markes of their callings, and to their daughters, instruments to spinne, knit, and labour.

m Their rites vnto infants.

The Mexican historie afore-mentioned, in the third part therof, sheweth in pictures their policie and customes. When a childe was borne (as is there described) it was laide in a Cradle: foure dayes after, the midwife brought it naked, with the instrument of the trade (as is said) in the hand, into the yard; where were prepared Bull-rushes and a little pan of water, in which she washed the same. Three boyes sate by eating toasted Mais, with sodden Frizoles in a little pan, and at the midwiues appointment named the childe with a loude voyce. After twentie dayes they went with it into the Temple, and presented the same in presence of the Priest, with an offering: and being offseene yeares, committed him to the high Priest of that Temple to be taught, if they would after haue him a Priest: or if they would haue him a souldier, they committed him to the Master thereof, with an offering of meate also. In this booke is pictured how they instruct and feede them at three yeares of age, giuing them halfe a cake: how at foure with a whole Cake: at siue burthening and exercising their bodies, and setting their daughters to spinne: how at six they exercise them in gathering vp corne spilled on the ground, or the like: at seven in fishing. There is likewise described their severe discipline in punishing them with Manguéz. The Priests did exercise their Pupils in bodily seruices of the Temple, in going to the Mountaines to sacrifice, in Musicke, obseruing the time by the starres, and the like. Olde men of threescore and ten, might be publicly drunken without controll, which to young folkes of both sexes was death, as was theft also and adulterie.

The Priests<sup>n</sup> also had their office in marriages. The Bridegroom and the Bride stood together before the Priest, who tooke them by the handes, asking them if they would marrie: vnderstanding their will, he tooke a corner of the vaile, wherewith the woman had her head couered, and a corner of the mans gowne, which he tied together on a knot, and so led them thus tied to the Bridegroomes house, where there was a harth kindled. Then he caused the wife to goe seven times about the harth, and so the married couple sate down together, and thus was the marriage contracted. That booke of pictures describes it thus: an Amantesa or Broker carried the Bride on her backe at the beginning of the night, foure women attending with Torches of Pine-tree Rosenned. At the Bridegroomes house his parents receiue her, and carrie her to him in a hall, where they are both caused to sit on a mat, neere a fire, and tied together with a corner of their apparell, and a perfume of Copale wood is made to their Gods. Two olde men, and as many olde women were present. The married couple eate, and then these olde folkes, which after this sepeare them asunder, and giue them good instructions for Oeconomical duties.

x. pag. 389.

In other parts of New-Spaine<sup>e</sup> they vsed other marriage-rites; at Tlaxcallan the Bridegroom and Bride polied their heads, to signifie, that from thenceforth all childish courses should be laide aside. At Michuacan the Bride must looke directly vpon the Bridegroom, or else the marriage was not perfect. In Mixteopan they vsed to carrie the Bridegroom vpon their backs, as if he were forced: and then they both ioine hands, and knit their mantles together with a great knot. The Macatecas did not come together in twentie daies after marriage but abode in fasting and praier all that while, sacrificing their bodies, and anointing the mouths of the Idolls with their blood. In Panuco the husbands buy their wiues for a bow, two arrowes, and a net; and afterwards the father in law speaketh not one word to his sonne in-law for the space of a year. When he hath a child, he lieth not with his wife in two years after, lest she should be with childe againe before the other be out of danger; some sucke twelue years: and for this cause they haue many wiues. No woman, while shee hath her discase, may touch or dresse any thing.

Adulterie in Mexico was death: common women were permitted, but no ordinary stews. The diuell did many times talke with their Priest, and with some other Rulers and particular persons. Great gifts were offered vnto him whom the Diuell had vouchsafed this conference. He appeared vnto them in many shapes, and was often familiar with them. He to whom he appeared, carried about him, painted, the likenesse wherin he shewed himselfe the first time. And they painted his Image on their doores, benches, and euery corner of the house. Likewise, according to his Protean and diuersified apparitions, they painted him in many shapes.

Acosta. l. 5. c. 8.

It belonged also to the office of the Priests and religious in Mexico, to interre the dead, and doe their obsequies. The places where they buried them were their gardens and courts of their owne houses: others carried them to the places of sacrifices, which were done in the mountaines: others burnt them, and after buried the ashes in the Temples, burying with them whatsoever they had, of apparell, stones, and jewells. They did sing the funerall offices like Responds, often lifting vp the dead body, with many ceremonies. At these mortuaries they did eate and drinke; and if it were a person of qualitie, they gaue apparell to such as came. When one was dead, his friends came with their presents, and saluted him as if he were liuing. And if he were a King or Lord of some Towne, they offered some slaues to be put to death with him, to serue him in the other world. They likewise put to death his Priest or Chaplaine (for euery Nobleman had a Priest for his domesticall holies) that he might execute his office with the dead. They likewise likewise killed his Cooke, his Butler, Dwarffes, and deformed men, and whosoever had most serued him, though he were his brother. And to prevent pouertie, they buried with them much wealth, as God Siluer, Stones, Curtins, and other rich peeces. And if they burned the dead, they vsed the like with all his seruants, and ornauments they gaue him for the other world, and lastly, buried the ashes with great solemnitie. The obsequies continued tenne dayes with mournfull songs, and the Priests carried away the dead with innumerable ceremonies. To the Noble-men they gaue their honourable Ensignes, Armes, and particular Blazons, which they carried before the body to the place of burning, marching as in a Proceffion, where the Priests and Officers of the Temple went with diuers furnitures, and ornauments, some casting incense, others singing, and some making the Drummes and Flutes to sound the mournfullest accents of sorrow. The Priest who did the office was decked with the markes of the Idoll which the Noble-men had represented: for all Noble-men did represent Idolls, and carrie the name of some one.

The * Mexicans honoured the best souldiers with a kinde of Knighthood, of which were three Orders: one wore a red ribband, which was the chiefe: the second was the Lion or Tyger-knight: the Grey Knight was the meaneft: they had great priuiledges. Their Knighthood had these funerall solemnities. They brought the corps to the place appointed, and enuironing it, and all the baggage, with Pine-trees, set fire thereon, maintaining the same with gummie wood, till all were consumed. Then came forth a Priest attired like a diuell, hauing mouths vpon every ioynt of him, and many eyes of glasse, holding a great staffe with which he mingled all the ashes with terrible and fearful gestures.

When the King of Mexico sickened, they vsed forthwith to put a Visor on the face of Texcatlipuca or Uitzilivtzli, or some other Idoll, which was not taken away till he mended or ended. If he died, word was presently sent into all his dominions for publike lamentations, and Noble-men were summoned to the funeralls. The bodie was laide on a Mat, and watched foure nights, then washed, and a locke of haire cut off for a relike, for therein (said they) remained the remembrance of his soule. After this an Emerald was put in his mouth, and his bodie shrowded in seuerenteene rich mantles, costly and curiously wrought. Vpon the vpper mantle was set the Deuice or Armes of some Idoll, whereunto he had bene most deuout in his life time; and in his Temple should the body be buried. Vpon his face they put a Visor painted with foule and diuellish gestures, beset with jewells: then they killed the slaue, whose office was to light the Lamps, and make fire to the Gods of his Pallace. This done, they carried the body to the Temple, some carrying Targets, Arrowes, Mases, and Ensignes, to hurle into the funerall fire. The high Priest and his crew receiue him at the Temple gate with a sorrowfull Song, and after he hath said certaine words, the body is cast into the fire there prepared for that purpose, together with jewells: also a Dogge newly strangled, to guide his way. In the mean-while two hundred persons were sacrificed by the Priests, or more, to serue him, as is said. The fourth day after, fiftene slaues were sacrificed for his soule, and vpon the twentieth day, five; on the sixtieth, three, &c. The ashes with the locke of haire was put in a Chest, painted on the inside, with diuellish shapes, together with another locke of haire, which had bene reserued since the time of his birth. On this Chest was set the Image of the King: the kinred offered great gifts before the same. The King of Mechuacan obserued the like bloudie rites: many Gentlewomen were by the new King appointed their offices in their seruice to the deceased, and while his bodie was burning, were maled with clubbes, and buried foure and foure in a graue. Many women-slaues and free maydens were slaine to attend on these Gentlewomen. But I would not burie my Reader in these direfull graues of men cruell in life and death. Let vs seeke some Festiuall argument, if that may be more delightfull.

He Mexicans<sup>a</sup> diuided the yeare into eightene moneths, ascribing to each twentie dayes, so that the five odde dayes were excluded. These five they reckoned apart, and called them the daies of nothing: during the which, the people did nothing, neither went to their Temples, but spent the time in visiting each other: the sacrificers likewise ceased their sacrifices. These five dayes being past, the first month began about the twentie six of February. Gomara<sup>b</sup> sets downe their moneths names in order. The Indians described them by peculiar pictures, commonly taken of the principall feast therein. They accounted their weekes by thirteene dayes: they had also a weeke of yeares which was likewise thirteene. They reckoned by a certaine wheele, which conrayned foure weekes, that is, two and fiftie yeares. In the midst of this wheele was painted the Sunne, from which went foure beames of lines, in crosse, of distinct colours, greene, blew, red, and yellow; and so the lines betwixt these: on which they noted by some picture, the accident that befell any yeare, as the Spaniards comming, marked by a man clad in red. The last night when this wheele was run about, they brake all their vessels and stuffe, put out their fire and all the lights, saying, that the world should end at the finishing of one of these wheeles, and it might be at that time; and then what should such things need? Vpon this conceit they passed the night in great feare, but when they saw the day begin to breake, they presently beat many Drums, with much other mirth and musick, saying, that God did prolong the time with another age of two and fiftie yeares. And then began another wheele; the first day whereof they tooke new fire, for which they went to the Priest, who fetched it out of a mountaine, and made a solemne sacrifice and thanksgiuing. The twentie daies of each month were called by severall names, the first Cipactli which signifieth a Spade, and to the rest a house, a Dogge, a Snake, an Eagle, a Temple, and the like. By this Calendar they keepe things in memory about nine hundred yeares since; The Indians of Culhua did beleue that the Gods had made the world, they knew not how: and that since the creation, foure Sunnes were past, and that the fift and last is the Sunne, which now giueth light vnto the world.

Opinion of five Sunnes.

The first Sunne (forsooth) perished by water, and all living creatures therewith: the second fell from heauen, and with the fall slew all living creatures, and then were many Giants in the countrey: the third Sunne was consumed by fire; and the fourth, by Tempest of ayre and winde; and then mankinde perished not, but was turned into Apes: yet when that fourth Sunne perished, all was turned into darknesse, and so continued five and twentie yeares: and at the fifteenth yeare, God did forme one man and woman, who brought forth children, and at the end of other ten yeares appeared this fift Sunne newly borne, which after their reckoning is now in this yeare 1612, nine hundred and eightene yeares since. Three dayes after this Sunne appeared, they held that all the Gods did die, and that these which since they worship, were borne in processe of time.

Mexica's feasts.

At the end of euerie twentie daies the Mexicans celebrated a Feast called Toumli, which was the last day of euerie moneth. The last day of the first month was called Tlacaxipevaliztli, on which were slaine a hundred captiues in sacrifice, and eaten, others putting on the skins (as before is shewed.) Many of them would goe to the slaughter with ioyfull countenance, dancing, and demanding almes, which befell to the Priests. When the greene corne was a foote about the ground, they vsed to goe to a certaine Hill, and there sacrificed two children, a Girle and a Boy, three yeares olde, to the honour of Tlaloc, God of Water, that they might haue raine: and because these children were free-borne, their hearts were not plucked out, but their throats being cut, their bodies were wrapped in a new mantle, and buried in a graue of stone.

When the fields of Maiz were two foote high, a Collection was made, and therewith were bought foure little slaues, betwixt the age of five and seuen, and they were sacrificed also to Tlaloc, for the continuance of raine: and those dead bodies were shut vp in a Caue appointed to that purpose. The beginning of this butcherie, was, by occasion of a drought which continued foure yeares, and forced them to leaue the Countrey. When the Maiz was ripe, in the moneth and Feast Hueitzozotli, euery man gathered his handful of Maiz, and brought it to the Temple for an offering, with a certaine drinke called Atli, made of the same graine. They brought also Copalli, a sweet gumme, to incense the Gods which cause the corne to grow. At the beginning of Summer they celebrated the Feast Tlaxuchimeca, with Roses and all sweet flowers, making Garlands thereof, to set on their Idolls heads, and spending all that day in dauncing. To celebrate the Feast Tecuilbuitli, all the principall persons of each Prouince, came to the Citie on the euening of the Feast, and apparelled a woman with the attire of the God of salt, who daunced among a great companie of her neighbours, but the next day was sacrificed with much solemnitie, and all that day was spent in deuotion, burning of Incense in the Temple. The Merchants had a Temple by themselves, dedicate to the God of gain: they made their Feast vpon the day called Micailbuitli, wherein were sacrificed and eaten many captiues, which they had bought, and all the day spent in dauncing.

In the feast of Uehpaniztli they sacrificed a woman, whose skinn was put vpon an Indian, which two dayes together daunced with the Townsmen, celebrating the same Feast in their best attire.

In the day of Hasamutzi the Mexicans entred into the Lake with a great number of Canoas, and there drowned a boy and a girle, in a little Boat, which they caused to be sunke, in such sort, that neuer after that boat appeared againe, holding opinion, that those children were in company with the Gods of the lake. That day they spent in feasting and anointing their Idolls cheekes with a kinde of gumme, called Vlli.

When Cortés was gone out of Mexico, to encounter Pamphilo de Naruaes, & had left Aluaro in the city, he in the great temple murdered a great multitude of gentlemen; which had there assembled in the great Temple, to their accustomed solemnitie, being six hundred, or (as some say) a thousand, richly attired and adorned, where they vsed to sing and daunce, in honour of their God, to obtaine health, children, victorie, &c.

In the moneth of May, the Mexicans made their principall feast to Vitziliputzli: two dayes before which, the religious Virgins or Nunnes mingled a quantitie of Beets with roasted Maiz, and moulded it with honey, making an Image of that paste, in bignes like to the Idoll of wood, putting in in stead of eyes, graines of glasse, Greene, blew, or white, and for teeth graine of Maiz. Then did all the Nobles bring it a rich garment like vnto that of the Idoll, and being clad, did set it in an azured chaire, and in a Litter. The morning of the feast being come, an houre before day, all the maidens came forth attired in white with new ornaments, which that day were called the sisters of Vitziliputzli: they were crowned with garlands of Maiz roasted and parched, with chaines of the same about their neckes, passing vnder their left armes. Their cheekes were dyed with vermillion, their armes from the elbow to the wrist were couered with red Parrots feathers. Thus attired, they tooke the Image on their shoulders, carrying it into the Court, where all the yong men were, attired in red garments, crowned like the women. When the maidens came forth with this Idoll, the young men drew neere with much reuerence, taking the Litter wherein the Idoll was, vpon their shoulders, carrying it to the staires foote of the Temple: where all the people did humble themselves, laying earth vpon their heads.

After this, all the people went in Procession to a Mountaine called Chapultepec, a league from Mexico, and there made sacrifices. From thence they went to their second Station called Atlahuayaya: and from thence againe to a village, which was a league beyond Cuyoacoan, and then returned to Mexico. They went in this sort about foure leagues, in so many houres, calling this Procession Ypania Vitziliputzli. Being come to the foote of the Temple-stairs, they set downe the litter with the Idoll, and with great obseruance draw the same to the top of the Temple, some drawing aboue, and others helping below, the Flutes and Drums, Cornets, Trumpets, meane-while increasing the solemnitie. The people abode in the Court. Hauing mounted, and placed it in a little lodge of Roses, presently came the yong men, which strowed flowers of sundry kinds, within and without the Temple. This done, all the Virgins came out of their Conuent, bringing peeces of the same past whereof the Idoll was made, in the fashion of great bones, which they deliuered to the young men, who carried them vp, and laide them at the Idols feet, till the place could receiue no more.

They called these morsels of paste, the flesh and bones of Vaxiliputzli. Then came all the Priests of the Temple, euery one strictly obseruing his place, with Vailles of diuers colours and works, garlands on their heads, and chaines of flowers about their necks: after them came the Gods and Goddeses, whom they worshipped of diuers figures, attired in the same liuerie. Then putting themselues in order about those peeces of paste, they vsed certain ceremonies, with singing and dancing. By these meanes they were blessed and consecrated for the flesh and bones of the Idoll: which were then honoured in the same sort as their God. Then came forth the sacrificers, who began the sacrifice of men, whereof they now sacrificed more then at other times: for this was their solemnest festiuall. The sacrifices being ended, all the young men and maides came out of the Temple attired as before, and being placed in order and ranke, one directly against another, they danced by Drums, which sounded in praise of the feast, and of their God. To which song, all the auncientest and greatest men did answer, dauncing about them, making a great circle as the manner is, the yong men and maides remaining alwaies in the middest.

All the Citie came to this spectacle, and throughout the whole land, on this day of Vitxiliputzli his Feast, no man might eat any other meate, but this paste with Honey, whereof the Idoll was made: and this should be eaten at the point of day, not drinking till afternoone: the contrarie was sacrilegious. After the ceremonies ended, it was lawfull for them to eat any thing. During the time of this ceremonie, they hid the water from their little Children, admonishing such, as had the vse of reason, to abstaine.

The ceremonies, dances, and sacrifices ended, they went to vncloth themselues, and the Priests and Ancients of the Temple, tooke the Image of paste, and spoyled it of all the ornaments, making many peeces of it, and of the consecrated Rolls, which they ministered in a kind of Communion, beginning with the greater, and continuing vnto the rest, both men, women, and children: who receiued it with teares, feare, reuerence, and other both affects, and effects of deuotion, saying, that they did eat the flesh and bones of their God. Such as had sicke folkes demaunded thereof for them, and carried it with great reuerence and veneration. All such as did communicate were bound to giue the tenth part of this seede, whereof the Idoll was made. The solemnitie of the Idoll being ended, an olde man of great authoritie stept vp into a high place, and with a loude voyce preached their Law and Ceremonies. This Historie deserueth the longer Relation, because it so much resembleth the Popish Chimara, and monstrous conception of Transubstantiation, and of their Corpus-Christi-Feast, with other their Rites, to which Acosta also the relater compareth it, blaming the Diuell, for vsurping the seruice, and imitating the Rites of their Church, whereas their Church deserueth blame for imitating the Diuell, and these his Idolatrous Disciples, in their Stupendious monsters of opinion, and ridiculous offices of superstition. But you shall yet see a further resemblance.

f Mexican lubiles.

Next to this principal Feast of Vitxiliputzli,<sup>e</sup> was that of Texcalipuca, of chiefe estimation. This fell on the nineteenth day of May, and was called Tozcolt. It fell euery foure yeares with the Feast of Penance, where there was giuen<sup>f</sup> full indulgence and remission of finnes. In this day they did sacrifice a captiue, which resembled the Idoll Texcalipuca. Vpon the euen of this solemnitie, the Noble-men came to the Temple, bringing a new garment like to that of the Idoll, which the Priest put vpon him, ha-
uing

uing first taken off his other garments, which they kept with great reverence. There were in the Coffers of the Idoll s many Ornaments, Jewels, Eare-rings, and other riches, as Bracelets, and precious Feathers, which serued to no vse, and were worshipped as the God himselfe. Besides that garment, they put vpon him certaine ensignes of Feathers, with fannes, shadows, and other things. Being thus attired, they drew the Curtaine from before the doore, that all men might see. Then came forth one of the chiefe of the Temple, attired like to the Idoll, carrying flower in his hand, and a Flute of earth, hauing a very sharpe sound, and turning toward the East, hee sounded it, and after that to the West, North, and South, he did the like.

g Their Reliques.

This done, he put his finger into the Ayer, and then gathered vp the earth <sup>h</sup> which hee put in his mouth, eating it in signe of adoration. The like did all that were present, weeping, and falling flat to the ground, inuocating the darkeness of the night, and the winds, not to forsake them, or else to take away their liues and free them from the labours they endured therein. Theeues, Adulterers, Murtherers, and all other offenders had great feare and heauinesse whiles the Flute sounded, so as some could not hide nor dissemble their offences. By this meanes they all demanded no other thing of their god, but to haue their offences concealed; powring forth many teares, with great repentance and sorrow, offering great store of incense to appease their gods. All the Martialists, and resolute spirits, addicted to the Warres, desired with great deuotion of God the Creator, of the Lord, for whom we liue, of the Sunne, and of other their gods, that they would giue them victorie against their enemies, and strength to take many captiues for sacrifice. This ceremonious sounding of the Flute by the Priest continued ten dayes, from the ninth of May to the nineteenth, with eating of earth, praying euery day with eyes lifted vp to heauen, sighes and grones, as of men grieued for their sinnes. Yet did not they beleue that there were <sup>i</sup> any punishments in the other life, but did these things to auert temporall punishments: they accounted death an assured rest, and therefore voluntarily offered themselues thereto. The last day of the Feast, the Priests drew forth a litter well furnished with Curtins and pendants of diuers fashions: this litter had so many armes to hold by, as there were Ministers to carrie it: all which came forth besmeared with blacke, and long haire, halfe in tresses with white strings, and attired in the Idols liuerie. Vpon this litter they set the Image of Texcalipuca, and taking it on their shoulders, brought it to the foote of the staires. Then came forth the yong men and maidens of the Temple, carrying a great cord wreathed of chaines of roasted Mays, with which they enuironed the litter, and put a chaine of the same about the Idols necke, and a garland thereof on his head.

The yong men and maids weare chaines of roasted Mays, and the men garlands, the maids miters made of rods couered with the Mays, their feete couered with feathers, and their armes and cheeks painted. The Image being placed in the litter, they strewed round about store of the boughes of Manguay, the leaues whereof are pricking. They carried <sup>k</sup> it on Procession (two Priests going before with incense) in the circuit of the Court: and euery time the Priest gaue incense, they lifted vp their armes as high as they could to the Idoll and the Sunne. All the people in the Court turned round to the place whither the Idoll went, euery one carrying in his hand new cords of the threds of Manguay, a fadome long, with a knot at the end, wherewith they whipped themselues on the shoulders, euen as they doe heere (saith Acosta) on Holy Thursday. The people brought boughes and flowers to beautifie the Court and Temple.

This done, euery one brought their offerings, Jewells, Incense, sweete Wood, Grapes, Mays, Quails, and the rest. Quails were the poore mans offering, which he deliuered to the Priests, who pull off their heads, and cast them at the foot of the Altar, where they lost their blood: and so they did of all other things which were offered. Euery one offered meat and fruit, according to his power, which was laid at the foot of the Altar, and was carried to the Ministers chamber. The offering done, the people went to dinner: the yong men and maidens of the Temple being busied meane-while to serue the Idoll with all that was appointed for him to eate, which was prepared by other women who had made a vow that day to serue the Idoll. These prepared meats in admirable varietie, which being readie, the Virgins went out of the Temple in Procession, euery one carrying a little Basket of Bread in her hand, and in the other a dish of these meates. Before them merched, an olde man like to a Steward, attired in a white Surples downe to the calves of his legges, vpon a red iacket, which had wings in stead of sleeues, from which hung broad Ribands, and at the same a small Pumpion stucke full of flowers, and hauing many superstitious things within it. This old man comming neere to the foote of the staires, made lowly reuerence. Then the Virgins with like reuerence presented their meats in order: this done, the old man returnes leading their Virgins into the Conuent. And then the yong men and Ministers of the Temple came forth and gather vp their meat, which they carry to their Priests chambers, who had fasted fise dayes, eating but once a day, not stirring all that time out of the Temple, where they whipped themselves, as before is shewed. They did eate of these Diuine meates (so they called it) neither might any other eate thereof. After dinner they assembled againe, and then was sacrificed one who had all that yeare borne the habit and resemblance of their Idoll. They went after this, into a holy place appointed for that purpose, whither the yong men and Virgins of the Temple brought them their ornaments, and then they danced and sung, the chiefe Priests drumming and founding other Instruments. The Noble-men in ornaments like to the yong-men, danced round about them.

They did not vsually kill any man that day, but him that was sacrificed, yet euery fourth yeare they had others with him, which was the yeare of Iubilee and full pardons. After Sunne-set, the Virgins went all to their Conuent, and taking great dishes of earth full of bread, mixed with Honey, couered with small Panniers, wrought and fashioned with dead mens heads and bones, carried the same to the Idoll, and setting them downe retired, their Steward vsing them as before. Presently came forth all the yong men in order, with Canes or Reedes in their hands, who beganne to runne as fast as they could to the toppe of the Temple-staires; euery one striving to come first to the Collation. The chiefe Priests obserued who came first, second, third, and fourth, neglecting the rest, these they praised, and gaue them ornaments, and from thence forward they were respected as men of marke. The said Collation was all carried away by the yong men as great Reliques. This ended, the yong men and maids were dismissed: and so I thinke would our Reader, who cannot but be gluttied with, and almost surfet of our so long and tedious feasting. Yet let me intreat one seruite more, it is for the god of gaine, who I am sure will finde followers and Disciples too attentiu.

For the Festiuall of this Gaine-god, Quetz-aabcaalt, the Merchants, his deuoted and faithfull obseruants, fortie dayes before, bought a slaue well proportioned to represent that Idol for that space. First they washt him twice in a lake, called the lake of the gods, and being purified, they attired him like the Idoll. Two of the Ancients of the Temple came to him nine dayes before the Feast, and humbling themselves before him, said with a loud voice, Sir, nine dayes hence your dancing must end, and you must die: and he must answer, (whatsoeuer he thinketh) In a good boure. They diligently obserued if this aduertisement made him sad, or if he continued his dancing according to his wont. If they perceiued him sad, they tooke the sacrificing Rasors, which they washed and censed from the bloud, which thereon had remained, and hereof with another liquor made of Cacao, mixed a drinke, which they said would make him forget what had beene said to him, and returne to his former iollitie. For they tooke this heauinesse in these men to be ominous.

On the Feast-day, after much honouring him, and incensing him, about midnight they sacrificed him, offering his heart to the Moone, and after cast it to the Idoll, letting the bodie fall downe the staires to the Merchants, who were the chiefe worshippers. These hearts of their sacrifices (some<sup>1</sup> say) were burned after the Oblation to this Planet and Idoll. The bodie they sauced and dressed for a banquet about breake of day, after they had bid the Idoll good morrow with a small dance.

This Temple of Quetzalcoatl had Chappels as the rest, and Chambers, where were Conuents of Priests, yong men, maids, and children. One Priest alone was resident which was changed weekly. His charge that weeke, after he had instructed the children, was to strike vp a Drumme at Sunne-setting, at the sound whereof (which was heard throughout the Citie) euery one ended his Merchandize and retired to his house, all the Citie being as silent as it no bodie had beene there: at day breaking he did againe giue notice by his Drumme: for till that time it was not lawfull to stirre out of the Citie. In this Temple was a Court wherein they danced, and on this Idolls holy-day, had erected a Theater, thirtie foot square, finely decked and trimmed, in which were represented Comedies, Maskes, and many other representations to expresse or cause mirth and ioy.

The Mexicans<sup>m</sup> had their Schooles, and as it were Colledges, or Seminaries, where the Ancients taught the children to say by heart, the Orations, Discourses, Dialogues, and Poems, of their great Orators and chiefe men, which thus were preserued by Tradition, as perfectly as if they had beene written. And in their Temples, the sonnes of the chiefe men (as Peter<sup>n</sup> Martyr reporteth) were shut vp at seuen yeares old, and neuer came forth thence till they were marriageable, and were brought forth to be contracted. All which time, they neuer cut their haire, they were clothed in blacke, abstained at certaine times of the yeare from meats engendring much bloud, and chastened their bodies with often fasting.

And although they had not Letters, yet they had their wheele for computation of time, (as it is said before) in which their writings were not as ours from the left hand to the right, or as of the Easterne Nations, from the right hand to the left, or as the Chinois, from the toppe to the bottome: but beginning below did mount vpwards: as in that mentioned wheele, from the Sunne which was made in the Center, vpwards to the circumference. Another manner of writing or signing, they had, in circle-wise. In the Province of Yucatan or Honduras, there were bookes of the Leaues of Trees, folded and squared, which contained the knowledge of the Planets, of Beastes, and other Naturall things, and of their Antiquities, which some blindly-zealous Spaniards, taking for incantments, caused to be burned. The P Indians of Tescuco, Talla, and Mexico, shewed vnto a Iesuit their Bookes, Histories, and Kalendars, which in figures and Hieroglyphickes represented things after their manner. Such as had forme or figure, were represented by their proper Images, other things were represented by Characters; and I haue seene, saith Acoffa, the Pater-noster, Aue Maria, and Confession thus written. As, for these things, I a sinner doe confesse my selfe, they painted an Indian, kneeling on his knees, at a Religious mans feet; To God most mightie, they painted three faces with their crownes, according to that painting blasphemie of the Popish Image-mongers, and so they went on in that manner of picturing the words of their Popish Confession; where Images failed, setting Characters; Their 9 bookes for this cause were great, which (besides their engrauiings in stone, walles, or wood) they made of Cotton-wooll wrought into a kinde of paper, and of Leaues of Metl, folded vp like our broad-cloathes, and written on both sides. Likewise they made them of the thinn inner-rinde of a Tree, growing vnder the vpper barke (as did also the Ancient Latines, from whence the names of Codex and Liber for a Booke, are deriued by our Grammarians.) They did binde them also into some forme of bookes, compacting them with Bitumen: their Characters were of Fish-hookes, Starres, Snarres, Files, &c. Thus did they keepe their priuate and publike records.

There<sup>t</sup> were some in Mexico, that vnderstood each other by whistling, which was ordinarily vsed by louers and theeues, a language admirable euen to our wits, so highly applauded by our selues, and as deeply delecting these Nations in termes of sillinesse and simplicitie. Yea, in Our Virginia (so I hope and desire) Captaine Smith told me that there are some, which the spacious diuorce of the wide streame notwithstanding, will by hallowes and howps vnderstand each other, and entertaine conference.

rence. The numbers of the Mexicans are simple, till you come to six, then they count six and one, six and two, six and three; ten is a number by it selfe, which in the ensuing numbers, is repeated as in other languages till fifteen, which they reckon in one terme, ten, five, and one, and so the rest to twentieth. ‡ Acosta lib. 7. cap. 20.

The Mexicans † did beleue concerning the soule, that it was immortall, and that men receiued either ioy or paine, according to their deserts and liuing in this world. They held for an assured faith, that there were nine places appointed for soules, and the chiefe place of glorie to be neere vnto the Sunne, where the soules of good men shaine in the warres, and those which were sacrificed, are placed: that the soules of wicked men abide in the earth, and were diuided after this sort: children which were dead-borne, went to one place: those which died of age or other disease went to another: those which died of wounds or contagion, to a third: those which were executed by order of Iustice, to a fourth; but parricides, which slew their Parents, or which slew their wiues or children, to a fifth. Another place was for such as slew their Masters or Religious persons. ‡ Acosta seemeth to deny that the Indians beleued any punishments after death, and yet setteth downe an Oration made at Mutezuma's election, wherein he is said to haue pierced the nine Vaults of heauen, which seemeth to allude to this of Gomara.

Their burials also were diuers, as is shewed before: and heere may be added, that hee which died for Adulterie, was shrowded like vnto their god of Lecherie, called Tlazoultetel: hee that was drowned, like to Tlaloc: hee that died of drunkenness like to the god of Wine, Ometochtli, the Souldiour, like to Uitziliputzli. But lest you with mee buried in like manner, which trouble as much my English Reader, with New-Spaines tedious Relations, as Old Spaines fastidious insulting spirits haue sometime done our English Nation, I will aduenture further into the adioyning Prouinces.

Circumcision, and Croffes.

Iucatan ‡ is a point of Land extending it selfe into the Sea, ouer against the Ile Cuba, and was first discovered by Francis Hernandez de Cordona, in the yeare 1517. at which time one asking an Indian how this Country was called, he answered Telietan Telietan, that is, I vnderstand you not, which words the Spaniards corrupting both in the sound and interpretation, called it Iucatan. Iames Velasques, Gouvernour of Cuba, sent his Cousin, Iohn de Grijalua the yeare after, who there fought with the Indians at Camporan, and was hurt. The Spaniards ‡ went to a Citie on the shore, which for the greatnes they called Cayro of that great Citie in Egypt. Here they found Turreted Houses, Stately Temples, wayes paved, and faire Market-places. The houses were of stone or bricke, and lime, very artificially composed. To the square Courts or first habitations of their houses they ascended by ten or twelue steps. The rooofe was of Reeds, or stalkes of Hearbes. The Indians gaue the Spaniards Jewels of Gold, verie faire and cunningly wrought, and were requited with Vestures of Silke and Wooll, Glasse, Beads and little Bells. Their apparell was of Cotton in manifold fashions and colours. They frequented their Temples much, to the which the better sort paved wayes with stone from their houses. They were great Idolaters, and were circumcised, but not all. They liued vnder lawes, and trafficked together with great fidelitie, by exchanging commodities without mony. The Spaniards saw Croffes amongst them, and demanding whence they had them, they said that a certaine man of excellent beautie passing passing by that coast, left them that notable token to remember him: others said, a certaine man brighter then the Sunne died in the working thereof. The Spaniards say'd thence to Campechium, a Towne of three thousand houses. Heere they saw a square Stage or Pulpit foure cubits high, partly of clammy Bitumen, and partly of small stones, whereto the Image of a man cut in Marble, was ioyned, two foure-footed vnknowne beasts fastning vpon him, as if they would teare him in peeces. And by the Image stood a Serpent all besmeared with bloud, deuouring a Lion, it was seuen and fortie foot long, and as bigge as an Oxe. These things I mention as testimonies of their Art in these barbarous places, and perhaps of their deuotion also. Grijalua or Grisalua seeing a Tower farre off at Sea, by direction thereof, came to an Iland called Cosumel, agreeing in priuate and publike manner of life with them of Lucatan: Their houses, Temples, apparell, and trade of Merchandise all one: their houses somewhere couered with Reeds, and where quarries were, with slate: many houses had marble pillars.

c This Towne was taken by Master William Parker.
Anno 1596.

They found ancient Towers there, and the ruines of such as had beene broken downe and destroyed: there was one whereto they ascended by eigheteene steppes or staires. The Gouvernour whom they supposed to be a Priest, conducted them to the Tower: in the top whereof they erected a Spanish Banner, and called alio the Iland Santa Cruce. In the Tower they found chambers, wherein were marble Images, and some of Earth in the similitude of Beares. These they inuoked with loude singing all in one tune, and sacrificed vnto them with fumes and sweet odours, worshipping them as their household gods. There they performed their diuine ceremonies and adorati-on: they were also circumcised.

Gomara d saith, That heere, and at Xicalanco, the Diuell vsed to appeare visiblie, and that these two were great in estimation for holinesse; euery Citie had their Temple, or Altar, where they worshipped their Idols, amongst which were many Crosse of Wood and Brasse, whereby some conceiue that some Spaniards had recourse hither when Roderigo was defeated, and Spaine ouer-runne by the Saracens. In e both these places they sacrificed men: which Cortes perswaded them to cease. The Temple in Cosumil or Acusamil was built like a square Tower, broad at the foote, with steppes round about, and from the middest vpward very strait: the toppe was hollow and couered with straw: it had foure windowes and porches. In the hollow place was their Chappell, where stood their Idolls. In a Temple by the Sea side was an vn-couth Idoll, great and hollow, fastened in the wall with lime: it was made of earth. Behinde this Idols backe was the Vestrie, where the ornaments of the Temple were kept. The Priests had a little secret dore hard adioyning to the Image, by which they crept into his hollow panch, and thence answered the people that came thither with prayers and petitions, making the simple people beleeue it was the voyce of the god, which therefore they honored more then any other, with many perfumes and sweete smells. They offered Bread, Fruit, Quails bloud, and of other Birds, Dogges, and sometimes Men. The fame of this Idoll and Oracle brought many Pilgrimes to Acusamil from many places. At the foote of this Temple was a plot like a Church yard, well walled, and garnished with Pinnacles, in the middest whereof stood a Crosse of ten foote long, which they adored for the god of raine. At all times when they wanted raine, they would goe thither on Procession deuoutly, and offered to the Crosse, Quails sacrificed, no sacrifice being so acceptable. They burnt sweete gumme to perfume him with, besprinkling the same with water, and by this meanes they thought to obtaine raine. They could neuer know, saith Gomara, how that God of Crosse came amongst them, for in all those parts of India there is no memorie of any preaching of the Gospell that had beene at any time. What others thinke, and what some Indians answered, concerning it, is said before.

Guatimala is commeth next to our consideration, a Prouince of pleasant Ayre, and fertile soyle, where groweth abundance of their Cacao, which is a fruit that serueth the Indians for meate, drinke, and money. The Citie (which beareth the same name) was first at the foote of a Vulcano or Hill which casteth fire, but because in the year 1542. <sup>h</sup> on the fixe and twentieth day of December, a Lake hidden in the bowels of that Hill, brake forth in many places, and with a terrible violence ruined the most part of the Citie: it was remoued two miles thence, together with the Episcopall Sea, and the Kings Councell. But in the year 1581. there issued from another Vulcan two miles off, or somewhat more, such an irruption of fire, as threatened to consume euery thing. The day following, followed such a showre of ashes that it filled the valley, and almost buried the Citie. And yet were not all the throwes passed of this Hilles monstrous trauels, but the year after, for the space of foure and twenty houres, thence issued a streame of fire, that dranke vp fire/streames of water, burned the stones and rockes, rent the Ayre with thunders, and made it a wauiug and mouing sea of fire. Before <sup>i</sup> that first eruption of waters, some Indians came and told the Bishop, that they had heard an vncredible noise and murmuring at the foot of the Hill, but he reprobued them, saying, they should not trouble themselves with vaine and superstitious feares; about two of the clock in the night following happened that deluge, which carried many houses, and whatsoever stood in the way, in which, fise hundred and twentie Spaniards perished, and scarce any mention of the houses remained.

It is worthy recitall which Benzo <sup>k</sup> and Gomara haue recorded, that Peter Aluado the Gouvernour (who by licence of the Pope had married two sisters, the Ladie Frances, and the Ladie Beatrice della Culua) hauing perished by a mischance, his wife not onely painted her house with Sorrowes blacke liuerie, and abstained from meate and sleepe, but in a madde impietie said, God could now doe her no greater euill. Yet for all this her sorrow, shee caused the Citizens to be sworne vnto her Gouvernement (a new thing in the Indies.) Soone after, this inundation happened, which first of all assailed the Gouvernours house, and caused this impotent and impatient Ladie now to bethinke her of a deuotion, and betake her to her Chappell, with eleuen of her maids, where leaping on the Altar, and clasping about an Image, the force of the water ruined the Chappell; whereas if shee had stayed in her bed-chamber, shee had escaped death. They tell of vncouth noyses, and hideous apparitions which then were seene. Benzo obserued by his owne experience, that this Countrie is much subiect to Earth-quakes. The Guatimalans, in manner of life resemble the Mexicans and Nicaraguans.

cap. 15.

Fondura <sup>l</sup> or Hondura is next to Guatimala, wherein were (saith Benzo) at the Spaniards first comming thither foure hundred thousand Indians, but when I was there, scarcely eight thousand were left: the rest being slaine, or sold, or consumed by the mines: and those which are left, both heere, and in other places, place their habitation as farre as they can, where the Spaniard shall be no eye-fore vnto them. The Spaniards in this Prouince planted fise Spanish Colonies, which all scarcely could number an hundred and twentie houses.

m Chap. 16.

Nicaragua <sup>m</sup> extendeth it selfe from the Chiularecan mines of Fondura, toward the South Sea. This Region is not great, but fertile, and therefore called of the Spaniards Mahumets Paradise, for the plentie of all things; yet in the Summer time it is so scorched with heate, that men cannot trauell but in the night. Six moneths, from May to October, are pestered with continuall showers, which the other fixe wholly want: The Parrots are heere as troublesome as Crowes and Rookes with vs, and they are forced to keepe their corne in like manner from their spoiling. The people are of like condition

dition to the Mexicans ; they feede on mans flesh. To their dances they flocke two or three hundred in a company, which are performed with great variety of gestures, vestures, and passions: Every man in, and, every man out of his humour. Thirty and five miles from Leon or Lyon, an Episcopall City in this Region, is a Vulcano or flaming hill, the fire whereof may be seene (in the night) about 100 miles. Some had a conceit, that molten Gold was the matter of this fire. And therefore a certaine Dominican caused a Kettle and long chaine of Iron to be let downe into this fiery concavity, where by the violence of the heat, the Kettle and part of the chaine was molten. He makes a bigger and stronger, but returnes with like successe, and this added, that himselfe and his 2. companions by eruption of fire, had almost heere consumed. Gomara, calls this fire Blaso de Ynesta, and the hill, Mafaya. It goes downe two hundred and fifty braces or yards. In this Country they vse Sodomie and sacrifices of men. Of this name Nicaragua, Gilgon sales, that first of the Spaniards discovered these parts, found a King with whom he had much conference, whom he perswaded to become a Christian: although his prohibition of wars and dancing, did much trouble him. This Nicaragua demanded them if the Christians had any knowledge of the Flood, which drowned all the earth with men and beasts (as he had heard his Progenitors say) and whether another were to come, whether the earth should be over-turned, or the heauen fall: when, and how the Moone and Starres should loose their light and motion: who moved those heauenly bodies, where the soules should remaine, and what they should doe, being freed from the body, whether the Pope died, whether the Spaniards came from heauen, and many other strange questions admirable in an Indian. They worshipped the Sunne and other Idols which Nicaragua suffered Gilgon sales to take out of the great Temple.

In Nicaragua there were five linages; and different languages: the Coribiet, Ciototoga, Ciondale, Oretigua, and the Mexican; though this place was a thousand miles from Mexico, yet were they like them in speech, apparell, and religion: they had also the same figures instead of letters, which those of Culhua had, and bookes a span broad, and twelue spannes long, doubled, of many colours. They differ, as in languages, so in religions. Of their religious rites thus writeth Gomara: their Priests were all married, except their Confessors, which heard Confessions, and appointed Penances, according to the quality of the fault: they revealed not the Confession: they appointed the Holydaies, which were eightene. When they sacrificed, they had a knife of flint, wherewith they opened him that was sacrificed. The Priests appointed the sacrifices, how many men, whether they were to be women, or slaues taken in battell, that all the people might know how to celebrate the Feasts, what prayers and what offerings to make. The Priest went three times about the Captiue, singing in a dolefull tune, and suddenly opens his breast, annoints his face with the blood, takes out his heart, diuideth his body. The heart is given to the Prelate, the feete and hands to the King, the buttocks to the taker, the rest to the people. The heads of the sacrifices are set on trees, planted there for that purpose, every tree hath figured in it the name of the Prouince wherewith they haue wars. Vnder these trees they many times sacrifice men and children of the Country and of their owne people, being first brought: for it was lawfull for the father to sell his children. Those which the Kings bring vp of their owne people, with better fare then ordinary for sacrifice, are made beleeue they shall be some canonized Wights, or heauenly Deities, and therefore take it gladly. They did not eat the flesh of these, as they did of the captiues. When they eat their sacrificed captiues, they made great feasts, and the Priests and religious men dranke much wine and smoke: their wine is of Prunes, whiles the Priest annoynts the cheekes and mouth of the Idol with the blood, the others sing, and the people make their praiers with great deuotion and reares, and after goe on procession (which is not done in all Feastes.) The religious haue white Cotten coates, and other ornaments which hang downe from the shoulders to the legges, thereby to put a difference betwene them and others. The Lay-men haue their Banners, with that Idol which they most esteeme, and bagges with dust and bodkins, the Yong-men haue their bowes, darts, arrowes; and the guide of all is the image of the Deuill set vpon a Lance, carried by the most ancient and honourable Priest. rings on the ground, or strew it with Roses and Flowers, because their Idols should not touch the ground, and the banner being stucke fast, the singing ceaseth, and the Prelate beginning, all the rest follow, and draw bloud, some from their tongues, some from their eares, some from their members, and euery man as his deuotion liketh best, and with that bloud annoynt the Image. In the meane while, the youths skirmish and dance for the honour of their Feasts: they cure the wounds, with the poulder of hearbs and coles. In some of these processions they hallow Mayz, besprinkling the same with the bloud of their priuities, and eat it.

They may haue many women, but one is their lawfull wife, which they marry thus; the Priest takes the Bridegroome and the Bride by the little fingers, sets them in a chamber at a fire, and giues them certaine instructions, and when the fire is out they are married. If he take her for a Virgin, and finds her otherwise, hee may diuorce her. Many bring their wiues to the Caciques or Lords to corrupt them, esteeming it an honour. Their Temples were low daike roomes, which they vsed for their Treasury also and Armory. Before the Temple was an high Altar for the Sacrifices, whereon also the Priest plaied the Preacher first, and then the Butcher.

Adulterers are beaten, but not slaine; the adulterous wife is diuorced, and may not marry againe, and her parents are dishonoured. Their husbands suffer them to lie with others in some Feasts of the yeere. Hee that forceth a Virgin, is a slave, or payeth her dowry: if a slave doe it with his Masters daughter, they are both buried quicke. They haue common brothels. A thiefe hath his haire cut off, and is made his slave from whom he hath stollen, vntill he hath made satisfaction, which if he defer long, he is sacrificed. They had no punishment for him which should kill a Cacique, for (they said) such a thing could not happen. The riches of Nicaragua consisteth much in a great Lake three hundred miles long, and being within twelue miles of the South Sea, doth disemboque it selfe in the North Sea, a great way off. In this Lake of Nicaragua are many and great fishes. One strange kind is that, which the inhabitants of Hispaniola call Manati (as for these inhabitants of the place, the Spanish iniuries haue chased them thence.) This fish somewhat resembleth the Otter, it is 25. foote long, twelue thicke, the head and taile like a Cow, with small eyes, his backe hard and hairy, hee hath onely two feet at the shoulders, and those like an Elephants. The females bring forth yong, and nourish them with the vdder, like a Cow. I haue seene and eaten of them (saith Benzo) the taste is like swines flesh; they eat grasse. There was a King in Hispaniola, which put one of them (being presented him by his Fishermen) into a Lake of standing waters, where it liued fife and twenty yeeres: when any of the seruants came to the Lake and called Matto, Matto, shee would come and receiue meate at their hands; and if any would be ferried ouer the Lake, she willingly yeelded her backe, and performed this office faithfully, yea she hath carried ten men at once singing or playing. A Spaniard had once wronged her, by casting a dart at her; and therefore after that, when she was called, she would plunge downe againe, otherwise to the Indians she remained officious. She would be as full of play as a Monkie, and would wrastle with them: especially shee was addicted to one yong man, which vsed to feed her. This proceeded, partly from her docible nature, partly, because being taken yong, she was kept vp a while at home, in the Kings house, with bread. This fish liueth both on land and water. The Riuer swelling ouer his banks, into the Lake, this fish followed the streame, and was seene no more. There was another strange creature in Nicaragua (they call it Cascuij) like a blacke Hogge, with small eyes, wide eares, clouen feet, a short trunkce or snout like an Elephant, off so lowd a braying, that he would make men deafe. An other there is with a naturall purse vnder her belly, wherein she putteth her yong: it hath the body of a Fox, handed and footed like a Monkie. The Battes in these parts are terrible for biting. The Inhabitants neere the Riuer Suerus are not differing from the rest, but that they eat not mans flesh. Next, is that necke or narrow extent of Land stretching betweene the North and South Seas, and (as it were) knitting the two great Peninsuls of the North and South America together.

goe on shore in the Name of God; whereupon the Colonie and Plantation there, was so called: It hath a bad situation, and small habitation. Baptista Antonio the King of Spaines Surueyout counielled to bring Nombre de Dios to Puerto Bello. It was remoued from the former sear, in the yeere of our Lord 1584. Sir Thomas Baskernile burnt it and went from thence with his Armiētowards Panama, in the yeere 1595. Darien was called Antiqua Darienis, because Ancifus vowed to our Lady at Siuill called Maria Antiqua, if shee would helpe him in those Indian Conquests, he would turne the Caciques house into a Temple: there he planted a Colonie.

It would be tedious to tell of the sturres and ciuill vnciuill brawles betwixt the Spaniards in these parts. Vasques Valboa imprisoned Ancifus, and after recovered his credit by discouery of the South-sea. For whiles the Spaniards contended about the weight and sharing of their Gold which a Cacique had giuen them, this Cacique being present, hurled downe the Gold, not a litle maruelling (as hee said) that they would so much contend for that, as if they could eat or drinke it: But if they liked it so well, he would carry them where their Golden thirst should be satisfied. He was deceiued in the nature of that dropisie thirst, which as a fire quenched with oyle, receiues thence greater strength: but he deceived not them in his promise, bringing them to the South-sea: where Valboa named one Prouince, Golden Castle. And for that which he spake of their strife, * as if they could eat or drinke those mettals, the cruelties of the Spaniards were such, as the Indians, when they got any of them, would bind their hands and feet, and laying them on their backs, would poure Gold into their mouthes, saying in insultation, Eate gold Christian. This Valboa was put to death by Arias his father in law.

2 Bero l. 1. c. 23

But now we haue mentioned the first Spaniards which planted these parts, it shall not be amisse to mention some hardships the Spaniards sustained before they could here settle themselves, which may be an answer to those nice and delicate conceits that in our Virginian Expedition cast off all hope, because of some disasters. How the Spaniards dealt one with an other, and how the Indians dealt with them, you haue heard; worse hath not followed from any turbulent emulous spirit of our owne, or hostile, of the Virginian, in this Plantation. And as for famine, Nicuesa's men were so pinched, that (not to speake of those which perished) one sold 7 an old leane mangy dogge to his fellowes for many castellans of Gold: these slayed the Dogge, and cast his mangie skin, with the bones of the head among the bushes. The day following one of them findes it full of Maggots, and stinking; but famine had neither eyes nor tent: hee brought it home, sod, and eat it, and found many Customers which gaue a * Castellan a dish for that mangy broth. An other found two Toads and sod them, which a sicke man bought for two fine shirts curiously wrought with gold. Others found a dead man, rotten, and stinking, which putrified carcassee they roasted, and eat. And thus from seuen hundred and seenty men, they were brought so low, that scarce forty (shadows of men.) remained to inhabite Darien. Much like to this was their successe at the riuer of Plate, in Florida and other places of the West Indies.

*Of the Southerne AMERICA, and of the Countries on the Sea-coast

HIS Peninsula of the New World extending it selfe into the South, is in forme somewhat like to Africa, and both <sup>a</sup> to some huge Pyramis. In this, the Basis <sup>a</sup> Gef. ens. lib. 3. cap. 24.
or ground is the Northerly part, called Terra Firma, from whence it lesseneth it self by degrees, as it draweth neerer the Magellan Straits, where the top of this Spire may fitly be placed. On the East side it is washed with the North Ocean, as it is termed : On the West with that of the South, called also the Peaceable. It is <sup>b</sup> supposed to haue sixteen thousand myles in compasse <sup>b</sup> Botero par. 1. lib. 6.
four thousand in lenght; the breadth is vnequal. The Eastern part thereof, betwene the Riuers Maragnon and Plata, is chalenged by the Portugals; the rest by the Spaniard. From the North to the South are Ledges of Mountaines, the toppes whereof are said to be higher then that Birds will visit; the bottomes yeeld the greatest Riuers in the World, and which most enrich the Oceans Store-house. Orenoque, Maragnon, and Plata seeme to be the Indian Triumviri, Generals of those Riuers-Armies, and Neptunes great Collectors of his watery tributes. Orenoque for Ships is nauigable a thousand myles; for lesse Vessels, two thousand; in some places twenty miles broad; in some, thirty. Berreos affirmed to Sir Walter Raleigh, That a hundred Riuers fell into it, marching vnder his name and colours,

lours, the least as bigge as Rio Grande, one of the greatest Riuer of America. It extendeth two thousand myles East and West, and commanded eight hundred myles, North and South. Plata, taking vp all the streames, in his way, is so full swolne with his increased shore, that he seemeth rather with bigge lookes to bid defiance to the Ocean, then to acknowledge homage, opening his mouth forty leagues wide, as if he would deuoure the same, and with his vomited abundance maketh the salt waters to recoyle, following fresh in this pursuit, till in salt sweates at last he melteth himselfe in the Combate. Maragnon is far greater, whose water hauing furrowed a Channell of six thousand miles, in the length of his winding passage, couereth threescore and ten leagues in breadth, and hideth his Bankes on both sides from him which sayleth in the midst of his proud Current, making simple eyes beleue, that the Heauens alway descend to kisse and embrace his waues. And sure our more-straitned world would so far be accessory to his aspiring, as to style him with the royall title of Sea, and not debase his greatnesse with the meaner name of a Riuer? Girana somewhat otherwise writeth of these Riuer, that Plata called by the Indians Paranaguau, as one should say, a Riuer like a sea is twenty fiue leagues in the mouth, (placed by him in thirty three degrees of Southerly latitude) encreasing in the same time and maner as Nilus: Marannon hee saith is in the entrance fiue leagues, and is not the same with Orellana (so called of Francis Orella, the first Spaniard that sailed in it, and Amazonas of the fabulous reports, as Girana termeth them, of such women there scene) which he saith hath aboue fifty leagues of breadth in the mouth, and is the greatest Riuer of the world, called by some the fresh Sea, running aboue 1500. leagues vnder the Equinoctiall. Thus much he though lesse then others, yet more then can be paralleld in any other streames. This Southern halfe of America hath also, at the Magellane Straits, contracted, and (as it were) shrunk in it selfe, refusing to be extended further in so cold a Climate. The manifold riches of Mettals, Beasts, and other things, in the beginning of the former Booke haue bene declared; and in this, as occasion moueth, shall be further manifested. The Men are the worst part as being in the greatest parts thereof inhumane and brutish. The Spanish Townes in this great tract and their Founders, are set downe by Pedro de Cieza Herera and others, I rather intend Indian-Superstitions then Spanish Plantations in this part of my Pilgrimage.

Of the Townes of Nombre de Dios, seuentene leagues from Panama, the one on the North Sea, the other on the South, and of Dariene, wee last tooke our leaues, as vncertaine whether to make them Mexican, or Peruvian being borderers, and set in the Confinnes, betwixt both. The moorish soyle, muddie water, and grosse Ayre conspire with the heauenly Bodies to make Dariene vnholme: the myrie streame runneth (or creepeth rather very slowly; the water but sprinkled on the heuse-floore, engendreth Toads and Wormes.

They haue in this Prouince of Dariene store of Crocodiles, one of which kinde, Cieza saith, was found fiue and twenty foot long; Swine without tayles, Cats with great tayles, Beasts clouen footed like Kine, otherwise resembling Mules, sauing their spacious eares, and a trunk or snout like an Elephant: there are Leopards, Lyons, Tygres. On the right and left hand of Dariene are found twenty Riuer, which yelde Gold. The men are of good stature, thinn haired; the women weare Rings on their eares and noses, with quaint ornaments on their lippes. The Lords marry as many Wiues as them listeth, other men one or two. They forsake, change, and sell their Wiues at pleasure. They haue publike Stewes of women, and of men also in manie places, without any discredit; yea, this priuiledgeth them from following the wars. The young girles hauing conceived, eate certaine herbes, to cause abortion. Their Lords and Priests consult of warres after they haue drunke the smoke of a certaine herbe. The women follow their husbands to the warres, and know how to vse a Bow. They all paint themselues in the warres. They neede no Head-peece, for their heades are so hard, that they will breake a Sword, being smitten thereon. Wounds receiued in warre, are the badges of honour, whereof they glorie much, and thereby enioy some Franchises. They brand their prisoners and pull out one of their teeth before. They will sell their children; are excellent Swimmers, both Men and women; accustoming themselves twice or thrice a day thereunto. Their Priests are their Physicians, and Masters of Ceremonies;

Ceremonies; for which cause, and because they haue conference with the Deuill, they are much esteemed. * They haue no Temples, nor Houses of deuotion. The Deuill they honour much, which in terrible shapes doth sometimes appeare vnto them; as I (saith Cieza) haue heard some of them say. They beleue, that there is one God in heauen, to wit, the Sunne, and that the Moone is his wife; and therefore worship these two Planets. They worship the Deuill also, and paint him in such forme as he appeareth to them, which is of diuers sorts. They offer Bread, Smoke, Fruits, and Flowers, with great deuotion. Any one may cut off his arme which Realeth Mais, Enciso, with his Armie of Spaniards, seeking to subdue these parts, vsed a Spanish trick, telling the Indians, That he sought their conuersion to the Faith, and therefore discouered of one God, Creator of all things, and of Baptisme; and after other things of this nature, Iesse to his purpose, he told them, That the Pope is the Vicar of Christ in all the world, with absolute power ouer mens Soules and Religions; and that hee had giuen those Countreies to the most mightie King of Spaine, his Master, and hee was now come to take possession, and to demand gold for tribute. They Indians answered, That they liked well what hee had spoken of one God, but for their Religion; they would not dispute of it, or leaue it: And for the Pope, hee should bee liberall of his owne; neither seemed it, that their King was mightie, but poore, that sent thus a begging. But what wordes could not, their Swords effected; with the destruction of the Indians.

The soile of Vraba is so sated with a streame therein, that in eight and twentie dayes the seedes of Cucumbers, Melons, and Gourds, will ripen their Fruits. There is a Tree in those Countreies, whose leaues, with the bare touch, cause great blisters; the fauour of the wood is poyson; and cannot be carried without danger of life, except by the helpe of another hearbe, which is an Antidote to this venomous Tree. King Abibeiba had his Palace in a Tree, by reason of the moorish situation and often inuasion of his Land. Vasques could not get him downe, till he beganne to cut the Tree, and then the poore King came downe, and bought his freedome at the Spaniards price.

Carthagena was so called, for some resemblance in the situation to a Citie in Spaine of that name. Sir Francis Drake tooke it. The Indians thereabouts vsed poisoned Arrows: the women warre as well as the men. Enciso tooke one, who with her owne hands had killed eight and twentie Christians. They did eate the enemies which they killed. They vsed to put in their Sepulchres gold, feathers, and other riches. Between Carthagena and Martha runneth a swift Riuer, which maketh the Sea-water to giue place; and they which passe by, may in the Sea take in of this water fresh.

It is called of the Inhabitants Dabaiba (the Spaniards haue named it Rio Grande, and the Riuer of St. Iohn) it passeth with a Northerne discouerie, into the Gulfe of Vraba before mentioned. They which dwell on this Riuer obserue an Idoll of great note, called by the name of the Riuer, Dabaiba: whereto the King at certaine times of the yeare sends slaues to bee sacrificed, from remote Countreies, from whence also is great resort of Pilgrimes. They kill the slaues before their God, and after burne them, supposing that odour acceptable to their Idoll, as Taper-lights, and Frankincense (saith Martyr) is to our Saints. Through the displeasure of that angrie God, they said that all the Riuers and Fountaines had once failed, and the greatest part of men perished with famine. Their Kings in remembrance hereof, haue their Priests at home, and Chappells which are swept euery day, and kept with a religious neatnesse. When the King thinketh to obtaine of the Idoll, Sunne-shine, or Raine, or the like; he with his Priests gets vp into a Pulpit, standing in the Chappell, purposing not to depart thence till his suit be granted. They vrge their God therefore with vehement prayers, and cruell fasting: the people meane while macerating themselves also with fasting, in foure dayes space not eating nor drinking, except on the fourth day, onely a little broth. The Spaniards asking what God they worshipped thus, they answered, The Creator of the Heauens, Sunne, Moone, and all inuisible thinges; from whom all good thinges proceede. And they say Dabaiba was the Mother of that Creator. They call them to their Deuotions with certaine Trumpets and Bells of gold. The Bells had clappers like in forme to ours, made of the bones of Fishes, and yeelding a pleasing a pleasing sound, as they reported: which no doubt, was a pleasing sound and musick to the Spaniards couetous hearts, howsoever it agreeth with the nature of that mettall to ring in the eares. One of them, say they, weighed six hundred * Pensa. Their Priests were enioyned chastitie, which vow, if they violated, they were either stoned or burned. Other men also in the time of that fast, likewise contained themselves from those carnall pleasures. They have an imagination of the soule (but know not what substance or name to ascribe vnto it) to which yet they beleue, was assigned future ioyes or woes, according to their demerits, pointing vp to Heauen, and downe to the Center, when they spake thereof. Many of their Wiues (for they might haue many) followed the Sepulchres of their husbands. They allow not marriage with the sister, of which they haue a ridiculous conceit of the spot, which they account a man, in the Moone; that for this Incest he was thither confined, to the torments of cold & moisture, in that Moone-prison. They leaue trenches on their Sepulchres, in which they yearly powre Mayes, and some of their Wine (to the profit) as they thinke of the Ghosts. If a Mother die while shee giueth suck, the poore nursing must not be Orphan, but be interred with her, being put there to her breast, and buried aliue. They imagined that the soules of their great men and their familiars were immortall, but not others: and therefore such of their seruants and friends as would not be buried with them, they thought should lose that priuiledge of immortalitie, and the delights of those pleasant places, where was eating, drinking, dancing, and the former delicacies of their former liues. They renew the funerall pompe of these great men yearly, assembling thither with plenty of wine and meats, and there watch all night (especially the women) singing dreerie lamentations, with inuectiues against his enemies, if he died in the warres, yea cutting the Image of his enemy in peeces in reuenge of their slaine Lord. This done, they fall to drinking of Mays-wine till they be wearie, if not drunken. Yet after this, they resume their songs to his commendation, with many dances and adorations. When day appeareth, they put the Image of the deceased into a great Canoe (a boat of one Tree, capable of threescore Oares) filled with drinke, hearbs, and such things as in his life he had loued: which some carrie vpon their shoulders in procession about the Court, and set it downe there againe, and burne it with all the contents. After which, the women, filled with wine, and emptied of all modestie, with loose haire, secrets not secret, and varietie of Bacchanal gestures, sometimes goe, sometimes fall, sometimes shake the weapons of the men, and conclude with beastly sleeping on the ground. The yong men exercise their dances and songs, piercing the middle of their priuie member with the sharpe bone of the Ray-fish, bedewing the pavement with the blood. And their Bauti, who are their Physitians, and Priests, heale the same againe in foure daies. They haue in those parts Magicians, without whose aduice they attempt nothing: and neither hunt, fish, nor gather gold, except the Tequenigna or Wizard thinke it fit.

To end this Dabaiban storie, Martyr saith (for I will not further engage my credit for the truth) that in Cainara, which is at the head of this Riuer, there hapned most terrible tempests from the East, which threw downe trees and houses, and in the last act of that tragedie, were brought (not by representation) two foule monsters of monstrous fowles, such as the Poets describe the Harpies, with womens faces; one of them so great, that her legs were thicker then a mans thigh, so heauie, that the boughes of the Trees could not beare her, so strong, that shee would seize on a man, and flie away with him, as a Kite with a Chicken: the other was lesse, and supposed to bee the yong one of the former. Corales, Oserius, and Spinosa, told Martyr, that they spake with many who saw the greater killed, which was done by a strageme; for they made the Image of a man, and set it on the ground, attending in the woods with their arrowes, till shee the next morning seized on this prey, and lost her selfe; the yong was neuer seene after; and happily you thinke, not before neither. But they added, that the killers of her were honored as Gods, and rewarded with presents.

a Lincolne 1.2.

In the Valley of Tunia, or Tomana, are Mines of Emeralds. The people worship the Sunne for their chiefe God, with such awfull deuotion, that they dare not looke stedfastly vpon it: the Moone also they worship, but in an inferiour degree. In their Warres, in stead of Ensignes, they tye the bones of certaine men (who in their liues had had been valiant) vpon long staues, to prouoke others to the like fortitude. They burie their Kings with golden neck-laces, set with Emeralds and with Bread and Wine. The people about Rio Grande are Caniballs, as also about S. Martha. The Tunians vse poisoned arrowes: and when they goe to the warres, they carrie their Idoll Chiappen with them; vnto whom, before they enter into the field, they offer many sacrifices of liuing men, being the children of slaues, or of their enemies, painting all the Image with blood; which done, they eate the flesh. Returning Conquerours, they hold great feasts, with dauncing, leaping, singing, drinking themselues drunke, and againe besmeare their Image with blood. If they were ouercome, they sought by new sacrifices to appease Chiappen. They demanded counsell of their Gods for their marriages, and other affaires. For these consultations they obserued a kinde of Lent two moneths, in which they lay not with women, nor eate Salt. They had Monasteries of boyes and girles, where they liued certaine yeares. They corrected publike faults, as stealing, and killing by cutting off the eares, and nose; hanging; and if he were a Nobleman, by cutting off his haire. In gathering Emeralds, they first vsed certaine Charmes. They vsed to sacrifice Birds, and many other things.

S. Martha standeth about fiftie leagues from Carthagena, at the foote of certaine Hills, alway crowned with snow. The Indians there are very valorous, and vse poisoned arrowes. They make bread of Iucca, a root as bigge as a mans arme, or legge, the iuyce whereof is poyson in the Islands, and therefore they presse it betweene two stones: but in the fittme land they drinke it raw; and both heere and there sodden, they vse it for Vineger; and being sodden till it be very thicke, for honey. This bread is their Casani, not so good as that of Mais. I haue seene a Plant of this herbe growing in Mr. Geralds Garden, the picture whereof he hath expressed in his Herball. The people are abominable Sodomites, a badge whereof they ware about their neckes; a chaine, with the resemblance of two men committing this villanie. In Gayta the Sodomites were attired like women, others were shauen like Friars. They had women which preserved their Virginitie: these addicted themselues to Hunting, with Bow and Arrowes, alone: they might lawfully kill any that sought to corrupt them. These people were Caniballs, and eate mans flesh, fresh and powdered: the young boyes which they tooke they gelded, to make them fatter for their Tables, as wee doe Capons. They set vp the heads of those they killed, at their gates, for a memoriall, and wore their teeth about their neckes for a brauerie. They vvorship the Sunne and Moone, and burne thereto perfumes of Hearbs, and Gold, and Emeralds. They sacrifice slaues.

Venezuela is so called, because it is built vpon a plaine Rock, in the Waters of a Lake. The women of this Countrey paint their breasts and armes: all the rest of their bodie is naked, except their priuie parts. The Maides are knowne by their colour, and greatnesse of their girdle. The men carrie their members in a shell. There are many filthie Sodomites. They pray to Idols, and to the Deuill, whom they paint in such forme as he appeareth to them. They paint their bodies in this sort. He that hath killed one enemy in the Warres, paints one of his armes; the second time his breast: and when he hath killed a third, he painteth a line from his eyes to his eares: and this is his Knight-hood. Their Priests are their Physicians, who being sent for by a sicke man, aske the Patient, if he beleue that they can helpe him; and then lay their hands vpon the place where they say their paines are: if he recouer not, they put the fault in him or in their Gods. They lament their dead Lords in songs in the night time, made of their praises: that done, they roste them at a fire, and beating them to poulder, drinke them in wine, making their bowells their Lords Sepulchres. In Zonpaciay they burie their Lords with much Gold, Jewells, and Pearles, and set vpon the graue foure sticks in a square, within which they hang his weapons, and many viands to eate.

From the Cape Vela, the space of two thousand miles alongst the Coast, is the fishing for Pearles, discovered by Christopher Columbus, in the yeare 1498, which sailed all along this Coast. In Curiana they receiued the Spaniards with great ioy, and for Pinnes, Needles, Bells, Glasses, and such trifles, gaue them many strings of Pearles: for foure Pinnes they would giue a Peacocke; for two, a Pheasant; for one, a Turtle-Doue : And when they asked, What they should doe with this new Merchandise of Pinnes and Needles, seeing they were naked ? they shewed them the vse to pick their teeth, and to pick out thornes in their feet. These Indians had Rings of gold, and Jewells made with Pearles, after the formes of Birds, Fishes, and Beasts : They had also the Touch-stone for their Mettall, and Weights to weigh the same, things not elsewhere found in India. They make their teeth white with an hearbe, which all the day they chew in their mouthes.

Vmana is a Prouince named of a Riuer, called Cumana, <sup>a</sup> where certaine Franciscans, Anno 1516. built them a Monasterie, and the Spaniards were very diligent in the fishing for Pearles. About <sup>b</sup> that time three Dominicans went fourescore miles West from thence to preach the Gospell, and were eaten of the Indians, which hindered not, but others of the same Order founded them a Monasterie in Ciribici, neare Maracapaná. Both these Orders tooke paines with the Indians to conuert them, and taught their children to write and reade, and to answere at Masse, and the Spaniards were so respected, that they might safely walke alone through all the Countrey: but after two yeares and a halfe, the Indians, whether for their too much imploiment in the Pearle-fishing, or for other cause, rebelled, and killed a hundred Spaniards, slue the Friars, one of which was then saying Masse, and as many Indians as they found with them; which the Spaniards of Domingo soone after reuenged.

Cubagua.

The losse <sup>c</sup> of Cumana hindered their Trade for Pearles at Cubagua, and therefore the King sent James Castilion to subdue them by force: which he did, and beganne the Plantation of New Caliz, for the Spaniards to inhabite there. Cubagua was called by Columbus, the Find. r. the Island of Pearles, situate in twelue degrees and a halfe of Northerly Latitude, and contains twelue miles in circuit. This little Island is exceeding great in commoditie, that accreweh by those Pearles, which hath amounted to diuers millions of gold. They fetch their Wood from Margarita, an Island foure miles to the North; and their Water from Cumana, which is two and twentie miles thence: they haue a Spring of medicinall Water there in the Island. The Sea there, at certaine times of the yeare, is very redde, which those Pearle-oysters by some naturall purgation are said to cause. There are Fishes, or Sea-monsters, which from the middle vpwards resemble men, with Beards, Haire, and Armes. The <sup>d</sup> people of Cumana goe naked, covering only their shame. At Feasts and Daunces they paint themselues, or else annoint themselues with a certaine Gumme, in which they sticke Feathers of many colours. They cut their haire about the Eares, and will not suffer it to grow on any places of their bodies, esteeming a bearded man a Beast: They take great paines to make their teeth blacke, and account them women, which haue them white. They blacke them with the poulder of the leaues of a certaine Tree called Gay; these leaues they chew, after they are fiftene yeares old; they mixe that poulder with another of a kinde of Wood, and with Chalke of white shells burned, in manner as the Easterne Indians vse their Betela and Arecca, with Chalke of Oysters: and this mixture they beare continually in their mouthes, still chewing it, that their teeth are as blacke as coales, and so continue to their death. They keepe it in Baskets and Boxes, and sell it in the Markets to some, which come farre for it, for Gold, Slaues, Cotton, and other Merchandise. This keepeth them from paine, and rotting of the teeth. The Maides goe naked, only they binde certaine bands hard about their knees, to make their hippes and thighes seeme thick, which they esteeme no small beautie. The married Women liue honestly, or else their husbands will diuorce them. The chiefe men haue as many Wiues as they will; and, if any stranger come to lodge in one of their houses, they make the fairest his Bed-fellow;

d Cap. 79.

These

These also shut vp their Daughters two yeares before they marrie them, all which time they goe not forth, nor cut their haire: After which, there is made a great Feast, and very many bidden, which bring their varietie of cheare, and also wood to make the new Spouse a house: A man cuts off the Bridegroomes haire before, and a woman the Brides, and then they eate and drinke, with much excesse, till night. This is the lawfull wife, and the other which they marrie afterwards, obey this. They giue their Spouses to be deflowred to their Piaces, (so they call their Priests) which these reuerend Fathers account their Preheminnce and Prerogatiue; the Husbands, their honour; the Wiues, their warrant.

The men and women weare Collars, Bracelets, Pendants, and some Crownes of Gold and Pearles: the Men weare Rings in their Noses, and the Women Brooches on their breasts, whereby at first sight the sexe is discerned. The Women Shoor, Runne, Leape, Swimme, as well as the Men: their paines of trauell are small: they till the Land, and looke to the house, whiles the men Hunt and Fish. They are high-minded, treacherous, and thirstie of reuenge: Their chiefe weapons are poisoned Arrowes, which they prepare with the bloud of Snakes, and other mixtures. All of both sexes, from their infancie, learne to shoot. Their meat is whatsoever hath life, as Horie-leaches, Battes, Gralhoppers, Spiders, Bees, Lice, Wormes, raw, sodden, fried: and yet their Countrey is replenished with good Fruits, Fish, and Flesh. This Diet (or, as some say, their Water) causeth spots in their eyes, which dimme their sight. They haue as strange a Fence or Hedge for their Gardens and Possessions, namely, a threed of Cotton, or Bexuco, as they call it, as high as a mans Girdle; and it is accounted a great sinne to goe ouer or vnder the same, and he which breakes it (they certainly belecue) shall presently die: So much faster is their threed women with this imagination, then all our stone-walls.

The Cumanois are much addicted to Hunting, wherein they are very expert, and kill Lyons, Tygres, Hogges, and all other four-footed Beasts, with Bowes, Nets, Snates. They take one Beatt, which they call Capa, that hath the soales of his feet like a French shooe, narrow behinde, broad and round before. Another, called Aranata, which for the Physnomie and subletie seemes to bee a kinde of Ape: it hath mouth, handes, and feet, like a man; a goodly countenance, bearded like a Goat. They goe in Heards, they bellow loud, runne vp Trees like Cats. auoide the Huntsmans Arrow, and cast it with cleanly deliuerie againe at himselfe. Another Beast hath a long snour, and feedeth on Ants<sup>f</sup>, putting his tongue into a hollow Tree, or other place, where the Ants are, and as many of them as come thereon, hee licks in. The Friers brought vp one, till the stinke thereof caused them to kill it, snouted like a Foxe, rough-haired, which voided in the excrements long and slender Serpents, which presently dyed. This Beast stinking while hee liued, and worse now dead, yet was good foode to the Indians. They haue one which will counterfeite the voice of a crying childe, and so cause some to come forth, and then deuoure them. The like is written of the Hyana, That shee will call the Shepheards by their names, and then destroy them when they come forth.

it a Bearc.

They haue Parrots as bigge as Rauens, with bills like Hawkes, liuing on the prey, and smelling like Muske: Great Battes, one of which was a Physician; by strange accident, to a seruant of the Friers: which being sick of a Pleurisie; was giuen ouer for dead, because they could not raise a veine wherein to let him blood; in the night a Batte (after the custome of that Creature) bit and sucked him, whereby so much blood issued, that the sick man recovered; which the Friers counted for a miracle. They haue three sorts of Bees, one whereof is little and black, and makes Honie in the Trees, without Waxe. Their Spiders are greater then ours, of diuers colours, and weaue such strong Cobwebs, that they aske good strength to breake them. There are Satamanders as bigge as a mans hand: they cackle much like a Pullet: their biting is deadly. I might here hold you too long in viewing these strange Creatures, wee will now returne to their stranger customes.

They take great pleasure in two thinges, Dauncing and Drinking, in which they will spend eight daies together, especially at the Marriages, or Coronation of their Kings.

Kings. Many Gallants will then meet together, diuersly drest; some with Crownes and Feathers, some with shells about their legges in stead of bells, to make a noise: some otherwise, all painted with twentie colours and figures: hee that goes worst, seemes best: taking one another by the hand, they dance in a ring, some backwards, some forwards, with a world of varietie; grinning, singing, crying, counterfeiting the Deafe, Lame, Blinde; Fishing, Weauing, telling of Stories; and this continueth sixe houres, and then they eate and drinke: before, he which danced most, now hee which drinketh most, is the most complete and accomplished Gallant: and now beyond counterfeiting, drunkennesse sets them together in brauing, swaggering, quarrelling: others play the Swine, spew vp the former to make way for other liquor: and they adde hereunto the fume of an hearbe, which hath the like drunken effect; it seemeth to be Tobacco.

This perhaps will not seeme strange to some, seeing these sauage customes of drinking, dancing, smoking, swaggering, so common with vs in these daies: it might indeede seeme strange to our forefathers, if their more ciuill, more sacred ghosts, might returne and take view of their degenerating posteritie: but now he must bee a stranger in many companies, that will not estrange himselfe from ciuilitie, from humanitie, from Christianitie, from God, to become of a Man a Beast; of an English-man, a Sauage Indian; of a Christian, a Fiend, saue that he hath a bodie, in the diuersified pollutions whereof, he hath aduantage, and takes it, to out-swagger the Diuell. These are the Gull-gallants of our dayes, to whom I could wish, that either their Progenitors had bene some Cumanian Indians, or that they would leaue this vsurped Gallantrie to those true owners, and resume spirits truly English.

The Gods of the Cumanians are the Sunne and Moone, which are taken for man and wife, and for the greatest Gods. They haue great feare of the Sunne, when it Thunders or Lightens, saying that hee is angrie with them. They fast when there is any Eclipse, especially the women; for the married women pluck their haire, and scratch their faces with their nailes: The Maids thrust sharp fish-bones into their armes, and draw blood. When the Moone is at full, they thinke it is wounded by the Sunne, for some indignation he hath conceiued against her. When any Comet appeareth, they make a great noise with Drummes and hallowing, thinking so to scarie it away, or to consume it, beleeuing that those Comets portend some euills.

Among their many Idols and figures, which they honour as Gods, they haue one like a Saint Andrewes Crosse, which they thought preserued them from night-spirits; and they hanged it on their new-borne children.

They call their Priests Piaces, whose Maiden-head-rite we before mentioned. They are their Physitians and Magicians. They cure with rootes and hearbes, raw, sod, and pounded, with the fat of birds, fishes, and beasts; with wood and other things vknowne to the people, with abstruse and darke wordes which themselves vnderstand not. They suck and lick the place where the paine is, to draw out the euill humors. And if the paine encreaseth, they say that the Patients are possessed with euill Spirits: and then rubbe their bodies all ouer with their hands, vsing certaine words of Coniuration or Charmes, sucking after that very hard; giuing them to vnderstand, that by that meanes, they call out the euill spirits. Presently they take a peece of wood, the vertue whereof none else knoweth but the Piace, and therewith rubbe their mouthes and throats, so long till they cast all that is in their Bellies, vomiting sometimes blood with the force thereof; the Piace in the meane time stamping, knocking, calling, and gesturing: after two houres there comes from him a thick flegme, and in the middest thereof a black hard buller, which those of the house carrie and cast into the fields, saying, Let the Deuill goe thither. If the sick-man recouer, his goods die and become the Priests; if hee die, they say his time was come. The Piace is their Oracle, with whom they consult, whether they shall haue warre, what shall bee the issue thereof, whether the yeare will be plentifull. They fore-warne them of Eclipses, and aduertise of Comets. The Spaniards demanded in their necessitie, whether any ships would come shortly, and they answered, that on such a day a Caruell would come with so many men, and such prouision and Merchandize, which accordingly came to passe.

They

They call vpon the Deuill in this manner: the Piase entereth into a Caue, or secret place, in a darke night, and carries with him certaine couragious youtnes, that may moue questions without feare. Hee sits on a bench, and they stand on their feet, hee cryeth, calleth, singeth Verses, soundeth shells: and they with a heauie accent say many times Prorourne, Prorourne: if the Deuill comes not, all this Black-Sanctus is renewed with grievous sighes and much perplexitie. When he commeth (which is knowne by the noise) he sounds lowder, and suddenly falls downe, by visages and varied gesture, shewing that the Deuill is entred. Then one of those his Associates demandeth what him please: the Friars went one day with their coniuring and coniured holies, the Crosse, Stole, Holy-water: and when the Piase was in that distraction, cast a part of the Stole on him, crossing and coniuring in Latine, and hee answered them in his native language much to the purpose: at last they demanded whither the soules of the Indians went, he answered to hell.

These Piases by their Physick and Diuining grow rich: they goe to Feasts, and sit by themselves apart, and drinke themselves drunke, and say the more they drinke, the better they can Diuine. They learne these Artes when they are children, and are enclosed in the woods two yeares, all that time eating nothing that hath blood, see no women, nor their owne parents, come not out of their Caues or Cells: and the Piases, their Masters, goe to them by night, to teach them. When this time of their solitarie discipline is past, they obtaine a testimoniall thereof, and beginne to professe in practise of Physick and Diuination. Let vs burie the Cumanois, and then we haue done.

Being dead, they sing their praises, and burie them in their houses, or drie them at the fire and hang them vp. At the yeares end (if hee were a great man) they renew the lamentation, and after many other ceremonies, burne the bones, and giue to his best beloued wife his skull to keepe for a Relique: they beleue that the soule is immortall, but that it eateth and drinketh about in the fields where it goeth, and that it is the Echo which answereth when one calleth.

CHAP. III.

Of Paria, Guiana, and the neighbour Countries, both on the Coast, and within the Land.

IN the yeare 1497. (some adde a yeare more) * Christopher Columbus seeking new Discoveries, after the suffering of vn sufferable heats and calmes at Sea (whereby the hoopes of his Vessells brake, and the fresh-water not able further to endure the hor indignation of that now-belleued Burning-Zone, fled out of those close prisons, into the lappe of that Father of waters, the Ocean, for refuge) he came at last to Trinidad. The first Land he incountred, he called by that name; either for deuotion, now that his other hopes were dried vp with the heat, or washed into the Sea by the violent showers aboue-board, and the lesse (but not lesse dangerous) which flowed from his Caske within: or else, for the three Mountaines which hee there descried. Once, this discoverie of Land so rauished his spirit, by the unexpected deliuerie from danger, as easily carried his impotent thoughts into a double error, the one in placing earthly Paradise in this Iland, (to which opinion, for the excellencie of the Tobacco there found, he should happily haue the smokie subscriptions of many Humorists, to whom that fume becomes a fooles Paradise, which with their braines, and all, passeth away in smoke) the other was, that the Earth was not round like a Ball, but like a Peare, the vpper-swellling whereof, he esteemed these parts. Hence Columbus sailed to Paria, and found out the Pearle-fishing, of which Petrus Alphonsus, a little after made great commoditie by trade with the Sauges. He was assailed with eighteen Canoas of Caniballs, a one of which he tooke, with one Caniball, and a bound Captiue, who with teares shewed them that they had eaten fixe of his fellowes, and the next day he must haue gone topos too: to him they gaue power ouer his Iaylour, who with his owne clubbe killed him, still laying on when his braines and guts came forth, and testified that hee needed not further feare him.

In Haraia of Paria, they found plentie of salt, which the Fore-man in Natures shop, and her chiefe worke-man, the Sunne, turned and kernald from water into salt: his worke-houfe for this businesse, was a large plaine by the waters-side. Here the Sepulchres of their Kings and great men seemed not lesse remarkable: they laid the body on a kinde of hurdle or gred-iron of wood, vnder which they kindled a gentle fire, whereby keeping the skinne whole, they by little and little consumed the flesh. These dried carkasses they held in great reuerence, and honoured for their household-Gods. In the year<sup>e</sup> 1499. Vincent Pinxon discovered Cape Saint Augustine, and sailed along the coast from thence to Paria.

Relat. S. J. R.

But why stand we here pedling on the coast for Pearles, Salt, and Tobacco? let vs rouse vp higher spirits, and follow our English guides for Guiana. Only let mee first haue leave to mention concerning the Superstitions of these parts Northward from Guiana, what it pleased Sir Walter Raleigh to impart vnto me from the Relation of a very vnderstanding man of that Countrie, whom hee vsed for an Interpreter. These people worship the Sunne, whom they imagine (as the fabulous Græcians tell of his Chariot and Horses, wherewith yong Phaeton sometime set the World on fire) to bee drawne in a Chariot by Tigres, which are the most fierie, fierce, and swift beasts amongst them: In honour therefore of the Sunne, and for sustenance of his Chariot-beasts, they carefully wash the carkasses of their dead, and lay them forth in the night, for repast vnto the Tigres, wearied with their long and late journey in the day. For so they beleue, that after Sunne-set these beasts are to this end dismissed from their labour; and that vicissitude, wherein Dauid obserueth the wisdom of diuine providence (that when it is night the wild beasts goe forth to seeke their prey, which when the Sunne ariseth and calleth men forth of their houses to labour, returne to their Dennes) is blindly by them applied to this their superstition. They likewise haue a Tradition amongst them, that their Ancestors in times past neglecting thus to prepare the corpses of such as died, for the Tigres diet, or not washing them so neatly as behoued, the Tigres made hereof a complaint to the Sunne, as not able to doe his worke, if not allowed their wonted cates: whereupon the Sunne sent one amongst them, brandishing a terrible fierie sword, and so dreadfully assaulting the places of their habitations, and the soile couered with long grasse, that all fell on fire, and an hundred thousand of the Inhabitants were destroyed: a terrible warning hereafter to bee more diligent in these Tigre-deuotions, which accordingly they performe to this day.

d Sir Walter Raleighs treatise of Guiana.

In the year 1595. d Sir Walter Raleigh hauing before receiued intelligence of this rich and mightie Empire, set forth for the Discouerie, and on the two and twentieth of March anchored at Point Curiapan in Trinidad, and searched that Iland, which he found plentifull. He tooke the Citie of Saint Ioseph, and therein Antonie Berreo the Spanish Gouvernour: Leauing his ships, hee went with an hundred men in boats, and a little Galley, and with some Indian Pilots passed along that admirable confluence of Riuer, (as by the Corps du guard) vnto Orenoque, as great a Commander of Riuer, as the Emperour of Guiana of Souldiers. And although wee haue before mentioned somewhat thereof, yet this, his peculiar place, requireth some further consideration. This Riuer Orenoque or Baraquan (since, of this Discouerie, called Raleana) runneth from Quito in Peru on the West, it hath nine branches which fall out on the North side of his owne maine mouth, on the South side seuen. Thus many armes hath this Giant-like streame to be his Purveyers, which are alway filling his neuer-filled mouth (seeming by this their naturall officiousnesse incorporate thereunto, and to bee but wider gapings of the same spacious iawes) with many Ilands and broken grounds, as it were so many morsells and crummes in his greedie Chaps, still opening for more, though hee cannot, euen in Winter, when his throat is glibbest, altogether swallow these: yea these force him, for feare of choaking, to yawne his widest, and to vomit out, betweene these cleaving morfells, into the Oceans lappe, so many streames, and (so farre is it from the Northerne and Southerne extreames) three hundred miles distant. The Inhabitants on the Northerne branches are the Tinisinas, a goodly and valiant people, which haue the most manly speech, and most deliberate (saith Sir Walter) that euer I heard, of what Nation soeuer. In the Sommer they haue houses on the ground, as in other places: in the Winter they dwell vpon the trees, where they build very artificiall Townes and Villages: for betweene May and September the Riuer of Orenoque riseth thirtie foot vp-right, and then are those Islands ouer-flowne twentie foot high, except in some few raised grounds in the middle. This waterie store, when the clouds are so prodigall of more then the Riuer store-house can hold, whereby they become violent intruders and incrochers vpon the Land, and not the violence of cold, giueth this time the Title of Winter. These Tinisinas neuer eate of anything that is set or sowne; Natures nurslings, that neither at home nor abroad, will be beholden to the Arte or Labour of Husbandrie. They vse the tops of Palmitos for bread, and kill Deere, Fish, and Porke, for the rest of their sustenance. They which dwell vpon the branches of Orenoque, called Caphiri and Macureo, are for the most part Carpenters of Canoas, which they sell into Guiana for gold, and into Trinidado for Tobacco, in the excessive taking whereof, they exceede all Nations. When a Commander dieth, they vse great lamentation, and when they thinke the flesh of their bodies is putrified and fallen from the bones, they take vp the carkasse againe, and hang it vp in the house, where hee had dwelt, decking his skull with feathers of all colours, and hanging his gold-plates about the bones of his armes, thighes and legges. The Armacas which dwell on the South of Orenoque, beat the bones of their Lords into powder, which their wiues and friends drinke.

OUT,

Countrie of

Pet. Martyr.
Des. 3. lib. 6.

As they passed along these streames, their eyes were entertained with a Pageant of Shewes, wherein Nature was the only Actor; here the Deere came downe feeding by the waters side, as if they had desired acquaintance with these new-come guests: there, the Birds in vnspcakable varietie of kindes and colours, rendering their seruice to the eye and eare: the Lands either in large plaines of many miles, baring their beautifull bosomes, adorned with Floras embroderie of vnknowne Flowers and Plants, and prostrating themselues to the eye, that they might bee seene; or else lifting vp themselves in Hills; knitting their furrowed browes, and strouting out their goggle eyes to watch their treasure, which they keepe imprisoned in their stonie walls; and now, to see these strangers: the Waters (as the Graces) dancing with mutuall and manifold embracings of diuers streames, attended with plentie of Fowle and Fish; both Land and Water feasting varietie of senses with varietie of objects: only the Crocodile (a Creature which seemeth Vassall, now to the Land, now to the Water, but to make prey on both) well-nigh marred the Play, and turned this Comedie into a Tragedie, euen in their sight, feasting himselfe with a Negro of their companie.

One leuell passed hence to Cumana, an hundred and twentie leagues to the North, wherein dwell the Sayma, the Assawai, the Wikiri, and the Aroas, a people as black as Negros<sup>d</sup>, but with smooth haire. Their poisoned Arrowes, like cruell Executioners, doe not only kill, but with vncouth torments make death to be, as the last, so the least of their furie; especially if men drinke after they are wounded.

d These might

At the Port of Morequito they anchored, and the King being an hundred and ten yeares old, came a foot fourteene miles to see them, and returned the same day. They brought them store of fruits, and a sort of Paraquitos, no bigger then Wrennes, and an Armadilla, which seemeth to be all barred ouer with small plates, somewhat like to a Rhinoceros, with a white horne growing in his hinder-parts, as bigge as a great hunting horne, which they vse to winde in stead of a Trumpet. They after eate this beast. Monardus<sup>e</sup> saith, it is in bignesse and snout like a Pigge, liues vnder the earth as a Moule, and is thought to liue on earth.

f Monard. c. 37.

They passed further, till they came in sight of those strange ouer-falls of Caroli, of which there appeared ten or twelue in sight, euery one as high ouer the other as a Church-Tower. They had fight at Winicapora of a Mountaine of Cryftall, which appeared a farre off like a white Church-Tower, of an exceeding height. There falleth ouer it a mightie Riuer, which toucheth no part of the fide of the Mountaine, but rushing ouer the top, falleth to the ground with fo terrible noife, as if a thoufand great bells were knocked one againft another. No maruell of thefe roring out-cries, if we confider that double penaltie of Sense and Losse, which this Riuer seemeth to fuftaine, the one in that dreadfull downe-fall, bruifing and breaking his vnited ftreames into drops, and making it foming and fenfeleffe with this falling-fickneffe; the other in leaving behinde his Cryftall purchafe, further enriched with Diamonds and other Iewells, which euen now he embraced in his waterie armes, but himfelfe (fuch is the couife and curfe of couetoufneffe) will not fuffer himfelfe to enioy.

Now for the Monfters of men: there are faid to be (not feen by our men, but reported by the Sauages and other) an Amazonian nation further South: which Gomara thinks to be but the wines of fome Indians (a thing common, as you haue euen now read) fhooting and following the warres, no leffe then their husbands: once, about Lucatan, about Plata, about the Riuer, called of this fuppoftion, Amazones: about Monomotapa in Africa; our Age hath told, but no man hath feene this Unimammian Nation. Yet here they fpeake not of fearing of the breaft: and what neede they, if there be fuch, feeing the women are fo good Archers in other places, their breafte notwithstanding? Again, * they tell of men with mouthes in their breafte, and eyes in their fhoulders, called Chiparemai, and of the Guianians, Ewianponmos, very ftrong; and of others headed like Dogs, which liue all the day time in the Sea. Thefe things are ftrange, yet I dare not efteeme them fabulous: only (as not to prodigall of faith) I fufpend, till fome eye-intelligence of fome of our parts haue teftified the truth.

Francis Sparrey left in Guiana by Sir W. Raleigh 1595. hath alfo witten of thefe parts; He relateth of a place called Comalaha Southwards from Orenoque, where at certaine times they fell women as at a Faire. He faith he bought eight, the eldeft of which was not eigheteene, for a red-hafted knife, which in England coft an halfe-penie: hee gaue them to the Sauages. He was afterwards fent prifoner into Spaine.

Anno 1604. Captaine Charles Leigh, fet faile from Woolwich on the one and twentieth of March for Guiana: May 10. he came in water thick and white, the next day in frefh, and the day after faw two Ilands in the mouth of Amazons, accounting themfelues fortie leagues vp the Riuer. May 22. they were in the Riuer of Wiapogo, (which they called Careleigh) in  $3\frac{1}{2}$ . degrees Northward from the Line. The people were readie to giue them entertainment. The Sayos and Capayos offered them their owne houfes, and gardens alreadie planted, two of which hee accepted with fome Gardens, vndertaking to defend them againft the Charibes and their other enemies. They defired him to fend into England for fome to teach them to pray, and gaue fwee pledges to be fent thither. Hee after (intending for England) died aboard his fhip of the fluxe. They intoxicate the fifh with a ftrong fented wood called Ayaw, whereby they eafily take them on the top of the water. Their bread is Caffari, of which chewed they alfo make drinke. They are much troubled with a worme like a flea (the Spaniards call it Niguas) which creeps into the flefh of their toes vnder the nailes, and multiply there with much multiplication of torment, except they vfe speedie preuention. One was fo pestered with them, that for remedie, they were faine to hold his feet vpwards, and powre thereon melted waxe hot, which being cold they plucked off, and therewith feuen or eight hundred. The people are of modeft countenance, naked, but would weare clothes if they had them. Hunty returned for England, and left there fwee and thirtie, which fhould haue bene succoured if Difcord had fuffered.

entercourse of fortunes with the Spaniards, some returned home. The Spaniards there (as John Nichol one of this companie testifieth) told them of a vision of Christ on the Crosse appearing to our King, and reuoking him from his error: at the sight whereof three of our Bishops fell into a trance, and so continued three dayes, after which they became Catholikes and preached: and the King had sent to the Pope for learned men to perfect this conuersion. These were the Spanishe tricks with falchiffe tales to peruert these men to their faith. The Marriners gaue names to the places which they left according to their conceits of these men; Roanoke Bay, Cape Knabo, River of Pascalls. They came as farre as Corbana or Cumana, where they observed the weather hot till noone, and then a coole breeze and thunder without raine. By Windes and Current they were detained from Wiapogo, which they sought. A Fleming there told them fabulous rumours of warres with Spaine.

Another ship of Amsterdam (to disgrace our men) told the Indians of Wiapoco, that they came to inhabite there and to oppresse them, as the Spaniards did. See what gaine can doe without godlinesse. A ship of Middleburgh came thither with Negroes to sell: thither came also a ship of Saint Malos. The Indians of these parts (as Wilson reporteth) choose their Captaines at their drunken feasts in this sort. They set the nominated person in the midst, with his handes lifted ouer his head, making Orations to him to be valiant: after which, they whip him with a whip that fetcheth blood at every stroke, for triall of his courage, hee neuer mouing thereat. They haue Commerce with the Deuill. For they told vs of three ships in the Riuer of Amazon, and that one two moneths after would visit vs. They call this Deuill Peyas, with whom the men haue often conference, the women neuer that they could perceiue: they suffer not meane while a child in the house. When any be sicke they thus consult of their recouerie, and if their Oracle answer death, they will giue no physicke; if life, they use their best helpe. For an Axe they would trauell with them two or three moneths, or finde them so long victualls at home. The Iayos are proud, ingenious, giuen to flourishing. The Arwakos of better carriage. The Saspayas craftie. The two former hate the Spaniards as much as the Caribes. Their houses haue doores at each end: the men keepe at one end, the women at the other: they are like Barbies, but longer; some hundred and fiftie paces long, and twentie broad, an hundred of them keepe together in one. No raine commeth in, notwithstanding that store which falleth in Aprill, May, Iune, and most of Iuly. They paint them when they goe to feasts. Against the time of trauell, the women haue a roome apart, whereto they goe alone, and are deliuered without helpe: which done, shee calls her husband and deliueis it to him, who presently washeth it in a pot of water, and paints it with sundrie colours. I could not heare (saith Wilson) the woman so much as grone all the time of her trauell. When one dies, they make great moane ten or twelue daies together, and sometimes longer. Here are store of Deare, Hares, Conies, Hogs, Munkeys, Leopards, Lyons, Porcupines, Parots as bigge as Hennes, blew and red very beautifull, &c. He returned with the rest in a ship of Amsterdam, the Indians being loth to part with them. They often enquired of Sir W. Raleigh, and one came from Orenoque to aske of him, alledging his promise of returne.

The like remembrances of him are mentioned by Master Harcourt in his late published Voiage to Guiana. This worthie Gentleman An. 1608. with Gentlemen and others, to the number of fourescore and seenteene, set forth for Wiapoco. The ninth of May they fell into the Current of that great & famous Riuer of Amazones, of which they drunke fresh and good, being thirtie leagues from Land: the tenth day the water became muddie, whitish, and thick: the eleventh day they made Land, and their Pin-nice being left drie vpon the Ebbe, by the next flood comming on was almost spoiled. Thence they stood along the coast to Wiapoco, whither they came May 17. and settled themselues at Caripo. Hee tooke possession in his Maiesties name (as Capraine Leigh had also done) of this spacious Countrey of Guiana, bounded on the North with Orenoque and the Sea, on the East and South with the Riuer of Amazones, on the West with the Mountaines of Peru. The Charibes are the ancient Inhabitants, the other later incrochers. There is no settled Gouvernement amongst them, only they acknowledge a superioritie which they will obey as long as they please. They commonly punish murder and adulterie by death, which are the only offences punished amongst them: and certaine persons are appointed to execute those punishments. The better sort haue two or three wiues or more, the rest but one: they are very iealous, and if they take them in adulterie, cause their braines to bee beaten out. Their wiues, especially the elder, are as their seruants, and he which hath most, is the greatest man.

Their account of time is by Moones, or daies: their numbring is to ten, and then say ten and one, &c. they also keepe accounts by bundles of sticks containing so many, as daies are agreed on, of which they take away every day one. They haue a certaine obseruance of the Sunne and Moone, supposing them to be aliuie, but as farre as he could perceiue, vsed neither sacrifice nor adoration to any thing. At the death of any great man, they make a solemne feast, their chiefeest prouision being their strongest drinke called Parranow, and as long as this drinke lasteth they continue their feast, with dancing, singing, and excessiue drinking, accounting the greatest drunkard the brauest man: during which drunken solemnitie, some woman (being nearest of kinne to the dead partie) stands by and eries extremely. Their Priests or South-saiers (he calls them Peeaios) haue conference with the Deuill, whom they terme Wattipa, but feare him much and say he is naught: he will often beat them black and blew. They beleue that the good Indians when they die goe to Caupo or Heauen, the bad to Soy, downewards. When a chiefe man dies, if he haue a captiue, they slay him; if not, then one of this seruants, to attend him in the other world.

The qualitie of the Land is diuers: by the Sea-side low, and would be violently hot, if a fresh easterly breeze did not coole it with a yehement breath in the heat of the day: the Mountaines are colder, the middle sort most temperate. Profit may here take pleasure, neither neede pleasure abandon profit. The particulars are by this and other our Authors related; I hunt after rarities to present you. Such is the fish Cassoorwa, which hath in each eye two sights, and as it swimmeth, it beares the lower sights within the water, and the other aboue: the ribbes and back resemble those parts in a man, saue that it is little bigger, but much daintier then a Smelt. Besides the Pockiero or small Swine with the Nauill in the back, is another called Paingo as large as ours in England. The Sea-cow or Manatin eates like beefe and will take salt and serue to victuall ships, it yeelds also an excelleng oyle, and the hide will make buffe. In the wet are infinite store of them. The Pina for delicacie exceedeth, a fruit tastig like straw-beries, claret wine and sugar. What commoditie Tobacco<sup>b</sup> and Sugars in those parts may yeeld is incredible, especially in this smokie humour of the one sexe, and that daintier of the other. Their dies, gummes, and other commodities I omit. Of gold and other metralls they haue good testimonie.

The Marashawaccas are a Nation of Charibes, vp high within Land, hauing great cares beyond credit: they haue an Idoll of stone which they worship as their God, in a house erected purposely to it, which they keepe very cleane. It is fashioned like a man sitting vpon his heeles, holding open his knees, and resting his elbowes vpon them, holding vp his handes with the Palmes forwards, and gaping with his mouth wide open.

Captaine Michael Harcourt was left Commander of the Countrey for his brother, who continued the possession three years, in all which space of thirtie persons died but sixe, and some of them by casualtie. Amongst the East-Indian Plants is mentioned one called Sensida: the like they found here, much like vnto Rose trees, about halfe a yard high, which if they were touched, or a leaf cut from them, would presently shrinke and close vp themselves, and hang as they were dead & withered: within halfe a quarter of an houre by degrees againe opening. Araminta the Cacique of Morefhegoro had a rough skin like to buffe-leather, of which kinde there be many in those parts. They returned by Cape Brea, which is so called of the pitch there gotten in the earth, whereof there is such abundance that all places of this our world may be stored thence: it is excellent for trimming of ships for those hot Countries, not melting in the Sunne.

It were a hard taske to muster all that World of Riuers, and names of Nations in the the parts neere Guiana, which they that will may finde in Sir Walter and Master Keymis, and Master Harcourt their owne relations. As for Guiana, this Sir Walter hath written. It is directly East from Peru towards the Sea, and lieth vnder the Equinoctiall: it hath more abundance of Gold then any part of Peru, and as many or moe great Cities. It hath the same Lawes, Government, and Religion; and Manoa, the Imperiall City of Guiana, which some Spaniards haue scene, and they call it El Dorado, for the greatnesse, riches, and situation, farre exceedeth any of the world; at least so much of it as the Spaniards know. It is founded vpon a Lake of salt water, two hundred leagues long, like vnto the Caspian Sea. The Emperour of Guiana is descended from the Incas, the magnificent Princes of Peru: for when Francis Pizarro had conquered Peru, and slaine Atabalipa the King; one of his yonger brethren fled from thence, and tooke with him many thousands of those souldiers of the Empire, called Oritomas, with whom and other his followers, he vnquished all that tract which is between the great Riuer of Orenoque, and Amazonas.

b The guilded Citie.

Diego Ordaz, who was one of the Captaines of Cortes, in the conquest of Mexico, in the year 1531. (thus saith Gomara, and that he perished at Sea; others more probably, say it was a few yeeres after the conquest of Peru) made search for Guiana, but lost himself, being slaine in a mutiny. Before this, his prouision of powder was fired, & one Iuan Martinez, which had the charge thereof, was therefore condemned to be executed. But at the Souldiers request his punishment was altered, and he set in a Canoe alone without victuall, and so turned loose into the Riuer. Certaine Guianians met him, and hauing neuer scene man of that colour, they caried him into the Land to be wondered at; and so from towne to towne, till he came to the great City of Manoa, the seat and residence of Inga the Emperour. He no sooner saw him, but he knew him to be a Christian (for the Spaniards not long before had conquered his brother) and caused him to be wel entertayned in his Palace. He liued seuen monthes in Manoa, but was not suffered to wander any whither into the Countrey; he was also brought thither all the way blindfold, led by the Indians, vntill he came at Manoa. He entered the City at noone, & traueled all that day til night, & the next, from the rising til the setting of the Sun; thorow the City, ere he came to the Palace of Inda. After seuen monthes the Emperour put him to his choise, whether to stay or goe, and hee with the Emperours licence departed. Hee sent with him many Guianians, all laden with as much gold as they could carry; but before he entered Orenoque, the Orenoquepomi robbed him of all, but of two bottels of gold-beades, which they had thought had bene his drinke or meat. Thus escaped hee to Trinidad, and died after at Saint Iuan de Puerto-rico, where, in his extreames he vnter these things to his Confessor. He called the City Manoa El Dorado, the guilded or golden, because that at their drunken solemnities (in which vice, no Nation vnder heauen excels them) when the Emperour carowseth with any of his Commanders, they that pledge him, are stripped naked, and their bodies annointed with a kind of white Balsamum, and then certaine seruants of the Emperour, hauing prepared gold made into fine powder, blow it thorow hollow canes vpon their naked bodies, vntill they be all shining from the foote to the head; and in this sort they sit drinking by twenties and hundreds, and continue in drunkenness sometimes six or seven dayes together. Vpon this sight, & for the abundance of gold he saw in the City, the Images, in the temples, the plates, armour, & shields of gold vsed in their wars, he gaue the city that name.

Iuan de Castellanos reckoneth twenty seuerall Expeditions of some or other Spaniards, for this Guianian Discovery with little effect, save that diuers lost their liues therein. Anno 1543 Gonzalo Pizarro sent a Captaine named Orellana, from the borders of Peru, who with fifty men were carried by the violent current of the Riuer, that they could not returne to Pizarro, he descended not in Orenoque the Guianian Riuer, but in Maragnon, called of him Orellana: which Iosephus Acosta writeth, from the relation of one of their society, who, being a boy, had bene in the Expedition of Pedro de Orsua for this Discovery, and had sayled the Riuer thorow, that in the midst men can see nothing but the skie (as before is said) and the Riuer, and that it is seuentie leagues broad vnder the Equinoctiall. Martine Fernandez maketh it seuen degrees and a halfe to the North of the Line, and fiftene League broad, and the Sea of fresh water to be another another River of forty leagues breadth: others haue written otherwise, which varying proceedeth from that variety of armes or mouths of Orenoque or Raleana, and Marañon or Amazonas, which since haue bene better discovered, as Master Keymis, Master Maslam, and others imployed in this action, haue found by experience. It riseth in Quito, Orellana sayled in it six thousand miles. In all these parts their greatest treasure is multitude of women and children. Tapiamari made a heauy complaint, that whereas they were wont to haue ten or twelue wiues, now they had not about three or foure, by reason of the wars with the Eperemes their enemies; whereas the Lords of the Eperemes had fifty or a hundred, and their warrels more for women, then either for Gold or Dominion.

Berro in the search for Guiana, tooke his journey from Nuevo reyno de Granada, where he dwelt, with seven hundred Horse, but trauelling he lost many of his company and Horse: at Amapaia the soile is a low Mussh, and the water issuing thorow the Bogs, is red and venomous, which poisoned the horses, and infected the men: at noone the Sun had made it more wholesome for their vse.

This New Kingdome of Granada is two hundred leagues within land, Southward from Cartagena. It had that name, because the Capitaine that discovered it, was of Granada in Spain. The plenty of Emeralds in these parts, hath made that Gemme of lesse worth. The next Prouince to this is called Popayan: in both which the Spaniards haue many Townes. And by the Riuer of Orenoque, both may be inuaded.

All the parts, from golden Castle, and the Gulfe of Vraba to Paria, yeeld Caribes or Canibals, which eat mans flesh, and geld children, to make them more fat and tender for their diet. And in all Inland parts neere Peru, and in the hills called Andes, which some call Golden Castle, they little differ. Cieza saith, That in the Valley of Anzerma, they keep certain tablets amongst the reedes, wherein they carue the image of the Diuell, in a terrible shape, also the figures of Cats and other Idols which they worship. To them they pray for raine or faire weather: they haue commerce with the Diuell, and obserue such superstitions as he enioyneth them. They are great man eaters. At the doores of their houses they haue small Courts, wherein are their graues in deepe vaults opening to the East: in which they bury their great men with all their wealth. The Curies are not farre from them; they haue no Temple, nor Idol. They haue conference with the Diuel. They marry with their neeces and sisters, and are man-eaters. They call the Diuell Xaxarama. They esteeme Virginity little worth. In the Prouince of Arma the Diuel doth often appeare to the Indians: in honour of whom they sacrifice their Captiues, taken in war, hanging them vp by the shoulders and pulling out the hearts of some of them. In Pau-tora they haue like diuellish deuotions, and their Priests are their Oracles.

Before the house of the chiefe Lord was an Idol, as big as a man, with his face to the East, and his armes open. They sacrificed two Indians euery Tuesday in this Prouince to the Diuel. In the Prouince of Pozo, in the houses of their Lords, they had many Idols in such resemblance as the Diuell had assumed in his apparitions. And in those Idols he would also speake and giue answers. In Carrapa they are extreame drunkards: when any is sicke, they offer sacrifices to the Diuell for his recovery. In Quinbaya is a hill which casteth forth smoke: but a more hellish smoke is their conference and commerce with the Diuell, like the former. In the Prouince of Cali they likewise confer with the Diuell: they haue no Temples or houses of Religion. They make deepe pits for Sepulchers of their great men, where their armour, wealth, and food is set about them. Their lust subiecteth the neece and sister to their mariages. In Popayan they are man-eaters, as also in the forenamed Prouinces. They obserue the same Caninall and Diuellish rites with the former, framing their superstitions to the Diuels direction in their mutual colloquies. They bury with their Lords some of his wiues and prouision. Some of them are great Wizards and Sorcerers. In Pasto they talke also with the Diuell, a thing common to all these parts of the Indies. But let vs leaue these steepe and cold hills, these men of the Diuel whom they worship, and diuels to men whom they deuoure, and see if in the lower Countries we can finde higher and nobler spirits.

CHAP. IIII.

Of Brasil.

AS Guiana is bounded with those mighty Rivers of Orenoque and Marañon, so Brasil extendeth it selfe North and South, betweene Marañon and the River of Plata or Siluer, which three we haue already shewed to be the greatest Rivers in the World. The Westerne borders are not so well discovered. The Easterne are washed by the Sea. Maffius bath largely described the same, whose words Bertius Maginus, and Gasper Ens haue transcribed: the summe whereof Iarric and Boternus haue inserted into their French and Italian Relations.

Petrus Aluarus Capralis, being sent by Emanuel, King of Portugal, in the yere 1500. vnto the East Indies, to auoide the calmes on the Guinnee shore, fetched a further compasse West, and so discovered the Continent, which now of that red wood there plentifully growing, is called Brasil, but by him was named the Land of the Holy Crosse, because he had there erected a Crosse with much ceremony. This Brasill was soone after by Americus Vesputius, at the charges of the said King, further discouered. The Region is pleasant and wholesome, the hills and valleyes equally agreeing in their vnequalnesse, the soyle fat and fertile: there are plenty of Sugar-canes; a kind of Balme expressed out of the herbe Copaibas, and many fruits which the Countrey naturally produceth; besides those which our Europe hath communicated. Many sorts there are of Beastes, as a kinde of Swine<sup>b</sup> which liue in both Elements, their fore-feet, being short in proportion to the hinder, make them slow in running, and therefore being hunted, commit themselves quickly to the water. Anta, resembling a Mule, but somewhat lesse; slender snouted, the neither chappe very long, like a Trumpet, with round eares and short tails, hiding themselves in the day-time,<sup>c</sup> and feeding in the night, the flesh tasteth like Beefe: there is also the Armadillo; the Tygre, which being hungry, is very hurtfull; being full, will flee from a Dogge: There is a deformed beast of such slow pace, that in fifteene dayes it will scarce goe a stons cast. It liueth on the leaues of trees, on which it is two dayes in climbing, and as many in descending, neither shous nor blowes forcing her to amend her pace.

The Tomendoas are as big as a Ram, with long and sharp sneuts, a taile like a Squirrel, (twice as long as the body and hairy) where-under they hide themselves, will put out their tongue two foote (out of the mouth as round as an Oyle-cruke) to gather plenty of Ants into their mouthes, hauing scraped vp the places where they keepe with their pawes. The Portugals haue there raised plenty of horses and sheepe. The men worship no God at all, but are giuen to sooth-sayings. The men and women goe altogether naked, are flat-nosed, make themselves blacke with the fruit Genipapi, weare their haire hanging from the hinder part of the head, not suffering it elsewhere to grow: in their nether lips weare long stones for a gallantrie (which being remoued, they seeme in deformed manner to haue a double mouth) they goe together by companies with great silence, the Wife going before her Husband, which (some say) is done for ieaousie. They entertaine and welcome Strangers at first with weeping and deepe sighes, pitying their tedious iourney, and presently dry their eyes, hauing teares at command.

Women in trauell are deliuered without great difficulty, and presently goe about their household businesse, the Husband in her stead keepeth his bed, is visited of the neighbours, hath his brothes made him, and iunkets sent to comfort him. They are ignorant of<sup>d</sup> numbering and letters: some Tradition they are said to haue touching Nos and the Floud. Vnder the same Roofe (which is like a Boat with the Keele vpwards) liue many families, they lie in Nets or Beddes hanging about the ground (which is vsuall in a great part of the Indies) to auoide hurtfull creatures: they minde the day, and are not carefull for the morrow, easily communicate what they haue, are very patient of labour and hunger, feasting if they haue where-with, from morning till night, and fasting other-whiles, when they want, three daies together. In swimming they are miraculously skilfull, and will diue whole houres to search any thing vnder the water. They beleue not any reward or punishment after this life ended, but thinke that as men die, so they goe to the other world, maimed, wounded, sicke or whole: and therefore bury the bodies with a Net to lie in, and food for some daies, thinking that they both sleepe and eat. They are excellent Archers, and what enemies they take in their wars, they feed well many daies, and then kill and eat them for great dainties. They dwell in houses scattered and separated from each other; their language is almost generally the same; they haue no lawes nor Maiestrates; the women call certaine things by one name, and the men by another. They haue no vse of three letters in the Alphabet, L, F, R, a reason whereof some haue wittily giuen, because they haue no Law, Faith, nor Ruler. They are vnmindfull of good turnes, and too mindfull of iniuries: impotent of lust and rage, and in summer, more like beasts then men. Thus saith Maffau.

He weighed the long stones (which they vse to weare in their faces, sewen in number) about sixteene ounces. He saith they liue 150. yeares, and that their women are out of measure luxurious, that they alway haue an Easterly winde which tempereth their aire.

Let vs in the next place heare such as haue liued in the Countrey: of which Lierius and Theues, two French-men, and Ioannes Stadins a Germane, haue written seuerall Treatises. But none hath more fully deseribed them, then a Portugall Frier, * and Anthony Kninet our Countie-man.

Ioannes Stadins f in the yeere 1554. was prisoner to the Tuppin Imbat, and because he serued the Portugals, should haue bene slaine and deuoured. But by Gods mercie he escaped. He was the Gunner in the Port of Saint Vincent, and going into the Wood to prouide somewhat wherewith to entertaine some friends then come to him, became himselfe a prey to those Men-hunters. When they had taken him, they contended which of them had bene the first taker, and that controuersie ended he, was stripped naked and led away. He was giuen to one of their Kings, and this victory by them was ascribed to their Tamaraka, or Idols, which they said had by Oracle prophesied thereof. But their Kings were no other then the chiefe in euery Cottage, which consisted of one kindred, and these Tamaraka were certaine Rattles, as shall after appeare. The manner is, that it gets them a great name, to exhibit this feast of a slaine Captiue, and therefore some that haue taken, will credit some other friend with the gift of a Captiue to this solemne butchery, on condition to repay him the next Captiue hee taketh. This was Stadins his case, who was thus tossed by exchange, from one to an other; till at last hee escaped altogether.

But when hee had bene newly taken, the Women came about him, and one while buffeted him, one saying, this is for such a friend of mine, that the Peros or Portugals had slaine; another fixing on his flesh the memoriall of another friend of hers, and then lead him with a rope about his necke, almost strangling him, making him also to daunce in the midst of them, with rattles tied to his legges: but hee after grew in some credite and respect amongst them, and saw diuers others eaten, while himselfe could not be free from feare of the like destiny. The Sauages, that they take, put on a great shew of resolution, and little regard (in seeming) that their Tragedie, supported with this comfort, that their friends will reuenge it. In time of sickness or sudden dangers, they would resort to him to pray to his God for deliuerance; and and this conceit of his God, which they obserued in his Deuotions, was the principall meanes of deferring his execution. Such as are mortally wounded in their fights, they would spend presently, or at least kill and dresse them, for a feast neere at hand: and one man that had liued long amongst them, and was desperately sicke, lest Death should deprive them of their cheere, they slue, and (because of his sicknesse) hurling away the head and inwards, eat vp the rest. They take great pride in this their cruelties and when Konyan Bebe their King, hauing a Basket full of peeces of man flesh on which he was feeding, offered Stadius a peece, who told him that it was more then beastly, hee answered, I am a Tigre, and I delight in these delicacies. This Stadius after escaped in a French Shippe.

Nicolas Durantius, a Knight of Malta, fir-named Villagagnon, in the yeere 1555. <sup>g Lerius hist. Nauig. in Amer.</sup> (malecontent with his estate at home) sayled into Francia Antartica, or the Southerne parts of Brasil, vnder the Tropike of Capricorne, and pretended there to worship God according to the purity of the Gospell, & to fortifie, both for the habitation of his owne, and for a Sanctuary vnto such as at home were persecuted for the truth. Hee fortified and sent thence to Geneva for assistance in this his holy intent: whereupon Richerius & Charierius, two Ministers, with diuers others, among whom was Iohn Lerius, were sent, and landed there in the yeere 1557. Lerius hath written his obseruations of these parts, as Themet also, another of Villagagnons Company, but (as Lerius testifieth) in many things falsely. The first Sauages that Lerius and his fellowes saw, were the Margaiates, which hold friendship with the Portugals, and are enemies to the French, and to the Touou Pinombansy, or Tuppin Imbas, confederates of the French, and as deadly enemies to the former. In the meane way they passed by the Tapemiry Paraiba, Ometacates, all which, howsoeuer they exercise hostilities, and mutuall disagreements, yet agree in like barbarous and rightlesse Rites. With the Touou Pinombansy he conuersed familiarly about a yeere. They are in habit of body like the Europeans, but stronger, and lesse subiect to sicknesse, not subiect to our bodily distempers, by like intemperance, or to vexation of minde, by turbulent and distracting passions of couetousnesse, enuy, ambition.

They are all naked, except sometimes: the Old-men rather to hide their disease in those parts, then their shame, couer their priuities. They weare in their nether lippe a <sup>h</sup> Pyramidall stone, which brauery weigheth downe their lippe, and subiecteth the face to great deformity. Some also not content with this, adde two others in their cheekes to like purpose. They presse downe the noses of their Infants to make them flar. They annoynt themselves with a kind of Gumme, which they couer with the downe of feathers sticking thereto. They weare also frontlets of feathers: in their eares they weare bones. They which will excell the rest in gallantry, and would seeme to haue slaine and eaten the most enemies, slash and cut their flesh, and put therein a blacke powder, which neuer will bee done away. They vse Rattles of the shell of a certaine fruite, in which they put Stones or Graines, and call them Maraca, of which they haue some superstitious conceit. The Women differ from the Men in nourishing their haire, which the Men shauo off before, and make not those holes in their lippes; but in their eares weare eare-rings of the forme and bignesse of a meane Candle. They paint also their faces with diuers colours, and weare bracelets of little bones, of which the men weare Chaines or Collars. They would not weare cloathes, pretending their custome of nakednesse, and often washing (sometimes ten times in a day) whereto cloathes would be a hinderance: and our Captiue Women, further then the whip forced them, would not accustome themselves to the apparell we gaue them. The Women make two kinds of Meale of certaine Rootes, which they vse in stead of Bread, which they doe not put, but hurle, into their mouthes without losse. Their office is also to make their drinke of Rootes sliced, and chewed in their mouthes, and thus prepared, boyled, and stirred in a great pot ouer the fire: the like drinke they make of chewed Mays, which they call Anatis: the men would account it a disgrace to do these things, and that they would not taste so wel. They call this drinke Caouin, it is thicke, and tastes like milke: I haue seene them continue (saith Lerius) drinking this liquor 3. daies and nights together: they hold it a disparagement disparagement not to be able to hold out at this Bacchanal exercise, which they celebrate with dancing and singing, especially at their beastly man-feasts, The women dance a part from the men. One of them reported to our Author, that they had taken a ship of the Peros, or Portugals, and eaten the men: they found therein great vessels, which they could not tell what it was, but dranke so much thereof, that they slept three daies after: it is likely that it was Spanish wine. They eat serpents & toads (which with them are not venomous) and Lizards: Our Author saw one Lizard as big as a man, with scales on her backe like Oysters, they haue a kind of Monkey called Sagonin of the bignesse of a Squirrel, the fore-halfe in shape resembling a Lyon: they haue another strange beast, called Coaty as high as a Hare, with a little head, sharpe eares, and a snout or beake aboue a foot long, the mouth so little, that one can scarcely put in his little finger; it feedeth on Ants. They take * Petum (it is not Tabacco) not in pipes, but put foure or fise leaues in another greater, and firing it, sucke in the smoke, and therewith in time of warre, will sustaine themselves three dayes together, without other sustenance. They weare this herbe about their necks.

* The Brazilian Petum is neyther in forme nor vertue, the same with Tabacco, as Levinus saith. The women take it not.

When St. Fran. Drake made his famous and fortunate voyage about the world, in the South sea he*lost the rest of his company, the Elizab. wherein M. Winter was (which returned into England) & a Pinnsle wherein were 7. men besides Pet. Carder the relater of this history. This Pinnsle being alone returned backe the Straits, & on the North side of the riuer of Plate 6. went on shore into the wood to seek food where 70. Tapines shot at them and wounded al, wherof 2. died soone after, 4. taken, their pinnsle also being broken, only P. Carder & Wil. Pitcher remained, which liued in an Island 2. months, on a fruit somewhat like orêges, & crabs without any fresh water: the want wherofforced them to drink their own vrin, saued in sherds for that purpose till the next morning. Weary of this life (which began to grow weary of them) they with a plank & certain boords, made shift in 3. daies to fet themselves ouer into the main 3. leagues distant, where meeting with fresh water, this Pitcher was broken, & died within halfe an hower of ouer eager drinking; Carder encountered certain Sauages called Tappanbasse, which led him away dancing, ragling tabering. They slept on beds of white cottonnetting tied 2. foot from the ground, & a fire on each side, to preuent cold & wild beasts: the next day they marched 20. miles to their towne, which was 4. square, with 4. houses, euery house being 2. bow-shoot in length, made with smal trees like arbours, thatched to the ground with palm-tree leaues hauing no windowes but 30. or 40. doores on each side the square. Their chief Lord was named Caion, about 40. yeeres old, he had 9. wiues, the rest but one, except the most valiant, which were permitted 2. one for the house, another to go with him to the wars. In this town were neere 4000 persons. He found among them good entertainment for certain moneths.

They vsed to goe to the wars three or 400. in a company with bowes and arrowes, and hauing overcome would bring home their captiues tied by the arme to so many of their mens armes, & soone after would tie them to a post, & with a club (after dancing & drinking) slit their heads. Their drinke is made of a root, chewed by women and spit into a trough, where it stands 2. or 3. daies, & hath a yess on it like ale, & then is turned into earthen iars, wherwith they drinke themselves drunke. After half a yere hauing learned the language, he was requested to their warres against the Tapmees, & much bettered their martiall skil, teaching them to make 100. targets of tree-barke, & 200. clubs, marking their owne company with red Balsam (of this they haue red, white, black, very odoriferous) & so marched 700 together 3. daies to another 4. square town like (but lesse then) their owne. They knocked downe two hundred; tooke 20 they broyled their carcases and after also the prisoners. How many men they kill, so many holes they make in their visage, beginning at the nether lippe, and so proceeding to the cheeke, eyebrowes, and eares. Some Portugals came to search for him, two of which and some Negros were taken and eaten. Hee obtayned leaue to goe to the Coast, hauing foure to provide him victuals for nine or ten weekes, and so came to Bahia de todos los santos, where hee yeelded himselfe to Michael Ionas a Portugall, and ariued in England in November 1586. nine yeares after his setting forth.

Master

Master Anthony Knivet was one of Master Candlishes company in his vnfortunate Voyage, 1591. who after much miserie sustained in the Magellan Straits, in their returne was set on shore at Saint Sebastians, where many of his company died with eating a kinde of blacke venomous pease. He saw there a great beast come out of the River (a Crocodile or some other monster) hauing, on the back great scales, vgly clawes, and a long taile, which thrust out a tongue * like a harping iron, but returned without harme. He found a dead Whale, which with long lying was couered with mosse, on which hee yet liued a fortnight. His company were knocked on the head with firebrands, and he like to be eaten of the Sauages, but escaped this and many other miseries; and was saued by the Iesuits from being hanged by the Portugalls. Where his calamities compelled him, which another Indian in like predicament of slauery, to escape by fleeing, swimming two miles ouer the sea: and so they trauelled seuen and thirtie dayes through a desert, meeting by the way Lions, Leopards, huge Serpents. Some Indians they saw with feathers of diuers colours, fixed on their bodies and heads with oyle of Balsam, seeming as if they had beene so borne, not leauing a spot bare but on their legges. The Sauages sell their children to the Portugalls for toyes. Some of them were so haunted with a spirit which they called Coropio (like that which Lerius his Sauages called Aignan) that some of them died therewith in much amazement. Many complained that they were possessed with spirits, which they called Anafaly, and commanded themselves to be bound hand and foot with bowstrings, desiring their friends to beat them with cords, wherewith they hang their beds; but most died notwithstanding. They haue wormes which creepe into their fundaments which consume their guts: for remedie whereof they take slices of Limons and greene pepper, and put therein with salt water.

Aignan

He in diuers expeditions for war and Merchandize with the Portugalls, and escapes from them, trauelled thorow more of those Sauage nations, then perhaps any other before or since. Out of whose obseruations bought at so deare a rate, I haue heere mustered these many wilde people before thee, with such rarities as he found amongst them seuen and twentie, they inhabite from Baya to Rio Grande.

The Petiuares are not so barbarous as many other, their bodies are carued with fine workes: in their lips is a hole made with a Roe-Buckes horn, which at mans estate they cut bigger with a Cane, and weare therein a greene stone; otherwise they esteeme a man no gallant, but a peasant. They haue no Religion: vse polygamie, but the women are tied to one husband, except he giue her publike leaue. When they goe to war, the wiues carry all the prouision. That wife whom he giueth his hunted prey, is his bed-fellow that night: and she goeth to the water, and washeth her selfe: after which she lieth downe in the net, and commandeth all the rest to attend on her for that day. When they are in trauell they goe to the doore, and being deliuered, the father lieth downe and is visited, as before is said. No Indian will kill any female creature whiles his wife is with childe, thinking that would be the death of his childe. They trauell with great store of Tobacco, and haue continually a lease thereof along the mouth betweene the lip and teeth, the rheume running out at the lip-hole. They warre against the Portugalls and all others, eating all, and take so many new names, as prisoners. They thinke mans flesh makes them valiant. Their houses are two hundred yards long without partitions: they hang their nets on beames: wash euery morning both men, women, and children: they part their grounds. They haue Serpents amongst them with bodies like trees, which strike two fins out of their fore-quarters, that kill whatsoeuer: they call them * Iaboya. They haue foure legs and a taile (like an Aligator or Crocodile) which they hide when they lie in the woods for their prey. They haue Munkies as big as a water-dog, faced like a man, with long broad beards, which goe twentie together on a tree, and one of them will alway walke vp and downe with his hand on his beard, making a great noise, the rest harkening still, an houres space.

* See infra.

The Maraquites are betweene Fernambur and Baya: other Indians call them Tappyes, that is, wilde men, which name, all but these, and the Vaanasses, which are like them, account a disgrace. The men are of good stature, the women very proper, and fight with their bowes as well as the men. They haue no dwelling, Religion, nor friendship with any Nation: yet he left them in peace with the Portugals. They haue holes in their lippes, but carue not their bodies: vse Polygamie; are swift; neuer come in to the field to fight, but keepe in the mountaines: they eate mans flesh without ceremonies,

Topimambaze..

The Topimambazes inhabit from R. de S. Franc. to Baya de todos Santos, they are, and speake like the Perywards, but the women are of better complexion. The men let their beards grow long.

Waymoores.

From Baya to Eleoos are the Waymoores, men of great stature, and swift as a horse: five or sixe of them will set on a Sugar-houfe with an hundred therein. I haue seene one (saith our Author) take a man aliue, and defend himselfe with this his prisoner, as it were with a Target. They haue long haire; are without Townes or houses, and care not where they come, presuming of their swiftnesse. They are greedie man-eaters, and are alwayes foule with durt and dust, by lying on the ground and ashes.

Tomomymenos.

The Tomomymenos dwell at Spirito Santo: haue settled Townes, with great stones set about like pales, of a good height, and within walles of clay and stone: they make the sides of their houses with loope-holes to shoote out at. They decke their bodies with feathers, and paint themselues blacke and red. One of these tooke the Portugall Captaine, Martin de Sa, and in spite of all his companie, carried him a stones cast, and threw him into a Riuer; but hee was rescued by Petummyen * another Sa-uage. The Portugals tooke sixteene thousand, slew the tenth part, and parted the rest, destroying the Countrey downe the Riuer Paraeyua.

* This name signifieth long Tobacco, as he interprets. Lerius otherwise.

Waytaquazes.

The Waytaquazes dwell on the North and South sides of Cape Frio. They are of greater stature then the Waymoores: wee tooke thirteene of them, and whiles wee searched for more, they burnt their cords from their hands and fledde. Their women warre with bowes and arrowes. They lye on the ground like Hogges, with a fire in middest: hold no peace with any, but eate all they can get. Heere the mountaines were full of Crablice, which stuck so fast on their skinnes, that they were faine to take drie straw to singe themselues.

Abausanga-retam was Captaine of a kinde of Tamoyes, an hundred and twentie yeares old, which being taken, ranne amongst the enemies, where being shotte in one and twentie places he fell, then desired Baptisme, after which, within foure houres he died: his haughtie courage could not brooke captiuitie.

Wayanasses.

The Wayanasses keepe at Ila Grande: they are low, great bellied, cowards, not carued, glory not to eate mans flesh: the women vgly with bigge bodies, but are well faced, painted red with Vrucu, which growes in a cod like a beane: the crownes of both Sexes are shauen like Friers, the rest of their haire long.

Topinaques.

The Topinaques haue their dwelling at Saint Vincents: are of good stature and complexion: the women painted with diuers colours: eate mans flesh: adore nothing: onely when they kill a man, paint themselues with a fruit called Ianipano, and with feathers on their heads, great stones in their lips, Rattles in their hands, dance three dayes together, drinking a filthy liquor, whereto they said Tobacco made them fresh. Among them is great store of Gold in many hills by the sea.

Pories.

The Pories dwell an hundred miles within Land, are low like the Wayanasses, liue on Pine-nuts, and small Cocos as bigge as Apples, with shells like Wall-nuts, but harder; they call them Eyrires: they warre with none, eate not mans flesh if they haue other meate; lye in nets of barke, haue no houses but two or three boughes tied together, covered with Palme-leaues: for a knife or combe, they will giue five or six gallons of Balsame-oyle.

Molapaques.

The Molapaques inhabite neere the Riuer Paradiua, are like Dutchmen in bignesse, faire of complexion, bearded, ciuill, couer their priuities: their Townes circled with walles of earth and great logges: haue a King called Moronibannu, which had thirteene wiues. They haue store of Gold which they esteeme not, nor vse it but to tye on their fishinglines: this is in the Riuer Para, fourescore leagues beyong Paraeyua. They take none but what the rayne washeth from the mountaines, which are of blacke earth without Trees. The women are goodly and faire like English women, modest, neuer seene to laugh, and of good capacitie. They tye their haire about their their middle with barke, and couer therewith their nakednesse: their haire also is of diuers colours: and they which want long haire, vse a furre to couer themselves. They eate mans flesh: obserue meales at noone and night (a thing rare in those parts) vse no Religion, so far as our Author could see in nine or ten dayes of his abode with them: they are very cleanly.

The Motayas met them with dancing and singing: the women fate about them and wept, and then set forth their victuals: they laughed at them for refusing mans flesh: they are smal people and browne, weare their haire in fashion as we in England, finding it round about, and in other parts of the bodie, plucke it away with a shell.

The Lopos, or Biberas, as the Portugals call them, liue in the mountaines of Pine-apples: they saw no houses, but boughes tied together with the pills of Trees: they would robbe them of their goods, but not hurt their persons: heere they found many mines of gold, and many rich stones: no part of America is richer, but it is farre within Land, and the Countrey populous, that neither Spaniard nor Portugall can inhabit there: they are browne and small, the women as shamelesse as beasts.

The Wayanawasons dwell in small townes by the side of a Riuer, are the simplest of all other, would stand and gaze on vs like heards of Deere, without speaking word. They are bigge, tall, cleane-made, lazie: heere sixteene of their company died with eating a certaine yellow plumme, as bigge as a horse-plumme. The roots of Mandioca had almost killed them all, but by a peece of Vnicornes horne they were preserued. From hence he with twelue Portugals determined to trauell to the South-sea by land: they came to many mountaines where they found store of gold, and many precious stones, and had thought themselves in Peru: those stones they tooke vp one day, they cast away the next to take vp better. In this Countrey they trauelled two moneths, till they came to the great Mountaine of Crystall, for height seeming to tower vp it selfe in the clouds, and was impassable for steepe nesse: they saw it ten dayes before they came at it, and were not able, when the Sunne was aloft, to trauell against it for the glistering reflection. They passed along it twentie dayes before they could finde passage, and at last came to Riuer which ranne vnder it. Then did they make them prouision of great Canes, three yards and a halfe broad, and six long, and killing good store of Tamandoes, roasted them: and thus provided went into the vault, which made such a noyse with the water, that it seemed to them an enchantment. They went in on a munday morning, and came out againe on a morning, they knew not whether one or two daies after.

The next Sauages they encountred were a kinde of Tamoyes, which are as proper men as any in Europe, most of them faire, their heads set with feathers; the women tall, proper, slender in the waste, faire, fine handed, comely faced, and breasts carued. They esteem of gold and gems, as we of stones in the streets. Here he liued eighteen month: but his twelue companions they slew and deuoured. Him they spared, because he professed himselfe a French-man, with whom they sometimes had some commerce.

The Tocomans dwell betweene the Riuer of Plate and Saint Vincent. They are sandie, small, but not so little as they say of the Pigmies, and dwell in Caues.

The Cariyoghs for two or three Glasses and a Combe, with some Kniues, would giue the worth of foure or fife thousand crownes in gold or stones. Their women are comely and faire, the men die their bodies blacke. The Tamoyes his last hosts, by his instructions (who was desirous to trie if the sea might yeeld him any succor) left their habitations, and thirtie thousand of them aduentured themselves to seek new. They came into the country of the Amazons, which the Indians cal Mandiocufyams, but durst not war against them: they tooke a Towne of the Carijos, and eat three hundred of them: the rest fled to the Riuer of Plate, and obtained Portugall succour, who tooke these Tamoyes captiues, slew ten thousand, and shared twentie thousand amongst them for slaues. And thus came he againe into his Portugall slavery, from which he had made an escape once before, and trauelled nine moneths in the wildernes: fife or six yeares he serued the Portugals, and liued a yeare and eleuen moneths with the Canibals.

He made another escape into Angola, and serued as a drudge in Mafangana, the sickliest Countrey vnder the Sunne, where the Portugals die like chickens, gape for aire like like the Cameliions, liue close, take Physicke, euery weeke let bloud, obserue certaine diet and howers when to goe abroad. But his houre to goe abroad at libertie was not yet come. Backe he was sent to Brasil: and long it was before his longing could be satisfied to reuiue his Countrey and friends: some compassion of his passions, I thinke this tedious following him in this epitomised discourse of his disastters hath bred in you.

Friers Treatise
of Brasil.

But no man hath written so absolute a discourse of Brasil, as was that taken from a Portugall Frier, and by Francis Cooke sold to Master Hakluyt. Out of him I could recite the names of other Brasilian Nations, Ararape, Apigapigtanga, Vintan (which he saith were by a Magician Priest of Portugall conueyed to Fernambur.) Tapuya is a generall name, of which he reckoneth threescore and sixteene seuerall Nations, most of them of sundrie languages.

Guaymares or Waymores, as
K. and as Stad.
Wayganna,

The Guaymares haue hard skins, and beat their children with thistles to harden them. They are swift and cruell, cut off the captiues flesh with reeds, leauing nothing but the bones and guts, and disbowell women with childe, to eat the childe roasted. The Camucuiara haue paps reaching almost to the knees, which when they runne they binde to their waste. The Curupetie eat not men, but carry the heads for shew.

Beasts of Brasil.

The Winter beginnes in Brasil in March, and ends in August. The beasts of Brasil he reckoneth Deere, Elkes like vnto Kine or mules, which diue and goe (but swimme not) vnder the water. Bores of two sorts, Conies, Pigges, Ounces, Foxes with bags to carry their yong vnder the belly. The Tatu or Armadilla, which digs as much as many men with mattocks: the Conduacu or Porcupine of three sorts: the Hirara like Civet Cats, which eat hony: The Aquiqui, bearded Apes black, and sometimes one yellow, which they say is their King, hauing an Instrument from his gullet as bigge as a duck-egge, wherewith he maketh a loude sound; so active, that they sometimes are said to catch an arrow with the hand, and redart it at the shooter, and so cunning that they seeke a leafe, chew it, and put the same into their wounds. There are of them many kindes. The Cuati are like Badgers, they climbe trees; no snake, egge, or bird escapes him. There are others greater, as great Dogges, with Tuskes, which deuour men and beasts. There are wilde Cats, which yeeld good furre, and are very fierce: the Iagouacu, are Dogges of Brasil; the Tapati also barke like Dogges. The Iaguacinia is a kinde of Foxe which feedeth on Sea-crabbes and Sugar-canes. The Birataca, a kinde of Ferret of such stinking sauour, that some Indians haue died thereof: yea Dogges which come neere escape not: the sent endureth fifteen or twentie dayes in those things which he hath come neere to: and causeth some Towne sometimes to be disinhabited. This commeth of a ventositie which it voideth and couereth the earth, or casteth it out being in danger to be taken: it feedeth on birds egges, and Amber. Ten or twelue kinds of Rats, all good meat. Other beasts are before mentioned.

Snakes.

Of Snakes without venome, he numbereth the Giboya, some of which are twentie foote long, and will swallow a Deere whole, crushing it with the winding of his taile, and bruising it with licking, to that purpose. The Guaranpiaquana eateth egges, goeth faster on the trees, then any man can runne on the ground, with a motion like swimming. The Camojama is all greene, and liueth on like food. The Boytiapua eat Frogges; the Indians strike this Serpent on womens hippes as remedie to barrennesse. The Gaitixpia smelleth so, that none can abide it: such is also the Boyuma: the Bamu (so termed of his crie) is great and harmelesse; the Baicueganga hath venomous prickles on his backe.

There are other venomous Snakes, as the Iararaca, of which are foure kinds, of muskie sent, one ten spannes long, with great tuskes, which they hide and stretch out at pleasure. The Curucucu fiteene spannes long, which lieth on a tree to hunt his prey. The Boycimiaga which hath a bell in his taile, so swift, that they call it the flying Snake, there are two kindes thereof. The Ibiracua causeth by his biting, the bloud to issue thorow all parts of the bodie, eyes, mouth, nose, eares, &c. The Ibiboca is the fairest, but of foulest venome amongst them all. The fields, woods, houses, beds, boots, are subiect to plentie of Snakes, which without helpe kill in foure and twentie houres. There are also many Scorpions, which ordinarily kill not, but cause extreame paine for for foure and twentie houres space. Lizards couer the walles of houfes, and holes are full of them. Their fundament-wormes are very dangerous, which Sir Richard Hakluyt saith he saw like a long Magot, greene, with a red head, creeping in, and glewing himselfe to the gut, where it groweth so great, that it stoppeth the passage, and killeth, with crue ll chollike torments.

Master Knivet speakes of one Serpent which he killed, thirteene spannes long, with foure and twenty teeth, great shells about the necke, black and russet, like a collar, lesse on her bodie, and dark greene vnder her belly, all speckled with black and white, with foure sharpe feet, no longer then a mans finger, and a tongue like a harping iron. Her taile like a strait bull-horne, black and white listd. If they finde fire they beate themselves in it, till either the fire or themselves be extinguished. They vse from a tree to fall on their prey passing by, thrusting their taile into the fundament. The Indians will not go (vnder five or six) to set vp one of them; this yet he killed with the helue of an axe.

Master Knivet.

Of Birds there are Parrots innumerable, more then Starlings or Sparowes in Spaine: the Guaminbig like Bees, which sleepe six moneths; the Tangara which haue the falling-sicknes, the rest dancing about that which is fallen, with a noise, from which they will not be skarred, till they haue done, &c.

of Birds.

Of Fruits, he reckons the Iacupucaya, like a pot, as big as a great bowle, two fingers thicke, with a couer on it, within full of Chesnuts: being much eaten greene, it caueth all the haire to fall off: Balsam trees pricked, excellent for cure and sent: Oyle-trees many; one as a well or riuer, growing in drie places where no water is: it hath holes in the branches as long as ones arme, full of water Winter and Summer, neuer running ouer, but alwaies at like stay: five hundred persons may come to the foot of it, and drink and wash their fill without want: the water is sauoury and cleare. There are hearbes which seeme to sleepe all night, and others which make shew of sence, as we haue before obserued from Master Harcourt in Guiana.

Fruits Trees,
and Herbes.

Of strange fishes in Brasil, he nameth the Oxe-fish, with eies and eye-lids, two armes a cubit long, with two hands, five fingers and nailes, as in a man; and vnder the armes the female had two paps inwards like an Oxe: it cannot be long vnder water: it hath no fins but the taile, which is round and close, two stones neere the braine of great esteeme for the stone: the inwards as of an Oxe, and taste like porke.

Oxe-fish.

The Cucurijuba is a fresh-water Snake, five and twentie or thirtie foot long (the Manima is a greater kinde) toothed like a dogge, with a chaine striped along the back very faire: It catcheth a man, cow, stagge, or other prey, winding it with the taile, and so swalloweth it whole: after which three lies and rots, the Rauens and Crowes eating her all but the bones, to which after groweth new flesh, by life deriued from the head, which is hidden all this while in the mire (which therefore they that finde, seeke and kill.) They will sleepe so being full, that they may cut off peeces (he telles an instance) from the taile, and they not awaken. They found one which was fiftie spans or twelue yards and a halfe long, hauing two wilde Bores in the belly. Thus much of the creatures in Brasil. Let vs now take better view of their Warres, Religion, and other their Rites.

Master T. Turner (who liued in Brasil, and was acquainted with Master Knivet) saith the Le-suits told him the like.

CHAP. V.

Of the Warres, Man-eating, and other Rites of the Brasilians.

He Brasilians, for the most part as you haue seene, exercise irreconcilable hostilitie, not to enlarge their dominions, but only to be reuenged for the death of their friends and Ancestors, slaine by their enemies. The Elder men, as they sit or lie in their hanging beds, will make an Oration of the vertue of their Predecessors, and of their sustained wrongs, and so excite the yonger to take armes: these Orations last sometimes sixe houres. Their armes are clubbes or wooden swords, five or sixe foote long, and a foote broad, a finger thicke, and very sharpe. One of these men being thoroughly moued, would trouble two of our Fencers. Their bowes are as long as ours, the string made of the herb Tacon, little yet able to endure the strength of an horse: their arrowes an ell long, which they will shoot twice as fast, as our men: they haue leather shields: Their elder men lead the rankes (if they may be so called, which haue none to marshall or order them) and with great shouts, and shewing the enemies the bowes of their slaine friends, they enter into a fierce battell. Their captiues they conuey in the middest of their armie home to their territories, vnto whom the men will not sticke to giue their sisters or daughters, to performe all the duties of a wife, and feed them with the best, till they redemand the same out of their flesh: the men are employed (if it be long before the slaughter) in hunting, fowling, fishing; the women in gardening, or gathering Oysters. When that disinnall day approacheth, knowledge is giuen, and the men, women, and children assemble to the place appointed, and there passe the morning in drinking; & the captiue (although he knoweth the dreadful issue) danceth, drinketh, and frolickes it with the best. After six or seuen houres thus spent, two ordiree of the strongest fasten a rope about his middle, leauing his armes at libertie, and so lead him vp and downe the Village in triumph. Neither doth he for all this hang downe his head, as men heere going to be hanged, but with incredible courage emblazoneth his owne worthinesse. Thus, thus, saith he, haue I sometimes bound your kindred, and thy father, saith he to one, haue I deuoured, and thy brethren (to another) haue I boucaned and eaten: and what innumerable numbers of you Touon Pinambausy haue these hands taken, this throat swallowed? Neither with the Margaiates suffer this my death vreuenged. Then they bring him stones, and bid him reuenge his death. He hurleth them at those which stand about him, whereof there are some foure thousand; and hurtech diuers: I saw one (saith our Author) whose legges I had thought had beene broken by the violence of one of those blowes. After this comes one, which all this while had bin hidden, with the <sup>a</sup> fatall club, and, Art not thou one of the Margaiates? saith he: and hast thou not deuoured our kindred? the other answereth, O how lustily I haue done it, how prompt haue I beene in taking them, how greedie in eating? And therefore, replieth the other, shalt thou be killed and rosted on the Boucan. What then? saith he, my death shall not be <sup>b</sup> vreuenged. The clubbe ends their dialogue, with one blow striking him dead. His wife (if hee had any, as they sometimes vse to bestow on their captiues) comes to the carkasse, and spends a little time and passion in mourning, but her Crocodiles teares are soone dried, and the humor falls into her teeth, which water for the first morsell. The other women, especially the elder (which are most cruell and greedy) bring hot water and wash the body, and rub it till it looke like the skinne of a Pig: then comes the master of the feast, which owed the captiue, and cuts it out as readily, as any Butcher with vs can doe a Wether. They daub the children <sup>c</sup> with the blood: foure women carry about the armes and legs for a shew, with shouts and cries: The trunk is diuided into two parts, the vpper part being cut and separated from the lower: the inwards are left to the women, which seeth and make broth of them called Mingau, which they sup vp, with their children: they eat also the flesh about the head. The braine, tongue, and that which within the head may serue for meate, is the childrens share. The author of the feast hath a new name added to the former (for they haue so many names as they haue slaine captiues, the chiefe of the Cottage branding him on the arme, with an honorable marke for the memorie thereof) and all that day he must spend in quiet. The Wagganna <sup>d</sup> are a kinde of Brasilians, which hold confederacy with no other Nation, but kill all which come to their hands, and that so cruelly, that they will cut off their armes and legges while they are aliue. These liue in the Mountaines. They cut them with stones, and those which haue trade with the Christians, vse knives.

Their Boucan is a grediron of foure cratches, set in the ground, a yard high, and as much asunder, with billets laid thereon, and other stickes on them grate-wise. On this they roste the flesh, putting fire vnder, all the people standing about the same, and every one gets a little peece of him. But me thinkes I see horror expressed in the countenance of him that reades this, and every one wearie of viewing this tragedie, loathing this inhumane feasting with humane flesh.

I will therefore leaue their shambles, and (which better becometh a Pilgrime) will visite

visite their holies and holy places. But alas, where or what are they? Maffaw hath already tolde vs, that they obserue no Gods; and Lerius confirms the same, yet sheweth that they acknowledge a Diuell, whom they call Aygnan: not that they worshippe him, but are tormented by him. Euen in speaking of him, * they tremble, and the remembrance breedes a compassionat amazement in the hearer, an amazed passion in the speaker, while he applauds our happinesse free from such tyrannie, deplores his own miserie. He sometimes in the forme of a beast, sometimes in forme of a bird, and otherwhiles deformed in some monstrous shape, doth grievously torment them. Euen whiles the Christians were in conference with them, they would pitiously cry out, Hei, Hei, helpe, Aygnan vexeth me. Nor could this be counterfeited in the iudgment of any that conuersed with them. They beleue the immortalitie of the soule, and that the soules of the vertuous, that is, (in their sense) of such as haue killed and eaten many enemies, shall lie beyond the highest mountains, and be gathered to the soules of their progenitors, and there liue in pleasant gardens, and perpetuall dancings and delicacies. The cowardly ghosts shall be carried vnto torment, by Aygnan, without end. They haue no name, whereby to signifie God vnto them, but wondered to heare what the French-men tolde of the Creator of heauen and earth. And because they are afraid of Thunder, which they call Toupan, they told them that God was Author thereof: the foolish Indians reply, that he was then naught which would make them afraide. But the feare of Aygnan made them sometimes flexible to embrace the Christian Religion, hearing that this Diuell was inferiour to the Christians God. So that euen in these (the most degenerate of all, which I haue obserued in this long and tedious Pilgrimage) there is some sparke left of Religion, euen in the acknowledgement of a Diuell, and of eternall rewards and punishments.

This is further confirmed by that which is written of certaine Magicians or Priests amongst them: which periwade the people that they haue dealings with spirits, that by their meanes they haue their roots and sustenance, and may by them haue fortitude. I (saith Lerius) was present at one of their Assemblies, where sixe hundred were gathered together, which diuided themselues into three partes: the Men went into one house, the Women into a second, the Children into a third. The Caribes forbade the Women and Children to depart their houses, but to attend diligently to singing: and wee (saith he) were commaunded to abide with the women. Anon the men in one house fell to singing, He, He, He, answered by the women in the other with the same. They howled it out for a quarter of an houre, shaking their breasts, and foming at the mouth, and (as if they had had the falling sicknesse) some falling downe in a swoone; the Diuell in seeming entring into them. The children also followed in the same harsh deuotions. After this, the men sung pleasantly, which caused mee to goe thither, where I found them singing and dauncing in three severall Rings, in the midst of each, three or foure Caribes, adorned with Hattes and garments of Feathers, euery one hauing a Maraca, or Rattle, in both his bandes. These Rattles are made of a fruite bigger then an Ostriches egge, out of which they said, that the Spirit would speake, and they continually shooke them, for the due consecration. These Caribes daunced to and fro, and blowed the smoake of Petum on the standers by, saying, Receiue yee all the Spirit of Fortitude, whereby yee may overcome your enemies. This they did often: the solemnitie continued two houres, the men ignorant of Musicke, and yet rauishing my spirit with the delight I conceiued in their Song. Their wordes founded this, that they were grieved for the losse of their Progenitors, but were comforted in the hope, that they should one day visite them, beyond the hills; and then threatened the Onitacates (which dwell not farre from them, and are at comitie with e all their neighbours, as swift as Harts, wearing their haire to the buttockes, eating raw flesh, and differing from all others in Rites and Language) and now prophesied their destruction at hand. Somewhat also they added in their song of the flood, that once had drowned all the world, but their ancestors, which escaped by climbing high trees. That day they feasted with great cheare.

This solemnitie is celebrated euery third yeare; and then the Caribes appoint in euery familie three or foure Maraca, to be adorned with the best feathers, and sticked in in the ground, with meat and drinke set before them; and the people beleue they eate it. They minister vnto their Maraca fifteene dayes; after which, in a superstitious conceit, they thinke that a Spirit speaks to them while they rattle their Maraca. They were exceedingly offended, if any tooke away any of this Prouision, as the French sometimes did; for which, and denying other the Caribes lies, those Priests hated them exceedingly. Yet do they not adore their Maraca, or any thing else. Peter Carder saith he could obserue no Religion amongst them, but the worship of the Moone; specially the New-Moone, whereat they reioyce, leaping, singing, and clapping of hands.

f Pet. Carder.

h Lerius saith,
That the Caribes
& the Paygi
are two kinds:
Thouet but one: and Stad-
ius mentions no more but
the Paygi.

Stadius tells (as you heard) that they ascribed his taking to the prediction of their Maraca. He tells of their consecration, that the h Paygi (so he calls them) enioyne that euery one should carrie their Tamaraka to the house, where they should receiue the facultie of speech. Euery ones rattle is pitched in the ground by the Steele or stalk, and all of them offer to the Wizard which hath the chiefe place, arrowes, feathers, and eare-rings; he then breathes Petun on euery rattle, puts it to his mouth, shakes it, and saith, Nee Kora, that is, Speake if thou be within: anon followeth a squeaking voyce which I, saith Stadius, thought the Wizard did, but the people ascribed it to the Tamaraka. Then those Wizards perswade them to make warres, saying, that those spirits long to feede on the flesh of Captiues. This done, euery one takes his rattle and builds vp a roome for it, to keepe it in, where he sets victualls, requireth and asketh all necessities thereof, as we doe of God: and these, as Stadius affirmeth, are their Gods. These Paygi doe initiate women vnto witchcraft by such ceremonies of smoake, dancing, &c. till she fall as in the falling sicknesse, and then he saith, he will reuiue her, and make her able to foretell things to come: and therefore when they goe to the warre, they will consult with these women, which pretend conference with spirits.

i A. Thouet
Anraci.

Andrew Thouet (which was in France with Villagagnon) agreeth in many of the former reports: he addeth, that for feare of Aiguan they will not goe out, but they will carrie fire with them, which they thinke is forceable against him: that the Paygi exercise poysonings, coniuration, and other things, which I know not with what authoritie he auereth against the former witnesses, whereas Thouet, sometimes taken in lying, deserueth lesse credite in the rest. When there is any tempest in the water, he saith they attribute it to the soules of their Progenitors, and cast something into the water to appease it.

They haue a tradition, That one, in habite like to the Christians, had long since told their progenitors of diuine matters, but to so little effect, as he forsooke them; and euer since had those bloudie warres continued amongst them. How little the Iesuities can preuaile, in bringing the Brasilians to Christianity, Maffa hath written somewhat, and Pierre du Larric, a Iesuite, very largely; which is not so pertinent to our present purpose.

Mr. Knauer (to whose relations our former Chapter is so much indebted) telleth of a rocke in Brasil called Etooca, with an entrance like a doore, where the Indians say (it is like they borrowed it of some fabulous Frier) that St. Thomas preached. It is within like a great hall: hard by it is a stone as bigge as foure Canoes, supported by foure stones like stickes, little bigger then a mans finger. The Indians say it had beene wood, and by miracle was thus altered. They shew vpon great rockes manie foot-prints of one bignesse; and tell that the Saint called the Fishes of the Sea, & they heard him preach. This smels of a Franciscan cowle.

Friers Treatis.

The Portugal Friers Treatise mentioned in the former Chap. deliuereth many things worthy our obseruation: They haue some tradition of the flood, in which they say all were drowned, one only escaping on a lanipata with a sister of his, which was with childe, from whom they had their beginning. They haue no knowledge of the Creator, nor of paine and glorie after this life, and therefore vse no ceremonies of worship. Yet doe they acknowledge that they haue soules which die not, but are conuerted into Diuells, and goe into certaine fieldes where growe many Figge-trees amongst the banks of a goodly River, and there daunce. They are greatly afraid of the Diuell (whom they call Curupira, Taguain, Piganga, Maticbera, Auchanga) is so much that often they haue died with the imagination of him. Yet doe not they worship it,

nor any other creature. or Idoll, onely some old men say, that in some wayes they haue certaine posts, where they offer him some things for feare, and because they would not die. Sometimes (but seldome) the Diuell appeares to them, and some few among them are possessed. There are Witches which vse witchcrafts, rather for health then deuotion. Some witches are called Carayba, or holines, but (like his holinesse of Rome) are of bad life: these would seeme to doe strange things, raising some to life which had fained themselues dead: they are their Oracles for their husbandrie and other affaires: sometimes causing them to die for hunger, whiles they promise to make the Mattockes worke alone.

They haue no proper name for God, but say Tupan is the thunder and lightning, which gaue them Mattocks and food. Their marriages are diuorced vpon any quarrell. In times past (they tell) no young man married before he slew an enemy, nor the woman before she had her termes, which time was therefore festiuall. At marriages also they vsed great drinkings, and the feast ended, they were laide in a cleane Net, after which the father tooke a wedge of stone, and did cut vpon a stake or post, which (they say) was to cut the taitles from the grand children, who were for this cause borne without them. After they were married they began to drinke; (for till then their fathers brought them vp in sobrietie of diet and modesty of speech) and then with a vessell the olde men gaue him the first <sup>k</sup> wine, holding his head with their handes for feare of vomiting, which, if it hapned, was a signe he would not be valiant. They eate at all times in the night and day, and keepe no meate long, being no niggards of their store (this name were the greatest disgrace you could offer them) and count it an honour to be liberall. They are patient of hunger and thirst: will eate snakes, todes, rats, and all fruits which are not poyson: drinke not ordinarily whiles they eate, but after meate will drinke drunke. They haue some particular festiualls, in which two or three dayes together they eate not, but drinke, and goe about singing, calling all to the like fellowship: sleepe not, haue their musickes, and sometimes fall to quarrells. They wash not before meate; they eate sitting, or lying in their beddes, or on the ground. They go to bedde betimes, and rise not early. In the morning one chiefe man makes an Oration to them lying in his Net, which continueth the space of an houre, about labouring as their forefathers did, with the substance and circumstances thereof. When he is vp, he continueth his preaching, running through the Towne. This custome they borrowed of a bird which singeth euery morning, by them called the King and Lord of birds. When a man speakes with a woman, he turnes his backe to her. They shauel their haire with a halfe-Moone before, which they say they learned of S. Thomas. Being angry, they let their haire grow: women, when they mourne, or when their husbands goe a farre iourney, cut their haire. They goe naked: and when any weare apparell it is for fashion on rather then honestie, as on the head, or no further then the nauell. Some houses haue fiftie, threescore, or threescore and tenne roomes, and some are without partition: ordinarily in one house they are of a kindred, and one is principall.

k Their strong

Fests.

Orations.

In childe-birth, the father or some other (whom they take for their Gossip) takes it vp, and cuts the Nauell-string with his teeth, or two stones, and fasts till it falls off, and then makes drinkings. The women presently after tranell wash themselues in their riuers: giue sucke a yeare and halfe, without any other thing to eate; carrying the childe on her backe in a net to the place of her labour: they rocke them on the palmes of their handes. They neuer strike their wiues except in times of drinking, and sometimes will be willing to take this opportunitie. Their children play without scurrilitie or quarrells, imitating the voyces of birds and the like. They will spare a captiue that is a good finger.

Child-birth.

When one dieth, they of that kindred cast themselues vpon him in the Net, sometimes choking him before he be dead: and those which cannot cast themselues on the bed, fall on the ground, with such knockes, that is seemeth strange, they die not also for companie: and sometimes they proue so feeble that they die likewise. If the partie die in the euening, they weepe all night with a high voice, calling their neighbors and kindred to society of their griefe. If it be one of the principall, all the Towne meetes to mourne together, and they curse with plagues those which lament not, prophesying that they shall not be mourned for. They wash and paint the dead curiously, and then cover him over with Corten-yarne, and put him in a great vessell vnder the earth, that no earth may come to him, & covering this vessell with earth, make him a house, where euery day they carrie him meate. For when he is wearied with dauncing, say they, hee comes thither to eate. Thus for a certaine time they goe to bewaile him euery day. With him they burie all his jewells; if any had giuen him a sword or other thing, now he challengeth his gift againe. The mourners eate not but by night. This mourning lasteth a Moone, after which they make drinkings: but many after this will forbear them.

They rule themselues by the Sunne, and goe two or three hundred leagues thorow the woods: no horse will holde out with them: they feare no Sea, being able to continue a night and a day swimming. When they returne from victorie, their women receiue them with shouts and buffering themselues on the mouth. The Keeper appointed to the Captiue, is one giuen him to be as his wife for bedde and boord. Some of these are so resolute, that they will not be ransomed, saying it is a wretched thing to die and to stinke and be eaten of wormes. Sometimes their Keeper will runne away with them.

Gentilitie.

When they kill a Captiue at their feasts, if he fall on his backe it is an ominous signe that the killer shall die, which presages they obserue in other circumstances. The taker hath a new name, as a title of dignitie added to him, & must be content to fill his fancie with this new Gentilitie, for nothing is left him to fill his bellie, euery one taking from him that which he hath. He stands all that day on certaine logges of the tree Pilan, with strange silence: he is presented with the head of the dead, the eyes pulled out, his pulses annoiued with the strings and sinewes, and cutting off the mouth whole, they put it in manner of a Bracelet about his arme. Thus lieth he downe in his Net, fearing if all Rites be not accomplished, that the soule of the dead will kill him. Within few dayes after they giue him the habite, racing his skinne with the tooth of a Cutia, in forme of some worke, putting thereon Cole and iuyce of Broome-rape, he lying still certaine dayes in silence, hauing water, meale, and fruits set neere him. After this, they make a great feast, and then may he lay aside his mourning, and cut his haire; & thenceforwards may kill any without any painfull ceremonie. Abastes, Marnixaba, Mogacara, are names of Gentilitie amongst them.

The Friers haue obtained some good liking with the Brasilians, for teaching their children to write, reade, and cipher: the Iesuites will be of esteeme euery where: yet two and fiftie of them sayling from Lisbon to Brasil Ann. 1570. by Frenchmen at Sea were taken and slaine.

In<sup>k</sup> marriages they abstaine (saith Leriu) onely from mother, sister, and daughter: they obserue no marriage-ceremonies, but vpon consent of her friends and her owne, take her home. It is a credite to haue many wiues, amongst whom is no Leab to ennie Rachels greater portion of loue: the husband may kill the Adulteresse; but for their vnmarried maydens they are not scrupulous. Our Author hearing a woman crie in the night, thought she had beene in some danger of deuouring by a wilde beast, but found her husband playing the homely Midwife to her in her trauel, biting the navel-string, and presing downe the nose. The father washeth and painteth him. They vse to put to their male infants little bowes and arrowes into one end of the bedde, and hearbes at the other, which are the enemies. His sonne must be supposed to kill, and eate; chatting out their hope of the childe valour, in being auenged when hee shall bee a man, vpon his enemies. They name their children at aduenture, by the name of a Beast, Bird, or otherwise, as this childe was called Orapaeon, that is, Bow and Arrows. The men are modest, in accompanying with their wiues secretly. The women haue not the ordinarie feminine sickenesse. Leriu thinkes, that humour was diuerred in their youth, seeing the mothers cut their daughters side down to the thigh, at twelue yeares of age. But twice while hee was there, did he see any in priuate brawling, or contention: if such happens, as they beganne, so they are suffered to end it: if any hurt

or kill other, he sustaineth the like in his own person, inflicted by the kinred of the partie wronged. They haue their proper peeces of ground, which they husband with their roots and Mais. When they entertaine a stranger, the Moussacat, or good-man, seemes to neglect him a while, and the guest sits him down silent on the bed, the women sit by on the ground, and holde their handes before their eyes, weeping, with many prayes, that he is a good man, a valiant man, that (if he be a Christian) he hath brought them fine wares. The stranger must endeavour, in some measure, to imitate the like weeping gesture. The Moussacat is all this while whittling his arrow, not seeming to see his new guest, till anon he comes. And are you come, saith he? How doe you? with many termes of his best Rhetoricke: and then askes, if he be hungrie; and if he be, sets his cheare before him on the ground: which kindnesse is repayed with glasse, combs, or the like. They are very kinde, both to their owne, and to such strangers as they are enleagued with. They would carrie burthen, or man, for the space of some miles, when they needed: their loue and hatred are in like extreames; the one to their owne, the other to their enemies. They haue Physicians called Pages. They vse much mourning at the death of any, and making a round pit, burie him vpriight therein, six houres after his death, with that wealth they had. In their villages liue some six hundred persons: they remoue their villages often, which yet carrie the same name. Stadim m saith, there are few villages of aboue seuen houses, but those houses are a hundred and fiftie foote long, and two fathoms high, without diuision into pluralitie of roomes; and therein liue many families, all of one kinred.

Of the Riuer of Plate, and the Countries adioyning: and of the Magellane Straits:

THis Riuer we haue already mentioned; the Indians call it Parana: <sup>a</sup> Botero. and Iohn Dias di Solis discovering the same in the yeare 1512. for some shew it seemed to haue of that Mettall, called it the Riuer of Plata, or Siluer. It is fortie leagues wide in the entrance, and preuayleth so farre against the Oceans saltnesse, that the taste of the fresh water sooner discouers his waters, then the eye can see his banks. It ouerfloweth the Countrey; as Nilus in Egypt, and Orenoque, Maramon, with the other great Riuers in America. It ebbeth and floweth a hundred miles vp the streame. <sup>b</sup> Dias, whom some call the first Discouerer, was, with fiftie of his companions, there flaine and eaten. But he which hath most fully discovered the Nations that dwell neere this Riuer, is Huldericus Schmidel, who sayled thither in the yeare 1534. and continued in those parts almost twentie yeares. He sayled thither with Peter Mendoza, who carried with him fiftie and twentie hundred men, to discouer, conquer, and inhabite those Regions.

They built the Citie Buenas aeres, so called of the wholsom aire, neere to an Indian towne, named Carendies of three thousand Inhabitants; if that may be called a town, whose inhabitants stay not long in one place. They will drinke the blood of the beasts they kill, for thirst. The Spaniards destroyed them, whose parts famine seemed to take against that cruell people, which with inuisible darts so pierced their entrailes, that vile and venomous creatures were applied to the curing of their wounded stomackes: and when such medicines failed, three of them stole a horse, <sup>d</sup> minding to flee from famine on that dead beast, but were therefore horsed on a Gibbet; where three others, that by this example were terrified from Horse-flesh, aduentured vpon these carcasses, cutting thence large gobbets, to pay that cruell tyrant, and greediest exactor, hunger, his tribute. Another, whose brother died, buried him in his owne bodie: halfe their companie were consumed with this plague.

c Admiranda Nauig. H. S.
d Herera tells of one of that name taken out of his bed by a Tygre, and deuoured in a Caue.
e These horses so multiplied in these parts, that now they are dispersed in wild troops, and they will hunt and kill them for the hides, and (which is a great commodity in Angola) for the tails.

The Indians of Carendies, Bartennis, Zeechuruas, and Tiembus, taking this advantage, assailed their Towne of Good Aires, turning it into good fires, by shooting Arrows, fired at the end, thereinto. They after passed vp the Riuer, and came to Tiembus, where the men are tall and great, their women alway deformed, with scratched and bloudie faces. The Tiembus could make fise thousand men. Of the Spaniards were not left fise hundred in a small time; and Mendoza dieth, returning homewards. The Curenda, the next people, are like the Tiembus. The Macuerendas liue onely on Fish, and a little Flesh. There they killed a Serpent fise and twentie foote long, and as bigge as a man. The Saluaisco goe starke naked, and liue onely on Fish, Flesh, and Honey. The Curemagbas are of huge stature: the men bore a hole in their nose, in which they weare a Parrots feather. The women paint their faces with indeleble lines. The Carios Countrie is large, neere to the Brasilians in Rites and Site. They goe naked: they will sell; the father, his daughter; the husband, his wife; the brother, his sister. The price of a woman is a hatchet, knife, or such like. They eat such as they take in their warres, and then deuoure them with great solemnitie. The Lampere made neere vnto their Towne, Pits, with sharpe stakes set vp in them, couered with stickes and earth: these they made for the Spaniards, but in a confused flight fell therein themselves. Here the Spaniards built the Towne of Assumption, which Herera saith, hath soure hundred Spanish households, and three thousand Mestizas. The King of the Scherves, attended with twelue thousand men, met the Spaniards, and gaue them friendly entertainment, with dauncing, musicke, and feasting. The women goe naked, and paint themselves as artificially as any of our Painters could do: they weare Carpets of Cotton, with the figures of Indian beasts.

The King asked the Spaniards, What they sought? who answered, Siluer and Gold. He then gaue them a siluer crowne, which he said he had taken in the warres, which he had waged with the Amazones, that dwelt two months iourney thence. Of these Amazones the Indians tolde the same things that Orellana tolde of, neere that Riuer, which hath receiued name of this supposition.

The Spaniards, with some of the Scherues for their guides, set forth for this Amazonian discouerie, but were encountred by the way with hote waters, in which they waded vp to the waiste, and so continued diuers daies, till they came to a Nation called Orishusen, who were then infected with a Pestilence, caused by famine; which famine the Grasshoppers had effected, two years together eating vp all the fruits which nature or husbandrie had provided for their sustentance.

Thus these Martiall and Venerable waies of the Spaniards, wanted food to holde out further toward the Amazons, if there were any such people, and that they were not, as before I said, the warre-like wiues, or happily some gallant Viragoes, that by themselves would let the world see what women could doe: but yet I cannot subscribe to the rest of their storie.

But I am wearie of leading you any further in this discouerie of this great Riuer and the neere inhabitants, seeing little is obserued in our Author of their Religions. Some of these barbarous Nations, he saith, hanged vp the hairie skin of their slaine enemies in their Temples or Houses of deuotion: this people is called Ieperi. To giue you a Catalogue of the names of the Indian Nations that inhabited these parts, would be but tedious. These iournies of the Spaniards were to see what gold, and not what Gods, the Indians had. They passed vp through the land into Peru.

Betweene Peru and these more Easterly parts, are the Hills Andi, or Andes, which lift vp their snowie tops vnto the clouds, and reach vnto the Magellane straits. In them inhabite many fierce Nations, bordering vpon the Nations of Brasil and Plata. The Ciraguans, the Viracans, the Toui, the Varai. These last exercise their children vnto Armes betimes, vnto them they commit their Captiues, for triall of their bloody forwardnesse; and he which at one blow can kill a Captiue, is of the greatest hopes, and rewarded for his encouragement. To this end they name their children Tygre, Lion, that their names might teach them the like beastly furie. At the new and full Moone they wound themselves with sharpe bones, to inure themselves to things of warre. They weepe in the entertainment of a friend, as the Brasilians do. In 17. degrees stands

the Spanish Citie of Holy Crosse of the Mountaine. The Riuer Vapai in those Valleys riseth and falleth, as Nilus doth. There is a Brooke at Holy Crosse of a wonderfull nature: it is but little aboue two yardes broad, and shallow withal, not running aboue a league, but it drunke vp of the thirsty sands. Yet doth this Brooke prouide the City water, and three sorts of good Fish, and that in great plenty from the end of February to the end of May. At other times there are few. They vse diuers meanes of shauing their heads, which, they say, they learned of one Paicume. In the womens lying in, the man keepes his bed, as is said of the Brasilians.

More towards the East dwell the Itatini people, which call themselves Garay, that is, Warriours; and others, Tapuis or Slaves. The language of the Varai is common to all these Nations with the Brasilians, that as in the other world, Latin, Slavon, and Arabike, so in that New World the Varay, Cuscan, and Mexican language, will generally serue a mans turne.

The Kingdome of Tucuma stretcheth two hundred leagues betweene Chili, Brasil, Holy Crosse, and Paraguay. The Spaniards haue therein fise Colonies. It is a plaine country. The Paraguay inhabit along the Riuer, so called, whereof they take name. From Plata South-wards is the great Region of Chica, washed on the South, East, and West by the Sea. The inhabitants are called Paragones.

The Spaniards <sup>f</sup> which with Magellane first discovered the Straits, saw Gyants on this coast, of which he carried away one with him to Sea, where after for want of sufficient food he died.

Edward's Cliffe, that wrote Master Winters Voyage, (who first, of all others, returned out of the Straits by the same way homewards) because hee saw on this Coast men of common stature, excepteth against that report of Giants, as a Gian-like report, exceeding the stature and measure of Truth. But besides that some of our owne at another time measured the print of mens feete eightene ynches in the Sands, Oliner i Noort in his World-Compassing Voyage, had three of his men slaine by men of admirable stature, with long haire, not farre from Port Desire, about seuen and forty degrees of Southerly latitude, and after, in the Magellane Straits discomfited a band of Savages, which neither would yeeld, nor flee from their wiues and children, which were in a Cate iust by, till euery man was slaine. Foure boyes the Hollanders carried away: one of which, learning their Language, told them of three Families, or Tribes, in those parts of ordinary stature, and of a fourth which were Giants, ten or eleuen foot high, which warred vpon the former.

Sebalt de Weert being detayned fise moneths in the Straits by foule weather, sent his men to fish for their prouision (which exceedingly failed them) who there were suddenly assailed by seuen Cannas of Giants, which they guessed to be so high as is mentioned: who being put to flight by their Peeces, fled to land, and plucked vp Trees, in their rude manner barricadoing and fortifying themselves against the further pursuit of the Hollanders, who were no lesse glad that they were rid of such company.

These men, both Giants and others, went either wholly naked, or so clothed, as they seemed not to dread the cold, which is yet there so violent, that besides the Mountaintops, alway covered with Snow, their very Summers, in the middest thereof, freeeth them not from Ice. Yea, at that time of the yeere those Hollanders encountered an Island of Ice in the Sea, which the cold Ayre had there mounted and maintained in despite of Neptunes rage, or the Sunnes volley of shot, in his neereft approach. The Trees in these parts, and the men (it seemeth) are naturally fortified against those Colds; the one (as is said) alwaies in manner naked; the other alwaies clothed, out-brauing the Winters violence in their Summer-like Greene Liurey, seeming to stoupe vnder the burthen of continuall Frosts and Snowes, and in a natural wisdom cloth themselves, and hold their leaues the furer.

Those Giantly men <sup>k</sup> about Port Desire; when they die, are brought to the Cliffes, and there buried, with their Bowes, Arrowes, Darts, and all their (almost no) substance. Master Kniues writeth that hee saw footings at Port Desire as bigge as foure of oures: and two men newly buried, one of which was foureene spans long. Hee also saw one Brasil, taken by Alonso Dias a Spaniard, being by foule weather driven out of Saint Julians, which was a yong man and yet about thirteene spans high. They goe naked and are faire and well proportioned. At Port famin in the straights, He sayth, they saw some dwarfish Sauages, not about five or sixe spannes high, which were thicke and strong, with wide mouths (almost to the eares) they ate their meate a little scorched, besmearing their faces and breastes with the blood running out of their mouthes: they lay yong feathers to this blood, which glues them to their bodies. Foure or five thousand traded with them at the Poles end. The cold is so extreme that Henrie Barranell became bald therewith, so continuing a yeare or two. One Harris a Goldsmith blowing his frozen nose, cast it with his fingers into the fire: and our Authour himselfe going on shore, and returning wet on his feet, the next morning pulled off his toes together with his stockins from his benumbed feete, which were as blacke as soot without feeling, and were after cured with words or charmes. Euery day some died of cold. They saw there a kinde of beast bigger then a Horse, with eares about a spanne long, and a taile like a Cow, called Tapetyweson: hee saw the like in Manicongo. The Sauages about the Straits feed (as both the same Author and the Hollanders report) on raw Flesh and other filthie food, and are Man-eaters.

It is no small credit to our Nation and Nauigation, that these Straits haue more enlarged themselves, and giuen oftner and freer passage to vs then to any other. Drake a See Hak. 20. 3. a swamme through; Winter both passed and returned; and so did Carder in the Pinnesse as before is said, Candish passed, but returned (as Drake had done) about the World in his Circuit. The Delight of Bristol entred them; and with small delight spent six weeks in them: and Captaine Danies, companion of Master Candish in his last Voyage, three times entred the South Sea, which three times forced him backe into the Embracing Armes of the vntruffie Straits. Some others haue attempted, but not attained them, as Fenton and Ward, and the Voyage set forth in the yeare of our Lord a thousand five hundred eightie six by the Earle of Cumberland. The Land on Larbord side (saith Sir R. Hawkins) is without doubt Ilands, low, sandie, broken: on Starbord is very mountainous, the lower Mountaines whereof, although they bee for their height wonderfull, yet (as we haue said of the differing statures of the men) they haue more Giantly over-lookers, with Snowie lockes and Cloudie lookes; betweene them may bee numbred three Regions of Cloudes. These Straits are foure score and tenne<sup>b</sup> Leagues through, of vaequal breadth, in the narrowest place a league ouer. The mouth is in two and 50. degrees, and  $\frac{1}{2}$ . or as Sir R. Hawkins obserued<sup>c</sup> in 52. 50. His companie killed a thousand Penguins a day: this is a foule like a Goose hauing no feathers on their bodies but Downe: it cannot flie, but wil run as fast as most men, feeds on fish and grasse, and harbors in berries. Seales are many in these parts, which will fall dead with a blow on the snout (some as firme the same of the Crocodile) otherwise not easily perced with a sword, or searing a Musket-shot. He sayth they are like Lyons, that they sleepe on Land and haue euer one to watch: which is also reported of the Morfe. He addeth of the Canoes of the Sauages there, that they are made artificially of rindes of trees sowed together with finnes of Whales, sharp at both ends and turning vp.

When these Straits were first discovered, they named them the Strait of Victorie, because the Ship called the victorie first descried them; (a name fitly ascribed both to the Straits and Ship, the one first obtaining the marine victorie and encompassing the compass of the earth, the other still remaining the only knowne passage, whereby that Sea-victorie can be atchieued. But the name soone passed from the Ship to the Generall, of whom still it is called the Strait of Magaglianes, or Magellan.

The Voyage of Sir Francis so vexed the Spaniard<sup>d</sup>, that hee sent Pedro Sarmiento to inhabit there, that hee might prohibite other Nations to passe that way: but Tempest and Famine hating the Spanish insolence, whose ambitious designes alway aimed at a Plus ultra, brought them to a Plus ultra indeed, further then euer they had designed; diuerse of the Ships (which at first were three and twentie, with three thousand five hundred men) perishing in the deuouring iawes of the Ocean, and others in their selfe-deuouring Mawes of Hunger, which eat them vp with not eating. The Name of Iesus, and Philips Citie, were their two newly erected Colonies, peopled with foure hundred men and thirtie women, which by Famine were brought to three and twentie persons, when when Master Candish tooke Hernando one of that companie, in his prosperous Voyage; another P, who had maintained himselfe by his Peece, and liued in a house alone a long time, was taken, by the Delight of Bristol, two yeares after. The English gaue a name fitting to this distressed Citie, calling it Port Famine. p W. Magalbs

The last Voyage of Master Candish proued vnfortunate both in the losse of himselfe, and many men: the blacke Pinnace was lost in the South Sea: the Desire returned, but lost diuerse of her men, surprised (as was q thought) and deuoured by the Sauages, neere to Port Desire. The Sauages here presented themselves, throwing dust in the Ayre, leaping &c. and eyther had Viziards on their faces, like Dogges faces, or else their faces were Dogges faces indeede. q Iohn Iane.

I haue scene a Coppie of a discourse written by Master Candish himselfe to Sir Tri- stram Gorges, whom he made sole executor of his last will: where in hee thus affirmeth; the running away of the Villaine Danis was the death of mee and decay of the whole action, and his only trecherie in running from mee, the utter ruine of all. He complaines also of mutinies, and that by South West, and West South West windes, hee was driuen from shore foure hundred leagues, and from fiftie to fortie degrees, that he was taken with winter and stormes in the straits, and such frosts and snowes in May as he neuer saw the like, so that in seuen or eight daies fortie dyed and seuentie sickned, Danis in the Desire and his Pinnesse left him in fortie seuen. The Ro-bucke kept with him to thirtie fixe. Captaine Barker transgressing his directions, was slaine with fife and twentie men on Land, and the Boat lost, and soone after twentie fife others followed the like fortunes: ten others by the cowardise of the master in the Ro-bucke forsaken at Spirito Sancto, which stole away with fixe monethes victuals for a hundred and twentie persons, they being but fortie fixe. At Sebastians hapned another mutinie by treacherie of an Irish man, (here Master Kninet and other sicke persons were set on shore.) Intending againe for the Straits, he beat and was beaten vp and downe the frowning Seas, and came within two leagues of Saint Elena, but could not attaine it; and professeth hee had rather haue put himselfe on an Iland, if he could haue found one which the Charts place in eight degrees, then returne: and now was scarce able to hold a pen when he wrote this. He died homewards. Since that Sir Richard Hawkins since that passed the Straits into the South Sea, of which his Voyage I haue read a long discourse written by himselfe. He fell into the hands of the Spaniards which tooke him in the South Sea. Ap. Hak.

CHAP. VII.

Of Terra Australis and Chili.

S for the Land on the Southerne side of the Straits, it is called the Land of Fire, eyther because the Discoverers saw fire thereabouts, or because that cold Climate so much needeth fire. More Easterly against the Cape of Good Hope, is the Land Terra di Vista. This Land about the Straits is not perfectly discovered, whether it be Continent, or Ilands. Some take it for Continent, and extend it more in their Imagination then any mans experience, towards those Ilands of Salomon and New Guinne, esteeming (of which there is great probabilitie) that Terra Australis, or the Southerne Continent, may, for the largenes thereof, take vp a fifth place in order, and the first in greatnesse, in the Diuision and parting of the whole World. Boters.

Master Brerewood our learned Countreman, (as is before obserued) perswadeth himselfe that it is as large as the Easterne Continent, which containeth Europe, Africa, and Asia altogether. His reasons are, that touching latitude it is knowne to approach neere, if not on this side) the Aequator; and touching Longitude to runne a long in a continuall circuit about the Earth, fronting both the other continents. Another reason, which he deemeth of more certaine importance, is this; that the Land to the North side of the Line in the other Continents of the Olde and New Word, is at least foure times as large Enquiries of lang. and re-

as that part of them which lieth to the South. Now forasmuch as the face of the Sea is leuell (so hee argueth) being therefore called Aequor & Aqua; and secondly, the earth being equally poised on both sides of her owne Center; and thirdly this Center being but one to the water, and the earth, even no other then the Center of the world: it followeth therevpon that the earth should in answerable measure and proportion lift it selfe and appeare about the face of the Sea on the South side of the line, as it doth on the North. And consequently, that what is wanting in the South partes of the other Continents towards the counteruailing of the North parts (which is about three fife parts of both the other Continents laied together) must of necessitie be supplied in this Continent of the South.

Lopez Vaz writeth, That the Gouvernours which the King of Spaine sendeth for Peru and New Spaine, haue a custome to discover New Countries. The Licentiate Castro being Gouvernour of Peru, sent forth a Fleet from Lima; which sayling eight hundred Leagues Westward, found certaine Ilands in eleuen degrees to the South of the Equinoctiall, with a kinde of people of yellowish complexion, and all naked. Here they found Hogges, Dogges, Hennes, Cloues, Ginger, Cinnamon, and some Golde. The first Iland they named Isabella, the greatest Guadalcanal, on the Coast whereof they sayled a hundred and fiftie Leagues, where they tooke a Towne, and some graines of Golde hanged vp in the houses. They burnt their Towne, because they had in a suddaine surpris killed fourteene of their men. They spent fourteene monethes in this Discoverie, and named them the Ilands of Salomon, that by that name, men might be further induced to discover and inhabit them, imagining, that Salomon had his Gold from thence.

Nova Guinea was discovered by Villalobos, sent from New Spain in the yeare 1543 going to discover the Moluccas. Herera sayth it was discovered by Aluaro of Saane-dra Anno a thousand five hundred twenty seven: and the Ilands of Salomon in the yeare a thousand five hundred sixtie seven by Lope Garcia of Castro, which are many and great, but eightene principall; some of them three hundred Leagues in compasse. 2. of 200. others of 100. and of fiftie and lesse: the Inhabitants, some blacke, some white, some browne: the greatest, named Saint Isabel 150. leagues in length, and eightene in breadth: Saint Nicholas a hundred leagues in compasse. The Inhabitants are blacke of hue and wittie. The Spaniards haue coasted it seven hundred leagues, and yet cannot tel whether it be an Ile or Continent.

Hesselius Gerardus hath largely set forth the Petition or Memoriall of Peter Fernandez de Quir, vnto the King of Spaine, about his Discoverie of those Southerne vnkowne Ilands, for the Plantation of the same. I haue since seene this his Supplication to the King in Spanish, with other memorialls thereof, wherein hee sayth that hee was sent with two ships to discover the Ilands of Salomon, and taking his course about the height of the Magellan straits, discovered a maine Land, and sailed eight hundred Leagues on the Coast, til he came in 15. degrees Southward from the Line, where hee found a fruitfull Countrie. He discovered a bay, into which fall two great Riuer, where they purpose to settle a Plantation. Order was taken that he should presently bee sent from Peru with commission to take vp twelue hundred men, with shipping and other necessities and as many the yeare after out of New Spaine. Hee found out three and twentie Ilands, two hundred and thirtie Leagues from Mexico; Taumaco, Chicayma (where are great Oysters with Pearles) Guaytopo (the people whereof are as white as the Spaniards) Tucupio, Fonofono, &c. They pray to the Deuill, which hath conference with an Indian vnscene, from a peece of wood; and to him and all the rest many times by night, he toucheth the face and breast with cold touches, but they could neuer learne what he was, He foretold of the Spaniards comming.

This Pedro Fernandez de Quir fourteene yeares busied himselfe to no small endamage of his State and Person about this Discoverie. The length thereof hee equallith vnto all Europe, and as much of Asia, as thence extendeth to the Caspian Sea: and for the wealth and riches hee calls it a Terrestriall Paradise. The inhabitants, hee affirmeth are innumerable, some white, some like the Mulatos and some otherwise, in colour colour and habite of bodie diuerfified. They neither haue King nor Lawes, nor Arts. They are diuided and warre one vpon another, with Bowes, Arrowes, and other weapons, all of Wood. They haue their Oratories and places of Buriall. Their bread is made of three sorts of rootes. They haue varietie of fruites, Cocos, Almons of foure sorts, Pome-citrons, Apples, Dates: there are also Swine, Goats, Hennes Partriches, and other Fowles; and as the Indians report Kine, and Buffals. Hee saw amongst them Siluer and pearles, others added Gold: and the Coast Countries seemed to promise great wealth within Land: Many Riuer: Sugar Canes, Bayes, Hauens, and other commodities of Lands and Seas, making shew of another China, the Aire very holtsome and temperate.

He tooke possession thereof in the name of the King, and set vp a Crosse and a Chappell, in the name of the Ladie of Loretto. These Regions trend euen as high as the Equinoctiall. When this discoverie was made he mentioneth not; only hee sueth to the King for employment therein, It is rightly called Terra Australis Incognita, and therefore I will not take vpon me to be your guide: in another sense one of our Countreymen hath wittily and learnedly (according to his wont) described this Contrie, and paralleled therewith the Countries of Europe, and hath let vs see that wee are acquainted in those Coasts too much, and need no Pilot or guide to conduct vs.

a Mercurius Britannicus.

But let vs come backe to our Straits of Magellan, that wee may coast from thence and visit the Countries of Chili and Peru: for of the Westerne borders of Chica girt in betwene the salt waves and cold Hills, little can be said fitting our purpose.

Hauiing sayled out of the Straits, wee haue a wide Sea before vs, and on our right hand the Countreie is so barren and cold, that I would not hold the Reader in any colde or tedious Narration thereof. John Ellis which was with Sir Richard Hawkins in his South-Sea Voyage, reporteth; that being past the Straits, they sayled North-West and by North fortie leagues into the Sea, and then due North till they came at Mocha in 38. 3 d. and thence held their course Northerly to Saint Maries in thirtie six and so to Val Parefa in thirtie three. Where they made good purchase and prize, if they could haue kept it. From hence they came as farre as Arecca in two and twentie and so passed the line to Tacame where they were taken. But our trauel must be by Land (as was theirs after against their wil) where we first encounter with Chili. This name<sup>b</sup> some extend euen to the Straits, where we haue placed Chica & the Patagones, others straiten it in shorter bounds; betwene Chica on the South; Charchas and Collao, on the North; Plata, on the East; and the Sea on the West: it is called Chili of the chilling cold, for so the word is said to signifie. The Hills with their high lookes, cold blasts, and couetous encroachings, drue it almost into the Sea: only a narrow valley vpon lowly submission to her swelling aduersaries, obtaineth room<sup>d</sup> for fise and twenty leagues of breath (where it is most to extend her spacious length of two hundred Leagues on that shore; and to withstand the Oceans furie, shee paies a large Tribute of many streames, which yet in the<sup>e</sup> night time shee can hardly performe; the miserable Hills in their Frozen charitie, not imparting that naturall bountie and dutie till that great Arbitrer the Sunne ariseth, and sendeth day with his light-horse-troupe of Sunne-beames, to breake vp those Icie Dungeons and Snowie Turrets, wherein Night, the Mountaines Gaoler, had locked the innocent Waters. Once, the poore Valley is so hampered betwixt the Tyrannicall Meteors and Elements, as that shee oftens quaketh with feare, and in these chill Feuers shaketh off and looseth her best ornaments.

And sometimes the neighbour hills are infected with this pestilent Feuer, and tumble downe as dead in the plaine, thereby so amazing the fearefull Riuer, that they runne quite out of their Channels to seeke new, or else stand still with wonder; and the motiue heat failing, fall into an vncouth tympanic, their bellies swelling into spacious and standing Lakes: the tides seeing this, hold backe their course, and dare not approach their sometime-beloued streames by diuers miles distance, so that betwixt these two stooles the ship came to ground indeed. The sicke earth thus hauiing her mouth stopped, and her stomacke ouer-laid, forceth new mouths whence she vomiteth streames of oppressing waters.

I speake

I speake not of the beastes and men which in these Ciuill warres of Nature must needes bee subiect to deuouring miserie. These are the strange effects of colde and Earth-quakes, not strange in Chili, where wee are now arriued. The people are fierce and cruell, and some (as is reported) Gyants. Almagro one of the first Conquerours of Peru in hope of Gold, passed from thence hither: but was deceived by the Indians which led him the wrong way. In passing the Deserts of Chili, the Aire is so piercing as before is obserued) <sup>a</sup> that men fall downe dead, or else looke their members suddenly, in manner without feeling. Ierome Costilla the Generall, one of Acosia's acquaintance had lost three or foure Toes which fell off without any paine: many of his Armie dyed, whose bodies at his returne hee found lying there without stinke or corruption, and one Boy remained aliue which had maintained himselfe by eating horse-flesh.

The Horses also were found whole as Apollonius <sup>b</sup> writeth, and the men sitting on them, as if they had beene aliue, with the Bridles in their hand. In fixe and thirtie degrees in that famous valley of Arauco, which defend their persons and freedome, maugre all the force and furie of the Spaniards. <sup>c</sup> These killed two of Sir Francis Drakes men, and wounded himselfe: they destroyed also three and twentie Hollanders of the companie of Cordes: both which they did in detestation of the <sup>d</sup> Spaniards, of whom they esteemed the English and Dutch, because of their apparell, They haue destroyed many of the Spaniards: they took the Citie Baldiua in the yeare one thousand five hundred-ninetie nine, and slew the Spaniards. Twice before, if not oftner, they had burnt and spoiled it. Yea Baldiua himselfe the first Conquerour of Chili, (for Almagro stayed not) and of whom that Citie receiued name, was taken by these Indians, his Horse being slaine vnder him. They bid him feare nothing, he should haue Gold enough: and making a great banquet for him, brought in the last seruice, which was a Cup full of molten Gold, which they forced him to drinke, saying; Now glut thy selfe with Golde. This Baldiua had entred Chili with foure hundred Horses, and easily conquered that part which had beene subiect to the Kings of Peru: but the other which was the richer part held out. The Spaniards sent them word they were the sonnes of God, and came to teach them the word of God: and if they would not yeeld to them, they would shoot fire among them. The Indians would trie this argument in the field, and there the great Ordnance so well pleaded the cause, that they beleued and subiected themselves. The Spaniards employed them in the Mines, whence they gathered such plentie of Gold that others had twentie thousand, but Baldiua himselfe had three hundred thousand Pezos by the yeare.

The Indians after, perceiuing the Spaniards to bee but mortall men, rebelled: and whereas they had vsed to carrie grasse into the Fort for the Spaniards Horses, they conueied, in the same, weapons, by which meanes, being assisted of their fellowes without, they wonne the Fort, and when Baldiua would haue recovered it, hee lost himselfe as you haue heard.

Euer since, this hostilitie had continued, and the Araucans are the lifts and barres to the Spanish Conquests. Their Countie, (to consider Arauco by it selfe) is but smal, about twentie leagues in length: neyther could the Ingas or Kings of Peru conquer it: their manner of warre is much like the Christians, in pitched battels placing their Bow-men among their ranks of Pike-men. To speake of other Townes which the Spaniards haue built in this Coast, is not our purpose: when they sacked Baldiua a thousand five hundred-ninetie nine, they feasted the Spaniards with the like golden Cuppes powred hot downe their throats: they <sup>f</sup> cut of the Images heades, triumphing over the Spaniards Gods, as they termed them. They were then at the siege of Imperiall, another Spanish Citie, hauing before taken Baldiua. They pulcke out the heartes of the Spaniards which they kill, and drinke in their sculs.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Conquest of Peru by the Spaniards, and of their Ingas or Emperours,

PRancis Pizarro* <sup>a</sup> was the Bastard Sonne of Gonçallo, a Capitaine in the Kingdome of Navarre: he was borne at Trufiglio, and exposed at the Church doore, and none being found that would giue him the breast, hee was nourished by sucking a Sow for certaine daies: at last his Father acknowledged him, and when hee was growne, set him to keepe his Swine, which being one day strayed and lost, hee durst not returne home for feare, and therefore went to Siuill, and thence passed to the Indies. In this swinish education hee had not so much as learned to reade. Hee went to Vraua with Alonso de Hoieda; with Valnoa, to the Discouery of the South Sea; and with Pedrarins de Anila, Gouvernour of Golden Castle, to Panama. In this City <sup>b</sup> were diuers which affected Golden Discoueries. Pedrarins intended Nicaragua; but Diego di Almagro, Hernando Luque, or Luques, a rich Priest, and this Pizarro now growne rich, agreed to ioyne their purses and best industry to search South-wards, where they had heard was store of wealth. They provided a Nauie and two hundred and twenty Souldiers, and Almagro with Pizarro, in the yeere 1525, or (as Benzo hath it) 1526. set forward.

Almagro and he parting company, Pizarro, offering to land his men, was wounded and forced to retire to Panama: Almagro in an other place had better successe, the Indians vsing him kindly, and giuing him three thousand Ducats of Gold. But seeking to land in that place of Pizarro's misfortune, hee was set vpon by the Indians, and lost in fight one of his eies. They met at Panama, and hauing cured their wounds, repaire their forces, and with two hundred men and many slaues, set sayle, and land in another place, but are repelled to their ships by the Inhabitants, and goe to Gorgon, a little Iland, six miles from the Continent, where Pizarro stayed, while Almagro went backe for better supply. At his returne Pizarro and his Company were almost starued, but being refreshed, and all of them now together attempting the Indian shore, were repelled with losse to the Ile, which they called Galli. Almagro is againe sent backe for new aid, the Souldiers would haue passed with him, and cursed this Land and their couetousnesse. Pizarro and his company agree to search further, and hauing sayled fise hundred miles, came to Chira, a Prouince of Peru, and taking some of the Inhabitants to learne them the Spanish tongue, returned to Tumbez.

Hauing learned of the Indians the great wealth of those parts, he set one Peter a Candian, on shore, who was kindly entertayned of the Gouvernour, who shewed him a Temple dedicated to the Sun, wherein were vnspeakeable riches, which when he related to Pizarro at his returne, the Spaniards goe backe with these newes to Panama. His two fellows, Almagro, and the Priest (called after, the foole, because he had spent his estate on this businesse, and was after excluded by his companions) agreed with Pizarro to go to Spaine to get licence for this conquest, and borrowed one thousand and fise hundred Ducats, to set him forth. Pizarro seekes and obtaines this Faculty only for himselfe, neuer mentioning his Partners, and with letters Pattents returneth to Panama with his soure Brethren, Hernando, Gonzalo, John, and Martin di Alcantara, his brother by the mothers side. His two Partners were not a little grieved when they heard how things passed, but after much stirre, Almagro and Pizarro became friends and agreed to communicate Purfes and Titles. Pizarro goes before with a hundred and fity Souldiers (taking order that Almagro should follow with al the strength he could make) and lands in Peru*, a River so called, which gaue name to those mighty and rich Prouinces, because the Spaniards by this way Discouered them. They went by land, enduring much miserie by the way to Coache where they were well refreshed. But a disease worse then the French Pox there warred vpon them, called Peri. Yet did Pizarro hold on his resolution; he passed ouer to Puna, where the Gouvernour intreated the Spaniards well, till the abusing of their Wiues caused the Indians to take armes, and so made their riches become a prey to the preuailing Spaniards.

There had Pizarro the first intelligence of Atabaliba. The Gouvernour of this Iland, to satisfie his ieaousie, cut off the noses, the members, and the armes, of his Eunuchs or Keepers of his Women. Pizarro sent to Tumbez sixe hundered prisoners, which the Gouvernour of this Iland had taken of the party of Atabaliba, who at that time main- tained Warre against his Brother Guaſcar about the Soueraignty, and this Gouver- nour had taken Guaſcars part. This ciuill discord was much to the Spaniards ad- uantage.

Pizarro sent three Messengers to Tumbez to demand peace and safe entrance, but they (notwithstanding the freedome of their Captiues) deliuered them to the Priests to be sacrificed to their Idoll of the Sunne. He taketh Tumbez and sacketh the Temple and Cittie.

From thence he proceeded in his way to Caxamalca: and Guaſcar sent some vato him with great promises to demand his aide against his brother Atabaliba: soone after Atabaliba sent one to him, to charge him to returne to his ships. Pizarro answereth, That hee came not to hurt any, but for their good, as his Emperour had giuen him in charge, nor could hee now, (being the Embassadour of the Pope and Emperour, Lords of the World) returne without great dishonour before he had seene his Royall person, and communicated to him such instructions as might bee good for his body and soule.

As he passed the Prouince of Chira, the Lords thereof prouoked him against Ata- baliba, who had lately conquered their Countries. And on the Riuer of Chira he founded the Colonie of S. Michael, for the safe keeping of his spoiles, and for his ships. Hee marcheth on to Caxamalca, and sendeth Messengers on horse-backe, to giue him notice of his comming. This strange beast made the Indians afraid, but Atabaliba was nothing moued therewith, more moued to see those bearded men giue him so little reuerence. Atabaliba sent Pizarro a paire of shooes, cut and gilded, that (as he pretended) hee might know him: others thought, that he might be knowne and designed to imprison- ment or slaughter.

The next day the King was carried, as in solemnetriumph, vpon mens shoulders, garded with fise and twenty thousand Indians in rich pompe and magnificence. Vin- centius de Valle-iridiz, a Dominican Frier, holding in one hand a Crosse, in the other his Breuiarie, or (as some say) a Bible, came before him with great reuerence, and blessing him with the Crosse, said: Excellent Lord, it behoueth you to know, That God in Trini- tie and Vnitie made the world of nothing, and formed a man of the Earth, whom hee called Adam; of whom we all haue beginning. Adam sinned against his Creator by disobedience, and in him all his Posterity, except Iesus Christ: who being God, came downe from Heauen, and tooke flesh of the Virgine Mary; and to redeeme Mankinde, died on a Crosse like to this (for which cause we worship it;) rose again the third day, & after fortie dayes ascended into Heauen, leauing for his Vicar in Earth Saint Peter, and his Successours, which we call Popes; who haue giuen to the most puissant King of Spaine, Emperour of the Romans, the Monarchy of the World. Obey the Pope, and receiue the Faith of Christ; and if yee shall belecue it most holy, and that most false which yee haue, yee shall doe well; and know, that doing the contrary, we will make war on you, and will take away and breake your Idols; therefore leaue the deceiueable Religion of your false Gods. This Preaching of the Fryer might well seeme strange to Atabaliba, which it seemes he learned of the Mahumetans, and not of the Apostles. He answered, that he was free, and would not become tributary to any, nor did acknow- ledge any greater Lord then himselfe: and for the Emperour, he could be pleased to be the friend of so great a Prince, and to know him: but for the Pope, he would not obey him, which gaue away that which was not his owne, and tooke a Kingdome from him whom he had neuer seene: as for Religion, he liked well his owne, and neither would nor ought to call it in question, being so ancient and approued, especially seeing Christ dyed, which neuer befell the Sunne or Moone, and how (saith hee) doe you know that the God of the Christians created the World? Fryer Vincent answered, That f This he spake according to the sull of Alexander the sixt, which had giuen the Sou- therne & We- sterne World to the Spanish Kings. The hornes of the Bull, and not of the Lambe, are the Popish weapons.

That

That his Booke told it him, and gaue him his Breniarie. Atabaliba looked on it, and in it, and saying, it said no such thing to him, hurled it on the ground. The Fryer tooke it vp and went to Pizarro, crying, he hath cast the Gospels to the ground, Reuenge it, O Christians, seeing they will not our friendship, nor our Law : or to vlc the words of a Spanish Captaine there present in his relation *thereof, come forth Christians, come forth, and come to these enemies, dogges that will not accept the things of God, and the Cacique hath cast our holy law to the ground. Francesco di Xeres, who was Pizarros Secretary writeth t<sup>t</sup> at the Frier would haue opened the booke because Atabaliba could not, and he in disdain smote him a blow on the arme, and objected to the Spaniards their abuses and robbing of his Caciques, saying he would not depart thence till all were restored.

Pizarro commanded to bring forth the Standard and the Ordinance : the Horsemen in three Bands assayed Atabaliba's people, and slew many : he himsele arriued with his Foot-men, which layed about with their swords : all charged vpon Atabaliba, slaying them which carried him, whose roome was presently supplied by other, till at last Pizarro pulled him downe from his litter by the clothes. All this while not one Indian fought, because they had no commandement, or, as Xeres saith, for feare and amazement to see their Cacique so vsed, and therefore no Spaniard was slaine, and many Indians perished vpon the thrust, for so the Fryer had bidden them fight, for feare of breaking their swords : neither were any wounded, but only Pizarro by one of his owne, thrusting at Atabaliba in his taking, and wounding Pizarro therewith in the arme. Thus are the Indians chased, their King with other great spoiles remayning with the Spaniards : of which Xeres reckoneth 80000. Castilians in gold and 7000. markes (euery marke being eight ounces) in siluer of the household plate of Atabaliba. And in Caxamalca they rifled houses full vp to the roofo of garments, besides armour and weapons, of which some were Axes and Pole-axes of gold and siluer.

The next day the Spaniards scoured about for spoile, and found fise thousand women of the Kings with much treasure. Atabaliba was much greeued with his imprisonment especially in regard of the chaine which they put vpon him. And when they had spent much reasoning about his ransom, a Souldier named Soto (of whom you haue heard in our History of Florida) said vnto him, wilt thou giue vs this house full of gold and siluer thus high? lifting vp his sword and making a stroke vpon the wal, Atabaliba answered, that if they would giue him liberty to send into his Kingdome, he would fulfill their demand. Whereat the Spaniards much maruelling gaue him three Monthes time, but hee had filled the house in two monthes and a halfe, a matter scarce credible, yet most true : For I (saith Lopez Vaz) know about twenty men that were there at that time, who all affirme that it was about ten Millions of gold and siluer. That Spanish Captaine in Ramusius relateth, that he promised to giue them so much gold as should reare vp to that marke, a span higher then a tall man could reach, the roome being 25. foot long and 15. wide : and the Gouvernour asking how much siluer hee would giue, hee answered hee would fill vp an inclosure which should be made there with vessels of plate, for his ransom, which was promised him. This Captaine was appointed Guardian of that golden roome & saw it melted, and reckoneth vp the parcels and particulars that were brought in vessels and plates of gold and siluer. And the Gouvernour sent to the Emperour his fift part, and parted the rest, to euery * foot-man, 4800. peeces of Gold, (which make 7208. duckets) to euery horse-man twice as much, besides the aduantages that belonged to any : To Almagros company (which were 150. that came after the victory) he gaue 25000. pezos, and 2000. to the inhabitants of Saint Michel. Many other gifts he gaue to merchants and others : and yet after the Governour was gone, there was brought more gold then that which had bene shared. This also is affirmed by Xeres that ten or 12. daies after Pizarro was gone, the Spaniards which had been sent to Cusco brought as much gold (which was taken from the wals of a house, and roofo of a Temple in Cusco, being plates of ten or 12. poundweight a peece, & other like) as amounted to two millions and a halfe, and being molten, proued one million 326539. pezos of fine gold : and 51610. markes of siluer. He addeth that Atabaliba was by sound of Trumpet freed from his promise, but was kept still vnder guard for the Spaniards security.

g Lopez Vaz

h Gomara saith that it was a great roome, and they made a line about it: it was all of wrought mettall in vessels, &c.

i Gom. hath 252000. pounds of siluer, and 1326000. pezos of gold.

* Xeres saith they were 102. footmen, and 63. horsemen.

How.

Howbeit they killed him notwithstanding, and in a night strangled him. But God the righteous Iudge, seeing this villainous act, suffered none of those Spaniards to die by the course of Nature, but brought them to euill and shamefull ends.

During the time of Atabaliba's imprisonment, his Captaines had taken his Brother Guasgar<sup>b</sup>, who spake with Captaine Soto, and promised that if they would restore him to his libertie and to his Kingdome, he would fill vp the roome at Caximalca to the rooffe, which was thrice as much as Atabaliba had promised: and added that his Father Gnaynacapa on his death bed had commaunded him to bee friend to the white and bearded men, which should come and rule in those parts. Atabaliba hearing of these things, fained himselfe sorrowful for the death of Guasgar, whom hee said Quisquiz his Captaine had slaine: this he did to trie how the Spaniards would take his death, which when he saw they little respected, he sent and caused him to be slaine indeede. This was done in the yeare of our Lord God a thousand five hundred thirtie three. He had before slaine another of his brethen and drunke in his skull, as hee had sworne to deale with Atabaliba.

The Indians hereupon hid the Treasures of Gold, Siluer, and Gemmes, that were in Cusco and other places, and had belonged to Gnaynacapa, which were farre more then euer came to the Spaniards hands. Chilicuchima one of Atabaliba's cheefe Captaines, which visited him in his imprisonment with great reuerence (for he and the cheife of his companie laid burthens on their shoulders and so entred into his presence, lifting vp both his hands to the Sunne, with thanks to him for this sight of his Lord, and then with much crouching kissed his hands and feet) he tolde the Spaniards that Quisquiz, another cheefe Captaine had conueyed away those Treasures of Gnaynacapa or Cusco the elder, as hee calls him: and being forced by torments of fire put to him, d confessed where Atabaliba had a Tent full of Plate and Treasure. The Spanish Captaine which reports this, saith, that he saw a great House full of Vessels of Gold, and other peeces, (as a Shepheard and his Sheep all of Gold, as great as the liuing) which were not shared amongst them: and hee saw eightene hundred thousand Pezos of the Emperours fifth part, ouer and aboue that which Pizarro sent by his brother, so that both Cesar and Soldier were deceiued. He heard Atabaliba say, that in an Island in a Riuer of Collas, was a very great house all covered with Golde, and the beames with all whatsoeuer in the house was covered with plates of Gold, yea and the pauement also. But in such a diuided state, where were so many Indian Captaines of the two brethren.

Inguas, the Spaniards being but a handfull and ieaious of each other, the Countrie being so wide and rich, that they could not so much as see and take view of the same in short space: their was easie opportunitie offered to conuey away the greatest part of their Treasures: especially Religion adding a helping hand both to conuey and to con-ceale from them, which thus spoiled their Temples, Idols, and Altars. The Spaniards so abounded with Gold, that they would giue e a thousand and three hundred, (one gaue fiftene hundred) Castlins or Pezos for a Horse, threescore for a small rundlet of Wine, fortie for a paire of shooes, likewise a sword, and other things after the same rate: and debtors sought out their creditours with Indians laden with Gold from house to house to pay them: they carried into Spaine one Vessell of Gold, another of Siluer, each sufficient wherein to boile a Cow, besides a huge Eagle, and other like Images, as an Idol of Gold as bigge as a childe of foure yeares olde: Drummes of Gold: and at the conquest of Cusco, Xeres tells of many Images of women of Golde, and as great, which they worshipp'd, and diuers like of Siluer, Sheep also in like portrature, of fine Golde; all well wrought.

The quarrell betweene the two brethren grew about their inheritance: Guasgar succeeding his Father in the rest, and Quito being assigned to Atabaliba, who seizing on Tumbamba, a rich Prouince, prouoked his brothers forces against him, who tooke him prisoner. But he escaping to Quito, made the people beleue that the Sunne had turned him into a Serpent, and so he escaped through a hole in the Prison: and on conceit of this miracle drew them into Armes against Guasgar, with which hee made such slaughter of his enemies, that to this day there are great heapes of bones of the slaine: he slew threescore thousand of the Canari, destroyed Tumbamba, and conquered as farre farre as Tumbez and Caximalca he sent a great Armie with Quisquiez and Calicucuma, two valiant Captaines, with such successe as you haue heard, against Gnascar, whom they tooke, and by his direction slew.

Gomara attributeth the death of Atabaliba to Philippinus the Spanish Interpreter, who to enioy one of his wiues, accused him of conspiracie against the Spaniards, but Benzel with more likelyhood affirmeth that Pizarro from his first taking had intended it. For he might haue sent him into Spaine as Atabaliba requested, if he had feared such secret practises: but his request and purgation were reiected, and foure Negro's which hee vsed for that purpose, strangled him at his command. Hee had many wiues, whereof the chiefe was his Sister, named Pacha. He seeing the glasse of Europe, marvelled much (as before is said that they hauing so faire a thing would goe so farre for Gold. His Murtherers dyed, as is said, the like bloody ends; Almagro was executed by Pizarro, and he slaine by yong Almagro; and him, Yacca de Castra did likewise put to death. Iohn Pizarro was slaine of the Indians. Martin another of the Brethren was slaine with Francis. Ferdinandus was imprisoned in Spaine and his end vnkowne; Gonzales was done to death by Gasca. Soto died of thought in Florida; and ciuill wars eate vp the rest in Peru.

Before the times of the Inguas, their Gouvernment<sup>m</sup> in these parts was (as still it is in Arauco, and the Prouinces of Chili) by Communalities, or the aduise of many. The Gouvernment of the Inguas continued betweene three and foure hundred yeares, although for a long time their Signiorie was not aboue fiue or six leagues compasse about the Citie of Cusco, where the originall of their Conquests began, and extended from Pasto to Chili, almost a thousand Leagues in length betweene the Andes and the South Sea.

The Canaries were their mortal enemies, and fauoured the Spaniards, & at this daie if they fall to comparisons, whether the Inguas or Canari were the more valiant, they will kill one another by thousands as hath hapned in Cusco. The practise which they vsed to make themselves Lords, was a fiction, that since the generall Deluge whereof all the Indians haue knowledge) the World had beene preserued, peopled and restored by them: and that seuen of them came out of the Caue of Pacaricambo, and that they also were the Authours of the true religion. The first of these Inguas was Mangocapa, which came out of the Caue of Tambo, six leagues from Cusco. Of him came two Families, the Hananchusco, of whom came these Lords, and the Vrinchusco. Ingaroca the first Lord was no great Lord, but was serued in Vessels of Gold and Silver. And dying, hee appointed that all his treasure should be employed for the seruice of his body, and for the feeding of his Family. His successour did the like: and this grew to a generall custome, that no Inguas might inherit his Fathers goods; but he built a new Palace.

In the time of Ingaroca, the Indians had Images of Gold. Taguarnaque succeeded. Virococha, the next successour was very rich. Gonzale Pizarro with cruell torments forced the Indians to confesse where his bodie was, for the report of the treasures buried with him: the bodie he burnt, and the Indians reserued and worshipped the ashes. They tooke it ill that this Inguas called himselfe Virococha, which is the name of their God, but he to satisfie them, said, that Virococha appeared to him in a dreame, and commanded him to take his name.

Pachacuti Inguas Tupacguis succeeded him, who was a great Conquerour, Politician, and Authour of their Ceremonies; hee reigned threescore and ten yeares, and fained himselfe sent of Virococha to establish his Religion and Empire.

After him followed Guaynacapa the Father of Gnascar and Atabaliba, which brought this Empire to the greatest heighr. The Indians opened him after his decease, leauing his heart and entrails in Quito, the bodie was carried to Cusco, and placed in the Temple of the Sunne. Hee was worshipped of his Subiects for a God being yet aliue, which was not done to any of his Predecessours. When he dyed, they slew a thousand persons of his household, to serue him in the other life, all which died willingly for his seruice, in somuch that many offered themselves to death, besides such as were appointed. His treasure was admirable. He vsed alwayes<sup>a</sup> to haue with him many Oregonis, which were his men of Warre, and ware shooes and feathers, and other signes of Nobilitie: he was serued of the eldest Sonnes and Heires of all his chiefe Subiects, euery one clothed after his owne Countrie Rite; he had many Counsellours and Courtiers in differing degrees of honour. Euery one at his entrance into the Palace put off his shooes, and might not looke him in the face when they spake to him.

All the Vessels of his House, Table, and Kitchen, were of Gold and Siluer, and the meaneft of Siluer and Copper for strength and hardnesse of Metall. Hee had in his Wardorbe hollow Statues, which seemed Gyants, and were of Golde: and the figures in proportion and bignesse of all the Beasts, Birdes, Trees, and Hearbes, in his Kingdome, and of the Fishes likewise. Hee had Ropes, Budgets, Troughs, and Chettis, of Gold and Siluer: heapes of Billets of Golde, that seemed Wood cut out for the fire. There was nothing in his Kingdome, but he had the counterfeite in Gold. Yea they say, That the Inguas had a Garden of pleasure in an Island neere Puna, which had a kinde of Garden-Hearbes, Flowers, and Trees of Golde and Siluer. Hee had also an infinite quantitie of Siluer and Gold wrought in Cusco, which was lost by the death of Gnascar, which the Indians held (as is said) from the Spaniards. Xeres saith he had three houses full of peeces of Gold, and five full of Siluer: and a hundred thousand plates or dics of Gold, euery of which weighed fiftie Castlins. What honours were done to him after his death appeares by that his golden Temple or Chappell where hee was buried, where he had continual attendance of dances, and musicians, and such as stood with fans to scarre away the flies. When any came to see the Cacique, they came first to performe their Ceremonies to this Image. He had two hundred children of diuerse women. Acosta<sup>a</sup> sayth, That he had (descended from his owne loynes) about three hundred children and grand-children.

When his Sonnes Gnascar and Atabaliba were dead, another of his sonnes called Mangocapa, continued the Warres a while with the Spaniards, and after retired himselfe to Yslia Bamba where hee kept in the Mountaines, and there the Inguas Rained, vntill Amaro was taken and executed in Cusco. Some remnants of them haue since beene christened. The other Family of the Inguas, which descended of the first Mangocapa called Urincusco, had their Successions also and Government; which here to discourse of, were to my proposed scope impertinent. Leaving therefore the Conquerours and Conquest of Peru, let vs consider the Countrie it selfe, with such obseruations as wee shall there finde touching their Religions.

He Kingdome of Peru extendeth<sup>b</sup> seven hundred leagues in length, in breadth a hundred in some places, in some threescore, in others fortie: more, or lesse, according vnto the difference of places. Quito and Plata are the vmost Cities thereof, the one bordering on Popayan, the other vpon Chili. It is not here meant of that spacious Kingdome of the Inguas, for that reached twelue hundred leagues, whereof this of Peru was but a part. Acosta<sup>c</sup> numbrest diuerse strange specialities, excepted from the generall Rules of Natures wonted course.

The first, that it blowes continually on all that Coast with one onely winde (and that also differing from that which vsually bloweth betweene the Tropikes) namely, the South and South-west. The second, that this winde (in other places vnhealthfull) is here so agreeable that otherwise it could be habitable. The third, that it neuer raines, thunders, snowes, nor hailes in all this Coast: And yet (which is a fourth wonder) a little distance from the Coast, it snowes and raines terribly. Fifthly there are two ridges and mountaines, which both runne in one altitude; and the one in view of the other, almost equally, about a thousand leagues: and yet on the one part are great Forrests, and

it raines the greatest part of the year, being very hote; the other is all naked, and bare; and very colde. So that Peru is diuided into three parts, which they call Llanos, Sier-ras, and Andes: the first raine alongst the Sea-coast; the Sierras be hills with some val-lies, and the Andes be steep and craggie mountaines. The Llanos or Plaines on the Sea-coast haue ten leagues in bredth, in some parts lesse, and in some a little more. The Sierra containeth with equall inequality twentie leagues: and the Andes as much, sometimes more, and sometimes lesse. They run in length from North to South, and in breadth from East to West: and in this so small a distance it raines almost continually in one place, and neuer in the other. In the Plaines neuer, on the Andes in a maner continually, though sometimes it be more cleare there then other. The Sierra in the mids are more moderate, in which it raines from September to Aprill, as in Spain, but in the other halfe year, when the Sunne is further off, it is more cleare. The Sieras yeeld infinite number of Vicagues, which are like wilde Goats; and Pacos, a kinde of sheepe-asses, profitable for fleece and burthen: the Andes yeelde Parrots, Apes, and Monkies.
Some report that monstrous births doe sometimes proceed (as by Natures vnwilling hand) from the copulation of these Barbarians & these Monkies. The Sierre opening themselues, cause vallies, where are the best dwellings in Peru, and most plentifull of Maiz & fruits. It is strange that in the vallie of Pachacama, neither the higher element yeeldeth raine nor the lower any streame, and yet there is plentie of rootes, Maiz, and fruits. They haue large and deepe ditches, in which they sow or set, and that which groweth is nourished with the dew: and because the Maiz will not grow, except it first die, they set one or two Pilchards heads (which fish they take with their Nets very plentifully in the Sea) therewith, and thus it groweth abundantly. The water which they drinke, they draw out of deep pits. Comming from the mountaines to the vallies they do vsually see (as it were) two heauens, one cleare and bright, the other obscure, and (as it were) a grey vaile spread vnderneath, which couers all the coast: & although it raines not, yet this mist is wonderfull profitable to bring forth grasse, and to raise vp and nourish the seede: and where they haue plentie of water, which they drawe from the Pooles and Lakes, yet if this moysture faileth, there followeth great defect of graine. And (which is more worthie of admiration) the drie and barren sands in some places, as in the sandie Mountaine neare the Citie de Los Reyes, are by this dew beautified with grasse and flowers. In some places they water their fields out of the Riuer.

Beyond the Citie of Cusco the two ridges of Mountaines separate themselues, and in the middest leaue a plaine and large champaine, which they call the Prouince of Callas, where there are many Riuer, and great store of fertile Pastures. There is also the great Lake of Titicaca, which containeth foure score leagues in compasse, and robbeth tenne or twelue great Riuer of their waters, which they were carrying to the Sea, but here are drunke vp (by the way) of this Lake. They saile in it with ships and barques.
The water is not altogether sowre nor salt, as that of the Sea, but is so thicke, that it cannot be drunke. Vpon the Bankes of this Lake are habitations as good as any in Peru. The great Lake passeth by a Riuer into a lesse Lake, called Aulagau, from whence it hath no manner of passage, except there be any vnder the earth. There are many other Lakes in the Mountaines, which seeme to arise rather from Springs then from Raines or Snowes, and some of them yeeld Riuer. At the end of the Valley of Tarapaya neere to Potozi, there is a round Lake, whose water is very hot, and yet the Countrey is very colde: they bathe themselues neere the bankes, for further in it is intollerable. In the middest is a boyling aboute twentie foote square: it neuer en-creaseth nor decreaseth, although they haue drawne from it a great streame for met-tall-Mills.

But to returne from this plentie of water in Lakes to that want thereof in the Plaines of Peru. The Naturall reason which some yeelde of this want of Raine, is, partly their sandie and drie qualitie, which of themselues can yeeld no further exhalations, then to produce those mists or dewes: partly the height of the Hills, which shaddow the Plaines, and suffer no winde to blow from the land vpon them, but intercept them wholly with their vapours and cloudes; so that their winde is onely from the Sea, which finding no oposite, doth not presse nor straine forth the vapours which rise to engender raine. This seemeth the rather to be probable, for that it raines vpon some small Hills along the coast which are least shadowed. In the same coast also, where the Easterly or Northerly winds be ordinarie, it raineth as in Guayaquill. The South winde in other places is accounted a causer of raine; which here reigneth without rayning.

As strange is the difference of seasons, after the Indians account. For in the<sup>h</sup> Sier-ras their Summer beginneth in Aprill, and endeth with September: October beginneth their Winter, which not the absence, but the presence of the Sunne doth cause.
Contrariwise in the Plaines, just by in site, they haue their summer from October to Aprill, the rest their Winter. (The like is noted in the East Indies at the hills of Balegate, where that ridge parteth Winter and Summer in the same neerenesse to the Sunne, at the same time, and a few miles distant.

The raines in the hills are cause why they call it winter, and the dewes or mists in the plaines, so that when the raines fall most in the hills, it is cleare weather in the plaines, and when the dew falleth in the plaines, it is cleare on the hills: and thus it commeth to passe, that a man may trauel from winter to summer in one day, hauing winter to wash him in the morning, and ere night a cleare and drie summer to scorch him. Yea in some places (saith Alexandro Vrsino) within six miles space both heate and cold are intolle-rable, and enough to kill any man. From St. Helena to Copapo it neuer raineth, which coast extends fortie miles, in some places 50. 1200. leagues in length.

i Cieza c. 25.

About the point of St. Helena in Peru, they tell that sometimes there liued Giants of huge stature, which came thither in Boats, the compasse of their knee was as much as of another mans middle: they were hated of the people, because that vsing their women they killed them, and did the same to the men for other<sup>k</sup> causes. These Giants were addicted to Sodomie, and therefore as the Indians report, were destroyed with fire from heauen. Whether this be true or no, in those parts are found huge & Giantlike bones.
Cieza writes that Iohn de Holmes at Porto Viejo digged and found teeth three fingers broad, and foure long. Contrariwise, in the valley of Chinchal they haue a Tradition that the Progenitors of the present Inhabitants destroyed the native people, which were not about two cubits high, and possessed their roomes: in testimonie whereof they alledge also that bone-argument.

k The like doth Apolloda-rus, and the Poets tell of Typhon, and other Giants.

Concerning the Indians conceit of their owne originall: we haue mentioned their opinion of a flood, and the repeopling of the World by them; which came out of a Caue. They haue another Legend that all men being drowned, there came out of the great Lake Titicaca, one Viracocha, which stayed in Tiaguanaco, where at this day is to be scene the ruines of very ancient and strange buildings, and from thence came to Cusco, and so began mankind to multiplie. They shew in the same Lake a small Island, where they saie that the Sunne hid himselfe, and so was preserued<sup>n</sup>: and for this reason they make great sacrifices vnto him in this place, both of sheepe and men. They held this place sacred; and the Inguas built there a Temple to the Sunne, and placed there women and Priests with great treasures.

o Acoft. ibid.

Some learned men are of opinion, that all which the Indians make mention of is not about foure hundred yeares; which may be imputed to their want of writing. In stead of writing they vsed their Quipos. These Quippos are memorials or Registers made of cords, in which there are diuers knots and colours, signifying diuers things:
these were their books of Histories, of lawes, ceremonies, and accounts of their affairs.
There were officers appointed to keepe them, called Quipocamayos, which were bound to giue account of things as Notaries and Registers. They had according to the di-uinitie of businesse, sundrie cords and branches, in euery of which were so many knots little and great, and strings tyed to them, some redde, some greene, and in such variety, that euen as we deriue an infinite number of wordes from the letters of the Alphabet, so doe they from these kinds and colours. And at this day they will keepe account exactly with them. I did see (saith Acofta) a handfull of these strings, wherein an Indian woman did carrie (as it were) written a generall confession of all her life, and thereby confessed her selfe, as well as I could haue done in written papet, with strings for the circum-

circumstances of the finnes. They haue also certaine wheeles of smal stones, by meanes whereof they learne all they desire by heart. Thus you shall see them learne the Pater-nister, Credo, and the rest: and for this purpose they haue many of these wheels in their Churchyards. They haue another kind of Quippos, with graines of Mays, with which they will cast vp hard accounts which might trouble a good Arithmetician with his pen in the diuisions. They were no lesse wittie, if not more, in things whereto they apply themselues then the men of these parts. They taught their young children all Arts necessarie to the life of men, euery one learning what was needfull for his person and family, and not appropriating himselfe to one profession, as with vs, one is a Tayler, another a Weauer, or of other Trade. Euery man was his owne Weauer, Carpenter, Husbandman, and the like. But in other Artes, more for ornament then necessitie, they had Golde-Smithes, Painters, Potters, and Weauers of curious workes for Noble-men, and so of the rest. No man might change the fashions vsed in his owne Countrey, when hee went into another, that all might bee knowne of what Countrey they were.

q Id ibide. 16.

For their marriages, they had many wiues but one was principall, which was wedded with solemnitie, and that in this sort. The Bridegroome went to the Brides house, and put Ottoy, which was an open shooe, on her foote: this, if she were a maide, was of wooll, otherwise, of Reedes: and this done, he ledde her thence with him. If shee committed Adulterie she was punished with death: when the husband died, she carried a mourning weed of blacke a yeare after, and might not marrie in that time, which befell not the other wiues. The Ingua himselfe with his owne hand gaue this woman to his Gouvernors and Captains, and the Gouvernors assembled all the young men and maidens in one place of the Citie, where they gaue to euery one his wife, with the aforesaid ceremonie in putting on the Ottoy: the other wiues did serue and honour this. None might marrie with his Mother, Daughter, Grandmother or Grand-childe: and Tupangui, the Father of Gnaynacapa was the first Ingua that married his Sister, and confirmed his fact by a Decree, that the Inguas might doe it, commanding his owne children to doe it, permitting the Noble-men also to marrie their sisters by the fathers side. Other incest, and murder, theft, and adulterie were punished with death. Such as had done good seruice in warre were rewarded with lands, armes, titles of honor, and marriage in the Inguas lineage.

They had Chasquis or Posts in Peru, which were to carrie tidings or Letters: for which purpose they had houses a league and a halfe asunder, and running each man to the next, they would run fiftie leagues in a day and night.

Posts.

When the Ingua was dead, his lawfull heire borne of his chiefe wife succeeded. And if the King had a legitimate brother, he first inherited, and then the sonne of the first. He inherited not the goods (as is said alreadie) but they were wholly dedicated to his O-ratorie or Guaca, and for the maintenance of the family he left: which, with his offspring, was alway busied at the sacrifices, ceremonies, & seruice of the deceased King: for being dead, they presently held him for a God, making Images & sacrifices to him. The Ensigne of royaltie was a red rowle of wooll finer then silke, which hung on his forehead, which was a diademe that none else might weare in the midst of their forehead; at their eare the Noble men might. When they tooke this roll, they made their Coronation feast, and many sacrifices with a great quantitie of vessell, of golde, and siluer, and many Images in the forme of sheep of golde & siluer, and a thousand others of diuers colours. Then the chiefe Priest took a yong child in his hand of the age of six or eight years, pronouncing these words with the other Ministers to the Image of Viracocha: Lord, we offer this vnto thee, that thou maiest maintain vs in quiet, and help vs in our warres: maintain our Lord the Ingua in his Greatnes & estate, that he may alway increase, giuing him much knowledge to gouerne vs. There were present at this ceremonie, men of all parts of the Realme, & of all Guacas and Sanctuaries. It is not found that any of the Inguas subiects euer committed treason against him. He placed Gouvernors in euery Prouince, some greater, and some smaller. The Inguas thought it a good rule of state to keepe their subiects alway in action, and therefore there are seene to this day long Causeis of great labour, diuiding this large Empire into foure parts.

Having conquered a Prouince, they presently reduced them into Towns, and Communalities, which were diuided into Bands: one was appointed ouer ten, another ouer a hundred, and another ouer a thousand, and ouer ten thousand another. Aboue all, there was in euery Prouince a Gouvernour of the house of the Ingua, to whom the rest gaue accounts of what had passed, who were eyther borne or dead. At the feast called Raymer, the Gouvernors brought the Tribute of the whole Realme to the Court at Cusco. All the Kingdome was diuided into foure parts, Chinchafuyo, Collafuyo, Andesuyo, and Condesuyo, according to the foure wayes which went from Cusco, East, West, North, and South.

When the Ingua conquered a Citie, the Land was diuided into three Parts, the first for Religion, euery Idoll and Guaca hauing his peculiar Landes appropriated to their Priests and Sacrifices; and the greatest part therof was spent in Cusco, where was the General and Metropolitan Sanctuarie, the rest in that Citie where it was gathered, which all had Guacas, after the fashion of Cusco, some being thence distant two hundred leagues. That which they reapt on the land was put into store-houses built for that purpose.

The second part of that diuision was for the Ingua for the maintenance of his Court, Kinsmen, Noblemen, and Souldiers: which they brought to Cusco, or other places where it was needfull.

The third part was for the Communitie for the nourishment of the people, no particular man possessing any part heereof in proper. As the Familie encreased or decreased, so did the portion. Their Tribute was to till and husband the Lands of the Ingua, and the Guacas, and lay it vp in store-houses, being for that time of their labour nourished out of the same Landes. The like distribution was made of the Cattell to the same purposes, as that of the lands, and of the wool, and other profits that thence arose. The old Men, Women, and sicke Folkes, were reserued from this Tribute. They payed other Tributes also, euen whatsoeuer the Ingua would choose out of euery Prouince. The Chicas sent sweet woodes; the Lucanas, Brancars to carrie his Litter; the Chumtilbicas, Dancers: others were appointed to labour in the Mines: and all were slaues to the Ingua. Some he employed in building of Temples, Fortresses, Houses, or other workes, as appeareth by the remnants of them, where are found stones of such greatnesse that men cannot conceiue how they were cut, brought, and layed in their places, they hauing no yron or Steele to cut, engines to carrie, nor morter to lay them: and yet they were so cunningly layed that one could not see the ioints; some of eight and thirtie foote long, saith Acos, eight broad, and six thicke, I measured; and in the walls of Cusco are bigger; none so little (saith Sancho) in some buildings there, as three Carrs might carrie, and some thirtie spans square, John Ellis which lately was there, saith some of them are twentie tunne weight, strangely ioyned without morter.

They built a bridge at Chiquitto, the Riuer being so deepe, that it will not admit Arches: they fastned bundles of reeds and weedes, which being light, will not sinke, which they fasten to either side of the Riuer, they make it passable for man and beast: it is three hundred foot long. Cusco: their chiefe Citie standeth in seuentene degrees: it is subiect to cold and snow, the houses are of great and square stone. It was besieged by Soto, and by Pizarro and him entred, where they found more treasure then they had by the imprisonment of Atabaliba: Quito is said to haue beene as rich as Cusco. Hither Ruminagni fled with five thousand souldiers, when Atabaliba his Master was taken by the Spaniards, and slew Illescas his brother, that withstood his tyrannicall proceedings, slaid him, and made a Drum of his skin; slew two thousand souldiers that brought the body of Atabaliba to Quito to be interred, hauing in shew of Funerall pomp and honor, before, made them drunk; and with his forces scoured the Prouince of Tamebamba: he killed many of his wiues for smiling when he told them they should haue pleasure with the bearded men, & burnt the Wardrobe of Atabaliba: that when the Spaniards came and entred Quito, which had almost dispeopled Panama, Nicaragua, Cartagena, & other their habitations in hope of Peruvian spoiles, they found themselves disappointed of their expected prey, and in anger set fire on the towne. Aluvarado with like newes came from Guatimala into those partes, with 400. Spaniards, but was was forced to kill his horse to feed his famished company (although at that time horses were worth in Peru above 1000. ducats a peece) was almost killed with thirst, was assaulted * with showers of ashes, which the hote Vulcane of Quito disperied 240. miles about (with terrible thunders and lightnings, which Pluto had seemed to steale from Jupiter, and here to vent them) and after with snows on the colde hills, which exacted seventy Spaniards for tribute in the passage, found many men sacrificed by the inhabitants, but could find no golde, till Pizarro bought his departure with 100000. ducats. He gaue thanks (he said) to God for his deliuerance, but that traſt, by which he had passed, to the diuel. This was he that afterward being bruised with the fall of his horse, (whereof he died) and asked where he was most pained, said, y in his soule, as guilty to himselfe of his former cruelties and couetousnes. This is the profit of vnſanctified and ill-sanctified golde: the one whereof we see in these Peruvian Temples thus spoiled by the Spaniards, who (in the other respect) were more spoiled by this spoile and purchase. What golden dayes these were to the Spaniards, this historie in diuers places sheweth. From one Pallace of Cusco (saith Xerxes) they tooke seuen hundred plates of golde, each whereof weighed five hundred Castlins: from another house the weight of two hundred thousand. Two house of golde he speakes of, the very tharch being counterfeit in gold, the strawes with the eares artificially wrought. But euery where are these Relations shewed with Cusco-golde. Aluarcados Armie, which he brought into Peru had perished, as Cieza relateth, with drought, but for certain Canes as bigge as a mans legge, which between the knots contained a pottle of water, extracted from the dewes; for there fell no raine in those parts.

Girana saith, that the inhabitants of Anzerma, were in their warres armed with complete harnesse of golde: and that about Quito there were mines, whence more golde was taken then earth. I tye no mans credite to these reports, but sure it is that they had these mettals in abundance, which the Spanish warreshue made our European World to seele, more managed and maintained by Indian wedges, then Spanish blades.

But let vs come from their mines, to their minds, which for heauenly things were as full of drosse, as the other were of purer mettals.

CHAP. X.

Of the Gods or Idols of Peru, and other their opinions.

THe Peruvians acknowledged a supreme Lord and Author of all things, * which they called Viracocha. & gaue him names of great excellencie, as Pachacamac, or Pachayachac, which is, the Creator of Heauen and Earth, and Usapu that is, admirable and other the like. Him they did worship as the chiefest of all, and honoured him in beholding the heauens. Yet had<sup>b</sup> they no proper name for God no more then the Mexicans, but such as in this sort might signifie him by his attributes or workes, and therefore are forced to vse the Spanish name Dios. In the name of Pachacamac, or Creator, they had a rich Temple erected to him, wherein they worshipped notwithstanding the Diuell and certaine figures. The name of Viracocha was of the greatest sound in their deuotions, and so they called the Spaniards, esteeming them the sonnes of heauen. Benzo<sup>c</sup> alledgeth another cause of that name giuen to the Spaniards. It signifieth (saith he) the froth of the Sea, (Vir is froth, Cochi the Sea) because they thought them ingendered of Sea-froth and nourished therewith, in regard of their couetousnesse and crueltie deuouring all things: applying that name to them in respect of their wicked practises, and not for Diuine Originall. Yea, they curse the Sea, which sent such a cursed brood into the land. (The Spaniards came thither by Sea, as you haue heard.) If I, saith Benzo, asked any of them for any Christian by that Title, they would neither look on me, nor answer, but if I enquired for the by the name of Viracocha, they would presently make answer. And there (wold the father point to the child) goes a Viracochi.

x Not far from Lima, on the South Sea, O-liner Noort was bemisted two dayes on the Sea, with such a shower of athes, which made them seeme as they had bin sprinkled with Meale. The Spaniards say they are there common.

In this they agreed with the ancient Grecian Ethnikes, which termed the most inhumane monsters of humanitie, and the cruellest Tyrants, the sonnes of Neptune, as procreated of the Sea. Such were <sup>b</sup> Procrustes, Polyphemus, and others.

To reconcile these two wholly, is impossible; not so, to shew some reason why the same name might be giuen both to their Idoll, and the Spaniards. These might be so termed, as coming thither at first by sea: and haply because at the first they thought somewhat more then humane to be in them, and that which at first they gaue for honor, may now be continued in an Ironie, or Antiphrasis, whiles they thought them better then men, and found them little inferiour to Diuels.

Viracocha their great Author of Nature, may be called by this Sea-name, <sup>c</sup> for some especiall Sea-rites obserued in his honour, or for the same cause that the Mythologians ascribe to Venus <sup>d</sup> her Sea-generation. For they pictured Venus swimming on the Sea (as Albrius <sup>e</sup> affirmeth) and the Poet singeth, Venus, Orta Mari: which the Mythologians apply to the motion and moisture required to generation, and to that frothie nature of the Sperme. So saith Phorntus: Venus è Mari nata perhibetur, quod ad omnium generationis causam motu et humiditate opus sit; Et forte quod spumosa sint animantium semina: therefore (saith <sup>f</sup> Fulgensius) she is called Aphrodite: for ἀφρός is froth; and so is lust, in regard of the vanitie, and so is seed in regard of naturall qualitie. Perhaps also the first Master of Viracochas Mysteries, which taught them first in Peru, came thither by Sea.

But to returne to Acosta, <sup>h</sup> hee telleth that the Ingua Yupangui (to make himselfe more respected) deuised, that being one day alone, Viracocha the Creator spake to him, complayning, that though he were vniuersall Lord and Creator of all things, and had made the Heauen, the Sunne, the World, and Men, and ruled all, yet they did not yeeld him due obedience, but did equally honour the Sunne, Thunder, Earth, and other things: giuing him to vnderstand, that in heauen where he was, they called him Viracocha Pachayachachin, which signifieth vniuersall Creator: promising also that he would send men inuisibly to assist him against the Changnas, who had lately defeated his brother.

Vnder this colour, he assembled a mightie armie, and ouerthrew the Changnas: and from that time commanded that Viracocha should be held for vniuersal Lord, and that the images of the Sunne and Thunder should do him reuerence. And from that time they set his image highest: yet did he not dedicate any thing to him, <sup>i</sup> saying, that hee being Lord of all had no neede. As for those inuisible Souldiers (a conceit like that which we haue mentioned of the Turks) he said that no man might see them but himselfe: and since they were conuerted into stones: and in that regard gathered a multitude of stones in the mountaines, and placed them for Idols, sacrificing them. He called them Purruancas, and carried them to the warres with great deuotion, making his souldiers beleue that they had gotten the victorie through their helpe. And by this meanes he obtained goodly victories.

Next to Viracocha they worshipped the Sunne: and after him the Thunder, which they called by three names, Chuquilla, Catnilla, and Intijllapa, supposing it to be a man in heauen with a Sling and a Mace, in whose power it is to cause raine, haile, thunder and other effects of the ayrie Region.

This Gnaca (so they called their Idols and Temples) was Generall to all the Indians of Peru: and in Cusco they sacrificed to him Children, as they did to the Sunne. These three, Viracocha, the Sunne, and Thunder, had a more especiall worship then the rest: they put as it were a Gantlet or Gloue vpon their handes, when they lifted them vp to worship them. They worshipped the earth in the name of Pachamama, and esteemed her the mother of all things: the sea also, and called it Mamacocha: and the Rainbow which with two snakes stretched out on each side, were the armes of the Ingas. They attributed diuers offices, to diuers stars, and those which needed their fauour worshipped them: so the Shepherd sacrificed to a starre, by them called Vrcubillay, which they hold to be a sheepe of diuers colours, & two other stars called Catuebillay & Vrcuebillay, which they fained to be an Ewe & a Lamb: others worshipped a star which they name Machacnay, to which they attributed the power ouer snakes & serpents, to keep them from from hurting them. To another star called Chugwinchinchey (which is as much as Tigre.) They ascribed power ouer Beares, Tigres, and Lions. They haue generally beleued that of all the beasts in the earth, there is one like vnto them in heauen, which hath care of their procreation and encrease. Many other Starres they worshipped, too tedious to rehearse. They worshipped also Riuers, Fountaines, the mouthes of Riuers, entrees of Mountaines, Rockes or great stones, Hills, and the tops of Mountaines, which they call Apachitas. They worshipped all things in Nature, which seemed to them remarkable and different from the rest.

They shewed mee, (it is <sup>k</sup> Acoftas speech) in Cazamalca, a Hill or mount of sand, which was a chiefe Idoll or Guaca, of the Ancients. I demanded what Diuinity they found in it; they alledged the wonder, it being an high mount of sand in the midst of the thicke mountaines of stone. In the Citie of delos Reyes, for the melting of a Bell, we cut downe a great deformed Tree, which for the greatnesse and Antiquitie thereof had bene their Gnaca. They attributed the like Diuinitie to any thing that was strange in this kinde, as Stones, or the Rootes Papas and Lallatracas (which they kissed and worshipped.) Beares also, Lions, Tigres and Snakes, that they should not hurt them. And such as their gods be, such are the things which they offer vnto them in their worship. They haue vsed, as they goe by the way, to cast in the crosse-ways on the hilles and toppes of mountaines, old shooes, feathers, and Coca chewed. And when they had nothing else, they cast a stone as an offering, that they might passe freely and lustily; hence it is, that they find in the high-ways great heaps of stones offered, and such other things. They vsed the like ridiculous offering in pulling off their haire of the eye-browes to offer to the Sunne, Hills, Winds, or any other thing which they feare. They report of one of the Inguas, that said he did not take the Sunne to be a god, because hee laboureth so much in his daily iourney. In fine, <sup>l</sup> euery one worshipped what liked him best. The Fishers worshipped a Sharke or some other fish: the Hunter, a Lion, Fox, or other Beast: with many Birds; the Country-man, the Water, and Earth. They beleued that the Moone was wife to the Sunne: when they sweare they touch the Earth, and looke vp to the Sunne. Many of their Idolls had Pastorall Staues, and Miters like Bishops, but the Indians could tell no reason thereof: and when they saw the Spanish Bishops in their Pontificalibus, they asked if they were Gnacas of the Christians.

They worshipped also (as before is said) the dead bodies of the Inguas, preserving them with certaine Rosin, so that they seemed alieue. The bodie of Tupaugui, the Grandfather of Atabaliba, was thus found, hauing eyes made of a fine cloth of gold so artificially set, as they seemed naturall, hauing lost no more haire then if he had died the same day, and yet he had bene dead threescore and eightene yeares. There also the Spaniards found his seruants and Mamacomas, which did seruice to his memorie.

In some Prouince <sup>m</sup> they worshipped the Image of a Bull, in another of a Cocke, and in other, others. In the principall Temple of Pachicama, they kept a shee-Fox and worshipped it. The Lord of Manta kept a great and rich Emerald, as his Ancestors also before him had holden it, in great veneration: on some daies it was brought forth in publike to be worshipped. They which were sicke came in Pilgrimage to visite it, and there offered their gifts, which the Cacique and Ministers turned to their owne profit. The Diuell in many places did appeare vnto them, and he indeed was Author of all these superstitions.

They haue a Tradition concerning the Creation, <sup>n</sup> that at the beginning of the world there came one from the North, into their Countrey, called Con, which had no bones, went very light and swift, cast downe Mountaines, lift vp the Hills, onely with his will and word: He said he was the sonne of the Sunne, and filled the earth with men and women which they created, giuing them fruits and bread, and other things necessarie for humane life. But being offended with some, hee countermanded all that former good, and turned the fruitful lands into barren sands, as they are now in the Plains; and tooke away the water that it should not raine (hence it came that it raines not) onely leauing them the Riuers, of pure compassion, that they should maintaine themselves with labour. Afterwards <sup>o</sup> came another from the South, called Pachicama, the sonne

They againe to gratifie him, turned him in their imaginations and superstitions vnto a god, and named the Prouince foure leagues from Lima of his name. He p continued till the Christians came to Peru. He was their great Oracle, and as some Indians affirme, he still continueth in secret places with some of their old men, and speaketh to them. Of this Temple we shall after speake.

q Gom. ubi sup. They hold opinion q also, that on a time it rained so exceedingly, that it drowned all the lower Countreies, and all men, saue a few, which got into caues vpon high hilles where they shut vp themselves close, that no raime could get in: there they had stored much prouision and liuing creatures. And when they perceiued that it had done raining, they sent forth two Dogges, but they returning all myrie and foule, they knew that the waters had not yet ceased: after that they sent forth more Dogs, which came backe againe drie. Then did they goe forth to people the Earth: but were mightily afflicted with multitudes of great Serpents, which had sprung vp out of those mirie Reliques of the Floud: r but at last they killed them. They beleeeue also that the World shall haue an end, but before the same, shall goe a great drought, and the Sunne and Moone, which they worship, shall be consumed: and therefore they make grieuous lamentations when there is any Eclipse, especially of the Sunne, fearing the destruction of it and the world. They beleeeue the immortalitie of the soule, as we shall more fitly see when we come to their buriall-Rites.

CHAP. XI.

Of the Religious Persons, Temples, Confessions, and sacrifices in Peru.

O man might come to the Gnacas, or Idolls, but Priests. These were clothed in white, and when they came to worshippe, they prostrated themselves on the ground, and holding in their hands a white cloth, did speake to their god in a strange language, that the people should not vnderstand. These haue the authoritie in their holies, and consecrate both the things liuing, and the offerings of other things. In the sacrifices they diuined by inspection of the inward parts, especially by view of the hart, if it were of a man. And if they finde not signes answerable to their expectation, they neuer cease off from sacrificing till they doe find them, beleeuing, and making the people beleeeue, that God is not till then pleased with their sacrifices. They bare incredible shew, and were had in great reputation of holines. When they were to sacrifice, they abstained from women, and if they had committed any trespasse, they did expiate and purge the same with fasting: in sacrificing they did binde, and blinde their eyes, and were sometimes so transported with Zeale, that with their nailes they scratched or pulled out their eyes, as hath beene seene. Neither did the people alone admire their holinesse, but the Princes also, who would doe nothing of moment without their aduice. They also without feare or flatterie, declared vnto them what they had receiued from their Oracles. The manner of their Diuels consultation was this. In b the night time (commonly) they entred backward to their Idoll, and so went bending their bodies and heads after an vgly manner, and thus consulted with him. The answer he made was for the most part like vnto a fearefull hissing, or to a gnashing, which did terrifie them. These Oracles are now ceased.

b Acofta lib. 5. cap. 12.

c Ten. Apollon. lib. 1.

Apollonius d speakes of two mightie Princes, not farre from Chili, one of them named Lychengorme, they are able to bring into the field two hundred thousand men, and are very rich: but the cause why I heere mention them is that number of Priests, which he saith are reported to belong to one of their Temples, to the number of two thousand. Cieza writeth, that the doores of their Temples were Eastward: that in every Temple were two Images of the bignesse and likenesse of Goats, before which they burnt sweete wood: there were also Images of Serpents. Every profession had their severall god. In some Temples were hanged the dead carcases of men sacrificed.

In every Prouince of Peru, there was one principall house of adoration. The ruines <sup>d</sup> of the Temple of Pachacama are still to be seene. That, and the Temples of Collao, and Cusco were lined within with Plates of gold and siluer; and all their seruice was of the same, which proued great riches to the conquerours. In Pachacama the Sunne was worshipped with great deuotion. There were kept in the same many Virgins. Francis Pizarro <sup>e</sup> sent his brother Hernandi (when he had taken Atabaliba) to spoile this Temple, but the Priests and chiefe men had carried away aboue foure hundred burthens of gold before he came, and none doth know what became of it. Yet did he finde there some quantitie of gold and siluer remaining. They sacked the Sepulchres also, and thence drew abundance of the said mettalls. Froin that time hitherto, the Temple went to ruine.

The Temple of Cusco <sup>f</sup> was very sumptuous, the pauement and stones yet remaine witnessers of the ancient splendor and magnificence. This Temple was like to the Pantheon of the Romans: for that it was the house and dwelling of all the gods. For the Ingwas did there behold the gods of all the Nations and Prouinces they had conquered, every Idoll hauing his proper place, whither they of that Prouince came to worship it, with excessiue charge for the same. And thereby they supposed to keepe safely in obedience those Prouinces which they had conquered, holding their gods as it were in hostage. In this house was the Pinchao, which was an Idoll of the Sunne, of most fine gold wrought with great riches of Stones, the which was placed to the East with so great Arte, as the Sun at his rising did cast his beames thereon, which reflected with such brightnes, that it seemed another Sunne. They say that at the spoile of this Temple, a Souldier had for his part this goodly Pinchao, and lost the same in a night at play, whence grew a prouerbe of Gamesters in Peru, They play the Sunne before Sun-rising. This Temple towards the East (if our Spanish Captaine in Ramusio deceiues not) was couered with gold, which the Spaniards (Religion forbidding Indian helpe) tooke away. There were many boyling pots and other vessels of gold. In the houses of the Citie was great store of gold. In one house or Temple where they sacrificed, was a seat of gold which weighed nineteene thousand Pezos, in which two men might sit. The house wherein old Cusco <sup>g</sup> lay buried, the pauement and walls were couered with gold and siluer, many pots and iarrs were couered with like mettall. Xeres also reporteth the same, who was Pizarros Secretarie, and his Relation subscribed by Pizarro and other Chieftaines: that this Temple was on the pauement, walls, and rooffe, couered with plates of gold and siluer, wrought one into another: and that there were twentie other houses in that Citie, the walls whereof within and without were couered with plates of gold.

Both these Authors, eye-witnesses, report, that at Caramalca was a Temple of the Sunne, (into which they entred vnshod) walled and planted with trees round about: the like is also in every great Towne: heere were many other Temples besides. In the midst was the stately Pallace of Atabaliba, with pleasant gardens and lodgings, in one of which was a golden cisterne, whereto were by two pipes from contrarie passages brought both cold water and hot, to vse them mingled, or asunder at pleasure. The Towne had about two thousand houses, seuered by streets as straight as a line, about two hundred pases long, with walls of stone. Ten dayes iourney from hence, Atabaliba told the Spaniards, that in the way toward Cusco was a Temple generall to all the Countrey, which was very rich with offerings of gold and siluer, much honoured by his father and himselfe: other Temples had their particular Idols; this Idoll was generall, and that the custodie thereof was committed to a wise man, which they thought could foretell things future, by reuelation of the said Idoll.

The Citie of Pachacama was famous for Peruvian deuotions. Their Idoll was placed in a darkesome painted roome, stinking and close shut, made of filthie wood, hauing at his feet many offerings of gold: none but the Ministers of his holies dust enter,

ter, nor touch the walls of the house. Three hundred leagues they came thither on pilgrimage with rich offerings: first speaking to the dore-keeper, who went in & consulted with the Idoll concerning them, and returned his answer. His Priests were of his own appointment, and might not approach to him without preparations of fasting, and abstinence from their wiues. Thorow all the streets of the Citie, and on the principall gates, and round about the Temple, were many Idols of wood which they worshipped. All the Countrey about payed a yearely tribute hereunto. The Spaniards told them this their god was a Diuell, and taught them to defend themselves from him with the signe of the Crosse. Neere to this Temple was an House or Oratorie of the Sunne, on an high place, engirt about with five walls. At Tichicaca was a Temple and Oracle of the Sunne, which had about six hundred men and a thousand women that did seruice therein, and made Chica there. Much gold and wealth was heere offered.

g Cieza cap. 64.

In some part of Peru, & as at Old Port and Puna, they vsed the detestable sinne against Nature: yea, the Diuell so farre preuailed in their beastly deuotions, that there were boyes consecrated to serue in the Temple: and at the times of their sacrifices and solemne Feasts, the Lords and principall men abused them to that detestable filthines. And generally in the Hill-countries, the Diuell vnder shew of holines had brought in that vice. Euery Temple or principal house of adoration kept one man or two or more, which went attired like women, euen from the time of their child-hood, and spake like them, imitating them in euery thing. Vnder * pretext of holinesse and Religion, their principall men, on principall daies, had that hellish commerce. A Frier dealt with two of these Ganimedes, about the filthinesse of this Vice, and they answered that they held it no fault; for from their child-hood they had bin placed there by their Caciques, both for that employment, as also to be Priests and to keep the Temple. Thus farre had they banished Nature, to entertaine Religion, and thus farre had they exiled the soule of Religion, retaining onely a stinking carcasse.

* Tantum Religio potuit suadere malorum.

h Cieza cap. 77. & 80.

At Ganada in <sup>h</sup> Caximalca the Inguas built a Temple in honor of the Sunne. There were Virgins kept which intended nothing but to weaue, and spinne, and dye clothes, for their Idolatrous seruices. The like was in other places. In Guanuco was a stately Palace of great stones, and a Temple of the Sunne adioyning, with a number of Virgins and Ministers, which had thirtie thousand Indians for the seruice thereof. The seruice which most of them did is like to be the tilling of the ground, feeding of cattell, and such like before mentioned, which they were bound to doe for the Inguas, and also for the Gnacas, that is, Idols, and Idoll-houses. But it were a wearisome Pilgrimage to goe and leade my Reader with me, to euery of their Temples, which for the most part had the same Rites, according to that proportion of maintenance which belonged to them.

i Gom. cap. 121.

Gomara i reporteth that their houses of women were as Cloisters or Monasteries, enclosed, that they might neuer goe forth. They gelded men, which should attend on them, cutting off also their noses, and lippes, that they should haue no such appetite: It was death for any to be found false and incontinent. The men that entred in to them were hanged vp by the feete. These made robes for the Idols, and burned the querplus with the bones of white sheepe, and hurled the Ashes into the aire towards the Sunne. If they proued with childe, and sware that Pachacama did it, the issue was preserved.

k Acofta lib. 5. cap. 15.

Of these Monasteries or Nunneries, thus writeth Acofta. There were in Peru, many Monasteries of Virgins, <sup>k</sup> but not any for men (except for their Priests and Sorcerers) at the least one in euery Prouince. In these were two sorts of women; one ancient, which they called Mamacomas, for the instruction of the yong; the other of yong Maidens, placed there for a certaine time, after which they were drawne forth, either for the gods, or for the Ingua. They called this House or Monasterie Aclagunagi, that is, the House of the chosen. Euery Monasterie had his Vicar, or Gouvernour, called Appopanaca, who had libertie to chuse whom he pleased, of what qualitie soeuer, being vnder eight yeares of age, if they seemed to be of a good stature and constitution. The Mamacomas instructed these Virgins in diuers things needfull for the life of man, and in the customes and ceremonies of their gods. Afterwards they tooke them from thence, thence, being about foureteene, sending them to the Court with sure guards, whereof some were appointed to serue the Idols, and Idol-Temples, keeping their Virginitie for euer: some other were for ordinarie sacrifices that were made of Maidens, and other extraordinarie sacrifices, they made for the health, death, or warres of the Inguas: and the rest serued for Wiues and Concubines to the Ingua, or such as he gaue them to. This distribution was renewed every yeare. These Monasteries possessed rents, for the maintenance of these Virgins. No father might refuse his daughter, if the Appapanaca required her: yea, many fathers did willingly offer their daughters, supposing it was a great merit to be sacrificed for the Ingua. If any of these Mamacomas, or * Ael-las were found to haue trespassed against their honor, it was an ineuitable chastisement to burie them aliue, or to put them to death, by some other cruell torment.

* The yong Virgin-Nuns.

The Inguas allowed a kinde <sup>l</sup> of Sorcerers or Sooth-sayers, which (they say) took vpon them what forme and figure they pleased, flying farre thorow the aire in a short time. They talke with the Diuell, who answereth them in certaine stones, or other things, which they reuerence much. They tell what hath passed in the furthest parts; before newes can come. In the distance of two or three hundred leagues, they would tell what the Spaniards did or suffered in their ciuill warres. To worke this diuination, they shut themselves vp into a house and became drunke, till they lost their senses: a day after, they answered to that which was demanded. Some affirme they vse certaine vnctions. The Indians say that the old women doe commonly vse this office of Witch-craft, especially in some places. They tell of things stolne or lost. The Anaconas (which are the seruants of the Spaniards) consult with them, and they make answer, hauing first spoken with the Diuell in an obscure place; so as the Anaconas heare the sound of the voice, but vnderstand it not, nor see any bodie. They vse the Hearbe Uillea, with their Chica (drinke made of Mays) and therewith make themselves drunke, that they may be fit for the Diuells conference. The conference with these Witches is one of the greatest lets to the proceeding of the Gospell amongst them.

Sorcerers.

Among their Religious persons, I may reckon their Confessors. They <sup>m</sup> held opinion that all Aduersities were the effects of sinne: for remedie whereof they vsed sacrifices. Moreouer, they confessed themselves Verbally almost in all Prouinces, and had Confessors appointed by their Superiours to that end, with some Reseruatiō of Cases for the Superiours. They receiued Penance, and that sometimes very sharply, when they had nothing to giue the Confessor. This office of Confessor was likewise exercised by women. The manner of the Tchuyri was most generall in the Prouinces of Collasuo. They discovered by lots, or by the view of some beasts, if any thing were concealed, and punished them with many blowes of a stone vpon the shoulders, vntill they had reuealed all: after that they enioyned them Penance, and did sacrifice. They likewise vsed Confession, when their children, wiues, husbands or Caciques were sick, or in any great exploit. When the Ingua was sicke, all the Prouinces confessed themselves, chiefly those of Collao. The Confessors were bound to hold their Confessions secret, but in certaine cases limited. The sinnes which they chiefly confessed, were, killing one another out of war, stealing, to take another mans wife, to giue poison, or Sorcery to doe any harme, to be forgetfull in the reuerence of their Guacas, not to obserue Feasts, to speake ill off, or to disobey the Ingua. They accused not themselves of secret sinnes. The Ingua confessed himselfe to no man, but to the Sunne, that he might tell them to Viracocha, of him to obtaine forgiuenes: which done, he made a certaine Bath to cleanse himselfe in a running Riuer, saying; I haue told my sinnes to the Sunne, receiue them then Riuer, and carry them to the Sea, where they may neuer appeare more. Others that confessed, vsed likewise those Bathes. When any mans children died; he was holden for a grieuous sinner, saying, that it was for their sinnes, that the sonne died before the father. Such therefore, after they were confessed, were bathed in the said Bathe, and then came a deformed person, to whip them with certaine Nettles. If the Sorcerers or Inchanters, by their lots or diuinations affirmed that any sicke bodie should die, the sicke man makes no difficultie to kill his owne sonne, though he had no other, hoping by that meanes to escape death, saying that in his place he offered his sonne in sacrifice.

sacrifice. The Penances enioyned them in Confessions, were, to fast, to giue apparell, gold, or siluer, to remaine in the Mountaines, and to receiue many stripes vpon the shoulders.

Acoſta li. 5. c. 18.

Sacrifices and offerings,

The sacrifices of the Indians may be <sup>n</sup> reduced into three kindes; of insensible things; of beasts; of men. Of the first sort were their sacrifices of Coca (an herbe of much esteeme) of Mays, Feathers, Gold, and Siluer, in figures of little beasts, or in the forme of that which hee sought for: also of sweete wood, and diuers other things, whereby their Temples became so rich. They made these offerings to obtaine a good winde, health, faire weather, and the like.

Of the second sort of Sacrifices, were their Cuyes, which are like Rabbits, and for rich men in matters of importance, Pacos (the great Camell-fashioned sheepe) with curious obseruation of the numbers, colours, and times. The manner of killing their Sacrifices, is the same which the Moores now vse, hanging the beast by the right forelegge, turning his eyes toward the Sunne, speaking certaine words, according to the qualitie of the Sacrifice. For if it were coloured, they directed their words to the Thunder, that they might want no water; if white, to the Sunne, that hee might shine on them; if gray, to Viracocha. In Cusco they did euery yeare kill and sacrifice with this solemnitie, a shorne sheepe to the Sunne, and did burne it, clad in a red Wastcoate, casting small baskets of Coca into the fire. They sacrificed also small birds on this manner: they kindled a fire of Thornes, and cast the small birds in, certaine Officers going about with round stones, wherein were carued or painted Snakes, Lions, Toads, Tigers, and saying Vsachum, that is, let the victory be giuen vs, with other words. They drew forth certaine blacke sheepe, called Vra, which had bin kept certaine dayes without meat, and therefore vsed these words: So let the hearts of our enemies be weakened as these beasts. And if they found, that a certaine peece of flesh behinde the heart were not consumed by fasting, they tooke it for a bad signe. They sacrificed also certaine black dogs, which they slew and cast into a Plaine, with certaine ceremonies, causing some kind of men to eat the flesh, which they did, lest the Ingua should be hurt with poyson. And for this cause they * fasted from morning till the stars were vp, and then glurted themselves. This was fitting to withstand their enemies gods. They offered shels of the sea to the Fountaines, saying, that the shels were the daughters of the Sea, the mother of all waters. These shels they vsed (in manner) in all Sacrifices. They offered sacrifice of whatsoeuer they did sow, or raise vp. There were Indians appointed to doe these sacrifices to the Fountaines, Springs, and Riuers, which passed through their Townes or by their Farmes, that they might not cease running, but alwaies water their grounds. Gomara <sup>o</sup> saith, that their Priests married not, went little abroad, fasted much, although no Fast lasted aboue eight dayes; and that was in their Seed-time, and in Harvest, and in gathering of gold, and making warre, and talking with the Diuell: yea some of them (I think) for feare, because they are blind-folded when they speak with him, put out their eyes; they enter into the Temples weeping and lamenting, which the word * Guaca signifieth. They touch not their Idolls with their hands, without cleane and white linnen, they burie in the Temples the offerings of gold and siluer, in their sacrifices they crie aloud, and were neuer quiet all that day nor night: they annointed with bloud the faces of their Idols, and doores of their Temples; they sprinkle also their Sepulchres. The P Sorcerers did coniure, to know what time the sacrifices should be made, which being ended, they did gather of the contribution of the people what should be sacrificed, and deliuered them to such as had charge of the Sacrifices. In the beginning of Winter, at such time as the waters increased by the moisture of the weather, they were diligent in sacrificing to the Waters. They did not sacrifice to the Fountaines and Springs of the Desarts. And euen to this day continueth this their respect to these Springs and Riuers. They haue a speciall care to the meeting of two Riuers, and there they wash themselves for their health, first annointing themselves with the flower of Maiz, or some other things, adding thereto diuers ceremonies, which they doe likewise in their Bathes.

Their third kind of Sacrifices was the most vnkinde and vnnaturall, namely, of men: We haue shewed before of their butcheries, at the burialls of their great Lords. Besides sides this they vsed in Peru to sacrifice young children, from foure or six yeeres old to ten: the greatest part of Sacrifices were for the affaires that did import the Ingua, as in sickenesse for his health, for victory in war, at the Coronation or giuing him the Royall Roll. In this solemnity they sacrificed two hundred children. The maner of the Sacrifice, was to drowne and bury them with certaine ceremonies: sometimes they cut off their heads, annoynting themselues with the blood from one eare to the other. They did likewise sacrifice Virgins, of such as were brought from their Monasteries. The common sort (as you haue heard) being like to die, would sacrifice their owne sonnes to the Sun or Yracocha, desiring him to be so content, and spare the fathers life.

Xeres relateth that they sacrificed their children; and with their blood annointed their idols faces, and their Temple-dores, and sprinkled the same also on the Sepulchers of the dead; and that those which are sacrificed, goe thereunto voluntarily with dances, songs, and mirth.

When they sacrificed, they obserued the heart and other the inward parts for diuination, and if they saw a good signe (after their bad construction) they danced and sung with great merriment; if a bad, they were very heauy: but, good or bad, they would be sure to drinke deepe. They eat not their humane Sacrifices, but sometimes dried them and preserued them in Coffins of Siluer.

It were an endlesse toyle, to reckon vp all the superstitions of Peru; in which were so many Nations, agreeing in disagreeing from truth, yet disagreeing in their diuersified errors. To let passe Paucura, which fat, sacrifice, and eat their Captiues, and euery Tuesday offer two Indians to the Deuill: and the drunken Prouince of Carrapa, where they eat little, and drinke much, at once drinking in, and pissing out: the Mitimaes which are carely at their meat, and make but one drinking in the day (which lastes from morning till night) by Bacchu Priuiledge enioying without controll any woman they like: The Canari put their wiues to the drudgery abroad, whiles themselues spin, weatie, tricke vp themselues, and performe other womanish functions at home: The Galani make their Captiues drunke, and then the chiefe Priest cutteth off their heads, and sacrificeth them. Generally, in the Mountaines they were more cruell, but all obserued bloody, beastly, diabolically ceremonies, the recounting whereof must needes weary the patientest Reader.

CHAP. XII.

Of their supputation of Times, of the Feasts, Sepulchres, and other Peruvian superstitions.

BEfore wee speake of the Peruvian Festiuall times, it is not amisse to take some more generall view of their Calendar. They diuided their yeere into so many daies iust as wedo, and into so many Moneths or Moones. To make the Computation of their yeere certaine, they vsed this industrie: Vpon the Mountaines about Cusco there were twelue pillars set in order, and in such distance, as euery moneth one of these pillars did note the rising and setting of the Sunne. They called them Saccanga; by meanes whereof, they taught and shewed the Feasts, and the seasons fit to sow, and reape, and for other things. They did certaine Sacrifices to these Pillars of the Sunne. Euery moneth had his peculiar name and Feasts. They sometimes began the yeere in Ianuary: but since, an Ingua called Pachacuto, which signifieth a Reformer of the Temple, began their yeere in December, by reason, as it seemeth, of the Sunnes retorne from Capricorne, their neereff Tropicke. I reade not of any weekes they obserued: for which they had not so certaine a rule, as the Sunnes course was for the yeere, and the Moones for the Moneth.

They obserued in Peru two kinds of Feasts: some ordinary, which fell out in certaine moneths of the yeere, and others extraordinary, which were for certaine causes of importance. Euery moneth of the yeere they made Feasts and Sacrifices: and had this alike, the offering of a hundred sheepe, but of vnlike colour and forme, according to the moneth. In the first moneth they made their first and principall Feast, ther efore called Capactayme, that is to say, a rich & principall Feast. In it they offered a great number of Sheepe and Lambes in Sacrifice, and burnt them with sweet wood: then they caused Gold and Siluer to be brought vpon certaine Sheepe, setting vpon them three Images of the Sunne, and three of the Thunder, the Father, the Sonne, and the Brother. In these Feasts they dedicated the Inguas Children, putting the Guacas or Ensignes vpon them, and they pierced their eares: then some old man did whip them with slings, and annoynt their faces with bloud, in signe that they should be true Knights to the Ingua. No stranger might remaine in Cusco during this moneth, and this Feast, but at the end thereof they entered, and were made partakers of the Feasts and Sacrifices after this maner. The Mamacomas or Nunnes of the Sunne made little loaves of the flower of Maiz, died and mingled with the bloud of white Sheepe, which they did sacrifice that day: Then they commanded that all Strangers should enter, who set themselves in a certaine order: and the Priests which were of a certaine linage, descending from Linquí Tupangui,<sup>d</sup> gaue to euery one a morsell of these small loaves, saying that they gaue it them to the end they should be vnited and confederate with the Ingua: and that they aduised them not to speake or thinke any euill against the Ingua, but alwaies to beare him good affection:

for that this peece should be a witnesse of their intentions, and if they did not as they ought, would discouer them. They carried these small loaves in great platters of Gold and siluer, appointed for that purpose; and all did receiue and eat those peeces, thanking the Sunne and the Ingua. This manner of communicating they vsed likewise in the tenth moneth called Coyarayme, which was September, in the Feast called Cytina. They likewise sent of these loaves to all the Guacas of the Realme, whither the people assembled to receiue them: to whom they said that the Sunne had sent them that, in signe that hee would haue them honour him, and the Caciques. This continued from the time of In-gua Tupangui, whom we may call the Peruvian Nunna, till the Spaniards substituted in place thereof their Masse, a masse of * more monstrous absurdities (in their transubstan-tiation, bread-worshipping, God-eating, which they can also vse to combine subiects, not to their Inguas or lawfull Princes, but against them, as our Pouder-traitours did) then the former, not-with-standing the fairest pretexts of Christian and Catholike titles.

But to returne to our Capactayme, it is strange that the Diuell had not only brought in an Apish imitation of Christian Sacraments, but of the Trinity also in their Pagan rites. For the Father, Sonne, and Brother, called Apomii, Churumii and Intiquaoqui, that is, Father Sun, Son Sun, Brother Sun, had some shew of that great mysterie. In like manner they named the three Images of the Chuquilla, or God of the Aire, whence are thunders, raines, and snowes. They had one Guaca where they worshipped an Idoll called Tangatanga, which they said was one in three, and three in one. Thus doth the Diuell despite the truth, which he would seeme to imitate. In the second moneth, called Camay, besides the sacrifices which they made, they cast the ashes into the Riuer, following five or six leagues after, praying it to carry them into the Sea, for that the Viracocha should there receiue this present.

In the third, fourth, and fifth moneth, they offered a hundered sheepe, blacke, speckled, and grey, with many other things. In the sixth moneth they offered a hundered sheepe more, of all colours: and then made a feast; bringing Maiz from the fields into the house, which they yet vse. This Feast is made, coming from the Farme to the house, saying certaine songs, and praying that the Maiz may long continue. They put a quantity of the Maiz (the best that groweth in their Farmes) in a thing which they call Pirna, with certaine Ceremonies, watching three nights. Then doe they put it in the richest garment they haue, and being thus wrapped and dressed, they worship this Pirna, holding it in great veneration, and saying, it is the mother of the Maiz of their inheritances, and that by this meanes the Maiz augments, and is preferred. In this moneth they make a particular sacrifice, and the Witches demand of this Pirna, if it hath strength enough to continue vntill the next yeere. And if it answers no, then they carry this Maiz to the Farme whence it was taken, to burne, and make an other Pirna as before: & this foolish vanity still continueth. In the seuenth moneth they made the Feast

Intiraymi

Intiraymi and sacrificed a hundreded Guanacos in honour of the Sunne: they made many Images of Quinya-wood carved, all attired with rich garments, they danced, and cast flowers in the high-waies, and thither came the Indians painted and singing.

In the eight Moneth they burned an hundreded sheepe, all grey, of the colour of Uiscacha with the former solemnities. In Yapaguia their ninth Moneth, they burnt a hundreded sheepe of Chesnut colour; and likewise a thousand Cuyes (a kind of Rabber) to the end the Frost, Aire, Water, and Sunne, should not hurt their Farmes. In the tenth Moneth called Coyarami, they burnt a hundred white sheepe that had fleeces; and then they made the Feast Situa in this manner. They assembled together the first day of the Moone before the rising thereof, carrying Torches in their hands: and when they saw it, they cried aloud, saying, <sup>d</sup>Let all harme goe away, striking one another with their Torches: which being done, they went to the common Bath, to the Rivers and Fountains, and every one to his owne Bath, setting themselves to drinke foure daies together. In this Moneth also the Mamacomas made their loaues (as is said) of communicating with the Sunne, and the Inguas. The Bathes, drunkenesse, and some reliques of this feast Situa remaine still, with the ceremonies a little different, but very secretly. In the eleventh Moneth they offered also three hundreded sheepe. And if they wanted water to procure raine, they set a blacke sheepe tied in the midst of a Plaine, pourcing much Chica about it, and giuing it nothing to eat till it rained. This <sup>e</sup>Chica is a drinke or wine made of Maiz, steeped and boyled, and wil sooner make one drunke then wine of grapes: they haue another way to make it, by champing the Maiz, which they hold then best, when it is done (after the beastliest manner) by old withered women. This drunken people will spend whole daies and nights in drinking it, and it is therefore forbidden by the Law. But what Law can preuaile against the Deuill and the drunkard? Wee neede not goe to Peru to prooue this.

Chica, what it is.

The twelfth and last Moneth they sacrificed a hundreded sheepe, and solemnised the Feast called Raymacantar Rayquis. In this Moneth they prepared what was necessary for the children that should be made Nouices: the moneth following the old men made a certaine shew, together with the Children, in Rounds and Turnings, which they commonly doe, when it raineth too much, or too little, and in the time of Plague.

Among the extraordinary Feasts (which were many) the most famous was that which they call Ym. This had no time prefixed, but by Necessity or Distresse. And then the people prepared themselves thitherto, by fasting two daies; during which they did neither company with their wiues, nor eat any meat with salt or garlick, nor drinke any Chica. All did assemble together in one place, where no stranger, nor any beast might be admitted; they had garments and ornaments which serued only for this Feast. They marched very quietly <sup>f</sup>in Procession, their heads covered with their valles, sounding of drummes, without speaking one to another. This continued a Day and a Night: The day following they danced and made good cheere for two dayes and two nights together, saying, that their prayer was accepted. Euen still they vse one which is somewhat like this, called Ayma, with garments onely seruing to that end, and make procession with their Drummes, hauing fasted before, concluding with good cheere. And although the Indians forbear sacrifices because of the Spaniards, yet they vse many ceremonies still, which had their beginning from their Ancient superstitions.

Now concerning their funerals. The Indians of Peru beleue commonly, that the soule liued after this life, and that the good were in glory, and the bad in paine. They vsed a wonderfull care <sup>h</sup>to preserue the bodies, which they honoured after death: their successours gaue them garments, and made sacrifices to them, especially of the Inguas, of whom we haue spoken before. In their bloudie funerals the women he loued best was slaine, and multitudes of other attendants of all sorts for his new family in the other world, and that, after many songs and drunkenesse. They sacrificed to them many things, especially young children, and with the bloud they made a stroke on the dead mans face, from one eare to another. This cruelty is common through a great part of the East and West Indies, as in their places this History doth shew you: wittily auoyded once by a Portugal <sup>i</sup>, who was a captiue, and to be slaine at the funerals of his Lord, & hauing but one eye, saw better to saue his life then if he had had both. For he told them that such a deformed and maimed fellow would be a disgrace to his Master in the other life, and so perswaded the Executors, or Executioners (if you wil) to seeke a new choice. The Indians haue another ceremony more general, which is to set meat and drinke vpon the graue of the dead, imagining they did feede thereon. At this day, many Indian Infidels doe secretly draw their dead out of the Churchyard, and bury them on hills, or vpon passages of Mountaines, or else in their owne houses. They haue also vsed to put Gold and Siluer in their mouth, hands, and bosome, and to apparrell them with new garments, durable, and well lined. They beleeeue, that the soules of the dead wander vp and downe, induring cold, thirst, hunger, and trauell*: and for this cause they vse their Anniversaries, carrying them clothes, meat, and drinke.

I Rich Sepulchers.

Pedro de Cieza <sup>k</sup> reporteth, that in Cenu in the Prouince of Cartagena (which we heere mention for proximity of rites, rather then of place) neere to a Temple built in honour of the Deuil, there was taken forth an innumerable quantity of Sepulchers, more then a million of them, old and new. Himselfe was there present. Much treasure is found in the Graues. Iuan de la Torre tooke forth of one Sepulchre <sup>l</sup> more then fūe hundred thousand pezoes. The great men adorned their Sepulchres with Vaults and Towers, and had with them interred their women, seruants, meat, chicha, armes and ornaments. He addeth, that the Deuill (in the shape of some principall person deceased) would sometimes appeare, and shew them newes out of that other world, how he liued and fared there. And hence (it seemes) came that spoyle of so much wealth, and so many persons for their funerals. But take heed (Reader) that you doe not beleeeue it was the Deuill that was wont to appeare in some habite of afflicted soules, and demanded Dirges and Masses for their manumission out of Purgatory: alas the Diuell was confined to the Indies, and would neuer haue beene so good a Purueyor for the Popes Kitchin. And certes, if our Christian ancessors had not their wiues and goods buried in their graues, with food, rayment, and ornaments: yet these things were also buried with them, whiles the feares of Purgatory made them willing to endow the Priests and Monasteries, and bestow on Lights, and other rites, that which should haue maintayned their houses, their wiues, and children. But how come we from Peru to Rome? Nay, how comes Rome, if not from Peru, as more lately discovered, yet with Peru, and with, and from, other Heathen Nations in the world, in her manifold ceremonies and superstitious rites? as this Relation of Peru, for their Confessions, Processions, and many other rites wil shew and one day I hope more fully to acquaint the world, when we come in our Pilgrimage to visite Christian-Antichristian Rome. Worse Sepulchers then the former (to returne to our Ameri. History) were those which Herera mentions within 50. leagues of Popayan where the husband hath beene seene to eat the wife, father and sonne, brother and sister haue renewed a neerer proximity and butcherly incorporation: where Captiues are fatted and brought forth with songs, his members by peece-meale cut off and eaten whiles himselfe liueth and seeth it. Since the inhabijing of S. James of Arima, they haue eaten more then 8000. Indians and some Spaniards.

This our Author testifieth (let vs a little view the present state of Peru) that Los Reyes in 12. degrees consisteth of 3000. households: it is one of the best climates in the world, not subiect to plagues, hunger, raine, thunder, but alwaies cleere. It is the seat of the Viceroy and royall Councel and Inquisition, John Ellis which was partner of Sir Richard Hawkins his aduentures, saith that Lima is neere as bigge as London within the wals: the houses are of Lome: there are nigh 100000. Indians brought in courtes thither to the Mines by the Caliques. Betwene Cusco and Potosi is continuall trade; the Lords by the way will entertaine men with abundance of plate, and gard (if they like) them with three or foure hundreded Indians. Imperiall village of Potosi is in nineteene degrees, it hath fūe hundreded households of Spaniards, and about fifty thousand Indians going and coming. Alexandro Vrsino who saith he liued in Peru thirty and foure yeeres, and had trauelled thorow all the Kingdome) hath written that in Potosi and Pouo are three hundreded

AND now I must obey the Spaniards Law, which will admit no strangers trafficke in Peru, and are iealous of any corruall, which shall holde longer and more familiar discourse with America, although they haue rather forced her to their lusts, then wooed her to their loues. I also begin to grow weary of this trauell in another World, willing to looke home-wards; and therefore am now embarqued on the Peruvian coast, where the Peaceable Sea may free me of those former dangers whereto my Pilgrimage was subiect, in passing along snowie and fiery hills, deceitful, vnwholsome bogges, scorching sandy plaines, wildernesses inhabited with wilde beasts, habitations peopled with wilder and more beastly men; and now by this commodity of my Paper-barke, I may both direct my course home-wards, * and yet walke, as intending another contrary, or diuerse Voyage. And euen as those heauenly Planets in their Wandering and yet most constant course, are guided by the generall motion of that vniuersall Wheele, and yet forget not their owne peculiar: so I, in my wandering Discoveries propound all and euery place of the World, to be the place of my exercise and subiect of my Labour, but yet the smoke of Ithaca <sup>c</sup> is sweetest, and my knowing all, would be but a melancholy maze, if I should not come home to fill English eares with the newes. The Reader also, by this time wearied, will be glad to heare of an end.

9. pa. Americ.

In this sea we may see many Islands which Nature hath seemed to set, as Centinels along the coast, to hold their watch, as skowts to espie, and as Garrisons to defend their Soueraigne, Earth, lest the Ocean (by secret vndermining, or by violent and tempestuous force, should be too busie an incroacher.

The Earth also on this <sup>d</sup> side finding her selfe more strongly assailed then on the other, hath sommoned them all home to her borders, and placed them for her better defence in stations neere her, not suffering them to stray abroad, as in other Seas is vsuall: so that there are almost no Islands in this widest of seas, the Peaceable, but neare the maine. If there be any, they are obscure, small, and not worthy our relation: As for those of Salomon and New Guinea, with their neighbours, they are reckoned to <sup>e</sup> another Continent, if they be not Continent themselves; and for the Archipelago of St. Lazaro, these Islands may be reckoned vnuely borderers, which while it is vncertaine whether they should acknowledge the soueraignty of Asia, Terra Australis, or America, are loyall to none; and therefore, where they are best knowne, are knowne by the name of <sup>f</sup> Theeues; a name fitting their nature and disposition. Thus did Magellane <sup>g</sup> finde them, from whom (besides other things) they stole his Boate, which by force hee was forced to recouer. Such did our Countrey-men <sup>h</sup> in Master Candishes renowned Voyages finde them, who saw also their Images of Wood in the head of their Boates, like the Images of the Diuell; Temple, and Saint, best fitting their deuotions: and such did Oliver Noort finde them, who came crying about him, yron, yron, offering him fruits in exchange for peeces of yron, and if any opportunity offered it selfe, stealing closely, or openly, any thing they could lay hold on. They shot at them in vaine, so active were they in diuing vnder the water, and continuing there, as if they had bene fitted alike to both Elements. The women also, no lesse then the men. They are a beastly people, polluting

themselves in promiscuous lusts, and branded (many of them) with the marks of their intemperance; the pockes having eaten their noses and lippes. They are browne, fat, long of stature: the men goe naked; the women weare a leafe before them, so that they beare some resemblance to the Pictures of Adam and Eve. Their boates are twenty foote long, and but a foot and halfe broad, cunningly wrought. They are extremely greedy of yron, of which mettall the Hollanders cast five peeces into the Sea, to trie them, and one of them fetcht them all out. But lest these Theenes rob vs of our intended Deuotions, and our Reader of patience in longer stay here, we will looke backe towards the Straits, & so compasse the other side of America. Many Ilands we may see here neare the shore, all along as we passe. But what should we trouble the Reader with names? I haue small deuotion to them, vnlesse I had some intelligence of some deuotion in them, further then that wherein they agree with the Peruvian rites, wherewith you were last tired.

* Certaine fowles which breed on the Ilands.

In the Straits are some Ilands of small quantitie, of smaller dignitie: and who would stay there, where the Penguins* are your best Hosts? the rest are Giants or Man-eating Sauages: and in the next, out of the Straits, but Seales, who all can yeeld but an inhospitable hospitality. Neither hath prouident Nature in all those coasts of Chica, or Brasil, beene prodigall of her Iland-store, foreseeing that they would, neither be vsurped by Seales and Sea-monsters, or other more vnnaturall and monstrous inhumane shape, of deuillish inhumanity, from the Land. It seemes she hath beene the more sparing in the numbers, noblenesse, or quantity of Ilands in all those Seas, which we haue most swiftly furrowed, that shee might in the great Bay more bountifullly impart her plenty, and shew her excellence in that kind. This is a great field, as it were sowne with Ilands of all sorts; the Earth seemes a louing mother, which holds open her spacious lap, and holdes out her stretched armes betweene Paria and Florida: the Ocean also, as iealous of the earths more naturall inheritance and claime vnto them, seemes to neglect his course to the Southward, and here sets in with a violent current, alway forcing his watery forces to walke (or rather to runne and flie) these rounds, to see that the Continent keepe her hand off, and not once touch his conquered possessions; that though (like Tantalus) she seemeth alwaies to be closing her open hands, and mouth vpon them; yet are they kept by this officious watchfulnesse of the Sea, that she can neuer incorporate and vnite them to her selfe. Easily can they vnfold this mystery, that are acquainted with the site of the Earth, & the swiftnesse of the Current in this vast space of Earth and Sea, setting in at Paria, and after cut againe at Florida, with admirable and incredible violence.

k Pet. Mar. dec. 3. l. 6.

To begin then at Paria: (for of Orenoque and his mouth-full of Ilands, and of Trinidad, that hath escaped the Riuer, and betaken her selfe wholly to Neptunes Loues, we haue already spoken.) Here two rowes and rankes of Ilands make shew and muster of themselves: the one extending East and West, the other North and South. Of the former is Margarita, which (like many a Gallant, whose backe robbeth his belly, whose bowels empty of necessities, alway are croaking and complayning of superfluity in ornament and fashion) so hath she a World of Pearles to adorne her, but wanteth water to satisfie her thirst: store of Pearles she can communicate of her plenty; water she is faine to borrow of her neighbours.

* Mundus muliebris.

The like we may say of Cubagua her next neighbour, that by her store of Pearles hath won suiters from our, and the American world, whom she can neither bid eat or drinke of her Land-hospitality, where Grasse and Water are wanting. But as it vsually comes to passe with these Fashion-mongers, which neglecting necessities, must at last be neglected of their ornaments too: So this Iland which sometimes was so rich, notwithstanding all her Pearles she pawned for her diet, that the Kings<sup>1</sup> fist amounted ordinarily to fiftene thousand Duckats a yeere, yet now seemes almost beggered; her Pearle-fishes and Pearle-fishers, most of them gone, and now it is time for vs to be gone from her too.

Yet Let vs heare this relation of Herrera* before we goe, of an Earth-quake which hapned there the first of September 1530, which raised the Sea foure sadome, ouerthrew the Fortresse, opened the earth in many places, whence issued much salt-water as blacke as Inke, stinking of Brimstone. Many dyed of feare and some were drowned. Captaine William Parker a thousand six hundred and one, hauing taken Puerto Bello, and Melendes the Gouvernour, landed in Margarita and receiued five hundred pound in pearle for ransome of prisoners: tooke a ship which came from Angola with three hundred and seuentie Negroes. Oniedo hath written in his nineteenth booke of the Iland of Cabagna. It hath no trees and but little grasse. There is a Fountaine on the East part thereof, neere the Sea, which casteth forth a bituminous substance like Oyle, which is said to be profitable for medicine, and may be found two or three Leagues floting in the Sea.

Little businesse, can we finde any further, in following that Westerne ranke, Orchilia, Oruba, and the rest, and therefore will looke Northwards, to that other ranke wee spake of: where leauing Tobago on the right hand, wee see before vs Granata, Saint Vincent, Saint Lucia, Dominica; and then circling to the North-west, Desiderata. Saint Christopher, Holy Croffe, and others, whose names, without other matter of History, would be but tedious to the Reader. These, and a multitude of others vnmencioned, are called the Ilands of the Caribes, or Canibals. The inhabitants eate mans flesh, and passe to other Ilands with their Boates to the hunting of Men, as other Hunters doe for Beasts. Carib signifieth stranger; for so the more innocent Indians esteeme them.

At home they onely couer their priuities, but in time of warre they vse many ornaments. They are nimble, bearded (vsing little Pincers to pull out the haire) shoot poysoned Arrowes, bore holes in their eares and nostrils for elegancie, which the richer sort decke with gold, the poorer with shells. From the tenth or twelfth yeare of their age they carrie leaues, to the quantitie of Nuts, all the day in eyther cheek, which they take not out, but when they receiue meate or drinke. With that medicine they make their teeth blacke: they call other men, Women, for their white teeth, and Beasts for their haire. Their teeth continue to the end of their liues without ach or rottenesse.

When the men went on man-hunting. (which they did sometimes in long and farre expeditions) the Women manfully defended the Coast against their Enemies: and hence it is in Martyrs b iudgement, that the Spaniards tell of Ilands inhabited only with women: which may be c the true interpretation, happily, of I know not how many places in America, besides those of Asia and Africa, reported Amazonian. Pontius d would warre vpon the Canibals, but on the Iland of Guadalupea his women were taken, his men slaine, himselfe forced to depart from that both place and enterprife. Columbus in his second Voiage landed on this Iland, where hee saw their round houses, hanging beds of Cotton, and certaine Images which hee had thought had bene their Gods: but by interpreters after learned, that they were but for ornament, and that they worshipped nothing but the Sunne and Moone, although they make certaine Images of Cotton, to the similitudes of such phantasies as (they said) appeared to them in the night. They found Earthen vessels, like ours, also in their Kitchens, Mans flesh, Duckes flesh, and Goose flesh, all in one pot, and other on the spits, readie to be laied to the fire. Entering into their inner lodgings, they found faggots of the bones of mens armes and legges, which they reserue to make heades for their Arrowes. They found in their Villages one Hall, or Pallace, to which they assemble, as to their Theatre, or Playing place.

The Inhabitants at the sight of the Spaniards were fled. In their houses they found about thirtie children Captiues, which were reserued to be eaten, but they tooke them for their Interpreters. Here they had Parrots bigger then Pheasants, with backs, breasts, and bellies of Purple colour. They vsed to prey on Hispaniola, and St. Johns Ilands, or Buriquen: and if these, in their warres with the Canibals, tooke any of them, they were sure to goe to pot (euen in the first sense and to be eaten. Master Perry saith in Guadalupea they found a bath so hote, that it boyled them a peece of porke in halfe an houre. In Menis also they found a bath like ours in England. In Mona they killed two wilde Boares, and saw a wilde Bull which was an ell betweene the hornes. Three Leagnes from thence in Monetta where the Fowles flew ouer them as thicke as haile, and made them deafe, with their noyle : they cannot fet foot on the ground but shall tread on Fowles or Egges, wherewith they laded two Boates in three houres. Master Challenge sayth that in the seven Antiles of Saint Vincent, Granado, Lucia, Matalina, Dominica, Guadalupa, and Aysey, are not aboute one thousand Indians. They brought away a Frier named Blasens which had beene fixeteene monethes slaue in Dominica, whom they saued, his fellowes being slaine, because he taught them to make Sayles.

a Nau. M. Iohn
Hawkins, ap.
Hak. tom. 3.

A little before Master Hawkins was there, in the yeare 1564. <sup>a</sup> a Spanish Carauell comming to water at Dominica, one of the Caniball Ilands, the Sauages cut her Cable in the night, and so she draue on shore, and all her companie was surprised and eaten by them.

b S. R. Hawkins.

Master George Percy relateth of these Dominicans (which they visited in their Virginia Voyage) that they paint themselues to keep of the Muskius: that they weare the haire of their heads a yard long, platted in three plaits, suffer none on their faces, cut their skinnies in diuers workes or embroderies : they eat their enemies ; lap spittle, spit into their mouthes like dogges ; worship the Deuill ; poyson their Arrowes. When they were here they had fight of the chiefe game which Nature yeeldeth, the fight of the Whale with the Sword-fish and Thresher, which killed him in two houres fight. The Sword-fish is not <sup>b</sup> great but strong-made ; his sword groweth vp right out of his necke, like a bone foure or fve inches broad and aboute a yard long (sometimes they are greater) with prickles on both sides.

c The like Sea-hawking is betweene the flying fish (which hath as it were Battes winges) & the bird Alcatraz, and the Bonito, the one in the aire, the other in the Sea pursuing him.

The Thresher hath a broade and thicke taile. Both these hold a naturall conspiracie against this Giant of Nature, the one on the top <sup>c</sup> of the water threshing him vpon the head with violent blowes, that sound as a peece of Ordnance, and may bee heard two leagues ; forcing him to hide his head in his Mothers lappe, which yet betrayeth him there to the Sword-fish who is readie to receiue him on his naturall blade, and staineth the Sea with his blood. The Whale hath no remedie, but with bellowing grones heard further then the Threshers blowes, to seeke to the shore, and their embayed to make his part good without danger of an vnderminer : other wise becomming pray to these his aduersaries. Thus we see greatnesse not alway exempt from dangers, yea perishing by fine force of weaker enemies. This our Authour (for we cannot passe from Iland to Iland but by Sea, and may not be wholly idle by the way) telleth that betwixt the Tropikes they were attended continually with three kinds of fishes, Dolphins, Bonitos, and Sharkes, the first like to the Rain-bowe, his head differing from other fishes being halfe a spanne straight vp erected from his mouth, the greatest foure foot long : a scole of these followed them neere one thousand Leagues knowne to bee the same by some hurts wherewith they had marked them.

d Oranges, Limons, and the like are excellent remedies to this disease.

The Bonitos are like Mackerils, but greater, some as bigge as a man could lift. The Sharkes haue their mouths vnder their bellies, that they cannot bite their prey without a halfe turne with the helpe of his taile. These are the most rauinous and some hold, ominous : they haue found in their bellies, Hattes, Cappes, Shooes, Ropes ends, and whatsoeuer hanged by the Shippes sides : they haue thirteene rowes of teeth. They spawne not, but whelp, like the Dogge, or Wolfe, and at night or towards stormes, receiue their young into their mouthes for safetie. I haue seene them (sayth Sir Richard) goe in and out being aboute a foot and halfe long. Little fishes, alway accompanie them and feede on the scraps : they are lesse then a Pilchard, streaked blacke and white (as in coloured Liueries) keeping on the head, finnes and backe of the other.

Another obseruation of this our Authour is the Scuruie or Scorbute <sup>d</sup> whereunto they are much subiect in Navigations neere the Line ; the cause hee ascribeth, the weaknesse, of the stomacke in immoderate heat ; salt meates, specially Fish, Calmes and the Sea-water which could not but infect the World, if it were not otherwise affected and mooued with Windes, Tides, and Currents : an instance whereof hee sheweth in the Queenes Nauie in the yeare of our Lord one thousand fve hundred foure score and tenne at the Afores many monethes be calme, the Sea thereby being replenireplenished with severall sorts of gellies and formes of Serpents, Adders, and Snakes, Greene, Yellow, Blacke, White, and some partie-coloured, whereof many had life, being a yard and halfe, or two yardes long. And they could hardly draw a Bucket of Water, cleare of some corruption withall. In twentie yeares wherein hee vsed the Sea<sup>d</sup>, hee could giue account of two thousand consumed with this disease.

In this Voyage they were forced for want of fresh Water to distill Sea water, which they found wholesome and nourishing. I might follow our Authour in his obseruations of these Seas, (which hee sayth, vnder the Line, is best to crosse in Ianuarie, Februarie and March) and of the Ilands of Cape Verde <sup>a</sup> (elsewhere by vs obserued) being in the height of these Ilands where now we are discouering: which he sayth, are the most vnwholsome in the World, and had halfe his people on this Coast sicke of shaking, burning, frenzie-feuers; a man can scarcely goe on the earth, though well shodde, when the Sunne shineth: and the Beerze which in the afternoone cooles them from the North-east, peirceth them also with sudden cold; so that the Inhabitants goe thicke clothed with Cappes and Kierchers besides their Hats, their Suites of thicke cloth, and Gownes well lined or furred to prevent danger: Sleeping in the open Ayre, or in the Moone-shine, is there very vnholosome: The Moone shining on his shoulder on the Coast of Guinee left him with such paine, that for twentie houres space hee was like to runne madde. But what Moone-shine hath made mee Lunatike to runne from these American Ilands, to those and the Coast, of Africa? Patience Reader and I will bring thee backe in a fresher pursuit.

In Dominica (where we were last on shore) it is related by one which wrote the Earle of Cumberland his voyage to Port Rico, that they haue their severall houses to other vses priuate, but haue a common Hall or Dyet for to eat in together, as Lycurgus instituted to prevent riot, amongst his Spartans. The Maides in this Iland are said to weare no garters, and the first night of their marriage they tie them so hard that the flesh hangs ouer.

In Tortuga they tolled certaine Spaniards a shore, vnder pretence of Traffique, and then ate them. Boriquen<sup>b</sup> or Saint Johns is three hundred myles long, and threescore and ten broad, trauesed with a rough Mountaine, which yeeldes many Riuers. The Spaniards haue there some Townes.

The Earle of Cumberland in the year 1597. hauing by his Sea forces stayed the going of fise Carikes to the Indies, whereby the King of Spaine lost three millions and the Marchants foure times as much; sailed to Saint Iohn Port Rico in this Iland, and tooke it with diuers forts; here was a Bishops see <sup>c</sup> and Cathedrall Church with a Frierie, foure hundred Souldiers in pay besides three hundred others: it was accounted the Maiden Towne and inuincible, and is the Spanish Key and their first Towne in the Indies. He brought from thence neere 80. cast Peeeces and much other wealth. This Iland was first conquered by John Ponce and by him inhabited: the Naturals were altogether like in Religion and manners to the Inhabitants of Hispaniola: and so were the plants and fruits also. Oniedo hath written hereof largely in his sixteenth booke. There growes the Tree called Legnosanto more excellent then Guaiacan for the Neapolitan and manie other diseases: there is also white Gumme good for ships in stead of pitch, and there are Bats which the inhabitants did eat. These Ilands are not so well peopled as in former times: and many of them are retyring places of Rebels and Fugitiues; which take this shelter against the Spanish cruelties. Hispaniola is the next Iland of name, but shall haue a place by it selfe, as a Map and Summarie of all the other.

Jamaica is almost as large as Boriquen. <sup>d</sup> It is extremely subiect to the Uracani, which are such terrible gusts of Winde that nothing can resist them. They turne vp Trees, ouer-turne Houses, transport the Shippes from Sea to Land, and bring with them a most dreadfull and horrible confusion. They raigne, or tyrannize rather, in August, September, and October. <sup>e</sup> The Inhabitants are of quicker wits then the other Ilands.

salt and fresh. This Island hath had manie names giuen by the Spaniards; Fernandina, Ioanna, Alpha and Omega. The Woodes are replenished with Swine and Kine; the Riuers yeeld Golden Sands. It hath sixe Spanish Colonies. Saint Iago, a Bishops See, is the chiefe Towne in the Island; and Hanana is the chiefe Port of the Indies. Oniedo reckons two things most admirable therein: one a Valley, trending betweene two Hills three Leagues, which produceth abundance of Stones, enough to lade many Shippes, of a perfect round forme, like Bullets: The other a Fountaine, whence Bitumen, or a certaine Pitchie substance floweth and floreth euen to the Sea, excellent for pitching of Shippes. In this Island the common people were prohibited the eating of Serpents, as being reserued for Royall dainties, and the Prerogatiues of the Kings Table.

b Mart. Dec. 7. li. 2.

Columbus b sayling by this Island, lighted into a Nauigable Riuer, the Water whereof was so hotte, that none might endure his hand long therein. Hee espied also a Canoe of fisher-men, which after a strange fashion vsed to hunt Fish, and take them by the helpe of another Fish, which they kept tyed in a Cord by the Boats side, and when they espied a Fish, loosed the cord; this hunting Fish presently layes holde on the prey, and with a skinne like a purse growing behind her head, graspeth it so fast, that by no meanes it can bee taken from her, till they draw her vp above the Water, and then not able to abide the Ayre, shee resigneth her prey to the Fishers, which leape out into the Water, and take it; in recompence whereof they giue her part of her purchase. Hee found also in his Coast Waters, for the space of fortie myles, white and thicke like Milke, and as though Meale had bene strewed through that Sea: other waters he found spotted with white and blacke, and others all blacke. An olde man of fourescore yeares being a Gouvernour in this Island, came to Columbus, and with great grauitie saluted him, and counsellled him to vse his victories well, remembring, that the Soules of Men haue two Iourneyes, after they are departed from their bodies: The one foule and darke, prepared for iniurious and cruell persons: the other pleasant and delectable, for the peaceable, and louers of quiet.

c Boetio.

Many other Islands might be heere mentioned, and but mentioned: little to our purpose I finde in them. Of Acusamil, neere lucatan, is already spoken. Of the Lucia or Incia, the greatest thing is their great number, which some d esteeme aboue foure hundred. LVCAIO is a generall or collective name, as Zeland, Lequio, Malucco. The Spaniards had carried the Inhabitants, as Martyr testifieth, into seruitude, to satisfie their insatiable desire of Golde. The women of these Islands were so faire, that manie of the bordering Countries forsooke their owne Countrey, and chose this for their loue. These women weare nothing till the time of their menstruous purgation, at which time the parents made a Feast, as if she were to bee married; and after that she weareth before those parts Nets of Cotton, filled with leaues of Hearbes. They obey their King so strictly, that if he commaund them to leape downe from an high Rocke, alledging no other reason then his will, they performe the same. But they are now, and were long since desolate e being wasted in the Mines of Hispaniola and Cuba, or by diseases and famine, to the number of twelue hundred thousand.

But I am loth to wilder my selfe further in this Wildernesse of Islands (for so haue the Spaniards made them:) f Columbus in one Voyage gaue name to seuen hundred Islands; of which I can report little fitting this our Pilgrimage. Hispaniola is the Ladie and Queen of them all, and (as it were) the common Store-house of all their excellencies: and therefore we will there make some longer stay.

CHAP. XIII.

Of Hispaniola: and a touch homewards at Bermuda.

Hispaniola or Spagniola<sup>a</sup> is Eastward from Cuba. It was of the first Inhabitants called Quisqueia, afterwarde Haiti and by Columbus<sup>b</sup> Cipanga and Opbir. The Spaniards call it as we first mentioned, and also Saint Dominike or Domingo of the chiefe Citie an Archiepiscopall See. It containeth in compasse five hundred and fiftie Leagues. They called the Iland Quisqueia, which signifieth Great and All, thinking that the Sunne gaue light to no other World then this and the other Ilands adioyning, Haiti signifieth Craggie, and such is the Iland in many places, with high Craggie Hilles, overlooking the deep and darke Valleys. But in many places it is most beautifull and flourishing. It seemeth to enioy a perpetuall spring, the trees alway flourishing, and the medowes clothed in Greene. The Ayre and the Waters are holosome. It is in manner equally diuided with foure great Riuers descending from high mountaines, whereof Iunna runneth East; Attibunicus, West; Nabiba, to the South; and Iache, Northward. Some diuide it into five Prouinces, Caicimu, Hubaba, Caibabo, Baimoa, Guaicaiarima. In the first of these there is a great Caue, in a hollow Rocke, vnder the root of a high Mountaine, about two furlongs from the Sea; the entrie is like the doores of a great Temple. Many Riuers stole their waters from the light of the Sunne; the vse of men, and the ordinarie officers of Neptunes Custome-house, and by secret passages came and hid themselues in this Caue. So the Ilanders imagined, seeing diuerse Riuers swallowed vp of the earth, after they had runne foure score and ten miles, and such a sinke or channell of waters in the Caue.

The Ilanders beleued, that the Island had a vitall spirit, and that there it doth breath: and a hole therein is the female nature thereof (for of that sexe they deeme it) euen as Antiquitie conceited the ebbing and flowing of the Sea to bee the breath of Demogorgon.

Andreas Moralis entred in with his ship, which was almost swallowed with the Whirle-pooles; and boyling of the water. Cloudes, engendred of those waterie conflicts, and darknesse, layed hold on his eyes; terrible noyse, as of the fals of Nilus, made deafe his eares, that when with labour he had gotten out, hee seemed to haue escaped the barkings of Cerberus, and the obscure Vaults of Hell. Vpon the toppes of high monntaines, the same Moralis saw a Lake, three miles in compasse, into which many little Riuers ranne, without any other apparant issue.

In Bainoa is a Lake of Salt water, notwithstanding it receiue th foure great fresh Riuers from the East, West, North, and South, and twentie smaller: and within a furlong of the Lake, on the North-side, are two hundred fresh-springs. It is thought to haue a large entercouise with the Ocean, because there are Sharkes (great Sea-fishes, which deuoure men) in the same. Here are stormes and tempests, which seeme to bee the Caters and Purueyors for those fishes, in drowning many. Diuerse other Lakes are mentioned in this Iland; one whereof partly salt, partly fresh, is five and twentie miles long, and eight broad. They are all in a large Plaine, a hundred and twentie miles in length and breadth, betweene eighteene and five and twentie. There is another Vale two hundred miles long, and broader then the former: and another as broad as that, which is a hundred and fourescore miles long.

Bart. de las Casas telleth of a Kingdome in Hispaniola, called Magna, which signifieth a Plaine, compassed about with hils, which watered the same with thirtie thousand Riuers and Brookes; twelue of them were very great: and all which come from the West (twentie thousand in number) are enriched with Gold.

Cotobi is a Plaine on the toppes of Hilles, so high, that it is subiect to the foure seasons of the year. There is also another Region of the same name, most barren, and yet most rich; full of Mines, otherwise vnfruitfull; a thing common in Nature, that great Mines vndermine fertilitie; and not strange amongst men, that the greatest

<sup>b</sup> Columbus called it Cipanga thinking it to be that Iland which Marcus Paulus calls by that name in the East. Acts, 13.
 He called it also Opbir, thinking it to bee that whence Salomon had his Gold.

test hoorders of Treasures are the most vnfruitfull, and barren in good workes. The gold (they say) is as a liuing tree, which rooting in the centre of the earth, sendeth forth branches vnto the vppermost face of the Earth, and there sheweth forth certaine beautiful colours in stead of Flowers, round stones of golden Earth in stead of Fruits, and thinne plates in stead of Leaues. From this Iland<sup>a</sup> was yearely brought foure or five hundred thousand Duckats of Gold yearely. They imagine some diuine nature to bee in Gold, and therefore neuer gather it, but they vse certaine religious expiations, abstaining from women, delicate meates and drinckes, and all other pleasures.

There is an Iland a little from Hispaniola which hath a Fountaine in it, comming by secret passages vnder the Earth and Sea, and riseth in this Iland: which they beleue, because it bringeth with it the leaues of many Trees, which grow in Hispaniola, and not in this Iland; the Spaniards call the Ile Arctusa. Oniedo mentions a little Iland bewene this and Jamaica, called Nauazca, halfe a league from which are many rocks in the Sea about five foot couered with water: out of which issueth and spouteth, about the water of the Sea, a spout of fresh water as great as a mans arme, that it may be receiued and taken sweet and good. This was seene by Stephano della Rocca a man of good credit.

The Ile<sup>b</sup> of Hispaniola is much infested with Flyes, or Gnats, whose pricking causeth wonderfull swelling: also there is a Worme called Nigua which creepeth into the soles of mens feet, and makes them grow as bigge as a mans head, with extremitie of paine; for which they haue no remedie, but to open the flesh sometimes three or foure inches, and so digge them out. The Gnats<sup>c</sup> are so troublesome, that the Inhabitants doe therefore build low houses, and make little doores, which they keep close, and forbear to light Candles. Nature hath to this disease ordained a remedie, namely, certaine Creatures, called Cucuij, which is a kinde of Beetles. These haue foure lights, which shine in the night; two in the seat of his eyes, and two which he sheweth when hee openeth his wings. The people get these and bring them to their houses, which there doe them a double seruice: they kill the Gnats, and giue so much light, that men may see to read and write letters by the light of one; and many of them seeme as so many candles. They had but three sorts of foure-footed Beasts, and those verie litle. Now men are exhaust, and Beasts multiplied, in so strange manner, that one Deane of the Conception, carrying a Cow thither, she was aliue fixe and twentie yeares after, and her fruitfull generation was multiplied in the Iland to eight hundred. They are now growne wilde, as their Dogges also. They kill their Kine for the Hides: five and thirtie thousand were transported to Spaine when Acosta returned, in the yeare of our Lord one thousand five hundred eightie seuen. Ants haue beene as noysome to Hispaniola as Grasshoppers in many parts of the World: in the yeare 1519. and two yeares after, they ruined their farme-houses, and spoiled their Oranges, Cannasistula, & their fruit-trees. They could keep nothing in their houses which was fit to bee eaten, from them: and if they had continued in like quantitie, they would haue dishabited the Iland and left it desolate. But they chose by lotte a Saint, to whose tuition they might commit themselves in that extremity, which fell vpon Saturninus, who was faine to become their Patron against the Pismires. These Ants were litle and blacke: another sort were enemies to these and wrought against them and chased them out of their holdes, and were not hurtfull but as good Benefactors (if Oniedo say true of them) as I can beleue of Saturninus. Other sorts there are many, of which some become winged and fill the aire with swarmes: which sometimes happens in England. On Barnstolmew day last 1613. I was in the Iland of Foulness on our Essex-shore, where were such clouds of these flying Pismires that we could no where flie from them, but they filled our clothes, yea the Floores of some houses where they fell, were in maner couered with a blacke carper of creeping Ants; which they say drowne themselves about that time of the yeere in the sea. Oniedo tels of other Ants with white heads which eat through wals and timbers of houses and cause them to fall. There are some Caterpillers a span-long, and others lesse, but more venomous. There are wormes which doe so much harme in Timber, that a house of thirtie yeeres in this Iland would be as ruinous and seeme as old as one of a 100. in spaine: and those which could not be old when he wrot this, seemed as if they had stood 150. yeeres. Many other small creatures this our Author mentions, but my Relations would be too great to follow him.

Before the Discouery of this Island by Columbus and the Spaniards, these Islanders of Hispaniola were fore-warned thereof by Oracle. There 2 Caciques and Bubiti (that is, their Kings and Priests) reported to Columbus, That the father of Garionexius, the present King, and another Cacike, would needs be importunate demanders of their Zemes, or Gods, of future euent, and therefore abstained five dayes together from all meat and drink, spending the time in continuall mourning. The Zemes made answer, That there would come, not many yeeres after, vnto that Island, a strange Nation, clothed, bearded, armed with shining swords, that would cut a man a sunder in the middle; which should destroy the ancient Images of their Gods, abolish their Rites, and slay their children. To remember this Oracle, they composed a mournfull Dity, which they call Areito, which on some solemne daies they vsed to sing. Their Priests were Physicians and Magicians or Diuinours.

Oniedo saith that they danced at singing of their Areiti or Ballads, which word I vse because it hath that deriuation which argueth dancing aswel as singing. These dances are generall thorow America. In this Island they danced, sometimes men alone, and sometimes women alone, but in great solemnities they were mixed, and danced in a circle, one leading the dance; the measures whereof were composed to the areito, of which one sang a verse, and all the rest followed singing and dancing, and so thorow euery verse of the same till it was ended, which sometimes continued till the next day. Anacaona the widow of the Cacique Caonabo, enterdayned the Spaniards with a dance of three hundred maides. Thus these Areitos were their Chronicles and memorials of things passed, as we read of the Bards in these parts. They vsed sometimes drummes or tabers to these dances, made only of wood, hollow, and open right against that place where they did strike. In some places they couered them with Deere-skinnes but here were no beasts in this Island that could yeelde any for such purpose. They had Tabacco in religious estimation, not onely for sanity, but for sanctity also, * as Oniedo writeth, the smoke whereof they tooke in at the nose with a forked pipe fitted to both nostrills, holding the single end in the smoke of the hearbe burning in the fire, till they became senselesse. Their Priests most vsed this, which comming to themselves after this sleepe fume, deliuered the Oracles of their Zemes or Deuils, which sometimes spake by them.

Now concerning the Zemes (which could fore-tell that which they could not auent) and the superstitions of Hispaniola, <sup>h</sup> the Spaniards had beene long in the Island before they knew, that the people worshipped any thing but <sup>i</sup> the Lights of Heauen; but after, by further conuersing and living amongst them, they came to know more of their Religion, of which, one Ramonus, a Spanish Heremite, writ a Booke, and Martyr hath borrowed of him to lend vs. It is apparent by the Images which they worshipped, that there appeared vnto them certaine illusions of euill spirits. These Images they made of Gossampine cotten hard stopped, sitting, like the pictures of the Deuill, which they called Zemes; whom they take to be the mediatours and messengers of the great God, which they acknowledge, One, Eternall, Infinite, Omnipotent, Inuisible. Of these they thinke they obtaine raine, or faire weather, and when they goe to the Warres, they haue certaine little ones which they bind to their fore-heads. Euerie King hath his particular Zemes, which hee honoureth. They cal the eternal God by these two names, Iocanna, and Guamanomocou, as their predecessors taught them, affirming, That he hath a Father called by these five names, Attabeira, Mamona, Gnacarapita, Liella, Gnimazon.

They make the Zemes of diuerse matter and forme: some of Wood, as they were admonished by certaine Visions appearing to them in the Woods: others, which had receiued answer of them among the Rockes, make them of Stone: some of Rootes, to the similitude of such as appeare to them when they gather the Rootes whereof they make their bread, thinking that the Zemes sent them plentie of these Rootes. They attribute a Zemes to the particular tuition of euery thing; as sometimes the Pagan, and now the Popish Romanes: some assigned to the Sea, others to Fountaines, Woods, or other their peculiar charges. When the Boitij consult with the Zemes, they goe into the house dedicated to him, and with the powder of the hearb Cohobba, snuffed into their nostrils, are distracted; after which, returning as out of a trance, he telleth, That the Zemes had spoken to him, and uttereth his reuelations. They say, That a certaine King, called Guamaretus, had a Zemes, whose name was Corochobum, which often vsed to descend from the top of the house, where Guamaretus kept him close bound: the cause of his breaking loose was either to hide himselfe, or to goe seeke for meat, or else for the act of generation: and that sometimes being offended, that the King Guamaretus had not honoured him diligently; he was wont to lie hid for certaine daies. In this Kings Village were some children borne with two Crownes, which they supposed to be the issue of this Zemes. And when this Village was burned by the Enemie, this Zemes brake his band, and was found a furlong off, without any harme. He had another Zemes, called Epileguanita, made of Wood, being in shape like a four-footed Beast, which went often from the place where hee was honoured, into the Woods. When they perceiued that he was gone, a great multitude gathered together to seeke him, with deuout prayers: and when they had found him, brought him home religiously on their shoulders, to the Chappell dedicated vnto him. But after the Spaniards comming into the Island, he fled for altogether, and could neuer be found; whereby they diuined the destruction of their Countrey.

They honoured another Zemes, in the likenesse of a woman, on whom waited two other, like men. One of these executed the office of a messenger to the Zemes, that had authority of Clouds, Windes, and Raine, and are at command of this woman: the other performed the like to the Zemes of the Waters that fall from the Hills, that being loosed, they might breake into Flouds, and ouer-flow the Countrey, if the people doe not giue due honour to her Image.

lib. 6.

Let vs adde to this relation of the Zemes of Hispaniola an accident in Cuba. A Mariner being sicke, was there left on shore, who recouering, grew into fauour with the King, and was employed in his wars with great successe against the enemie. He attributed his victories to the Virgine Mary, whose picture he had in his bosome. The King by his perswasion reiecteth his Zemes, and dedicated a Chappell and Altar to this Picture, whither he and all his family resorted a little before the Sunne-set, bowing their heads, and saying, Aue Maria, Aue Maria; further they could not say. They beset the same with Jewels, and many Earthen-pots, some with sundry meates, some with water, round about the Tabernacle, which they offered in stead of sacrifice, as before they had done to their Zemes. Being demanded, why they did thus, they answered, Least it should lacke meat. For they beleue, that Images may hunger, and doe eat and drinke.

They told of this picture, That being carried with them into the Warres (as they vse to bring their Zemes with them into the battell) this made the Zemes of the enemy turne his backe, yea, a woman (a lye, or a Deuill) descended in the sight of them all to play the Bellona for her followers; and in a contention betwixt them, whether the Zemes or this Lady were more excellent, two young men of each side were bound, and whether Deity should loosen her party, that should be their God. Both inuoke: the Deuill appeared in vgly shape, and by and by a faire Virgin, whereat the Deuill vanished (doe you beleue it?) and the Virgin with touch of a rod loosed her mans hands, which were found on the other aduers party, being now double-bound. Thus can the Deuill transforme himselfe into an Angell of Light, at Loretto, in Hispaniola, and where else soeuer he can be entertaeyned; the name of Saints, and promise of Heauen, shall further his helish designes.

1 Dec. 7. 10.

They had festiuall Solemnities in Hispaniola to their Zemes; whereunto the Kings summoned their subiects by publike Criers: and they, neatly dressed after their manner, painted with diuers colours of hearbes, resorted thither, with their armes, thighes, legges, adorned with shels, to make Musicke in their dancing. Thus they preiented themselues before the King, who sat drumming at the entrance of the Gate. When they were to sacrifice, they purged themselues first, thrusting downe a sacred hooke hooke into their throat, and by vomit emptied their bodies. After, they went into the Kings Court, and all sate in a ring about the Idoll, crosse-legged like Taylours, and wry-necked for reuerence, praying, that their Sacrifice might be accepted. The women in another place, when the Priests gaue warning, fell to dancing and singing (in manner as is before expressed) the praise of their Zemes, and offered Cakes in baskets, concluding with Songs in praye of their ancient Kings, and prayers for future prosperitie. After this, both Sexes kneeled downe, and offered their Cakes; which the Priests receiuing, cut in peeces, giuing to euery man a portion, which he kept vntouched the whole yeare, for a holy Relique, esteeming that house in danger of Fire and Whirlewindes, that is not preserued with this referued peece of Cake. They seemed sometimes to heare a voice from their Zemes, (whether by the illusion of the Priests, or the Diuell) which the Priests interpreted by their behauiour: for if they danced and sung, all was well: but if they went sorrowfully, the people went forth sighing, and gaue themselves to fasting, euen to extreame faintnesse with weeping, vntill they thought their Zemes reconciled. In this Iland they had * as many wiues as they were able to sustaine, the Cacique Bebecinus had thirtie, two of which were buried with him perforce. Some of them were addicted to lusts of Sodomie and others more (if more may be) vnnaturall. Generally they were very luxurious, both men and women: yet they abstained from mother, sister, and daughter (other degrees they spared not) thinking that such incest would bring them to an euill death. In their buying and selling they weighed not the worth of things, but onely their owne fancie, as we see in children. Theeues they cruelly punished, empaling them on sharpe stakes aliue.

Touching the originall of Man, thus they fable. There is in the Iland a Region called Caunana, where they saie that mankind came first out of two Caues of a Mountaine called Cautas: and that the biggest sort of men came forth of the mouth of the biggest Caue, and the least sort out of the least Caue: this Caue they name Amatauna, the greater, Cazibaxagua. Before men might come out of the Caue, the mouth thereof was kept and watched nightly, by a man whose name was Machuchael, who departing further to looke abroad, was by the Sunne (the sight of whom he was forbidden) turned into a stone. They saie the like of others turned into trees; for going so far a fishing in the night, that they could not returne before the rising of the Sunne. A certaine Ruler also, called Vagoniona, sent one forth of the Caue a fishing, who by the Sunnes surprisall, was turned into a Nightingale, which therefore in the night bewaileth his misfortune. Vagoniona sore troubled with this losse, leauing the men in the Caue, brought forth the women and sucking children, and leauing the women in an Iland of that Tract, called Marbino, carried the children away with him, which being oppressed with famine, fainted; and remained on the bankes of a certaine Riuer, where they were turned to Frogs, and cried ton, ton, as children with them vse to crie for the dugge. And hence also come those pitifull cryings of the Frogs in the Spring-time. As for Vagoniona, he by speciall priuiledge was not transformed: wandering in diuers places, he descended to a certaine faire woman, whom he saw in the bottome of the sea, and receiued of her bright plates of Laten, and a kinde of stones which their Kings greatly esteemed. Another Caue they had (for the former tale is endlesse, as Superstition commonly is) called Ionanaboma, adorned with pictures of a thousand fashions. In the entrance were two grauen Zemes, whereof one was called Bintbaitel, and the other Marobu. Out of this Caue they say the Sunne and Moone first came to giue light to the world. They made religious concourse to these Caues, and men goe on Pilgrimage to Rome, Compostella or Ierusalem.

They had a superstitious conceit of their dead: who (they thought) walked in the night, and eate the fruit Guannaba (which is like to a Quince) and that they would deceiue women, in taking the shape of men; making, as though they would haue to doe with them, and suddenly vanish away. If any feeling a strange thing in his bed, made doubt whether it were a dead bodie, he might be resolu'd by feeling on his belly, because these ghosts could take all other members of mans bodie, but not the nauell (as some with vs imagine that the Diuell can take the whole shape of a man, onely his clawes excepted): these dead men, they say, often met them by the way, and if a man were not afraid, they vanished; but if he were afraid, they would assault him, and many hereby haue bene taken with the losse of their limbes. These superstitions were left them by tradition in Richmes and Songs from their fore-fathers, which it was lawfull for none to learne, but onely the Kings sonnes. They sung them before the people on solemne Feasts, playing on an instrument like a Timbrel. Their Boitij or Priests instruct them in these superstitions: these are also Physicians, making the people beleue that they obtaine health for them of the Zemes. They tie themselves to much fasting, and outward cleanness and purging; especially where they take vpon them the cure of great men: for then they drunke the powder of a certaine hearbe, which brought them into a furie, wherein they said they learned many things of their Zemes.

Much adoe they make about the sicke partie, deforming themselves with many gestures, breathing, blowing, sucking the fore-head, temples, and necke of the patient; sometimes also saying that the Zemes is angrie for not erecting a Chappell, or dedicating to him a Groue or Garden, or the neglect of other holies. And if the sicke partie die, his kin-folkes by witchcraft enforce the dead to speake, and tell them whether he died by naturall destinie, or by the negligence of the Boitij, in not fasting the full due, or ministring conuenient medicine: so that if these Physicians be found faultie, they take reuenge of them. They vsed in ministring their Physicke, to put certaine stones or bones in their mouthes, which if the women can get, they keepe religiously, beleeuing them to be profitable for them in trauell, and honour them, as they doe their Zemes.

When their Kings died, they buried the best beloued of their concubines with them, who also had other women buried for their attendants, together with their Jewels and ornaments. They had in the Sepulchre beside them a cup full of water, and some of their Casani-bread. Hispaniola is (saith Herrera) in 19. deg. 4. hath ten Spanish townes, and hath sometime had in it fourteene thousand Castilians. Ouiedo reporteth of a Huricano or Tempest, which, 1508. threw downe all the houses, except some which were built of stone in Domingo: and the whole Towne of Buona Ventura changed his name into Mala Ventura, being hereby quite ouerthrowne. Twentie saile and more were lost in the harbor of Domingo. Many men were lifted vp and carried in the aire many bow-shots, some being therby miserably bruised. In July the next yeare happened another more terrible then the former. But now, saith he, these hurricanes are nothing so fierce, since the Sacrament is placed in the Churches.

Hauiing thus wearied you with this long stay in Hispaniola (by which ye may guesse of the neighbouring Ilands) we will haste homeward, and not touching in any Iland by the way (for we could but touch and away) wee may aduenture, notwithstanding the wonted danger, vpon Bermuda. Danger hath made it now not so dangerous: no-uments haue bene documents. For while some haue bene wracked there, they haue made vertue of Necessitie, and so well obserued the coast, that skill hath almost secured that which Nature had seemed to set there in defiance, both of Habitation and Nauigation, to both which it is now subiect by our Nation. It was called Bermuda, as <sup>1</sup> Ouiedo saith, of Iohn Bermudez, which first discovered it, and Garza of the shippes name wherein he then sailed: Ouiedo writeth that he was iust by it, and had thought to haue sent some Hogges on shore there to haue multiplied, but by force of tempest was driven thence: and others either of like purpose, or by force of shipwracke haue since done it. It <sup>m</sup> is also called the Iland of Diuels, which they suppose inhabite there; and the Enchanted Iland: but these are enchanted conceits. Iob <sup>2</sup> Hortop relateth, That in the height of Bermuda they had sight of a Sea-monster, which three times shewed himselfe from the middle vpwards, in shape like a man of the complexion of a Mulato or tawnie Indian. But this name was giuen it not of such Monsters, but of the monstrous tempests which here they haue often sustained. Sir G. Sommers hath deserued that it should beare his name, by his endeavors there-about testified in life & death. He with Sir T. Gates, as before is said, were wrackt on the Iland, which losse turned to some gaine, as if God would giue them this into the Virginia-bargaine. Before, An. 1593.

Henry <sup>n</sup> May, an English-man, in a French ship was wracked thereon, and hath given vs some discourse thereof: more fully hath Syluester <sup>o</sup> Tourdan, one of that Virginian Company, one of the company of those worthy Knights, in a Treatise of that shipwracke, and the discouery of Bermuda. The commodities wherof hee reckoneth, varietie of Fishes, plentie of Hogs (which it seemeth haue escaped out of some wracks) diuers fruits, Mulberries, Silke-wormes, Palmitos, Cedars, Pearles, Amber-grise: But the most strange thing seemes the varietie of Fowle, of which they tooke a thousand of one sort in two or three houres, being as big as a Pigeon, and laying speckled egges, as big as Hens egges, on the sand, where they come and lay them daily, although men sit downe amongst them. When Sir Thomas Gates his men haue taken a thousand of them, Sir George Sommers men haue stayed a while by them, and brought away as many more. Another Fowle there is, that liueth in holes like Cony-holes; their egge like in quantitie and qualitie to Hen-egges. Other birds were so gentle, that whistling to them, they would come and gaze on you; while with your sticke you might kill them. Other egges they had of Tortoises, a bushell in the belly of one, very sweete: they tooke fortie of them in a day: and one would serue fiftie men at a meale. Two were there borne, and other two married, to make the most naturall possession thereof for our Nation; which now in hope of good successe hath there planted an habitation. That wracked Company built there a shippe and a pinace, and set saile for Virginia.

William Strachie in a large discourse, with his fluent and copious pen hath described that Tempest which brought them to this Iland, affirming that there was not an houre in foure dayes, in which they freed not out of their almost captiued ship, twelue hundred barricoes of water, each containing six gallons, and some eight: besides three pumps continually going: eutery foure houres they bestowed an hundred tuns of water on the cruell sea, which seemed more hungrie after their bodies, or thirstie for their blood: from Tuesday noone, till Friday noone, they bailed and pumped two thousand tuns, and yet were ten foot deep; nor could they haue holden out one day longer, when they first had sight of the Bermudas. These (he saith) are an Archipelagus of broken Ilands, not fewer then fise hundred, if all may be so called which lie by themselves: the greatest (which lieth like an halfe-moone) is in 32.20'. At their first landing they killed with batts seuen hundred fowles, like to Gulls, at one time. The Ilands seeme rent with tempests of thunder, lightning, and raine, which threaten in time to deuour them all: the stormes in the full and change keepe their vchangeable round Winter and Summer, rather thundring then blowing from euery corner, sometimes eight and fortie houres * together; especially when the Halo (or circle about the Moone) appeareth, which is often, & there foure times as large as with vs. The North and Northwest windes cause Winter in December, January, and February: yet not such but then yong birds to be seene. Without knowledge a boat of ten tuns cannot be brought in, and yet within is safe harbour for the greatest ships. They found there for their sustenance wilde Palmitos, the tops of which trees roasted did eate like fried Melons; sodden, like Cabages: with the leaues they couered their cabins: Berries blacke and round, as big as a Damson, ripe in December, and very luscious: in the Winter they shed their leaues. No Iland in the world had more or better Fish. Of Fowles was great varietie. They killed a wilde Swanne. Some there are which breed in high Ilands in holes, to secure them from the Swine. They haue their seasons, one kinde succeeding another. Besides this reliefe of Fowles, they had plentie of Tortoise egges, which they lay as big as Goose egges, and commit to the Sunne and sands hatching nurserie. They had sometimes fise hundred in one of them. Euen heere (lest the Iland should lose that former name of Diuells) some entered into diuellish conspiracie three seuerall times. Some were banished, and after reconciled. Henry Paine was shot to death. Some fled to the woods, but all reduced, except Christopher Carter * and Robert Waters. But these Ilands haue now beene possessed diuers yeares by an English Colonie; and my friend Master Barkley (which hath beene there, and is now onwards on a second Voyage thither) seemeth rauished with the naturall endowments, both for health and wealth, of these Ilands: which now are to be shared amongst the Aduenturers, and fortified against all inuasions, Nature it selfe being herein readie to further their securitie against the greatestt forren force, mustering windes (which some say are violent further off, but calmer neere the Ilands) and rocks many leagues into the sea, for their defence: which now yet they are gone to strengthen, both with men and munition. The Colonie that is there haue not onely sent verball, but reall commendations of the place: as may appeare by a Treatise * thereof lately set forth by one, which in the Shippe called the Plough, sailed thither Anno 1612. wherein is declared the commodities there found, as Mullers, Breames, Lobstars, and angel-like Hog-fish, Rockfish, &c. as before is said. The aire is very healthfull, as their experience (the best argument) hath found, and agreeing well with English bodies: the ground as fertile as any (they say) in the world: Ambergreece, Pearle, Cedars and other vnkowne Timbers: store of Whales and other commodities, which would be tedious to rehearse: which I hope and pray, may further prosper, to the profit of this and the Virginia Plantations. From hence and thence, I am now passing in an English ship for England, where to passe away tediousnesse of the Voyage, I will entertaine my Reader with a discourse of the more then tedious and fastidious Spanish cruelties.

Or as much as the Papists doe vsually glory in the purchase of a new World vnto their Religion, and would haue men beleue, that since this Scripture-Heresie hath made new Rome to tremble now, no lesse then Hannibal did her Pagan-Mother, they haue a new <sup>a</sup> supply with much aduantage in this Westerne World of America; and they make this their Indian conuersion, one of the Markes of <sup>b</sup> the trueneſſe and Catholicisme of their Church, which hath gained (if Possuin lie not) an hundred times as much in the New World towards the West, South, and East, by new Conquerers, as it hath lost in the North parts by Heretikes: where through both the Hemispheres (saith Hill) these thousand yeares, nay as farre as the Sunne shineth, there is no tongue, nor people, nor climate, which hath not in some measure (such a measure perhaps as he measured his truth and wit withall in this assertion) the Catholike Roman Religion. I would we could borrow the height of this Hill, whereon to stand and ouer-ueiw so many parts of the world yet vnkowne, and learne of this Giant Atlas (how easily may this mute become a liquid?) which beareth thus the Hemisphere, of his Roman heauen on his mounting shoulders, a new Geographic. But his impudencie is already sufficiently whipped and exposed to the worlds derision, by him, the neereſſe of whose presence doth now so much glad me after so long and far a Pilgrimage. His learned pen hath shewed the like bold bragges of Briſſow and Stapleton his Masters, and proued them fables. For further confutation whereof, it shall not be amisse to obserue the proceedings of the Spaniards in these parts. And herein wee will vse the witnesse of men of their owne Romish Religion. Iosephus <sup>c</sup> Acoſta, a leſuite, writeth, that the Indians conceive an implacable hatred against the Faith, by the scandall of the Spaniards cruelties: and that they haue baptised some by force. Vega <sup>d</sup> accuseth them of Baptising without making them know the faith, or taking knowledge of their life. And how could it otherwise be, when <sup>e</sup> we finde it recorded of sundrie of their Preachers, that baptised each one of them aboue an hundred thousand, and that in few yeares. In so much that (as is storied by Snyſſen) it is to be found among the records of Charles the fifth, that some old Priest hath baptised seuen hundred thousand, another three hundred thousand. Some of these were so good Christians, that they still continued (as Nunno di Guzman writeth to the Emperour) the sacrifices of humane flesh. Oniedo writeth, that they haue but the name of Christians, and are baptised rather because they are of age then for deuotion to the faith, and none or very few of them are Christians willingly.

He that will reade what they lately haue done in Spaine with the remnants of the Moores, may perhaps satisfie himselfe with the reasons of Frier Fonseca in defence thereof. But for the poore Indians, Bartholomaeus de Las Casas, a F Dominican Frier, of the same order with Fonseca, and after a Bishop in America, hath written a large and vnanswerable Treatise of the enormous cruelties, & vnchristian Antichristian proceedings in the new world, the summe whereof is this, That the Indians were a simple harmelesse people, loyall to their Lords; and such as gaue no cause to the Spaniards of dislike, till they by extreame iniuries were prouoked: they are also docible and pliant, both to good doctrine and liuing. To these Lambes, saith he, the Spaniards came as cruell and hungrie Tygres, Beares, and Lions, intending nothing those fortie years (he wrote this Ann. 1542.) but bloud and slaughter, to satisfie their Auarice and Ambition: in so much that of three millions of people, which were contained in Hispaniola of the Naturall inhabitants, there scarce remained at that time three hundred, and now as Alexandro Vrsino reporteth none at all: onely two and twentie thousand Negros and some Spaniards reside there.

Cuba, and the other Ilands had indured the like miserie, and in the firme Land tenné Kingdomes, greater then all Spaine, were dispeopled and desolate; and in that space there had not perished lesse then twelve millions by their tyrannie: and he might truly say that fiftie millions had payed Natures debt.

In the Iland Hispaniola the Spaniard had their first Indian habitations, where their cruelties draue the Indians to their shifts, and to their weake defence, which caused those enraged Lions, to spare neither man, woman, nor childe: they ripped vp the great-bellied women, and would lay wagers, who could with most dexteritie strike off an Indians head, or smite him asunder in the middle: they would pluck the Infants by the heeles from their mothers breasts, and dash out their braines against the stones, or with a scoffe hurle them into the Riuer. They set vp Gibbets, and in honour of Christ and his twelue Apostles (as they said, and could the Diuell say worse?) they would both hang and burne them. Others they tooke, and cutting their hands almost off, bid them carrie those letters (their hands dropping bloud, and almost dropping off themselves) to their Countrey-men, which (for feare of the like) lay hidden in the Mountaines. The Nobles and commanders, they broiled on gridirons: I once (saith our Author) saw foure or fiue of the chiefe of them thus roasted, which making a lamentable noise, the nicer Captain had they should be strangled, but the cruell tormentor, chose rather to stop their mouthes, so to preuent their out-cries, and to continue their broyling till they were dead. They had Dogs to hunt them out of their couerts, which deuoured the poore foules: and because sometimes the Indians, thus prouoked, would kill a Spaniard, if they found opportunitie, they made a law, that a hundred of them should for one Spaniard be slaine. The King of Magua offered to till the ground for them fiftie miles space, if they would spare him and his people from the mines. The Captaine in recompence deflowred his wife, and he hiding himselfe, was taken, and sent into Spaine; but the ship perished in the way, and therein that admirable & graine of gold, which weighed in the first finding (being pure) so many thousand crowns as in the first Chapter of the eight booke is mentioned.

In the Kingdome of Xaragua in Hispaniola, the Gouvernour called before him three hundred Indian Lords, which he partly burned in a house, & put the rest to the sword, and hanged vp the Queene, as they did also to Hiquanama the Queene of Hiquey. Of all which cruelties our Author an eye-witnesse affirmeth, that the Indians gaue no cause by any crime, that had so deserved by any law. And for the rest that remained after these warres, they shared them as slaues. They which should haue instructed them in the Catholike faith, were ignorant, cruell, and couetous. The men were spent in the mines, the women consumed in tillage, and both by heauie burthens which they made them carrie, by famine, by scourging, and other miseries.

And thus they did in all other parts wheresoeuer they came. In the Isles of Saint John, and Lamayca, were fixe hundred thousand Inhabitants, wherof then when the

Author

Author wrote this, there were scarcely left two hundred in eyther Iland. Cuba extendeth furthest in length of any of these Ilands. Here was a Cacique named Hathuey, which called his subiects about him, and shewing them a boxe of golde, said, that was the Spaniards God and made them daunce about it very solemnly; and left the Spaniards should haue it, he hurled it into the Riuer. Being taken and condemned to the fire, when he was bound to the stake, a Frier came and preached heauen to him, and the terrors of hell: Hathuey asked if any Spaniards were in heauen, the Frier answered, yea, such as were good; Hathuey replied, he would rather goe to hell, then goe where any of that cruell Nation were.

I was once present, saith Casas, when the Inhabitants of one town brought vs forth victuall, and met vs with great kindnesse, and the Spaniards without any cause slewe three thousand of them, of euery age and sexe. I, by their counsell, sent to other townes to meete vs, with promise of good dealing, and two and twentie Caciques met vs, which the Captaine against all faith caused to be burned. This made the desperate Indians hang themselves (which two hundred did, by the occasion of one mans cruelty): and one other Spaniard seeing them take this course, hee made as though he would hang himselfe too, and persecute them in the Regions of death, which feare detained some from that selfe-execution. Sixe thousand children died, saith our former Author, in three or foure moneths space, while I was there, for the want of their parents which were sent to the mines: they hunted out the rest in the mountaines, and desolated the Iland. Neither did the other Ilands speed better. The Lucaiz they brought to an vtter desolation: and shipping multitudes of men for the mines in Hispaniola (wanting food for them) the third part commonly perished in the way; so that an vnskilfull Pilot might haue learned this way by Sea, by those floating markes of Indian carcases. This Spanish pestilence spread further to the Continent, where they spoyled the shores, and the Inland countries of people. From Dariena to Nicaragua, they slew foure hundred thousand people with Dogges, Swords, Fire, and diuers tortures.

h Marke this way of conuerting Infidels.

Their course<sup>h</sup> of preaching was, to send, vnder paine of confiscation of lands, libertie, wife, life, and all, to acknowledge God and the Spanish King, of whom they had neuer heard. Yea, they would steale to some place halfe a mile off the Citie, by night, and there publish the Kings decree in this sort, being alone by themselves: Ye Caciques and Indians of this place or that place (which they named) Be it knowne to you, that there is one God, one Pope, and one King of Castile, who is Lord of these lands. Come quickly and doe your homage. And then in the night, whiles they were asleepe, fired their houses, and slew and tooke captiues at their pleasure, and then fell to search for golde. The first Bishop that came into these parts, sent his men to be partakers of the spoile. A Cacique gaue the Spanish Gouvernour the weight in golde of nine thousand crownes; he (in thankfulnessse) to extort more, bound him to a post, and put fire to his feet, and forced him to send home for a further addition of three thousand. They not satisfied, persisted in their tormenting him, till the marrow came forth at the soles of his feet, whereof he died. When any of the Indians, employed by the Spaniards, failed vnder their heauie burthens, or fainted for want of necessities, lest they should lose time in opening the chaine wherein he was tied, they would cut off his head, and so let the bodie fall out. The Spaniard robbed the Nicaraguans of their corne, so that thirtie thousand died of famine, and a mother eate her owne childe: fise hundred thousand were carried away into bondage, besides fiftie or sixtie thousand slaine in their warres; and now, saith Casas, remaine foure or fise thousand, of one of the most populous Regions of the world. Here did Vaschun<sup>i</sup> giue at one time foure Kings to be deuoured of Dogges.

i P. Mart. dec. 3. lib. Cortes accustomed himselfe to haue foure Kings attend on him. Dec. 8 lib. 3. 2. He burned 60. Kings, their heires looking on.

In New Spaine, from the year 1518. to 1530. in foure hundred and eightie miles about Mexico, they destroyed about foure millions of people in their conquests by fire and sword, not reckoning those which died in seruitude and oppression. In the Province of Naco & Honduras, from the year 1524. to 1535. two millions of men perished, & scarcely two thousand remained. In Guatimala, from the year 1524. to 1540. they destroyed about foure or fise millions vnder that Almarado, who dying by the fall of his horse, as is before said, complained (when hee was asked where his paine was most most) of his soule-torment: and his Citie Guatimala was with a three-fold deluge of earth, of water, of stones, oppressed and ouerwhelmed. He forced the Indians to follow him in his Expeditions, in armies of 10, or 20000, not allowing them other sustenance, then the flesh of their slain enemies, maintayning in his Armie shambles of mans flesh. In Panuco and Xalisco their state was much like; one made eight thousand Indians wall about his Garden, and let them all perish with famine. In Machuacan they tortured the King that came forth to meete them, that they might extort golde from him. They put his feet in the stockes, and put fire thereto, binding his handes to a post behinde him; and a boy stood by basting his roasted feete with oyle, another with a Crosse-bow bent to his breast, and on the other hand another with Dogges; of these tortures he died. They forced the Indians to deliuer their Idols, hoping they had bid of gold, but their golden hope failing, they forced them againe to redeeme them. Yea where the Friars had in one place made the Indians to cast away their Images, the Spaniards brought them some from other places to sell them.

In the Prouince of S. Martha they had desolated foure hundred and fiftie miles of land. The Bishop wrote to the King, that the people called the Spaniards Diuells, or Tares, for their Diabolical practises; and thought the Law, God, and King of the Christians, had beene authors of this crueltie.

The like they did in the Kingdome of Venezuela, destroying foure or five millions, and out of that firme Land, carried to the Ilands for slaues at times, in seuenteen years, a million of people.

But why doe I longer trace them in their bloudie steps; seeing our Author that relates much more then I, yet protesteth that it was a thousand times worse. Or what should I tell their sparing no persons, plucking the childe from the breast to quarter it to his dogges? torturing Kings with new deuises, borrowed eyther from the Inquisition, or from Hell? cutting off the noses and hands of men and women that liued in peace with them? selling the father, mother, childe, to diuers places and persons? lying with the women (as one of them bragged) that being with childe, they might yeeld more money in the sale? How was Nature become degenerate in these prodigious monsters? Euen the nature of things might be abashed with the sense of this vn-naturall senselesse. The Tygre would but deuoure his prey, and not curiously torment it; the Lion sometimes spares it; nay their Dogges haue somtime beene lesse dogged, then their doggish diuellish masters. How may we admire that long-suffering of God, that rained not a floud of waters, as in Noahs time, or of fire, as in Lots, or of stones, as in Ioshuas, or some vengeance from heauen vpon these models of Hell? And how could Hell forbear swallow such prepared morsels, exceeding the beastlineffe of beasts, inhumanitie of wonted tyrants, and diuellishnesse, if it were possible, of the Diuels? But these you will say were <sup>k</sup> Souldiours: let vs leaue the Campe and looke to their Temples.

There perhaps you shall see their Priests reading, praying, and (this they most glorie of) preaching to conuert the Indians by their word and workes. Aske Colmenero, a Priest of Saint Martha, who being asked what he taught the Indians, said that he deuoted them with curses to the Diuell, and this sufficed, if he said to them, Per signum Sanctis Crucis. You haue heard what good Diuinitie the Dominican preached to Atabaliba King of Peru (which wanted not her wants of millions by their cruelties; as well as the former). They teach them (saith <sup>l</sup> Acosta) a few prayers in the Spanish tongue, which they understand not; and they which are more painefull, a Catechisme without explanation.

Their teaching is but a iest and shadow to get money: they follow dicing, hunting, whooring; in somuch that Baptisme is scorned, and the Indians are forced to it against their wills: and a sincere and <sup>m</sup> vpright Iudge was wont to say, that if hee came into Spaine, hee would perswade the King to send no more Priests into America; such is their dissolutenesse. They had then indeede three Archbishoprickes; that of Dominico, which had sixe Suffragane-Bishops; the second of Mexico, which had seuen; the third of Los Reyes to which were subiect three Bishops: yet these teach the people vices by their practise and ill example; in somuch that the Indians (saith Casas) are of opinion opinion that the King of Spain (which hath such subiects, as the Spaniards shew themselves) is himselfe most cruell, and liues on mans flesh; and that of all gods, the God of the Christians is the worst, which hath so bad seruants, longing for their owne gods, of whom they neuer receiued such ill, as now by this of the Christians. The Spaniards cannot endure the Indians to heare a Sermon, thinking it makes them idle (as Pharaoh said of the Israelites) and captious: they learne them Vsurie, lying, swearing, blasphemie, and repugnant to their Nature. Thus did a Cacique<sup>o</sup> describe a Christian to Benzo, by the vnchristian course of the Spaniards. Christian (saith he, looking Benzo on the face) what are Christians? They imperiously demand Mays, Hony, Silke, Rayment, an Indian woman to lye with them; they call for Gold and Siluer, they will not worke; are Gamsters, Diccers, Wicked, Blasphemers, Back-biters, Quarrellers: and concluded, that Christians could not be good. Benzo said, that euill Christians did such things, not the good ones: he replied, where are those good, for I neuer saw any but bad. Hee was threescore and tenne yeares olde, and spake Spanish perfectly. Benzo saith, that they would not looke on the Christians, but curse them, and as before is said, called them Sea-froth. Hee being very inquisitiue to see what they thought of our faith, reporteth, that some of them taking a peece of Gold, will say, Lo here the Christians God: for this they kill vs, and one another, for this they play, blaspheme, curse, steale, and doe all maner of villanies. <sup>q</sup> A Franciscan publicly said, that there was neither Priest, Monke, nor Bishop, good in all India: and the Priests themselves will say, they came thither for gaine. A Caciques sonne which was towardly in his youth, and prooued after dissolute, being asked the reason thereof, said, Since I was a Christian I haue learned to sweare in varietie, to dice, to lie, to swagger, and now I want nothing but a Concubine (which I meane to haue shortly) to make me a complete Christian. These indeede are the myracles that the Spaniards worke in the Indies, saith our Authour: I asked an Indian once if hee were a Christian; he againe asked me if he should bee the Bishops Groome a dozen yeares to keepe his Mule. Others of the Indians, saue a little washing and some cold ceremonies, know nothing of our religion.

You haue heard what Commerce and conference many of them were wont to haue with the Deuill: and how the Spaniards haue taught them, now to scarre him away with the signe of the Crosse. And this is the report of a certaine Spanish Treatise of Prelates, that the Diuell is now frayed away with the presence of the holy Sacrament of the Eucharist, and of the holy Crosse: weapons spirituall in pretence, carnall in the inuention, but neither preuailing like the spirituall which Paul mentions, nor effecting so much as some say<sup>r</sup> of those which are indeede carnall and wholly materiall: Yea these thus vsed (with deniall of the power of the Crosse and godlinesse) are the Scepters of his Empire amongst them. And for those carnall weapons which Paul disclaimed, the Spaniards doe not onely acknowledge but glory off: Nunio <sup>u</sup> di Gusman auerreteth in a writing to the Emperour, that howsoeuer some finde fault with their warres vpon the Indians so to bring them to the faith, yet he accompts it a most worthy and holy worke and of so great merit, that in the seruice of God none can bee greater.

The Indians haue liued at more quiet with the Spaniards, since the King proclaimed them free; yet still hate them: and for their Christianitie, Franciscus <sup>x</sup> à Victoria protesteth, that it doth not appeare to him, that Christian Religion had beene propounded in meete sort to the Indians: Miracles he heard not of, but on the contrarie, scandals, villanies, and many impieties. This is the Preaching and Conuersion the Romists boast of, and gull our European world with musters of their miracles, and thousands of their Proselytes, which we rather pitie then enuie.

How the case is altered, since that new generation of the Ignatian brood hath taught (especially the Spaniards, whose they are, and whom they serue) a better Catholicisme; let Arnaldus <sup>z</sup> tell you: he saith, that they haue indeed wrought miracles amongst the Indians: among which he reckoneth conuerting the Pagans, by butcherly subuerting and rooting them out. In Hispaniola, by keeping the husbands and wiues in diuers workes asunder, the old generation being thus worne out, and a new preuented. In Peru they had publike places of torture within the Marches, wherein they might put a thousand at once, by tortures to drawe forth confessions of their hidden treasures: such as escaped, hanged themselves in the mountaines, and their wiues by them, with their children at their feet. By their Dogges at Land they worried them: and in their Pearle-fishing exposed them to the raucning Sharkes, themselves more dogged and sharking then the brute Creatures; by fire and sword consuming twentie millions of the people, I would giue the Deuill his due, and therefore would not ascribe all this to those later Loeusts, the Iesuites: who are yet accounted the most cunning and zealous Architects, in setting vp the roose of that aspiring Spanish Monarchy, these and the like bloudie foundations notwithstanding; and therefore may be called Accessories after. As for the Spaniards, we see them, by testimonie of their owne, accused of the same things. And how the Ignatians wash their hands (not from, but in) bloud, our Europe can testifie.

What Deuill brought the Inquisition (his faire daughter much resembling his accursed presence) I know not: our Country-men <sup>a</sup> Philips, Hortop, and others, knew to their cost. But what should we speake of the Spanish crueltie to others? Looke on their dealing with each other in ciuill broyles: thus dealt they with Columbus rewarding him with chaines, and sending him prisoner to Spaine, by that way which hee first of all, and for Spaine, had discovered. What Roldanus and his rebellious faction did in Hispaniola, and Vaschus in the Continent, Martyr relateth. But the bloudest butcheries passed in Peru: where Couetousnesse, which before had ioyned, now diuorced the hearts of Pizarro and Almagro; and after that, that neerer coniunction of the head and bodie of Almagro; <sup>b</sup> reuenged in the persons of all the Pizarri, which againe retorted the like vengeance vpon the Almagrist; their ghosts seeming, or some hellish furies rather, to be loosed on that Peruvian stage, and to haue brought like mischiefs to the beholders and actors in this Tragedie. Vengeance seemed to haue broken forth of Atabaliba tombe, armed with sword, fire, halter, chaines, yea the Spaniards themselves offered themselves her officious vassals, to become cruell Executors of her bloudie Will, in mutuall executions vpon themselves. The awfull names of Viceroyes, Gouernours, and Captaines, were no lesse subiected to imprisonment and death, then the poorest souldier. But for these ciuill vnciuill cruelties amongst themselves, they require a good Orator to describe them: and those former tyrannies vpon the Indians, are beyond all oratory and description. Thunders from heauen had need be the voice to vtter such hellish and vheard-of massacres; Deuils from hel were fittest Scribes, with the fierce characters of their infernal work-houses to register them; the reading whereof might astonish the sense of the Reader, amaze his reason, exceede his faith and fill his heart with horror and vncouth passions. For me; I want fit words to paint them in their black colours: my hand with reluctance trembleth at the writing: my tongue faltereth in the speaking, and wholly I seeme to my self surprised with distraction, and not to be my self. whiles the view of this Spanish Medusa transformeth me into a stone: the rather when I thinke such should our English Conuersion haue beene, if in that dismall yeare 1588. England had as well succeeded to them as the Indies: or if since, our Catholike Preachers had preuailed in their Powder-proiects, in the yeare 1605. who for a Temple chose a Vault, that their workes of darknes might be done in the dark, and their work-house might be neerer to hel, thence to borrow at hand supplies of deuillish deuises, and in neerer familiaritie to consult with the Deuill. For wordes, they had prepared a sulfurous breath, the smoke whereof might darken the heauens; the fire might rent the trembling & astonished Earth; the noise might make the Hearers past Hearing, and being, together. Once, those hellish Cerberi by such preaching had intended there to haue opened the mouth of hell vpon vs, which should haue swallowed our Lawes, our Religion, our Sunne, Moone, and Morning-Starre (the King Queene, and Prince) Our fairest Skie of fixed and well ordered lights, then shining in their greatest splendour of Parliament-brightnesse. The Giants of old were said to bee the sonnes of the Earth but these, as they were engendred of Earth, so had they incestuously violated that their mother (whether you vnderstand it in a literall or mysticall sense) and begotten in her wombe this Hell-monster of their bloudie Catholicisme; they had deligned the time of her Trauell, and themselves would haue bin the Mid-wiues; the Deuils had had bidden themselves as Gossips, and at that opening of the Earths wombe in her fierie trauell would haue sent that way into the World (to attend the babe) all the black-guard of Hell, Treason, Superstition, Atheisme, Ignorance, Fire, Sword, and all Confusion, in a reuolution of a worse Chaos then that <sup>a</sup> Tohu and Bohu of olde could haue effected. Then should it haue beene no maruell, if Rome, France, Spaine, or any other had exercised tyrannie or crueltie, seeing all must haue come short of the first crueltie, which our English Catholikes had executed, to open the floudgates of bloud vnto them. And all this was the Catholike cause, and these the Preachers, or the Vshers rather to the Preachers (for the Iesuites will be angrie if we take from them their bloody priuiledge of this new Catholicisme, which the Deuill (till now he is an older and cunninger Serpent) had neuer learned himselfe, nor could learne others, till he had gotten Ignatius Vshers in his hellish Schoole. But whither is your Pilgrime transported? Friend, I draw neere my port, and leauing America behind me, still red with this bloud; now also hauing England in sight, which (as from a greater height) was neere to a more dangerous fall: and in this subiect, which is of the Spanish cruelties, not written in hatred of their Nation, because they are Spaniards, but of their Pseudo-catholike Religion, vnder shew whereof they there did, and heere would haue executed those butcheries: and for thankfulness to God for our later deliuerance, of which the time when I relate these things (being the returne of that ver yday <sup>b</sup>, wherein those things should haue beene effected) iustly demandeth my best testimonie: I haue thus told out my storie.

FINIS.

Good Reader, let me intreat thy patience and fauour in correcting these faults which in my absence (by want of skill or diligence in them to whom it belonged at the presse) haue corrupted the sense. The faults are many: such as are in exotike languages, marginall notes, false printings, or meerey literall, I hope they which can finde, can and will amend. These others which haue passed in the text, I haue beere endeouored to acquain the with, and pray thee to amend before thou readest: desiring like fauour, if any other haue escaped my hasty enquire. My serue dwelling, and neere search for such intelligence as might benefit thee, would not suffer mee to attend the presse myselfe, which hath thereby thus oppressed both mee and thee. The first number is of the page, the following of the line in the same page.
